

John Adams
Library.

IN THE CUSTODY OF THE BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.

SHELF N^o

ADAMS

411

v.1

John Adams

Jackson

THE HISTORY OF
ENGLAND.

Written in FRENCH by

Mr. RAPIN de THOYRAS.

Translated into ENGLISH with Additional NOTES, by N. TINDAL, M. A. Vicar of Great Waltham in Essex.

The SECOND EDITION.

VOL. I.

2285
4

LONDON:

Printed for JAMES, JOHN and PAUL KNAPTON, at the Crown in Ludgate-street, near the West-End of St. Paul's.

M DCC XXXII.

HISTORY

OF ENGLAND.

MR. RAPIN DE THOYRAS.

ADAMS

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2009

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS
FREDERIC
PRINCE of WALES.

S I R,

Y prefuming to offer to YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS this Translation, is in some measure justified by the Nature of the Subject, and Reason of the Thing. For History, however useful to others, is infinitely more so to a Prince, and particularly the History of that Crown He is born to wear. How instructive, as well as agreeable, must a fair and impartial Narration of the Lives and Actions of a long Series of Predecessors be to Him? And that Such is the following History, originally penned by a Foreigner, who had no Party to serve, or Interest to promote, may be undoubtedly concluded from the universal Approbation it every where meets with.

HERE then, as from a faithful Monitor, uninfluenced by Hopes or Fears, YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS will learn, in general, That to a Prince nothing is so pernicious as Flattery; nothing so valuable as Truth: That proportionable to his People's Liberty and Happiness will be his

DEDICATION.

Glory and Strength: That true Valour consists not in destroying, but protecting Mankind; not in conquering Kingdoms, but defending them from Violence: That a Prince's most secret Counsels, Motives and Pursuits, will probably one day be published and rigorously judged; and, however flattered whilst living, yet when dead, he will be treated as his Actions have deserved, with Honour or Reproach, with Veneration or Contempt.

MORE particularly, YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS will Here perceive, that foreign Acquisitions and Conquests were generally fatal to England; all Increase of Empire burdensome to her, except That of the Ocean, which can never be too extensive, as it enlarges and protects her Trade, the principal Fountain of her Riches and Grandeur.

BUT above all, you will Here see the Origin and Nature of our Excellent Constitution, where the Prerogatives of the Crown, and Privileges of the Subject are so happily proportioned, that the King and the People are inseparably united in the same Interests and Views. You will observe that this Union, though talked of by even the most Arbitrary Princes with respect to their Subjects, is peculiar to the English Monarchy, and the most solid Foundation of the Sovereign's Glory, and the People's Happiness.

ACCORDINGLY, you will Here constantly find, that in the Reigns where this Union was cultivated, the Kingdom flourished, and the Prince was glorious, powerful, trusted, beloved. On the contrary, when, by an Arbitrary Disposition, or evil Counsels, it was interrupted, the Constitution languished, mutual Confidence vanished, Distrust, Jealousy, Discord arose; and when entirely broken, as was unfortunately sometimes the Case, Confusion and Civil Wars ensued.

As this Union, so essential to our Government, was by Your Royal Grandfather, and is by His Present Majesty, Your Royal Father, steddily adhered to, so it is with extreme Satisfaction presumed, that the same Adherence will distinguish YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS's future Reign, a Presumption grounded upon Your many noble Endowments, but chiefly on that Foundation of all other, as well as Royal, Virtues, a generous Mind, which naturally abhors Oppression and Tyranny.

PRESUMING on this known Generosity, I most humbly intreat YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS's gracious Acceptance of this Address and Translation, and beg leave to have the Honour of subscribing my self, with profound Respect and Submission,

S I R,

Your ROYAL HIGHNESS's

Most humble, most dutiful,

And most obedient Servant,

N. TINDAL.

T H E P R E F A C E.

WHEN Mr. Rapin first begun this Work, he little thought of writing a compleat History of England. His long stay in our Island giving him an opportunity of learning our Language; and his Post in the Army, during the War in Ireland, even obliging him to it, he diligently applied himself to the reading of English Books, and particularly of such as treated of the Government and History of England, after the Norman Conquest. As the desire of knowledge continually increases, and being master of his time, he was not satisfied with understanding the Nature, but wished also to know the Original, of the English Constitution. To this end, he thought it necessary to peruse carefully the History of the Anglo-Saxons, who introduced this form of Government into Great-Britain. He found this Study to be very discouraging, the History of the Anglo-Saxons being like a vast Forest, where the Traveller, with great difficulty, finds a few narrow paths to guide his wandering steps. It was this however that inspired him with the design of clearing this part of the English History, by removing the rubbish, and carrying on the Thread so, as to give at least a general Knowledge. For this purpose, he was indispensably obliged to show, how the Saxons came to send Troops into Great-Britain, and why a Conquest, which had cost them so much, was abandoned by the Romans. In a word, he fixed the beginning of his History to the time of Julius Cæsar, who first attempted to conquer our Island, intending to conclude with the Norman Conquest. But not knowing how to employ his time better, and besides finding, that after the Conquest, the Scene was changed, and from a wild Forest he was entered into a cultivated Country, where the way was easy, he resolved to proceed. However, when he came to the Reign of Henry II, he was upon the point of relinquishing his Work, of which the beginning gave him no encouragement, when an unexpected assistance, not only induced him to continue it, but also to form the project of a much larger History than what he at first intended. This assistance was RYMER'S FOEDERA, communicated to our Author by the famous le Clerc, to whom, being then publishing at the Government's charge, the Volumes were sent by the Lord Halifax, a great Promoter of that noble Work.

This Collection, consisting then of seventeen Folios, which are lately reprinted with two additional Volumes, was of infinite service to our Author in compiling his History, and enabling him to clear numberless things which remained in obscurity. It afforded him means, 1. To rectify the Dates in many places. 2. To discover a great number of errors in the best English, Scotch, French, Italian, and Spanish Historians. 3. To decide, on many occasions, concerning the contrarieties between the Historians. 4. To insert in his History many Events, wholly omitted, or but slightly mentioned by others. In a word, it is This that chiefly distinguishes his History from all that have appeared before this Collection was published. For it is easy to see what an advantage it was to him, since it contains Treaties of Peace, Truce, League, Marriages, Commerce, made by the Kings of England with other Princes; Ambassadors Instructions; their Letters and Informations, as well concerning their own Negotiations, as the affairs of the Courts to which they were sent; very instructive Memoirs upon affairs confusedly spoken of by the Historians; Letters Patents; Orders; Safe-Conducts; with numberless other Papers, which cannot be ranged under general Heads, and which are of great use to a Historian. All these Mr. Rapin was so well acquainted with, that he has published Abstracts of seventeen Volumes, to show the relation of these Acts to the History of England. This Work to a Man less versed in the English History than Mr. Rapin, would require his whole life; but to him, who knew the intent and motive of every Act, it was only a diversion. By the way, it may be added, that Mr. Rapin had a thorough knowledge of our Parties and Factions, as appears in his Dissertation on the Whigs and Tories, published in 1717, and translated into English, Dutch, Danish, and twice into High-Dutch.

The advantage which the use of RYMER'S Collection, gave Mr. Rapin over all our Historians, serves, in great measure, to remove the objection of his being a Foreigner, which naturally arises in the mind of an Englishman. But if it is farther considered, that besides this advantage, he not only carefully perused all the English Historians, but also confronted them with those of the neighbouring States, whether they wrote in Latin, French, Italian, or Spanish, it must be owned this objection entirely vanishes, and that supposing his judgment and capacity equal to the Work, (which the Publick by an uncommon approbation seems to allow) he was in all other respects as well qualified as any Englishman can be.

As his assistances were extraordinary, so there's reason to believe his impartiality uncommon. For besides his privilege, as a Foreigner, of freely speaking the truth, without fear of offending any Party, he had no motive or interest to induce him to be partial to England, or any of the neighbouring States. His Life was equally spent in France, England, Holland, and Germany. During the seventeen years he was employed in this Work, he had no Post or Pension, nor exercised any Profession, which might bias him to one Nation more than another, and as he had no particular obligations to any of the forementioned States, so he had no reason to complain of ever receiving the least injustice.

But notwithstanding his endeavours to be entirely impartial, he plainly foresaw, People's prejudices in favour of their own Nation, would prevent them from doing him justice upon several occasions. But this was a Rock he could not avoid. How is it possible, for instance, to relate the Contests between the English and Scots, to the satisfaction of both? The War between them in the XIVth Century, concerning the Sovereignty of the Kings of England over Scotland, cannot be described with its Causes and Circumstances, without exasperating the one or the other. The Scots are persuaded, Edward I. acted very unjustly with their Ancestors, and that his Grandson Edward III. was not more scrupulous. The English, on the contrary, believe, their Kings had Then and long Before an uncontested right of Sovereignty over all Scotland, and that Edward the First's War upon that account was very lawful. Our Author has declared for the Scots, as believing the Truth on their side. For which reason he has endeavoured to set this whole affair in the clearest light possible, thinking it the duty of a Historian, to correct such errors as have gathered strength from Time, or from the negligence and prejudices of former Writers.

The quarrel between Edward III and Philip de Valois, in which so much blood was spilt, is another instance wherein it is almost impossible to please both the English and French. Among the French, the Salic Law is a Noli me tangere. To satisfy them, not only the Antiquity of that Law must be acknowledged, but the Sense and Extent must also be left unexamined. The English, on their side, are no less prejudiced. Without considering that Edward could have no right to the Crown of France, but on supposition of the authority of the Salic Law, they alledge against it such reasons, as are not only unserviceable, but even prejudicial, to that Prince's Rights. Our Author however, without being restrained by the Fear of displeasing either, has explained, in a Dissertation at the end of Edward the Third's Reign, what is meant by the Salic Law, wherein consisted the Difference between the two Kings, and shown, that their Rights were so litigious, as to be very difficultly decided by that Law.

If it is hard to satisfy two different Nations in the recital of their Contests and Quarrels, it is no less so to content the English themselves, in things wherein their opinions are divided; as for instance, the Prerogatives of the King, the Privileges of Parliament, the Succession of the Crown, and the like. Mr. Rapin observes, that disputes on these points were first set on foot among us in the last Century, by two opposite Parties, one whereof was for an absolute and arbitrary Power in the King, whilst the other endeavoured not only to divest him of his just Prerogatives, but even to render him dependent on the Parliament. These two extremes he equally condemned, and as he had no motive or interest to incline him to either Party, he has done his utmost to discover the Truth, through the Passions and Prejudices of the Writers on both sides. He has fairly confronted the Facts laid down by the several Historians, received for true, such as they all agree in, and of such as are variously related, he has admitted only those that are supported by strong evidence. The Barons Wars are also a Subject that can hardly be treated to the satisfaction of all Readers; some considering as Rebellion, what others deem a just defence of Liberty and Property. Mr. Rapin has declared for neither of these Opinions, farther than induced by solid reasons, and, by means of the Fœdera, has clearly accounted for the Rise and Progress of these Wars, which, for want of that assistance, are very confusedly explained by others.

What most embarrassed our Author, is the national Partiality of the Historians, chiefly upon two Articles, The Violation of the Treaties, and, the Success of the Battles. For the first, where the Truth was no other way to be discovered, he has frequently made use of a very natural maxim; namely, that it is not likely the Party, to whom a Treaty is advantageous, should be the first to break it. As for the second Article, nothing is more common than to see Historians stick to own their Nation vanquished, and think it incumbent on them to diminish its losses, or magnify its victories. On these occasions, when our Author could not fix the success of a Battle by the Consequences, he has taken care to inform the Reader of the disagreement between the Historians.

Mr. Rapin, professing to write for the information of Foreigners, was obliged to give a particular account of the English Constitution. The following Discourse therefore was solely designed for the instruction of such as are strangers to our Government, which, being different, as he observed, from all others, the Reader, as well as Historian, must always have it in sight, least wrong Ideas lead them into great Errors.

Origin and Nature of the English Constitution.

The Government of England is a mixt and limited Monarchy, as it is certain, all the Governments in Europe established by the northern Nations formerly were. They were Monarchies, invested, not with absolute and arbitrary, but with a power bounded by the national Laws. Such is still the English Constitution, whatever changes have happened in the other European Kingdoms. The King and People make but one Body, of which the King is Head. He directs and gives motion to all the other Members, takes care of their Welfare, and ought always to have an eye to the Publick, to procure their good, and guard them against all impending evils. By watching thus for the publick, he consults his own interest, since, being strictly united with his Subjects, he is sure to be gainer by all the advantages he procures them.

But to enable the King to labour effectually for the good of the Kingdom, it was necessary to cloath him with a great Power, and assign him a Revenue sufficient to live in splendor, in order to attract the veneration of the People. It was necessary to grant him Privileges approaching absolute Power; as the command of the Armies and fortified Places; the execution of the Laws, and the admininistration of Justice in his own Name; the pardoning of condemned Criminals; the disposal of all the high Offices; the calling and dissolving of the Parliament; the rejecting of Bills he thinks contrary to the publick Good; the proclaiming Peace and War: These are called the Prerogatives of the King, or of the Crown. I do not pretend to give an exact List of them. I am sensible some extend them much farther: but all I mean here is, that the King has great Prerogatives, which were the effect or consequence of the mutual agreement of the first Anglo-Saxon Kings with their People. The King wants nothing to render him happy and powerful. His Revenues are more than sufficient for his ordinary expences, and to reward those who distinguish themselves by their merit, besides the preferments in the Church, State, and Army, which he may bestow as he pleases. Has he a just War to maintain? He is not obliged to burden his People with Taxes and Impositions. It is the People themselves that voluntarily furnish him with every thing necessary. Thus, without ever being under a necessity of heaping up riches for the future, he is sure of finding in the purses of his Subjects wherewithal to supply his present occasions.

There are but two things, the Saxons did not think proper to trust their Kings with, by reason of the ill consequences, for being of like passions with other Men, they might very possibly abuse them; namely, The Power of changing the Laws enacted by consent of King and People; and the Power of raising Taxes at their pleasure. From these two Articles spring numberless branches concerning the Liberty and Property of the Subject, which the King cannot touch, without breaking the Constitution, and they are the distinguishing character of the English Monarchy. The Prerogatives of the Crown, and the Rights and Privileges of the People, flowing from the two fore-mentioned Articles, are the Ground of all the Laws that from time to time have been made by the unanimous consent of King and People. The English Government consists in the correspondence and strict union of the King's Prerogatives with the People's Liberties. So far are these from destroying one another, that they are rather the strongest cement of that strict union, so necessary between the Prince and People. The King, by means of his Prerogatives, is able to protect his Subjects; to see the Laws duly executed, and Justice impartially administered; to defend the Weak against their powerful oppressors; to assist the Unfortunate, and punish the Disturbers of the Society. On the other hand, the People, whilst in possession of their Liberties, confiding in the Laws and the King's care to execute them, live securely without any fears for their Lives or Properties. They enjoy the fruits of their industry, which turns to the King's advantage, since from the People it is, that the King's occasions are supplied. If they make their court to the Nobles, it is only when their interest or assistance may be necessary, and not out of fear of being oppressed, since the Greatest are equally subject to the Laws, with the Meanest.

It cannot be denied, such a Government is extremely proper to render both Prince and People happy. But when Kings arose, as some there were, that aimed at absolute Power; by changing the old, and making new, Laws, at pleasure; by imposing illegal and arbitrary Taxes on the People; this excellent Government being, in some measure, dissolved, by these destructive maxims, confusion and civil Wars ensued, which some very wrongfully ascribe to the fickle and restless temper of the English. On the other hand, the People have not always been contented with maintaining their Privileges, when once infringed by the King, but, for fear of the like attempts for the future, have proceeded to measures very destructive of the just Rights of the Crown. And this is the reason why the Prerogative, abused by some former Kings, runs not at present so high as formerly.

Since then the English Constitution consists in an intimate union between the Prince and People, as between the Head and Body, it is consequently in its utmost perfection and strength whilst this union subsists, and both, without mutual suspicions, jealousies, and fears, securely enjoy their respective Rights. On the contrary, it decays and degenerates, when one endeavours to invade the Privileges of the other.

To preserve a perfect union between the King and the People, it was necessary to establish a way of communication between them. This was done by means of a Wittena-Gemot, or Assembly of Wise Men, who represented the whole Nation. This method the Saxons brought with them from Germany, where all publick affairs were decided in such an Assembly, of which their Generals, chosen in time of war, were Presidents. However, they were obliged to make some alterations, because in Germany they had no Kings, the supreme Power being lodged in the Wittena-Gemot; whereas in England, their Chiefs or Leaders assumed the Title of Kings. Hengist, who first led led Saxon Troops into Britain as Auxiliaries, was the first that assumed this Title, probably with the approbation of the Saxons under his command. For since he was not naturally their King, how could he become so without their consent? But it must be observed, Hengist may be considered in a double capacity. At his arrival in Great-Britain he was certainly only General of the Saxons. But after receiving the Grant of Kent from Vortigern King of the Britons, he became as much Sovereign of that Country as Vortigern was before him, and accordingly assumed the Title of King of Kent, but this new Title did not make him King of the Saxons, of whom he was only intrusted with the command. So, it is likely, the Saxons, in consenting, their General should become their Sovereign, did not give him an absolute power over their Lives and Properties, supposing, what would be extremely difficult to prove, he was invested with such a power over his British Subjects. There is a remarkable passage in the History of France to this purpose. Clovis was King of the Franks, before he led his Army into Gaul, and his large Conquests there gave him no more power over his own Countrymen than he enjoyed before. This is evident from his being prevented by a common Soldier, from presenting the Archbishop of Rheims, with a piece of Plate taken among the Plunder. The Soldier could not bear, the King should appropriate to himself what belonged to all in common, so he hewed it in pieces with his Battle-Ax [and took his share.] The King, who knew he exceeded his Power, did not dare to punish him upon the spot, and though he afterwards took an occasion to put him to death, it was upon some other account, wherein he might lawfully do it. It may then with good reason be affirmed, that the Saxon Generals, in assuming the Title of King, acquired not a despotick Power over their own Followers, by whose assistance they conquered Britain. Since therefore the first Kings had not such a Power, it was necessary to establish some way to prevent their usurping it; and that could not be done better, than by general Assemblies, which consisting of the King, and the chiefs of the People, kept the balance even betwixt both. It must be further observed, there is one material difference between the settlement of the Franks in Gaul, and of the Saxons in Britain. In Gaul, the number of the Conquered was always superior to that of the Conquerors. Whereas in Britain, if any Britons remained in the conquered Provinces, they were but few, and in a state of Slavery. So, the Country was properly inhabited only with Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, over whom the Conquests made by their own Arms, gave to their first Kings no power but what they consented to. We are ignorant indeed of the particulars of the agreement between the Kings and their respective People, but the proofs that afterwards appear, of the People's Liberty, leave no room to doubt, there was at first some regulation thereon.

It is not easy to know distinctly, who the Witan or Wifemen were that composed their Wittena-Gemots. At first, these Assemblies might only consist of the Saxon Officers, among whom the conquered Lands were divided, and who from thence became the Princes or Chiefs in the several States. In process of time, the Britons having entirely abandoned their Country, the Conquerors, finding themselves too few to cultivate the whole, sent for a great number of Families from Germany, to whom the rest of the Lands were given. These distributions were thus made. The new King gave to those of his Followers, who were distinguished by their Birth, Services, or personal Merit, such a portion of Land, on condition they served the Crown on certain occasions; which these parcelled out again to others, with a reservation of such and such Services to themselves. These two sorts of Possessors were called Thanes, that is, Servants: but the first were distinguished by the Title of King's Thanes, which answers to that of the immediate Vassals of the Crown. These, after the Norman Conquest, were called Barons, and afterwards Peers of the Realm. For Earl and Duke were only honorary Titles or names of Offices. It is not denied, the King's Thanes were Members of the Wittena-Gemots: but that the other Thanes were so, is greatly disputed, as will be seen in the Dissertation on the Government, Laws, and Customs of the Saxons. It suffices at present, that there was in each Kingdom an Assembly of Witan or Wifemen, who, jointly with the King, regulated all important Affairs, made Laws and Ordinances, and imposed Taxes. As nothing was decided but by the mutual consent of the King and the Assembly, their interests not being separate, and their aims the same, namely, the good of the publick, this is a clear evidence, that the essence of the Government consisted in the strict union between King and People. If we look into the Histories of the other European Kingdoms founded by the northern Nations, we shall find the like Assemblies under different names, as Diets in Germany and Poland, and Cortez, in Spain. It is not therefore strange, the Saxons should establish in England the only form of Government known to them.
[v o l .]

After the Norman Conquest these Assemblies were called Parliaments. If William the Conqueror continued them, which perhaps is not very easy to prove, it was not with the same Rights and Privileges they enjoyed under the Saxon Kings. It is true, in the following Reigns, some traces of them appear, which make it thought, they were not entirely abolished. However, Parliaments were not frequent till King John, and Henry III. in whose Reign, several affirm, and perhaps not without reason, that the Commons, for the first time, sent Representatives to Parliament. Probably, the Lords and Commons, after their separation, the time whereof is unknown, met in two different Houses, since the English still call Houses the two Rooms, where they assemble, though under the same Roof. They say, the Upper House, or House of Lords, and the Lower House, or House of Commons, to denote what is expressed in French by the word Chamber. It is but since the Reign of Edward I. successor to Henry III. that there has been an uninterrupted series of Parliaments.

After the Commons became a distinct House from the Lords, they pretended to be the sole Representatives of the People, by whom they were chosen. The Lords could pretend only to act for themselves, or for the Body of the Nobility, as making a considerable part of the Nation. However this be, the Barons, of whom very likely the Parliament at first consisted, lost by degrees many of their ancient Rights, and the House of Commons came to be considered as the Guardians of the People's interests. However, the Lords still retain very great privileges; they are, for instance, the highest Court of Justice in the Kingdom; they have a power to bring in, approve, and throw out Bills; in a word, they always make an essential part of the Parliament. The Bishops and Abbots, who had all along a Right to sit in Parliament, had it continued to them after the Conquest. It cannot well be doubted that they sat in the Wittena-Gemots, as King's Thanes, or Barons, since they were the immediate Tenants of the Crown: but it is not so certain, that they enjoyed this Right, as Representatives of the Clergy.

The Commons, as a consequence of their being the Representatives of the People, claim an undisputed Right of laying Taxes, and granting Money to the King. So that the House of Lords in this case have no other power than to pass, or throw out, the Bill, without offering to make any alterations or amendments.

Thus, the two Houses of Parliament compose the Body of the Nation, jointly with the King, who is the Head. The close and absolutely necessary union between the King and the Parliament, appears in nothing so much as in the manner of making an Act of Parliament, or Law. When either of the two Houses designs to bring in a Bill (for so is an Act called before it is passed) after examining and debating every Clause, it is sent to the other House for their approbation: If it passes there, it is brought to the King for the Royal Assent, after which, and not before, it has the form and force of a Law. But if either of the Houses throw it out, or the King refuses his assent, it comes to nothing, as if it had never been mentioned. Nothing more plainly demonstrates, that the essence of the English Government consists in the union between the King and his People. Take away this Union, and it becomes Confusion and Anarchy.

Whether the Commons originally sat in Parliament, or only since the Reign of Henry III. it is certain, their power by degrees is very much increased, to which the maxim, that their House solely represents the People, has greatly contributed. This maxim was not yet established in the Reign of Henry VIII. since we find he applied to the Barons for a supply of Money. But this is not the only new Privilege they have acquired. Upon their separation from the Lords, the interests of the two Houses were not the same upon all occasions. They have had frequent contests concerning their respective Rights. But generally the Commons had the advantage of the Lords; and no wonder, since they alone dispose of the Nation's Money.

On the other hand, as great alterations have happened with regard to the Lords or Peers. Formerly all the immediate Vassals of the Crown were Barons, and, as such, had a seat in Parliament. But now, as there are none of those Lands that were called Fees of the Crown, the right of sitting in the House of Lords is annexed to the bare honorary Titles of Duke, Marquis, Earl, Viscount and Baron, which give those that are invested therewith, no power over the Shires, Cities, or Lands, whose names they bear, and which the King may bestow on whom he pleases. However, when once these Titles are conferred on a Family, the Head cannot be deprived of his right to sit in Parliament, unless he has been judicially condemned by his Peers, for some crime that renders him unworthy. But it must be observed, it is in the King's power to extend or limit, many ways, the right of succeeding to these Honours; so that sometimes, though rarely, he extends it to the female, in default of the male, Line. Though a Peer only has a right to sit in the House of Lords, the King may, if he pleases, call the Son of a Nobleman to the House of Peers in his Father's life-time. The inferior Titles are always included in the superior, so that every Duke is at the same time Marquis, Earl, Viscount and Baron (1). Thus all the Lords are Barons, and properly as such, are Members of the Parliament, according to ancient usage. For before and long after the Conquest, the Lords of Parliament were considered only as the King's Thanes or Barons. For this reason, the civil Wars in the Reigns of King John and Henry III. are called, the Barons Wars. The Title of Duke was first conferred in England, after the Conquest, by Edward III. on his eldest Son, whom he made Duke of Cornwall. The Title of Marquis is much later. In the time of the Saxons, Earls or Counts were properly Governors or Chiefs of Shires or Counties, so called from them. William the Conqueror having distributed the Lands of the English among his Followers, they on whom he conferred the Title of Earl or Count, became really and truly Lords of those Lands whose Titles they bore, so that they were hereditary in their Families. Afterwards, but at what time is not known, they lost this privilege, and the Title of Earl, as was before observed, is become only honorary. The Viscounts, under the Saxon Kings, were Lieutenants to the Earls in their Counties. They discharged the Office of High-Sheriff, which is now left to inferior Officers, whilst the Viscounts are ranked among the Peers, and have even the precedence of the Barons. This last Title was formerly general, and included the whole Body of the Nobility or Peers of the Realm, of whom the Upper House of Parliament consists. Next to these are what they call in England, the Gentry, who, though distinguished by several Titles, as Knight, Esquire, &c. are all included in the Body of the Commons, who in France are called, the Third Estate. From among these are chosen the Knights of the Shires, Citizens and Burgesses, who compose the Lower House, to the number of five hundred and thirteen: but it seldom happens that all are present, and forty are sufficient to make a House.
his

What has been said shows, how the two Houses of Parliament are part of the Legislature, since by them the Laws are made with the Royal Assent. Accordingly, the Parliament has ever been very careful to preserve its Privileges, and hinder the least breach, for fear of losing them insensibly, as it has happened in other Kingdoms. On the other hand, most of the Laws tend to maintain the Liberty and Property of the Subjects, so that they can be deprived of them only by Law. There are absolutely but two ways to deprive the English of their Liberties. Either by laying aside Parliaments entirely, or by bribing the Members to sacrifice their Country to their ambition or avarice. Both these methods have been tried more than once, and for some time with seeming success, but in the end have turned to the Confusion and Ruin of the Projectors. The English have ever been extremely jealous of their Liberties, and this jealousy has frequently caused violent motions in the Kingdom, when they have seen or suspected a tendency to undermine their Privileges, and they have thereby preserved the Constitution of their Government in much the same state as in the beginning of the Monarchy.

In this Second Edition, the Translation, which in the first was not so correct, is thoroughly revised and compared with the Original; but if the Style be not yet so lively and agreeable as some could wish, it must be remembered that a fine Style cannot be expected from one who is supposed to translate Mr. Rapin. For though he was a very judicious, he was certainly no elegant, Writer. And perhaps it would be difficult to find a greater instance of the power of Truth on the minds of Men, than the universal approbation given to a History penned in so naked and unadorned a manner. Indeed, History does not require that nicety of Expression, which is necessary in other Works; but may be read with benefit, though it wants that Perfection. However this be, care has been taken in the Translation to avoid all low expressions, and to preserve an even and unaffected Style.

As it is almost impossible for a Foreigner not to fall into some little mistake, particularly as to our Customs, Laws, Names, Families, and the like, these are all carefully noted and rectified.

Though Mr. Rapin depended not on any modern Historian in what passed before Henry VIII. but consulted the ancient and cotemporary Writers, and accordingly placed their Names in the Margin of his Manuscript, yet many of these references are wanting, which happened, as he says himself, by the following accident. Having employed a young Man to transcribe his History for the Press, and ordering him to leave a Blank for such proper Names as he could not readily read, the Blanks in the Body of the History were filled up by the Author, whilst Those in the Margin were forgot. This omission is with great labour and pains supplied in the Translation, and the Names of the Authors every where quoted in the Margin.

As Mr. Rapin wrote his History for the instruction of Foreigners, he has passed over in silence numberless Facts, Particulars, and Circumstances, which, though of little moment or use to a Stranger, may be agreeable, and even necessary to an Englishman. This want is in some measure supplied, at least as far as the intended compass of the Work would allow, by many additional Notes.

In a word, the Translator, in his eight years application to this Work, has endeavoured to render it as useful as he could to his Countrymen, and thinks himself obliged publicly to acknowledge the assistance he has received, in this second Edition, from the Reverend Mr. PHILIP MORANT, Minister of the English Church at Amsterdam, who, besides revising the Sheets as they came from Press, has been at the pains to compare every Paragraph with the ancient Historians, and examine all the Quotations from the Fœdera, and thereby been enabled to correct some mistakes, and add several Notes.

(1) This is not so, unless they have had each Title distinctly conferred on them. There are few Dukes that are Marquisses, and many Earls not Viscounts.

Omissions of the PRESS.

Page 270. Col. 2. Line 57. after absolving, read-----John's Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance, and enjoining them----- Page 697. Col. 1. Line 34, after the word [Reformation?] insert. [Is it all Christians in general agreeing together, as by a sudden Inspiration, to reform the abuses?]]

N. B. The rest of the Errata will be printed at the end of Vol. II.

Some PARTICULARS of the LIFE of Mr. DE RAPIN THOYRAS.

In a Letter to-----

S I R,

I Imagined you would be surprized at my backwardness to second your design of writing the Life of Mr. DE RAPIN. This has given me some concern, for I wish to be of your mind, but must confess, I have hitherto been unresolved. I know not how the publick stands affected; and though I supposed, with you, that the World would be glad to be acquainted with Mr. DE RAPIN, I should think nothing can better satisfy their Curiosity, than his new History of England; it not being possible, in my opinion, but in so voluminous a Work, an Author (undesignedly) draws his own Picture himself, more to the Life than any other can do. If you say, this is not sufficient, because his Family and Actions are not seen there; I answer, the two Panegyricks on Mr. DE RAPIN, (in the xth Volume of the Bibliothèque Germanique, and in the Histoire Littéraire of February 1726) seem to contain all that is proper to be said on these two heads. By this, you see I have not the same scruple concerning your present proposal, that these Panegyricks may at least be re-published and prefixed to his History of England. Indeed I think it very requisite, and, what is more, am resolved to publish them my self, with some alterations, that is, of the two I design to make one Discourse, borrowing from each what shall occur to my mind, without affecting either to swerve from, or copy them, that there may be room to insert some particulars that are passed over in silence. It may be, I shall go too far, contrary to my first intention, but however, you may be assured, I shall say nothing but what I have been fully informed of, and what Mr. DE RAPIN's Family are ready to justify. Nevertheless, as in all this my sole aim is to oblige you, use this Letter as you please; suppress what you do not like; nay, if you think fit, be satisfied with the Panegyricks alone as first published, which perhaps would be best. But to begin.

Mr. DE RAPIN, counted among his Ancestors and Relations many eminent Persons as well of the Sword as the Gown. His Family is originally from Savoy, where it flourished time out of mind (1), and enjoyed several honorable Posts (2). As I am ignorant of their personal qualities, I cannot say whether it was through a wife precaution, or to perpetuate an ill-grounded enmity, that a Bishop of Maurienne caused to be engraved, in the Episcopal Palace, the following Inscription still to be seen, Caveant Successores nostri a familiâ Rapinorum, i. e. Let our Successors beware of the RAPINS. On the other hand, this Family pretends, that their external Lustre was impaired solely by their steady adherence to the Laws of Honour and Justice. This is insinuated by the Author of the following Verses, which are not quoted for their Elegance.

*Pour n' avoir sans besoin su prendre,
On voit tomber cette maison:
Si l' Effet eut suivi son nom,
Elle auroit de quoi se défendre.*

i. e. This Family, for being too honest to invade the Property of others, is gone to decay. Had they been given to what their Name implies, they would have wherewithal to support themselves.

But to draw nearer to Mr. DE RAPIN, I shall proceed to four Brothers of that name, who settled in France in the Reign of Francis I. (3)

One, a Clergyman, was Almoner to Queen Catharine de Medici, who desired him of the Duke of Savoy. Besides the Preferments he enjoyed in his own Country, he was called the King's Orator, but what that means I cannot tell.

His Brothers (of whom but one has left Issue) were all three Soldiers, and embraced the Reformed Religion; for the sake of which, very probably, they abandoned their Country.

The eldest was a Colonel of Foot, and Governor of Montauban, with authority over the neighbouring Governors. His Name is among those of the Viscounts, who commanded the Troops of the Reformed in the Southern Provinces of France. Letters, still extant, show how well known he was to King Henry IV., to Lewis and Henry Princes of Condé, to Admiral Chastillon, and many other Persons of the first Quality.

All we know of one of his Brothers, called Peter, is, that a Commission of Captain of Horse must, by all circumstances, belong to him; but of this we cannot be sure, because the Name is not expressed.

Philibert, another Brother, was Gentleman to the Prince of Condé, and afterwards his Steward (4). He had no less reputation in military (5), than capacity in civil, affairs (6): but both proved fatal to him, as they drew upon him the enmity of the Catholics, and particularly of the Parliament of Toulouse (7), who caused his head to be struck off at the very time he was come, by the King's Order, to register the Edict of Peace of 1568.

The French Historians frequently speak of these two Brothers. Father Daniel alone does not mention them, and passes over in silence, this cruel execution (8). The reason does not appear at first, for he cannot say, this Sen-

(1) By the Titles of this Family it appears that the Rapins were Noble in the year 1250. The Branches that are in Savoy pretend to a greater Antiquity: But of that I can say nothing.

(2) It is known in general, that some of the Rapins at several times were Syndics of the Nobles of their Country; others were deputed by the Nobility to go in their Name and do Homage to the Duke of Savoy their Sovereign.

(3) Between the Years 1525 and 1547.

(4) Maitre d' Hôtel de sa Maison, that is, he had the management of the Prince's House in the highest Sense of the Word, and not as we understand the Term Steward at present.

(5) In fine, Rapin was in great Repute amongst his own Party. The Conspirators of Toulouse made choice of him to treat in their Name with Fourquevaux, which is a clear Evidence that he had a Head to manage, as well as a Hand to act. Annals of Toulouse, Ann. 1568. The Conference spoken of in this Passage, was held to see whether there was any way of Accommodation between the two Parties; but it proved fruitless, and only served to exasperate them more than ever. Shortly after a Battle was fought in the City, which lasted some Days, wherein the Protestants, who were numerous there, but however inferior to the Catholics, lost three thousand Men, and were in the end chased out of the City. A solemn Procession was instituted in commemoration of this Event. When Peace was restored, the Reformed complained of this Procession, as a thing which revived the Memory of the Troubles, whereupon it was prohibited for the future; nevertheless it has been all along continued; only it was removed from the 12th of May, to the 17th, on some pretence or other.

(7) Homo bellis superioribus---clarus ob idque Tolosanis innotuit. Thuanus. lib. 32.

(8) It might be alleged there are no proofs of it. But since Thuanus and Mézerai, with whom few Writers can be compared for Faithfulness, speak of it, it must be inferred either there were proofs in their Days, or they were warranted by the Notoriness of the Fact. And what puts it out of all question is, that M. de la Faule, who writ last at Toulouse, the Annals of that City, of which he was Syndic, though he takes notice that the Arrêt against Rapin is not to be found (having been doubtless razed out of the Registers for the Parliament's Honour) yet says more of the Matter than all those that went before him.

tence, how unjust soever it may be supposed, is only a private affair, which therefore he might omit if he pleased; since it is visible, on the contrary, that such an Event, rendered memorable (1) by its circumstances and consequences, ought necessarily to have place in History. But when we consider, we find this able Historian has very artfully managed this omission for two uses; first, to extinguish, as far as in him lay, all remembrance of a rage which casts a blemish on the Papists; secondly, to render the Reformed odious, when he comes to speak of the ravages committed by the Admiral's Army, some time after, about Toulouse. Mean while, with regard to these ravages, he was not so free as he desired, but was obliged to speak of them in general terms, for he could not descend to particulars, without discovering the connexion between these ravages and RAPIN's death, by which they were both occasioned and justified. But what he slightly mentions, Thuanus (2) and Mezerai relate more at large, and set in a true light. Mezerai, who is more circumstantial, and informs us, there were then in Toulouse eight thousand regular Troops, which added to the great number of Inhabitants, deprived the Reformed of all hopes of becoming masters of the City, says expressly, that the Hugonots--- set fire to all the Lands and Houses of the Counsellors, on the Ruins whereof the Soldiers writ with smoking Coals, RAPIN'S REVENGE.

Peter de Rapin, Baron of Mauvers, Son of Philibert, was Governor of Mas-Granier, one of the Cautionary-Towns granted to the Reformed in Guienne. He was a Soldier from his youth, and attended King Henry IV in all his expeditions. Most part of that time, he received not a Farthing from his Estate, which threw him into great straits, as well as many others for the same reason. The King himself was in no better circumstances, as may be inferred from his answer to Mr. DE RAPIN, who having lost his Horse, besought his Majesty to give him wherewithal to buy another: I would, says he, with all my heart, but see, I have scarce a Shirt to my back. But Mr. DE RAPIN's sufferings in the religious Wars were not confined to what passed in the Army. He thrice saw his House burnt and battered down in his life, and every thing plundered. It is true, he had amends made him the last time, as far as was possible, and in a manner which must have been very agreeable to him: for the Catholick Gentlemen of the Neighbourhood, by whom he was esteemed and beloved, meeting together, resolved to supply him with necessaries to plough and sow his Lands; and as those troubles lasted but eight months, when they were appeased, he found a Crop ready, and all his Estate, except his House, in as good condition as the most diligent Owner could have kept it. On another occasion, he had a pleasure without any alloy: upon a rumour of his death, he read himself a Letter from Queen Mary de Medici, expressing her great sorrow to his Family. He married a Daughter of Mr. de Lupé, Lord of Maravat, Captain of fifty Men at Arms, Governor of Mauvezin a Cautionary-Town, and a Major-General.

He left a numerous Issue, of whom his second Son James, Sieur de Thoyras (3), was the darling of his Parents. His Father left him more than any of the other younger Children, and his Mother gave him moreover that portion of the Estate of John de la Ferriere, Vidame (4) of Chartres, and one of the Heads of the French Protestants, which fell to her in right of her Mother. He was designed for a Soldier, like his Brothers; but his Mother willing to have him near her, was for breeding him a Scholar, to which the Father consented. After he had finished his Studies, he was admitted Advocate in the Court of the Edict (5) of Castres, and, contrary to the custom of the Country, where Persons nobly descended are never of that Profession, he practised it both at Castres and at Castelnaudary, and Toulouse, above fifty years, to the day of his death. It is true, I include the four years he spent at Paris, where he went, upon news of Mr. Pellisson his Brother-in-law, being arrested with Mr. Fouquet. Nothing passed in that famous affair, but what he was privy to, and he was very serviceable in many respects. He was one of the three concerned in the Fæstum, and supplied all we find there relating to the Roman Law. I saw in France a Letter sent to him by Mr. Fouquet from the Bastile, thanking him for it in the most affectionate manner. All that knew him, of whom several are now living, have always described him as one of the prime Advocates of his time, and very eminent for his impartiality and integrity. His Wife, who died at Geneva, where she was sent by the King's order, for refusing to turn Papist, was Sister of George and Paul Pellisson, whose Memory is still recent. Her Father and Grandfather were Judges in the Parliament of Toulouse, and in the Court of the Edict of Castres. Raymond Pellisson her Great Grandfather, after having been Master of the Requests, and Ambassador to Portugal, was at last first President of the Senate of Chamberi, and Commandant in Savoy, whilst in possession of the French. I say nothing of a very extraordinary affair that befell him, and on which several Authors (6) have enlarged, nor of his Descendants above-named, because I should only copy what is to be found in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary printed at Amsterdam in 1716. This Family, from whence have sprung several illustrious Persons (7), is originally English (8), and comes from an Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales when in Guienne.

I proceed now to Mr. DE RAPIN, who is properly the subject of my Letter. PAUL DE RAPIN, Sieur de Thoyras, younger Son of James, was born at Castres, March 25. 1661. He began to study Latin under a Tutor, his Father kept in the House, after which he was sent to Puy-laurens, and from thence to Saumur. At this last place, when about seventeen, he had a quarrel with a Friend, upon a slight occasion, and they immediately challenged each other. But whether they lost time in fetching their Swords, for being Students they seldom wore any, or the Duel held long, Night came whilst they were engaged, and then, Mr. DE RAPIN's Sword broke near the hilt without his perceiving it. His Adversary immediately seeing it, generously told him. Whereupon the Combat ceased, and embracing each other, they returned together to Town. Some time after he had another quarrel with a person much older than himself, who rudely jostled him as he was walking through a narrow and difficult passage. Mr. DE RAPIN fell upon him, but they were quickly parted by the People there present. He ran for his Sword, and speedily returning, found the Person gone, neither could he meet with him, though he carefully sought him several days. Some time after, he heard the Man was gone to Paris, where Mr. DE RAPIN followed him. He was no sooner arrived, but he was seized by a Guard of the Marshals of France. This accident, which he did not expect, believing his design very secret, because he had not imparted it, was occasioned by the advice his Uncle Pellisson received from Saumur, from whence he was informed of the supposed cause of his Nephew's journey, which might be of ill consequence; and withal, of the place where his antagonist might be heard of. Mr. Pellisson fearing a Duel would ensue, which, however it ended, would ruin his Nephew, acquainted the Marshals of France with the matter. Mr. DE RAPIN, who was yet very young, affording them opportunity to secure him, by going directly to his Uncle's. The Marshals having heard both Parties, condemned the aggressor to lie in Prison at Fort-l'Evêque, till Mr. DE RAPIN should consent to his discharge, which he did about a month after, at the desire of the Prince of Furtemberg Bishop of Strasburg, who was then at Paris. Mean while, the next day after the sentence, the Prisoner's Brother, who was reckoned a good Sword's-man, meeting Mr. DE RAPIN in the Street, accosted him, and, talking to him so as to renew the quarrel, Mr. DE RAPIN answered him by drawing his Sword, and wounded him before they were parted. But this rencounter was kept secret by the advice of the Friends of both Parties, for fear of incensing the Marshals.

The beginning of the year 1679, Mr. DE RAPIN returned to his Father's, in order to apply himself closely to the study of the Law. But before he had made any progress, he was obliged, with many other young Gentlemen, to commence Advocate, upon notice of an Edict which was published soon after, that a Doctor's Degree should not be given to any person, who had not studied five years in some University.

This same year, the Courts of the Edict were suppressed, by which Mr. DE RAPIN's Family were forced

(1) This Execution of Rapin made a great Noise, and the Prince very justly complained of it to the King and Queen. Their Majesties also expressed great Regretment against the Parliament of Toulouse, in their Letters to them on that occasion. Annals of Toulouse. Ann. 1568. It is left to the Reader to judge whether any thing like this would have happened for a private concern.

(2) Incentis oppidanorum et senatorum, præcipue circa urbem, prædijis, quod eos à publicâ quiete maximè omnium abhorrere dicerent Protestantes, recentibus adhuc oculis obversante Rapin, ante biennium à Rege et Condæo ut Edicti pacificatorum promulgationem urgeret, in urbem missi, & immani perfidia ignominioso supplicio affecti, memoria; cujus indignam necem illi, inauditis et jure belli incontestis vastationibus, ultum ini testabantur. Thuanus. lib. 42.

(3) The Name of a Village belonging to his Family.

(4) That is, Judge of a Bishop's Temporal Jurisdiction.

(5) Les Chambres de l'Edit were Courts of Judicature erected in several Towns, in behalf of the Hugonots, the Judges being half Reformed, and half Catholics.

(6) Recueil d'Anecdotes de Papen, Liv. 19. Art. 9. Histoires Admirables de Simon Goulart, Tom. I. p. 6.

(7) See Recherches des Antiquitez de la Langue Francoise, ou Dictionnaire Gaulois, by Borel.

(8) Borel in the same place, p. 377.

to remove to Toulouſe. Not long after, Mr. DE RAPIN perceiving the ill ſtate of the Reformed, and that, probably, it would daily grow worſe, deſired his Father's conſent to quit the Profeſſion of Advocate for That of Arms. His Father, without abſolutely denying his requeſt, returned ſuch an answer, as only tended to gain time. Not that the Requeſt ſeemed to him unreaſonable and ill-grounded: but he was apprehenſive this new way of life, where ambition is more fired than in any other, would expoſe his Son to great temptation, when he ſhould find by daily experience, that it would not be poſſible to riſe to any tolerable Poſt, ſo long as he adhered to his Religion; whereas that obſtacle being removed, he might hope to be advanced like the reſt. This ſtate of Uncertainty made him very remiſs in the ſtudy of the Law. He pleaded however one cauſe as Advocate, but ſtopped there, and applied himſelf more cloſely than ever, to the reading of good Authors, to the Mathematicks and Muſick, in which he acquired great ſkill.

In the year 1685 his Father died, and two months after, the Ediſt of Nantz was revoked. Whereupon Mr. DE RAPIN retired into the Country with his Mother and Brothers. But as the perfecution, ſhortly after, was at the height, he departed with his youngſt Brother and arrived in England, in March 1686.

Not long after, there came to London a French Abbé of Quality, and Friend of Mr. Pellifſon, who made Mr. DE RAPIN frequent viſits, and introduced him to Mr. de Barillon the French Ambaſſador, from whom Mr. DE RAPIN received great civilities. Theſe Gentlemen would have perſwaded him to wait upon the King, aſſuring him of a gracious reception. Mr. DE RAPIN, who could not ſee what pretenſions he had to ſuch an honour, and beſides, was apprehenſive that a Propoſal ſeemingly ſo advantageous might tend to his prejudice, excuſed himſelf in the handſomeſt manner he could. This affair put him upon ſeriously reflecting on his preſent ſituation, continually teased about his Religion, by the Marquiſ of Seiſſac and other French Catholicks then at London, but eſpecially by the Abbé, who, though extremely courteous and civil, always turned their Converſation to Controverſy. Perceiving therefore it was not poſſible for him to defend himſelf unprepared, againſt a Man who was maſter of theſe Subjects, and managed them with great art, he returned into the Country, from whence he was come to viſit the Abbé, without taking leave. He knew himſelf guilty of ill manners, but choſe to be ſo, rather than remain any longer expoſed.

As he had then no expectations in England, he made but a ſhort ſtay, and going over to Holland, where he had relations, he liſted himſelf in a Company of French Volunteers at Utrecht, commanded by Mr. de Rapin his Couſin German.

The ſame year, Mr. Pellifſon publiſhed his Reflections on Religious Differences, and ſent them to Mr. DE RAPIN, charging him to tell him his opinion, which he did very largely, as he ſaid himſelf, retorting, in ſeveral places, Mr. Pellifſon's expreſſions. But nothing of this appears among his Papers. Not that I think it either loſt or miſlaid, but rather believe that out of modeſty he never took a Copy, imagining that what he could ſay on ſuch a Subject was not worth preſerving.

He was ſtill in the Company of Volunteers when they went into England with the Prince of Orange. But in 1689, the Lord Kingſton made him Enſign in his own Regiment, with which he paſſed into Ireland. At the Siege of Carrickfergus, juſt after his arrival, he had the good fortune to gain the eſteem of the Officers of the Regiment, and eſpecially of Lieutenant Colonel Fielding, who, in leſs than a year, procured him a Lieutenantcy.

In the beginning of 1690, the Regiment to which Mr. DE RAPIN belonged, was given to Lieutenant General Douglas, who, upon the recommendation of three French Colonels of the Army, took more notice of him than of the reſt of the Subalterns, and afterwards put a very great confidence in him.

After the battle of the Boyne, in which Mr. DE RAPIN was preſent, General Douglas was detached with his own, and twelve other Regiments of Horſe and Foot, to make a diverſion about Athlone, and, if poſſible, ſurprize the Town. He appointed Mr. DE RAPIN and Mr. Carles, now Lieutenant General in Portugal, to act as Quarter-Maſter General of his little Army. This Siege not proving ſucceſſful, the Town being ſtrongly garriſoned, General Douglas was recalled. Mr. DE RAPIN, who was ſent before to receive orders, found the King at the head of a Line, who ſtopping him, asked ſeveral Queſtions, to which Mr. DE RAPIN made ſuch answers, as ſerved to remove ſome ill impreſſions inſuſed into his Majeſty concerning Douglas's Conduct.

At the ſiege of Limerick, he was ſhot in the Shoulder, and next day the Siege being raiſed, was forced to ride four miles on Horſeback in great anguiſh. He was left with the reſt of the wounded, (among, whom was his Brother, who was ſhot through the Body) and ſo loſt his Regiment, which was ordered to the North. But ſhortly after, he heard General Douglas had procured him a Company, and cauſed him to be admitted, though abſent. It was the ſame Company where he had been Enſign, and where was ſtill the ſame Lieutenant which made Mr. DE RAPIN extremely uneaſy.

The next year, General Douglas had orders to go to Flanders. Mr. DE RAPIN, whom he deſigned for his Aid de Camp, not being in a condition to attend him, by reaſon of his wound, adviſed him to take another, to whom the General ſoon gave a Company in the Scotch Guards, of which he was now Colonel. The Campaign opened in Ireland with the taking of Baltimore, where Mr. DE RAPIN had the ſatisfaction to be ſerviceable to a poor diſtreſſed captive Family, with whom he was acquainted the foregoing year. He was afterwards at the Siege of Athlone, and in the aſſault, made through the River that runs under the ſtrongeſt Rampart of the Town, a bold and brave action, and which ſucceeded, as it is thought, contrary to the expectation of the Generals. In this Town were left two Régiments of different Nations, commanded by the Lieutenant Colonels, who underſtood not each other's Language, and were both very jealous of their Power, which might have occaſioned diſputes. Happily, Mr. DE RAPIN belonged to one, and his intimate Friend, a Captain of good ſenſe, to the other, who were both equally eſteemed by their reſpective Commanders; ſo whenever any accident happened that was like to breed a quarrel, theſe two Officers, who were unprejudiced, agreed between them upon what was to be done, and adviſed it each with conſtant ſucceſs.

After that, Mr. DE RAPIN was ſent ſucceſſively to ſeveral Garriſons, and among the reſt to Kilkenny, where he frequently waited on the Biſhop, who ſeemed pleaſed with his Converſation. This commerce would have been very agreeable, could he have peaceably enjoyed it, but the warm and daily conteſts between the Mayor and the Officers, ſcarce allowed him a moment's repoſe. He often uſed his endeavours to ſtiſle them, and prevented their proceeding to extremities. Mean while, his fear that things would be brought to a deſperate paſs, made him gladly embrace the opportunity of commanding two Companies in another place. Some time after, he rejoined his Regiment at Kingsale, where he contracted an intimate Friendſhip with Sir James Waller who commanded there.

About the end of the year 1693, he received an order to repair to England, without any reaſon aſſigned; but at the ſame time, a Letter from Mr. Belcaſtel informed him, he was to be Governor to the Earl of Portland's Son. He could not conceive whence this proceeded, having never had any ſuch thoughts; and it was ſome time before he knew, he was recommended by the Lord Galloway. He came therefore to London and entered upon his Office. Here was an end of all his hopes of riſing in the Army, to ſuch Poſts as ſeveral younger Officers of his acquaintance have obtained. All the amends he received, was leave to reſign his Company to his Brother, who died in 1719, Lieutenant-Colonel in a Regiment of Engliſh Dragoons. It is true, ſome time after, the King granted him a Penſion of a hundred Pounds a year, till he ſhould better provide for him, which never happened. So he enjoyed his Penſion ſeveral years, but upon that Prince's death, it ceaſed, and a Place was given him, which brought him in but a moderate income.

His new Employment obliged him to be ſometimes in Holland, often in England, and alſo in France, whiſt the Earl of Portland was Ambaſſador, till the young Lord was fixed at the Hague, where he learned his Exercices. Whiſt he was there, in the year 1699, Mr. DE RAPIN married Mariamne Toſart, an advantageous match, of whom I ſhall ſay nothing, as ſhe is living. This did not hinder him however from minding his Pupil, and attending him in his Travels. He began then with Germany, where they made ſome ſtay at ſeveral Courts, and particularly at Vienna. From thence they paſſed into Italy, by way of Tyrol, where they ſaw Marſhal Killerkey a Priſoner, who gave Mr. DE RAPIN a Letter for Cardinal d' Etrées then at Venice.

At his return, his employment ceaſing, he repaired to his Family, who in his abſence lived at the Hague, where he ſpent ſome years. During that time, he improved his leiſure Hours, as far as the common duties of Life would allow, in reſuming the ſtudy of Fortification, and eſpecially of Hiſtory, which led him to draw many general and particular Genealogical and Chronological Tables. But what was moſt agreeable to him, and, as he thought, moſt inſtructive, was his being Member of a Society or Club ſtill in being, to the erecting of which he was proud of contributing, where ſeveral Perſons of Learning and Merit reasoned upon such Subjects as occurred, and spoke their opinion on such questions as were usually proposed. Mean while, as he found his Family increase, he resolved to sacrifice to the good of his Children the pleasures of the Hague, by retiring to a cheaper Country. Accordingly, he removed in 1707 to Wizel in the Duchy of Cleves. He found there a good number of French Refugees, among whom were several Officers, Men of Quality, with whom he lived very friendly; and he was also received as kindly as could be expected, by Persons of the highest rank, who were chiefly concerned in the Government of the Country, and who, on all occasions, gave him marks of their favour.

The way of living at Wizel, different in many respects from that of the Hague, rendered him more than ever master of his time, and allowed him almost as much leisure as he could desire, to study the History of England, and the nature of the Government. This was a more extensive design than perhaps it seems at first, for it obliged him, not only to peruse all the English Historians, but also those of other Nations, who had any affairs with the English, in order to procure light, and be assured of the truth of the facts, by confronting the several Authors. He would have found it very difficult to succeed, or rather would, probably, have miscarried, had he not before qualified himself for reading, in their original Tongue, all the Books he was obliged to consult. Besides Greek and Latin, which he learnt at the College, and had since improved, he understood Italian and Spanish, not to mention High and Low-Dutch, of which indeed he was not so much master. As for English, which was the most necessary of all, he had made that his particular Study.

Though he was of a very strong constitution, yet a seventeen years constant application to compose his History, entirely ruined his health. About three years before his death, he found himself quite spent, and frequently seized with violent pains in his Stomach. He might have recovered if he would have relinquished his Work, and unbent his mind for a time. Of this he was sensible, but could not resolve it, as he ought. All he indulged himself in, was, not to rise before six a-Clock, after which it was impossible for him to sleep or lie in his bed. As to his diversions, of which walking was the most usual, he was quickly tired of them, and, if his indisposition permitted, returned to his Work, which was the cause of his illness, and properly his sole delight. At last, a violent Fever, attended with an oppression upon his Lungs, carried him off the seventh day, being the 16th of May 1725.

He has left one Son and six Daughters.

From what has been said, it appears that Mr. DE RAPIN was naturally grave. This led him, whilst he was in the service, to seek the conversation of the Serious, which prejudiced not only several of his Comrades, but even some of his Superiors, against him, who would have had him partake of all their diversions. But, on the other hand, it gained him the Esteem and Friendship of many Persons of Merit, who were in considerable Posts. We are not however to imagine, he was an enemy to Mirth: he could be merry on occasion, though not so frequently, nor so immoderately as many are. Nay, he writ several little things in Prose and Verse, with humour and gaiety: but as they were on light or ludicrous Subjects, and designed only for a present amusement with his Friends, he never thought them worth revising, and I question whether there is one to be found among his Papers. What has been said of his application to his Study, and Works, is also to be understood with this limitation, that it never hindered him from embracing all opportunities to serve his Friends, and reconcile their differences.

Thus have I done what lies in my power, to make known Mr. DE RAPIN's Character. I am sensible, that to have a compleat Idea of him, we must, besides what I have said, consider him in his Writings, but this is what I shall not undertake. It belongs to the Publick to declare what opinion he there gives of himself, and to determine whether he shows good Sense and Judgment in his manner of discovering the motives of Actions; and above all, whether he has justly observed an entire Impartiality, so essential to a good History.

This is all I have to say to you concerning Mr. DE RAPIN. I wish it may be satisfactory, and am,

S I R,

Yours, &c.

B R I T A N N I A R O M A N A

INTRODUCTION

TO THE

HISTORY of ENGLAND.

CONTAINING

The Extent of Great-Britain or Albion. Whence so called. The First Inhabitants, Customs, and Manners of the Britons. Their Way of Fighting, and Commerce. Their Religion. The Druids. Their Government. Original of the Irish, Scots, and Picts.

GREAT-BRITAIN is, without contradiction, the largest, finest, and most considerable Island in Europe: Nay, one might venture to affirm, she holds the first Rank among all the Isles of the known World; and it would be, perhaps, no difficult task to prove, she justly deserves this Preference. But not to enter into so needless a Discussion, it suffices to say, very few can be compared to her for Temperateness of Air, Number of Inhabitants, and all the Necessaries as well as Comforts of Life. If she wants any thing of foreign growth, her Wants are easily and plentifully supplied by her Commerce, which brings home to her whatever is rare and excellent in all Parts of the World.

I shall not undertake to display here all that may be said to the Advantage of this Island, or repeat all the Encomiums bestowed on her, as well by the Ancients as Moderns. The present flourishing State of Great-Britain sufficiently speaks for her. Her Fleets, by which she reigns Sovereign of the British Seas (1); her Troops, whose Valour makes them every where dreaded; her illustrious Generals, who have carried the Terror of her Arms to the utmost Bounds of Europe, exalt her much Higher than all I can say in her Praise. Besides, every one knows, this truly fortunate Isle, by her Riches and the excellent Constitution of her Government long since established, enjoys a Happiness unknown to the rest of the World.

I don't question but the Figure England has made for some time, inspires many Persons with a Curiosity to learn by what Steps she is arrived to that Height of Grandeur and Power, which renders her so formidable to her Neighbours. It was this Imagination that led me to publish the present History in French, for the Benefit of those who not understanding the English Tongue, cannot satisfy their Curiosity by reading the Histories writ in the Language of the Country. I am apt to believe this Work must needs meet with a favourable Reception, if the History itself does not suffer by the Historian's Defects. But

As Great-Britain has all along been divided into two Parts, namely, England and Scotland, I must warn the Reader, that my Design is only to write the History of England in particular. Though the Neighbourhood of these two States has been productive of several Events common to Both, their Histories are nevertheless distinct from each other. And therefore, I see no sufficient Reason to induce me to imitate sundry Historians who have joined them together, on pretence that the two Kingdoms in the last Century were united under one and the same Sovereign. As for the particular History of England, to which I intend to confine myself, I will venture to say, it contains as great Variety, with as many entertaining and remarkable Events, as most Histories hitherto extant. It is true indeed, it has its dry and barren Places, especially in the Beginning; but this is an Imperfection common to it with the Histories of France, Spain, and all the rest of the Kingdoms founded by the Northern Nations. As there were but few Men of Letters among the Nations, that, like a Deluge, over-ran the Roman Empire, there were consequently but few Writers who took care to transmit to Posterity, Memorials of their Histories. This History, like most others, may be compared to a River which swells in proportion to its Distance from the Fountain-Head, and grows immensely great where it falls into the Ocean. But as England is a Part, and That the most considerable of Great-Britain, it will not be improper to prefix to the History of that Kingdom, a general Account of the Island, of the first Inhabitants, their Customs, Manners, Government and Religion.

THE ISLAND OF ALBION OR BRITAIN was scarce known to the Romans till the Time of their Emperors, Julius Caesar was properly the first that discover'd it to them, by carrying thither the Roman Eagles, and by the Account of his two British Expeditions, the Particulars whereof he has given in his Commentaries. He says, it is an Island in the shape of a Triangle: He sets down the Length of each Side, and tells us, the whole Circuit of the Isle measures about fifteen hundred Miles, or five hundred French Leagues. After such a Description, one cannot but wonder at what Life of Tacitus seems to assert, and Dion Cassius positively affirms, that Britain was not discovered to be an Island till the Government of Julius Agricola, that is, in the Reign of Vespasian, Titus, or Domitian. Was it possible for Cæsar's Commentaries to be unknown to these Historians? (1)

(1) Well may the English be called Lords of the British Seas, since the Royal Navy of England consists of 7 Men of War of 100 Guns, 13 of 80, 23 of 70, 19 of 60, 47 of 50, (that is, 125 of the Line of Battle) besides 23 of 40, 9 of 30, and 25 of 20. In all 180. See Dr. Sturges's Pref. to his History.

Extent of Great Britain.

Great-Britain, as Cæsar observed, being almost triangular, if it be considered as bounded by three Right-lines, forming a perfect Triangle, the three Sides together may be reckon'd about fifteen hundred Miles. But allowing for the Windings of the Coast, they are found to make about eighteen hundred Miles, or six hundred French Leagues in Compass. The shortest Side, which looks towards France, and reaches from the North-Foreland in Kent (2) to the Land's-End (3) in Cornwall, contains about three hundred Miles. The Western Side, over against Ireland, from the Land's-End to the northernmost Point of Scotland, may be about eight hundred Miles in length, and the third or Eastern Side about seven hundred.

Comd. Dists.

The Names of Albion and Britain, by which this Isle has been known, are both of so antient a Date, that their Origin is not to be trac'd. To Conjecture only, recourse has been had in this Case. The first of these Names, say some, was received from a certain Giant, Son of Nep-tune. Others derive the Name Albion from the Greek Word Alphon, signifying White, because the Coasts, when viewed at a distance, look of that Colour. Some again imagine Albion comes from the Celtick Word Alp or High, the Land appearing so as you approach it from the Continent (4).

The Name of the Isle of Albion.

Among the Word Britain.

As for the Origin of the Name Britain, we find, among the Antiquaries, variety of Opinions or Conjectures, the Principal of which are these Four. The first, that the Name of Britain was given to the Island by Brutus, a Trojan Prince. The second is Somner's a learned Englishman, who supposes that because of the violent Motion of the Sea which washes the Coasts of Great-Britain, this Name may come from the British Word Brydio or Rage. The third, espoused by Camden, Sir William Temple, and others, is founded upon the Word Brith, signifying in the British Tongue, Wood, because the ancient Britons used to dye their Skins blue with that Plant. The fourth is Bochart's: That famous Antiquary believed, the Phœnicians coming to buy Tin in the Island of Albion, gave it the Name of Barat-Anac, that is, the Land or Country of Tin, which being by the Greeks mollified into Britannia (5) was adopted by the Romans. This Etymology seems to be confirmed by the Græcians calling the Isles of Scilly, Cassiterides, which signifies in Greek the same as Barat-Anac in Phœnician.

Somner.

But in Canaan.

Strabo, 1. 2.

Examination of the Word Britain.

If I may be allowed to speak my Opinion of these four Etymologies, the First seems to be founded altogether upon a Fable. The Second, deriving the Name, Britain from a British Word signifying Rage, is, I think, unwarrantable; because the Island receiving this Name from Foreigners, as will be shown presently, it is not likely they should take it from the British Language, of which probably they were ignorant: Besides, it is not Fact that the Sea rages more on the Coast of Great-Britain than in other Places. Consequently its Motion not being uncommon, could not give occasion to derive this Name from a Word signifying Rage. The Third, deriving the Name from the Word Brith or Wood, is the most generally received. But however, it is liable to one Objection, which those that embrace it, ought to remove: and that is, the Name of Britain was certainly given to the Island by Foreigners. This is evident from the Natives never styling their Country Britain, or themselves Britons. Their true Name is Cumri or Cumbri, from whence Cambria, the Name of Wales to this Day among the Welsh. Now it is by no means probable, that Foreigners should make use of a British Word to form the Name of this Island. So, the Fourth Opinion, viz. Bochart's, seems to me the most natural. It can't be said to be unlikely that the Phœnicians, the first Traders to this Island, should give it the Name of Baratanac, or the Land of Tin. Supposing this, it is probable the Name passing from the Phœnicians to the Greeks, and from these last to the Romans, was changed into That of Britannia (6). However this be, we have nothing to trust to in this Matter but very doubtful Conjectures. The late Instances of the Names given to new-found Lands are so many Demonstrations, that Caprice has as great a share as Reason in coining these new Names. A Saint's Day, the Name of a Leader or Pilot, the first Object that chanced to present itself to view, an Accident happening at the Time of the Discovery of these new Lands, have usually served for Foundation to the Names assigned them. So that perhaps the Conjectures of Camden and Bochart are as little to the Purpose with respect to Britain, as Ours would be, if ignorant of the Occasion of the Names given to the several Parts of America, we should endeavour to trace them from the Language, Custom, or Commerce of the Natives.

We are as much in the Dark concerning the Origin of the first Inhabitants of the Island of Albion, for in all likelihood it was peopled by Colonies from different Places, and at different Times. Endeavours therefore have been used to give us some light into this Matter from their Customs, Manners, Religion, and Form of Government. But before I proceed to what has been conjectured on this Head, it will be necessary just to touch upon the Fabulous Story of Brutus, published by Geoffrey of Monmouth, a Writer of the XIIth Century. Not that it deserves Notice; but being mentioned by almost all the English Historians, it seems hardly pardonable to pass it over in Silence. Besides, it is the part of a good Historian not only to relate Matters of Fact, but also to guard his Readers against the Fictions introduced upon the World for Truths.

Geoffrey of Monmouth, a Benedictin Monk, penned in Latin a History of Britain, and dedicated it to Robert Earl of Glocester, natural Son of Henry I. King of England. In this pretended History Britain is said to receive her Name from Brutus, the First of her Kings. What the Historian relates is as follows:

Brutus, Son of Sylvius, Grandson of Aeneas, had the Misfortune to kill his Father as he was shooting at a Deer. As he could not or would not, after this fatal Accident, stay any longer in Italy, he retires into Greece, where gathering together the Descendants of the Trojans that were brought thither after the Destruction of their City, he puts to Sea with them, and after long wandering on the Mediterranean, enters the Atlantick Ocean, and performs Wonders in several Places, particularly in Gaul against Goffarius King of Aquitain. At length, guided by an Oracle, he comes and lands in the Island of Albion, at a Place where Tetnes now stands in the County of Devon. The Island was at that time inhabited by Giants of the Race of Cham, whose Chief or King was Geg-Mageg. Brutus and his Companions, though few in Number, not only keep their ground, but root out the Giants and get possession of the Island, which Brutus with his own Name called Britain. Before his Death, he divided his Dominions among his three Sons. Loegrin or Loegrin had for his Share Loegrin so called from him, the same with England now, exclusive of Wales, which was the Share of Camber, Brutus's second Son, and from him named Cambria. Albanact the youngest, had the Country since called Scotland, to which he gave the Name of Albania. (7)

Having laid these Foundations, the Author continues his History, giving an Account of the various Revolutions that happened in the Island, under the Kings Successors of Brutus, whose Names he relates with some of their Actions. But as to the Time of their Reigns he is not so exact, setting down neither when they began, nor how long they lasted. He is contented with saying, Brutus's Arrival in Albion was twelve hundred Years after the Flood, and sixty-six after the Destruction of Troy. This History, published in so dark an Age, was greedily received, particularly by the Welsh, the Posterity of the antient Britons. But it brings with it so many Marks of Forgery, that it is looked upon by all that have examined it with any Attention, as a Fiction of Geoffrey's fancy, or some other Author, whom he has too implicitly followed.

After rejecting this Fable, I wish it were in my Power to give a satisfactory Account of the Origin of the Britons. But that is impossible. We must be satisfied with the Conjectures of Cæsar, Tacitus, and some more modern Authors: The most probable Account seems to be this:

(1) Tacitus say, Hanc enim novissimam, i. e. tam primam Romanæ Classis circumvectam, Island in eâ Britanniam affuerunt. This is Rapin's Observation. But after it is so manifestly false, and yet has been Cæsar's Commentaries. For in Cæsar's Time Britain was only supposed to be an Island, but not known to be so by the Romans, and Strabo does not find it. Dion Cassius lived about a hundred Years after Tacitus; in the latter end of the 2d. and the beginning of the 3d. Century.

(2) Col'd by the Romans Castrum.

(3) Belonum.

(4) Alphon in the Phœnician Tongue signifies a High Mountain; and Allen in the same Language signifies White. The Derivation from Alphon seems to be countenanced by the British Poets, who call Britain, Ins. æven, i. e. the White-Island. See Steele's Note on the British Poets, p. 20.

(5) The Trojan Name -- Rapin, signifying in Greek, Reign, shews, according to Camden, that the Word was taken by the Greeks, just as Mithras, Luxurians, Agustians, &c. Rapin. It is a question whether there is any such Greek Word as -- Tania signifying Copper.

(6) A modern Author gives the following Derivation. The Phœnicians having sailed the Strait, i. e. the narrow Strait in the Ocean comparable to those now called the English Strait. These therefore by way of Eminence they called Britann, that is, Great Islands in the Ocean, in Opposition to those in the Mediterranean, which they called the Lesser-Sea. From Brutus, Britannia naturally flows. See Cluver.

(7) The Name of Loegrin is lost; Cambria is retained by the Welsh, as Albion is by the Scots. But this is no Proof of the Origin of these Names. See Geoffrey of Monmouth's History, Rapin.

That Great-Britain was peopled by the Celtæ or Gauls, descended from Gomer Son of Japhet, is universally acknowledged. Of This the Name Cumri (1), by which the Welsh call themselves still in their Language, and several other Reasons, will not suffer us to doubt. Besides, the numerous swarms of Gauls that over-ran so great a Part of Europe and Asia, make it credible, they neglected not to send Colonies into Great-Britain which lay so near them. The Affinity, taken notice of by Antiquaries, between the Gauls and Britons with respect to Religion, is a farther Confirmation of this Opinion. It is true indeed, the Belgæ are said by some Writers to settle in the Eastern, the Spaniards in the Western, and the Hibernians or Irish in the Northern Parts of Great-Britain. But this is not inconsistent with the common Opinion. The Belgæ were no other than Gauls, and the Spaniards, as well as the Irish or Scots, were, according to some Writers, Colonies of the Celtiberian-Gauls that inhabited along the Western Coasts of Spain. But supposing it were not very certain, that these Spaniards were Celtiberians, it can't be denied, that the Southern Part, now called England, was peopled by the Gauls. This is the most probable Account of the Origin of the Britons.

Camden.
Brit. p. xii.
&c.

Manners and Customs of the Britons.
Cæsar Com.
l. v.
Tacit. vit.
Agricol.

As for their Manners, Customs, Religion, and Government, though mentioned by Cæsar in his Commentaries, should we confine ourselves to what he has said, our Knowledge would be but very imperfect. A fuller Discovery of these things must be drawn chiefly from the Authors who write after the Romans were become Masters of Britain. As the Britons did not at once, but by degrees, alter their Customs and Manners, what these Authors say of the Britons of those Days, may be presumed to agree in many respects with the ancient Inhabitants of the Island.

The Britons were generally tall and well-made, and, like most of the Irish at this Day, yellow-hair'd. Their Constitution was so good, that, according to Plutarch, they frequently liv'd a hundred and twenty Years. This length of Days was probably owing to their Sobriety and Temperance as much or more than to the Wholesomeness of the Air. The use of Cloaths was scarce known in the Island. None but the Inhabitants of the Southern Coasts cover'd their Nakedness with the Skins of wild Beasts carelessly thrown over them, not so much to defend themselves against the Cold, as to avoid giving Offence to the Strangers that came to traffick with them. They were wont by way of Ornament to make Incisions in their Bodies in the Shape of Flowers, Trees and Animals, which with the Juice of Woad they painted of a Sky-colour that never wore out. These Scars are by Tertullian term'd Britannorum Stigmata.

Solinus
Plin. Hist.
Nat. l. xxii.
c. l.

They liv'd in Woods, in Hutts cover'd over with Skins, Boughs or Turf. There are People now in the North of Scotland that are said to have no other Houses. I remember also to have seen in Ireland poor People living in a Hutt cover'd only with green Turf, and not above three or four times bigger than their Body. I was told, they liv'd quietly in these Habitations, without stirring abroad unless to provide for their Subsistence, and, contented with Milk and Potatoes, gave themselves no farther trouble. This may serve to give us an Idea of the way of living as well among the ancient Britons, as, perhaps, among many other Nations. Their usual Food was Milk, and Flesh got by Hunting, their Woods and Plains being well stock'd with Game. As for domestick Fowls, Hens and Geese, if they bred any, it was for their pleasure, being strictly forbid by their Religion to eat them, as Cæsar expressly observes. Neither did they eat any Fish, though the Rivers and the Sea that surrounded them, were plentifully stor'd with them. Their Towns or rather Villages were only a confus'd parcel of Hutts plac'd at a little distance from each other, without any Order or Distinction of Streets. They generally stood in the Middle of a Wood, the Avenues whereof were defend- ed with slight Ramparts of Earth, or with the Trees that were fell'd to clear the Ground. Notwithstanding this their plain and simple Manner of living, so remote from the Luxury of other Nations, they were as quick of Apprehension as their Neighbours the Gauls, and, if Tacitus may be credited, of greater Penetration. Diodorus Siculus does not scruple to prefer their Honesty and Integrity before That of the Romans. One Custom however they had that seem'd detestable to other Nations, though for their part they thought it very innocent: And that was, for ten or a dozen Brothers or Friends to live all together and have their Wives in common. This Custom continued a long time among them, though in other respects they were grown very civiliz'd by their Commerce with the Romans, when Masters of this Island. A British Lady being upbraided one day by Julia, Severus's Empress, with a Custom so contrary to the Practice of other Nations, is said, by an Historian, to return this bold Answer, The Roman Ladies have little Reason to reproach us upon this Account, since we do publicly with the best of our Men no more than what they do privately with the worst of theirs, Freedmen and Slaves. The Britons, without doubt, differ'd from more civiliz'd Nations in many other Customs (2). But their Country being little frequented by Foreigners, we know but few Particulars about them, especially with regard to the Time before the Arrival of the Romans. We must therefore be satisfied with what we find scattered here and there in Authors, who it may be, for the most part, knew but little of the Matter.

Cæsar Com.
l. v.

Dio. l. lxxvi.

Cæsar gives a great Character of the Valour of the Britons, and their going to Battle with undaunted Bravery. But it is hard to understand his Description of their way of Fighting. He says, they fought for the most part in Chariots, from whence, furiously driving among their Enemies, they flung their Darts: but when they had to deal with the Horse, they left their Chariots to fight on Foot with Advantage. Now this seems very strange. For my part, I own I can't conceive what Advantage they could have to engage the Horse rather on foot than in their Chariots.

The Britons
manner of fighting.
Cæsar Com.
l. iv.

As well situated for Trade as the Britons were, we don't find they had any large Vessels, or ventur'd to Sea beyond the Coasts of Gaul. Their chief Commerce was with the Phœnician Merchants (3), who, after the Discovery of the Island, exported every Year great Quantities of Tin, with which they drove a very gainful Trade with distant Nations. But notwithstanding all their Care to conceal the Fountain-Head, the Greeks (4) discovered it at length, and came and traded also to the same Place.

Their Trade,

This Commerce being carried on in the furthest Parts of Cornwall only, Foreign Merchants had no Opportunity to know exactly the State of the Island. For which reason we are ignorant at this day, of many Particulars, concerning the Religion and Government of the Britons, that probably would have been transmitted down to us, if other Nations had met with Information. A full account therefore must not be expected of these Matters, since Here, as well as in many other Cases, Conjectures only are all we have to go upon. Thus much however is known, that the Britons had in a manner the same Gods with the Gauls. For Instance, Dis and Samothes were Deities equally worshipped by both Nations. But the Britons had a very particular Veneration for Andate, Goddess of Victory, to whom they sacrificed their Prisoners of War.

Their Religions.

We know moreover the Druids, as well among the Britons as Gauls, had the Care and Direction of all Religious Matters (5). The Name Druid comes from the Word Deru, signifying in the British or Celtic Language, an Oak, like Drus in the Greek (6). For the Mistletoe that grows on the Oak was looked upon by them as a most sacred Thing, and the greatest Blessing from Heaven (7). The Druids were held in such Veneration by the People, that their Authority was almost absolute. No publick Affairs were transacted without their Approbation: not so much as a Malefactor could be put to death without their Consent. Religion not only afforded them a Pretence to

The Druids.
Cæsar, l. vi.
Pliny, l. xvi.
c. 44.

(1) That is, Indigenæ, or the first and most antient Inhabitants of Britain, in Opposition to those that came over from Belgium. Mag. Brit. p. 8.

(2) Another Custom they had, viz. If a Wife was found accessory to her Husband's death, she was proceeded against with Fire. Hence, says Coke, our present Law of burning Women that have kill'd their Husbands.

(3) The Phœnicians first came to Britain before the Trojan War. Sam. Brit. p. 47.

(4) The Greeks came hither 160 Years before Julius Cæsar. Sam. Brit. p. 74.

(5) Et vos, Barbaricos ritus moremque finitimum Sacrorum, Druidæ, positis repetitis ab armis. Solis nosse deos, &c. Lucan.

The Druids, now, while Arms are heard no more,
Old Mysteries and barbarous Rites restore:
A Tribe who singular Religion love,
And haunt the lonely Coverts of the Grove,
To these, and these of all Mankind alone,
The Gods are sure reveal'd, or sure unknown.
If dying Mortals Doom they sing aright,
No Ghosts descend to dwell in dreadful Night:
No parting Souls to grisly Pluto go,
Nor seek the dreary silent Shades below:
But forth they fly Immortal in their Kind,

And other Bodies in new Worlds they find.
Thus Life for ever runs its endless Race;
And like a Line, Death but divides the Space;
A Stop which can but for a Moment last,
A Point between the Future and the Past.
Thrice happy they beneath their Northern Skies,
Who that worst Fear, the Fear of Death despise:
Hence they no Cares for this frail Being feel,
But rush undaunted on the pointed Steel;
Provoke approaching Fate, and bravely scorn,
To spare that Life which must so soon return. Lucan.

(6) Father Pezron, in his Book of the Original of the Celtic Language, will have both Greek and Latin to come from Celtic. If so, the Greek Word Drus must come from the Celtic Deru. Rapin.

(7) Ad Viseum Druidæ, Druidæ cantare solebant. Ovid. They called the Mistletoe, as they still call it in some Part of Wales, the Pren-Awyr. These Groves where they worshipped were called Llwyn, thence probably the Word Llan signifying now in Welsh a Church. These Groves were Inclosures of spreading Oaks, ever surrounding their sacred Places. In which were 1. Gorseddau, or Hillocks where they sat and pronounced their Decrees, and spoke Orations to the People. 2. Carneddæ, or Heaps of Stones on which they had a peculiar Mode of Worship. 3. Cremleste, or Altars on which they perform'd the Solemnities of Sacrifices. Rowland, p. 69.

concern themselves in the Government, but authorized them, as they pretended, to intermeddle in private Affairs. Under colour that there is hardly any Case but where Religion may be concern'd, they claim'd a Power to exclude from the Sacrifices all such as refused to submit to their Determinations. By that means they became very formidable, this sort of Excommunication being deemed to infamous, that the Person on whom it was pronounced, was avoided by All. The Christian Clergy in this Point have but too closely imitated the antient Druids. The Chief of the Druids was a sort of Pontiff or High-Priest, who had Authority over all the rest. This Dignity was Elective: and sometimes when the Candidates were of equal Merit, such Heats and Broils have raged among them, that they have fallen to Blows before the Election was over.

The Bards. The Bards, among both Britons and Gauls, were Priests of an inferior Order to the Druids. Their Business was to celebrate the Praises of their Heroes in Verses and Songs, which they compos'd and sung to their Harps (1). They continued in being a long time. There were some even after the Romans had entirely abandon'd the Island.

The Eubates. A third sort of Priests, as well in Britain as Gaul, were the Eubates (2), who applied themselves chiefly to the Study of Philosophy, and the Contemplation of the wonderful Works of Nature, as Marcellinus informs us.

Religion of the Gauls and Britons. In short, as the Britons and Gauls had properly but one and the same Religion, 'tis very probable one of these Nations received it from the other. Cæsar was of Opinion, that the Gauls had it from Britain, because, as he observes, those that were desirous to have a thorough Knowledge of this Religion, went thither to study it. But this Argument at most serves only to prove, that their religious Mysteries were celebrated with greater Exactness in Britain, it may be by reason of the Revolutions that happened in Gaul, by the Wars raised there by the Romans. Buchanan, not so positive as Cæsar, says, it can't certainly be known which of the two Nations received it from the other. 'Tis very likely however, the Gauls when they peopled Britain, brought their Religion with them. Be that as it will, since the British and Gaulish Druids had the same Notions, and there is nothing certain concerning the First, we can form no Idea of their Religion, but by that of the Gauls, which is a little better known to us. This Knowledge however is of no great Extent, the Druids having left nothing in Writing, it being their Custom to teach their Disciples every thing by heart. A Burgundian Author has been at the Pains to collect some of the Druidical Maxims or Rules, of which the most remarkable are these:

Gallut. Men. de Franch. Comt.

Maxims of the Druids.

None must be instructed but in the Sacred Groves.
Mistletoe must be gather'd with reverence, and if possible in the Sixth Moon. It must be cut with a Golden Bill.

Every thing derives its Origin from Heaven.

The Arcana of the Sciences must not be committed to Writing, but to the Memory.

Great Care is to be taken of the Education of Children.

The Powder of Mistletoe makes Women fruitful.

The Disobedient are to be shut out from the Sacrifices.

Souls are immortal.

The Soul after Death goes into other Bodies.

If the World is destroy'd, it will be by Fire or Water.

Upon extraordinary Emergencies, a Man must be sacrificed;
According as the Body falls, or moves after it is fallen;
according as the Blood flows, or the Wound opens, future Events are foretold.

Prisoners of War are to be slain upon the Altars, or burnt alive inclos'd in Wicker, in honour of the Gods.

All Commerce with Strangers must be prohibited.

He that comes last to the Assembly of the States, ought to be punished with Death.

Children are to be brought up apart from their Parents, 'till they are fourteen Years of Age.

Money lent in this World will be repaid in the next.

There is another World, and They who kill themselves to accompany their Friends thither, will live with them there.

Letters given to dying Persons, or thrown on the funeral Piles of the Dead, will faithfully be deliver'd in the other World.

(1) Vis queque qui feris animas illoque premissas
Laudibus in honorem, vates, distuldis, avum, Plurima securi iudicis carmina, Bardi. Lucan.

(2) Ouznie, Strals. In Welsh or Bryg, Offeyr or Offyddon. Men. Ant. p. 65.

(3) The present Bishoprick of Lugo.

(4) Rousset in his Alena Arqueia imagines the Second Sight (which he seems to believe) call'd Taish in Scotland, to be a Relick of Druidism, and build his Conjecture upon this noted Story related by Vepieus, who says, Diolejian, when a private Soldier in Gallia, on his removing thence, reckoning with his Hostess, a Druid Woman, she told him he was too penurious, but that he needed not to be sparing of his Money, for after he should kill a Bear, the ass'd him (looking steadily in his Face) he would be Emperor of Rome. These Words made great Impression upon him, and he was afterwards much delighted in hunting and killing Bears, often saying when he saw many made Emperors, and his own Fortune not much mending, That the Bears must eat the Fleish. However, many years after, one Arvus Apo, Father-in-law of the Emperor Numerianus, guiding for the Forest, suddenly slew him, for which Fact being brought by the Soldiers before Diolejian (then become a prime Commander in the Army) he ask'd a full name, and being told he was call'd Apo (i. e. Bear) without further Paule sheath'd his Sword in his Bowels, saying, Et tu, Apo, cum ceteris, which done the Soldiers saluted him Emperor.

The Moon is a Sovereign Remedy for All things, as its name in Celtic implies.

Let the Disobedient be excommunicated; let him be depriv'd of the Benefit of the Law; let him be avoided by All, and render'd incapable of any Employ.

All Masters of Families are Kings in their own Houses, they have a Power of Life and Death over their Wives, Children and Slaves.

These Articles may serve to give us a Specimen of the Principles and Religion of the Druids, which flourish'd a long while in Great-Britain as well as in Gaul. It spread as far as Italy, as appears by Augustus's Injunction to the Romans not to celebrate its Mysteries. There were Women, as well as Men, Druids. It was a female Druid of Tungria (3), that according to Vepieus foretold to Diolejian (when a private Soldier in Gallia) that he would be Emperor of Rome (4).

If the Religion of the Britons may be learnt by That of the Gauls, an Idea of their Government may likewise be formed the same way. As both Nations were of Celtic Extraction, they had, very probably, the same Form of Government. In order therefore to know the Nature of the British Government, recourse may be had to what was in use among the Gauls. From the Time of the founding of Rome, the Gauls were divided into several petty States, with a Head or King over each. Some of these being more powerful than the rest, kept their Neighbours in a sort of Dependance, and one of them, upon great and imminent Dangers, was by common Consent chosen chief Commander, whose Power was limited, as well as the Time of his Administration. During his Office, he was consider'd as a Sovereign Magistrate, having Power to put the Laws in Execution, and act as Captain-General of all their Forces. Livy (according to the Custom of the Romans) calls this Magistrate, King. But a modern Author, who believed he understood better the Nature of that Dignity, affirms the Title of King not to be at all proper for the Person invest'd with it, and therefore calls him only Paramount, or one superior to the rest. However this be, the Britons may be supposed to have had much the same Form of Government, since we find the whole Country between the Tine and the Channel was divided into seventeen petty States, with each its Head, dignified by Authors with the Name of King. When Julius Cæsar invaded Britain, the Command of their Army was confer'd by the Britons on Cassibelanus King or Chief of the Trinobantes; and in the Time of Claudius, Caradacus King of the Silures was chosen General. In the Map annex'd, the Names and Situation of these States are laid down. These Nations without doubt, depending on each other no farther than Necessity compell'd them, had frequent Quarrels and Contentions. But we have no certain Knowledge of their Affairs; and therefore the Beginning of their History can be dated no farther back than Cæsar's Invasion. From thence to the Time of their being freed from the Dominion of the conquering Romans, the Thread may in some measure be carried on, though several large Gaps occur, which 'tis not possible to fill up, by reason of the Fewness of the Authors that have treated of this Subject. But before I begin, it will be necessary to premise a brief Account of the Picts and Scots, Inhabitants of North-Britain.

The Government of the Britons.

S. Julian Orig. of the Burgund.

Pomp. Mel. l. i. i.

If the Britons aspire to a very antient Original, by calling themselves Descendants of Brutus, Great-Grandson of Æneas, the Scots ever jealous of the Glory of their Neighbours, resolve not to yield to them even in this imaginary Honour: Nay, they go beyond them, and lay Claim to a much greater, but withal a no less fabulous Antiquity. Their Histories are full of their Nation being founded by Gathelus Son of Cecrops, King of Athens; or, as some say, Son of Argus, fourth King of Argos, jointly with Senta Daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt. This fable is dress'd up in the following Manner:

Gathelus being forced to quit his native Country, to avoid the Persecution of his Enemies, puts to Sea in company with some Friends who would not forsake him. After several Adventures too long to relate, he comes into Egypt and serves under Moses in Pharaoh's War with the Ethiopians. At length, upon Moses leaving Egypt, Gathelus

The fable of the Scots being descended from the Athenians, is a fable of the Scots, as is the fable of the Scots being descended from the Ethiopians.

You too, you Bards! seekem sacred Raptures first,
To chaunt your Heroes on your Country's Lyres,
Who associate, in your immortal Strain,
Brave Patrons-Souls in Righteous Battle slain.

having signaliz'd himself by many brave Actions, succeeds him in the Command of Pharaoh's Army, who gives him his Daughter Scota in marriage. Thirty-nine Years after, Gathelus, terrified by an Oracle foretelling the Destruction of Egypt, sails from thence with a great Number of Greeks and Egyptians who adhere to his Fortune. He makes several Attempts to settle in Africa, but not succeeding, roves about uncertain of his Fate, and at last lands at a Port on the western Coast of Spain, calling the Place Portus Gatheli, from whence came the Name of Portugal. [Here the Author of this Fable forgot that Gathelus spoke Greek and not Latin.] After some stay, Gathelus leaving a Colony here, steers his Course farther Northward, and settles in a Country, from his own Name call'd Gathelicia, or Galicia. Some time after, his Son Hiberus embarking with some of his Father's Followers, sails towards the North, and leads a Colony to an Island by him nam'd Hibernia, and afterwards Ireland. As this Island was not then very populous, the Natives gladly receive the New-comers, and mixing with them, soon became one Nation under the general Name of Scots, from Scota Mother of Hiberus.

It would be lost time to refute a Fable that brings its own Confutation along with it. Neither should I have mention'd it, had not Buchanan insert'd it in his History of Scotland, and shewn the Absurdities of it to remove the Prejudices of Those of his Countrymen who stood up in its defence. This may be call'd the fabulous Origin of the Scots. The Account given for Truth by the Writers that are less prepossess'd in favour of the Antiquity of their Nation, is as follows:

A probable Account of the Origin of the Scots. The Island of Iren, called by the Romans Hibernia, and by the English and Scots, Iren-landt or Ireland, had been long possess'd by the Scots from Scythia in Europe, when a Colony of Spaniards came with a design to settle there, much about the time that the Carthaginians became Masters of Spain. The Number of these Foreigners not being very considerable, the Natives, far from being alarmed, willingly admitted them, and assigned them Lands to cultivate. Buchanan supposes these Spaniards to be descended from a Colony of the Celtiberians that were settled in Spain. The good Reception these met with in Ireland, drew others thither: inasmuch that in the end the Island grew very populous, and the two Nations mixing together became one People under the Name of Scots. In process of time, the Land being over-stock'd, abundance of Families threw themselves into the Hebrides or Hebrides, Islands situated North of Ireland, which being small, were likewise in time as well peopled as Ireland itself. The Scythians or Scots are said to land in Ireland not long after the Flood, and the Spaniards to arrive there in the Year of the World 3380.

Arrival of the Picts in Britain. Bede, l. i. c. 1. The Hebrides being thus peopled by the Scots, certain strange Ships came and offer'd to land. These Ships were fill'd with Picts, a German Nation inhabiting the Countries now called Mecklenburg and Pomerania. They were roving about according to the Custom of the northern Nations, in quest of new Habitations, their Country being too populous to find them a Subsistence (1). They demanded of the Scots some part of their Isles to settle in. The Scots replied, the Soil was so barren, that it was incapable of supplying them all with Necessaries. But withal inform'd them, that a large Island call'd Albion lay not far distant, where the northern Parts being thinly inhabited, they would infallibly find room enough, offering them assistance in case of Opposition. The Picts satisfied with this Discovery, steer'd directly to Albion, and finding but few Inhabitants where they landed, settled without much trouble in the northern Parts.

Buchan. The Scots, having been long desirous to extend their Habitations into Albion, where they hoped to find greater Plenty than in their Islands, laid hold of this Opportunity to share in the new Settlement (2). The Picts were not displeased to see such Numbers flock over, for besides the Need they stood in of their Assistance against the Attacks of the Natives of Albion, they could not possibly have subsisted long in that Country, if the Scots had not supplied them with Wives to perpetuate their Colony. But this was done upon condition the Heirs of the Women should have the Preference before those of the Men in the Succession to the Kingdom they were going to establish. This Law, Bede says, was in force in his time. The two Nations, being thus united together in one common Interest, compell'd by degrees the ancient Inhabitants of Albion to retire to the Southward, and leave them in possession of all the Country lying North of the Tine. At length, their Numbers being mightily increas'd, they agreed to separate; whether the Difference of their Laws and Customs occasioned frequent Quarrels, or for some other unknown Reasons. The Scots chose the Western Part, as nearest Ireland, with the Hebrides, and the Picts took the Eastern as opposite to Germany (3). After the Separation, the two Nations began to be distinguished from one another, and govern'd each by their own Laws. The Scots that inhabit-Distinction between the Scots, and Great and Little Scotland.

Camd. Desc. of Scot. ed Albion began to be distinguished from Those that remained in Ireland and the adjacent Isles. The Former were called Albians, and the Latter, Irish. Hence comes likewise the Distinction between Great Scotland or Ireland, and Little Scotland or North Britain. The Albin Scots of strengthened by continual Supplies from their Brethren the Irish, increas'd to such a degree, that in the end growing much more powerful than the Picts, they utterly destroy'd them. But this happened not till many Ages after their Separation.

It is difficult for Amity and a good Understanding to remain long between two bordering Nations. Jealousy and opposite Interests furnish them with too frequent Occasions of Quarrel. The Picts and Scots were no sooner parted, but they began to fall at variance about some trifling Affair. The Contest being inflam'd, they were upon the point of coming to an open rupture by the Instigations of the ancient Inhabitants, who fomented the Division to the utmost of their Power. These last, whom I shall for the future call Britons, though I know not when that Name was first given them, began to repent of suffering these Foreigners to settle in the Island. Wherefore, at this so seemingly favourable an Opportunity, they thought it their Interest to kindle a War which could not fail to be fatal to both Parties, and might even prove equally destructive of Both. As the Britons were in most danger from the Scots by reason of their Neighbourhood to Ireland, they offer'd their Assistance to the Picts to drive the Scots out of the Country, in expectation afterwards to find an opportunity to do the same by those they were now so desirous to side with. The Scots being inform'd of this Alliance, turn'd their Thoughts to Ireland, and applied for Aid to King Perchard, who sent over his Son Fergus. This young Prince finding the Albin-Scots in a sort of Anarchy, without a Chief or Head but what they chose upon extraordinary Occasions; and representing to them the Inconveniences attending such a State, they resolv'd to invest him with Sovereign Authority. Fergus therefore was the first King of Scotland properly so call'd, for Great Scotland or Ireland not only had been govern'd by Kings many Ages before; but if the Irish are to be credited, was the most ancient Monarchy in the World. Fergus is said to arrive in Scotland in the Year of the World 3627, about the Time Alexander the Great made his Entrance into Babylon. But this Pretension is so strongly contested, it must not be too easily admitted.

Fergus joins with the Picts against the Britons. Fergus, as soon as he was seated in his Throne, made great Preparations for the War against the Picts, without neglecting however the Means to avoid it. He represented to them by his Ambassadors that the Contest between the two Nations being of little moment, might easily be decided without coming to Blows, would both sides but agree to hearken to reason: That it was to be feared their weakening one another, would afford their Neighbours and common Enemies the Britons an opportunity to destroy both Nations, which it was easy to perceive was their Intention. This Remonstrance made such Impression on the Picts, that suddenly altering their first Design, they entered into a strict Alliance with the Scots against the Britons. Fergus thus strengthen'd by the Assistance of the Picts, march'd against the Britons, and gave them Battle, in which their King Coilus was slain. After this Defeat, the Britons finding themselves too weak to resist the two northern Nations, sue for Peace. Fergus shortly after, returning to Ireland, was cast away and drowned near the Place where Carick-Fergus now stands (4).

This is the Account of the Scotish Historians concerning the Settlement of the two Nations that inhabited North-Britain. From the Arrival of Fergus to the Roman Invasion, they pretend things remained in much the same State without any considerable Alteration in the Island, or of the Inhabitants. From the Channel to the Tine, the Country was possess'd by the Britons, and divided into seventeen petty States or Kingdoms. From the Tine to the utmost Bounds of the North, the Picts (5) inhabited the Eastern, over against Germany, and the Scots the Western Parts, opposite to Ireland, from which they were parted by a very narrow Channel. The Scots count fifteen Kings from Fergus to Ederus, who reigned in Scotland when Cæsar invaded Britain.

(1) In St. Kilda the most western Isle of the Hebrides, the Inhabitants now live upon Eggs, which the wild Geese come and lay constantly at a certain Season. Martin's Voyage to St. Kilda, printed at London 1698. Rapin.

(2) This is strongly contested, for it is pretended by many that the Scots did not settle in the northern Parts of Britain till the beginning of the Sixth Century. Buchanan's Account is followed here. Rapin.

(3) They were parted by Grantslain Hills, called by Tacitus in the Life of Agricola, c. 25. M. J. Grampius.

(4) This was the first Place besieged by Duke Schomberg at his Arrival in Ireland in 1689. Rapin.

(5) The name of Picts is first mention'd by Eumenius in his Panegyric to Maximian, about the Year 286. Tyrel, p. 92.

Dispute as to the Scots being the first inhabitants of Great Britain.

Though one should think the Scots best knew the Origin of their own Monarchy, yet this Antiquity of theirs is greatly contested by several famous and learned English Writers. Instead of admitting what the Scots advance, they pretend to demonstrate that the Nation was not settled in Great-Britain till the beginning of the Sixth Century. This Dispute appears at first sight to be of little Consequence, the Scots being able to plead too long a Prescription to apprehend their Right of Possession may be called in question. On the other hand, it does not seem to be of much Benefit to the English to contest with them the Honour of this Antiquity, supposing it to be imaginary. Notwithstanding, as Religion was concerned in the Case, the Dispute was carried on with great Warmth. The Presbyterians among their Objections against Episcopacy advance, that the Church of Scotland was governed by Presbyters only, call'd Culdees (1), before there were any Bishops in the Country; whence they would infer that Episcopacy is not of divine Institution. The English Bishops answered this Objection by denying the Fact, affirming, the Church of Scotland was so far from being govern'd by Presbyters, that it was not yet in being, the Scots not settling in the Island before the Year of our Lord 503. According to the English then, eight hundred Years of the Time the Scots ascribe to their Settlement in Great-Britain must be taken away. This Difference is so considerable, that one can hardly think the Scots should be so much mistaken. Is it possible, the forty Kings that are pretended to sit on the Throne of Scotland, from Fergus I. to Coran, who reigned in the Year of Christ 501, were imaginary Kings only? On the other side, it is no less difficult to believe that their learned Adversaries would lay so great an Error to their Charge, were they not perswaded they had good Proofs to support their Opinion. As the Generality of my Readers are but little concerned in this Dispute, it is not, I suppose, expected that I should fully relate the Arguments urged on both Sides, they being the Subject of many Volumes. I shall content my self therefore with briefly showing how this Dispute was managed.

Had the Scots been obliged to prove directly their Settlement in Great-Britain from the Time of Alexander the Great, I am afraid their Arguments would not have been altogether satisfactory to unprejudic'd Judges. But they wisely gave the Dispute another Turn. When a Nation, say they, ascribes any thing to itself in an historical Way, it ought not to be denied without sufficient Evidence to the contrary. By this means they put their Adversaries upon proving a Negative, which every one knows to be a very difficult Task. However, this is what they have undertaken to do. Their main Argument is drawn from no Writers mentioning the Scots as Inhabitants of Great-Britain till the Sixth Century. They alledge on the contrary several Passages from Latin Authors, wherein you have a List of the Nations that inhabited the northern Parts of the Island, without the least mention of the Scots. But the Scots maintain that this negative Proof destroys not their Pretensions, for their Nation not being subdued by the Romans till the Reign of Severus, and remaining but a very short Space under their Dominion, it is no wonder they knew so little of it, and consequently gave so imperfect an Account. They add moreover, tho' the Deucaledonians, Meatae, Attacotti, are mention'd by Tacitus and other Historians, as inhabiting the northern Parts of Great-Britain, it does not follow that these Nations were not Picts or Scots, just as the Iceni, Trinobantes, Silures, were truly Britons, though distinguish'd by particular Names. Among the Adversaries of the Scots in this Dispute, the most considerable are Usher, Lloyd, Stillingfleet, Authors of great Note. In their Defence the principal Writers are Hector Boetius, Buchanan, Mackenzie, all Three very eminent in Scotland.

If the Picts were still in being, they would have the like Charge to maintain. For the same English Authors affirm, the Picts were no other than Britons, who to avoid the Tyranny of the Romans, retir'd into the northern Parts of the Island; where continuing to paint their Bodies with Wood, the Romans gave them the Name of Picts, to distinguish them from those that, after their Submission to the Roman Power, had left off that Custom. This Opinion is not groundless, since it is certain, many Britons, unwilling to submit to the Roman Yoke, retir'd northward, as the Conquerors advanc'd in the Island. But as the Romans subdued the Seventeen British Nations, not all at once, but by degrees, it may be ask'd why they gave the Name of Picts to Those only that fled beyond the Tine, and not to the other Nations before they were conquer'd, to distinguish them also from such as had submitted. The Scots further reply, that the Argument alledg'd by the English is more specious than solid, being entirely built upon the Conformity of the Name Picts with the Latin Word Picti: That many Britons, it is true, retir'd among the Inhabitants of the North, but to prove These to be the same with them that were afterwards call'd Picts, it must be shown how they came to be a separate Body, and a distinct People from the other northern Nations, as it is certain the Picts were for several Ages, with Laws and Customs different from These of the Britons and Scots: That seeing nothing like this can be shown, it is more natural to think these fugitive Britons retiring among the Picts were incorporated with them. This Opinion, to which I confess I am inclin'd, may be farther confirmed, by considering that the Scots, not being conquered till the Reign of Severus, and remaining but a very little time under the Dominion of the Romans, called their Neighbours Pebiti. Now if this Name be the same with that of the Picts from the Latin word Picti, how can it be conceiv'd that the northern People, whether Scots or others, should give their Neighbours a Roman Name? But if it be a different Name, it must then be owned, the Picts were not Britons, nor receiv'd their Name from the Custom of painting their Bodies. Buchanan, who takes the Name of the Picts to be Roman, confesses however his Ignorance of the Name they gave themselves. But on the other Hand, he pretends they came from certain Gaulish Colonies settled in Thrace, where they painted their Bodies as well as in Britain. The Picts, continues he, spoke the same Language as the Britons and Scots, since we don't find in History that these three Nations had occasion for Interpreters to trade together. I own this does not seem to me to be a satisfactory Reason, it being very possible these Nations might speak different Languages, and yet Historians make no mention of Interpreters (2). Buchanan however concludes from hence they were originally Celtæ. Verstegan, an English Author, says the Name of the Picts comes from a Word in their own Language, signifying Warrior. I don't think it necessary to examine any farther the Origin of a Nation that has now been entirely extinct without the least Remains almost Nine Hundred Years.

This is all I could find worth notice concerning the Picts and Scots, who are to make so considerable a Figure in the following History. It is time now to return to the Britons, and show in what manner they were subdued by the Romans.

(1) Bishop Lloyd says they were call'd Kelldesi, or in old Scotch, Kyldees, from Cylle, a Cell, and Tee or Dec a House, that is, a House of Cells. But afterwards when it was usual to find out Latin Derivations for those Words of which Men did not know the Original, Kyldees or Kyllodes came to be call'd Culdees or Coldies, that is, Worshippers of God. Either way it appears they were Monks. Now the first Monks among the Scots were St. Martin's Disciples, who died in 401. Consequently the Culdees were not of so antient a Date as pretended by Selden and the Scots Historians. They are not mentioned by Bede or Nennius.

(2) Bede says, in his time God was served in five several Languages in Britain, namely, Anglorum, Britonum, Sectorum, Pictorum, & Latinerum, l. 2. c. 2. Huntingd. p. 299.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK I.

From the first Invasion of Britain by the Romans under JULIUS CÆSAR, to the Calling in of the SAXONS. Containing the Space of about Five Hundred Years.

THE Romans were become Masters of almost all Europe, of the best Part of Africa, and of the richest Countries of Asia, before they undertook the Conquest of Great-Britain. While so many Kingdoms were by these Conquerors continually added to their Empire, Great-Britain preserv'd her Liberty: but it was owing rather to her Situation than Strength. She was consider'd as a separate World by herself, to which the Inhabitants of the Continent seem'd to have no Pretensions, or at least, knew nothing there capable of exciting their Desires. Besides, the Wars with the Gauls kept the Romans so long employ'd, that they had not leisure or opportunity to think of the Britons. Julius Cæsar was the first that form'd the Project of that Conquest, during his Government of Gaul, where he caus'd the Roman Arms to triumph. His frequent Victories over the Gauls had extremely increas'd his Fame, and procur'd great Advantages to the Commonwealth. But he was not himself satisfied with the Reputation he had lately acquir'd in Gaul. His Thirst of Glory and Desire of enlarging the Bounds of the Empire, inspir'd him with the Design to extend his Conquests, and bring the Britons under the Dominion of the Romans. Some accuse him of being influenc'd by a more ignoble Motive, and of aiming in this Enterprize at the enriching himself with the Spoils he hoped to find in the Island (1). But this Imputation cannot be said to be well-grounded. However this be, Great-Britain, tho' little known in those days, had charms sufficient to raise the Ambition of that renowned Warrior. His Pretence for invading the Britons was their assisting the Enemies of the Commonwealth: a Pretence frequently us'd by the Romans to carry their Conquests into the most remote Countries. Upon this Ground he made two Expeditions into the Island, the Particulars whereof are thus related in his Commentaries.

Cæsar forms the Design to conquer Britain.

Sueton. Mela.

Cæsar, tho' he had spent part of the Summer in making an Irruption into Germany, resolv'd to employ the rest in the Execution of his Design upon Britain. He was very sensible however, the Season was too far advanc'd to expect to make any great Progress. Nevertheless, he consider'd it would be no small advantage if he could take a View of the Island, almost wholly unknown to all but the Merchants that traded on the Coasts. And these Merchants themselves were so little acquainted with what Cæsar wanted to know, that sending for some of them, he could learn neither the Extent of the Island, nor whether it was well-peopled or not. Much less could they give him any Information concerning the Ports and Havens, and whether there were any fit to receive Ships of Burthen. This Uncertainty made him resolve to send Volusenus to view the Coasts as far as was possible without danger, whilst his Troops were marching to the Place of Imbarkation (2).

The Britons, receiving Intelligence by the Merchants of Cæsar's Design, endeavour to divert him from his purpose, by sending Ambassadors with Offers of Obedience to the Romans, and the Delivery of Hostages. Cæsar gives the Ambassadors a very civil Reception, but exhorting them to persist in their Resolution, dismisses them without Answer, or at least without telling them positively what he intended to do. With them however he sends Comius (whom he had a few days before made King of the Attrebates) (3) with Instructions to persuade the Britons to make an Alliance with the Romans, and acquaint him with his Design to come over into their Island. They were by no means pleas'd with the News, for they expected what they had done would have induc'd the Roman General to alter his Resolution. So, whether Comius spoke to them too haughtily, or they had a mind to let the Romans see they did not fear them, they committed the Ambassador to Prison, loading him with Irons.

Mean while Volusenus having coasted along the southern Parts of the Island without landing, returns and gives an

(1) Britanniam petisse spe margaritarum, quarum amplitudinem conferentem, interdum sua manu exegisse pondus. Sueton. in J. Cæs. c. 47. Rapin.
(2) Suetonius says nothing of C. Volusenus being sent to make Discoveries, but rather intimates, that Cæsar undertook to do this in person. Nieue in Britanniam transiit, nisi ante per se portus & navigationem & accessum ad insulam explorasset. Vit. Jul. Cæs. c. 58. But according to Cæsar's own Account Suetonius was mistaken.

(3) Inhabitants of the Country about Arras,

Account of the Discoveries he had made. Whereupon, every thing being ready to begin the Expedition, Cæsar imbark'd two Legions on board eighty Transports, leaving orders for the Horse to follow with all speed in eighteen more that could not yet join the Fleet, and were expected every moment: but his Orders were not timely enough executed. At his Arrival on the Coasts of Britain, he sees the Hills and Cliffs that ran out into the Sea, cover'd with Troops that could easily with their Darts prevent his landing (1). Upon which he determines to look out for some other place, where he may land his Army with less danger. However, he lies by 'till Three in the Afternoon (2), expecting some Ships that were not yet come up. Upon their joining the Fleet, he makes a Signal for the principal Officers, and giving them his last Instructions concerning their landing, makes sail and comes to an Anchor about two Leagues farther, near a plain and open Shore (3). The Britons perceiving his Intent, send their Chariots and Horse that way, whilst the rest of their Army advance to support them. The main difficulty in landing proceeded from the Largeness of the Vessels which hinder'd them from coming near enough to the Shore; so that the Roman Soldiers saw themselves under a Necessity of leaping into the Sea arm'd as they were, in order to attack their Enemies who stood ready to receive them on dry Ground. Cæsar perceiving his Soldiers did not exert their usual Bravery on this occasion, orders some Gallies to get as near the Shore as possible, and set upon the Enemy in the Flank. This Precaution had the desired Effect.
For the Slings, Engines, and Arrows were so well employ'd from these Gallies, that the Courage of the Britons began to abate. But the Romans still demurr'd upon throwing themselves into the Water, and it may be would hardly have done it at all, had not the Standard-Bearer of the Tenth Legion shewn them the way, by leaping in first with his Colours in his Hand, crying out aloud, Follow me, Fellow-Soldiers, unless you will betray the Roman Eagle into the Hands of the Enemy. For my part I am resolv'd to discharge my Duty to Cæsar and the Commonwealth. Upon these Words, he leaps into the Sea and advances with his Eagle towards the Barbarians. Emulation and Shame causing the Soldiers to forget the Danger, they courageously follow him and begin the Fight. But their Resolution was not able to compel the Britons to give ground: Nay, it was to be fear'd that the Romans constrain'd thus to fight in the Water without keeping their Ranks, would in the End have been repuls'd, had not Cæsar caus'd some armed Boats to ply about with Recruits, which made the Enemy fall back a little. The Romans improving this Advantage advance with all possible Expedition, and getting firm footing, press the Britons so vigorously, that at length they put them to rout. They durst not however pursue them, because the Horse were not yet come. Which Cæsar says, was the only thing that hinder'd the Victory from being compleat (4).

Islands near coast Difficult.

*The Britons
are routed.*

They sue for Peace.

Cæsar grants their Request.

The Romans sustain a great Loss by a Storm.

Misfortune, the same night the Tide of Flood rose so high,
(as is usual at the full of the Moon, a thing then unknown to the Romans) that the Gallies, having been drawn ashore were fill'd with Water. This Accident threw the Romans into great Conternation, for they had not brought with them wherewithal to repair their shatter'd Vessels, nor any quantity of Provisions, Cæsar having all along intended to winter in Gaul.

The Britons that were with Cæsar soon perceiv'd his want of Provisions, Ships and Cavalry. Besides, it was easy to guess, by the small extent of their Camp, that the Number of the Romans was not considerable. Having made these Observations, they steal away by degrees, and represent to their Countrymen, "what a favourable Opportunity offer'd to free themselves from Servitude:
"How the Romans were few in Number, without Provisions and Horse: How they had just lost their Ships, "and with them all hopes of retiring." Upon this the Britons resolve to use all possible means to cut off the Romans Provisions, and amuse them 'till Winter come on.
Cæsar guessing their Intentions by what had happen'd to him, took all imaginable Care to lay in as great a Stock of Provisions as he could, and put them under a strong Guard within the Camp. Then sending to Gaul for part of what he had occasion for to refit his Fleet, he made use of the Timber and Iron of the broken Vessels to repair the rest.
The Soldiers labour'd with so uncommon a Diligence,
(as their Safety was at stake) that in a few days the Fleet was in condition to sail, twelve Ships only having been lost.

The Britons break the Treaty.

Cæsar repairs his Fleet.

The seventh Legion attack'd by the Britons.

They sue for Peace.

Mean while, the seventh Legion being sent out to forage, News was brought to Cæsar, that a Cloud of Dust was seen to rise from that quarter. He suspected immediately what was the matter; and taking with him two Cohorts (5) that guarded the Camp, ordered the rest of the Forces to follow with all expedition. When he came to the Place, he found the Legion surrounded by the Enemy, and over-power'd with Numbers. As the Harvest was brought in every where else, the Britons did not question but the Romans would come and forage there, so lay in a Readiness to fall upon them. It was very easy to put Soldiers in Disorder that had quitted their Arms, and were dispers'd up and down to gather the Corn. They kill'd some at the first Onset; and to prevent the rest from escaping, began to surround them with their Chariots. Cæsar came very seasonably to the Relief of the Legions, and sav'd them from being all taken or slain. Having brought them off, he stood some time in order of Battle in sight of the Enemy, but at length retreated to his Camp, not deeming it proper to engage, unless compell'd to it.

The Britons, flush'd with this Success, drew together a greater Body of Troops, with a Resolution to attack the Roman Camp. Tho' Cæsar had but thirty (6) Horse in all, he drew up his Men, that the Enemy might not think he was afraid of them. They attack'd him as he forefaw.
But instead of forcing the Camp, they were vigorously repuls'd and pursu'd for several Miles. The Britons were so dishearten'd at their Loss, that they sent the same Day Ambassadors to Cæsar to sue for Peace. The Posture of Cæsar's Affairs would not suffer him to improve his Victory, because he had no Horse to oppose to those of the Enemy. This Consideration induc'd him to conclude a Treaty with them, whereby they were bound to deliver a greater Number of Hostages, and send them to Gaul, where he intended to go as soon as possible. Tho' the Passage was not long, the Fear of exposing his Fleet to another Storm, if he stay'd 'till the Equinox, made him hasten his Departure (7). The Britons neglecting to send their Hostages, he puts his Troops into Winter Quarters, and forms the Design of a more important Expedition in the following Spring. Mean while, the Senate being in-form'd of Cæsar's Exploits in Britain, a Procession of twenty Days is decreed to him, though the Advantages

The Britons attack the Roman Camp.

They sue for Peace.

Cæsar returns to Gaul.

(1) This agrees exactly with the Cliff of Dover towards the South-fereland, that all Men of Judgment believe this to be the Place.

(2) Papin, our mistake, says, Four. See Cæsar's Comment.

(3) Such is the Shore at the Mouth of the River that goes up to Rickborough, call'd in Latin, Rutupie, Rutape, or Portus Rutupensis. Dr. Cole calls it Rutape, which suits best with the modern Names.

----- Rutupinaque littera fervent,
Unda Caledonies talit turba Britannas. Lucan. lib. vi.

Rickborough, or Portus Rutupensis is plac'd in the 2d Itin. of Antonine's Itinerary at twelve Miles distance from Durovernum, or Canterbury. Twelve Roman are about nine English Miles.

(4) The Time of Cæsar's landing in Britain is thus known. His first Expedition was, as he says himself, in the Consulate of Pompey and Cæsar, that is, according to Dr. Hannay, in the Year of Rome 667. But Augustus died in the Year 767, that is, Sixty-eight Years after Cæsar's Descent. Upon News of Augustus's Death, there was a Mutiny in the Pannonian Army, which was quitted by Drusus, by help of an Eclipse of the Moon. Now from this Eclipse it is certain that Augustus died in the 14th Year of Christ, consequently Cæsar's first Descent, which was Sixty-eight Years before, must be in the 56th Year current before the Christian Æra. And as the Year, to say the very Day and Hour when he landed, very probably, be fix'd. For Cæsar having mention'd the 4th Day after his landing, says, the Night after a new full Moon. Now, the Summer being far spent, this full Moon must have been in July or August. But the full Moon of July was in the beginning of the Month, and of the two full Moons that Year in August, that on the 1st Day was at Noon, wherefore it must be that a little after Midnight of the 3d. Hence it is plain, Cæsar landed four Days before, on the 26th of August, about five in the Afternoon. See Lucan, lib. vi. Antiquit. Phil. Trans. Vol. III. p. 402.

(5) It was the Custom of the Romans to place whole Cohorts before the Gates of their Camp. Hence our English Phrase, Court, or Cohort of Guard. A Cohort was the 10th Part of a Legion, about Six hundred Men. The first or chief Cohorts are said to contain sometimes above a Thou- sand Men. Isidore, p. 8.

(6) Dr. Barrow says, for Forty, that 30 is put by mistake for 300. p. 5.

(7) The Equinox, which now falls upon the 21st of September, must in Cæsar's Time have been on the 25th of that Month. (This Difference is accounted for by the Earth's Motion in its Orbit about the Sun, which is about 11 Minutes more than it really is.) So that probably Cæsar left the Island about the 20th of September, about 10 Days after his landing; and as he says, a little before the Equinox.

he had gain'd were of little Consequence to the Commonwealth (1).

B. C. 54-Cæsar's second Expedition.
Comm. l. v.

He lands without Opposition.

The Britons are worsted.

The Roman Ships are shattered by a Storm.

Cæsar repairs the Fleet, and draws the Ships toward the Camp.

Cassibelanus General of the British Forces, attacks the Romans.

He is repuls'd.

Another Skirmish, where the Britons have the Advantage.

Cæsar, according to his Custom, went and pass'd part of the Winter in Italy, leaving Orders with his Officers to repair the old, and build some more new Ships. When he had received Advice that his Orders were executed, he came to Portus Itius (2), where he found six Hundred Ships (3), and twenty-eight Gallies, on board of which he put five Legions, and two Thousand Horse. He conducts this numerous Fleet to a Place on the British-Coast, mark'd by him the Summer before, and lands his Forces without Opposition. For the Britons, as he was told afterwards, at the sight of so mighty an Armament, thought fit to retire into the Country behind some Hills. Cæsar, according to the Roman Custom, fortifies his Camp, and leaving a Guard, sets out in the Night in quest of the Enemy. Having marched about twelve Miles, he sees them posted on the other side of a River (4) to oppose his Passage. As resolute as they seem'd at first, they could not withstand the furious Charge of the Roman Horse, but were forc'd at length to quit their Post. They retir'd a little farther into a Wood, the Avenues whereof were block'd up with huge Trees laid a-cross one another, and which seem'd to be fortified in some former War. Tho' it appear'd very difficult to force these Intrenchments, the seventh Legion however performed that Service, and oblig'd the Britons to betake themselves to flight. But Night coming on, and the Country unknown, Cæsar forbids all Pursuit.

Next Day, he divides his Army into three Bodies, which march at some distance from each other in pursuit of the Enemy. During the march, he received the melancholy News that his Fleet was almost entirely destroyed by a violent Storm, most of the Ships being dash'd in pieces or driven ashore. As this Accident might be attended with ill Consequences, he resolv'd to hasten back to the Sea-side. Here he finds forty of his Ships destroyed, and the rest so damag'd, that they were hardly repairable. However, Necessity compelling him to go about it without loss of time, he sets all the Carpenters in the Fleet and Army to work, sending for others at the same time from Gaul. To prevent the like Misfortune again, as soon as the Ships are refitted, he employs his Soldiers, Night and Day, to draw them by Strength of Arms into the midst of the Camp. This Work, notwithstanding the difficulty of it, was finished in ten Days (5). Mean while, he writes to Labienus his Lieutenant in Gaul, to build more Ships and send them over when ready. Then leaving a sufficient Force to guard the Camp, he resumes the Design interrupted by the Misfortune befallen his Fleet.

He had not march'd far, before he was informed that the Enemies Forces were much increas'd, under the Conduct of Cassibelanus King of the Trinobantes, whose Kingdom lay beyond the Thames, about eighty Miles from the Sea (6). This Prince had hitherto wag'd continual Wars with his Neighbours; but upon the Romans Approach, they had concluded a Peace with him, and chosen him Commander in Chief. Whilst the Roman Army was on the march, they found themselves attacked on a sudden by the British Horse and Chariots. But this attack, tho' vigorous, was repuls'd with great loss on their Side. Nevertheless, they were not disheartned. Some Days after, whilst the Romans were employed about their Intrenchments, a Body of their Troops that lay conceal'd in the neighbouring Woods, fell furiously upon those that guarded the Camp, and put them into great Disorder. Cæsar seeing this, immediately sends two Cohorts to their Assistance, who, surpriz'd at the British manner of fighting, are routed at the first Charge. Quintus Laberius Pons a Tribune was slain in the Action. As this Battle was fought in sight of the Camp, Cæsar saw plainly the great Disadvantage the Romans, encumber'd with their heavy Armour, lay under, against swift and light-arm'd Enemies that engag'd in small Parties only, with a Body of Reserve in their Rear, from whence they were continually recruited. The Roman Horse were no less embaras'd than the Foot. As the Britons frequently counterfeited a Retreat, the Horsemen detach'd to pursue them were immediately cut in pieces; so that it was equally dangerous to pursue the Enemy or to retire. The confus'd manner of Cæsar's relating this Affair, is a clear Evidence that the Romans were worsted, tho' he does not say it in so many Words. Besides, the Reasons he alleges to excuse his ill Success are very weak; or if they are of any weight, whence is it that he did not meet with the same Difficulties in so many other Actions, wherein he pretends the Britons were routed Horse and Foot?

On the morrow, the Britons posted themselves on some Hills within sight of the Roman Camp. As they appear'd to be but few in Number, 'twas thought they had no Design to engage a second Time. Mean while, Cæsar sending out all the Horse to forage, with three Legions to guard them, the Britons fall with great fury upon the Foragers, who were defended by their Guard. The Resistance made by the Legions giving Cæsar time to advance with the rest of the Army, a great Battle ensu'd, wherein the Britons were entirely defeated.

After this Victory, Cæsar marches towards the Thames with intent to penetrate into Cassibelanus's Dominions. When he comes to the River Side, at a very difficult Ford, he sees the Enemy drawn up on the opposite Bank. Besides their great Numbers, they had fortified that Part of the River with sharp Stakes (7), driven so deep that some of them did not appear above the Water, as Deserters said afterwards. Notwithstanding these Obstacles, Cæsar resolves to attack them, and orders the Horse to ride in, and the Foot to follow, the Soldiers being scarce able to hold their Hands above Water to carry their Arms. The Attack was made with such Resolution that the Britons at length were forced to quit their Post and leave the Romans a free Passage (8). Cassibelanus finding he could not hinder Cæsar's passing the Thames, dismisses his Army, reserving only Four Thousand Chariots with which he harasses the Romans and endeavours to cut them short of Provisions, by carrying off all the Corn and Cattle that lie in their Rout. The Romans were great Sufferers in this March; for they did not dare to make the least Excursions in search of Provisions, for fear of Sallies from the Woods and By-places.

Mean while, the Trinobantes, upon Cæsar's approaching their Country, send Deputies to him to sue for Peace, praying him withal to take into his Protection Mandubratius their King, who fled into Gaul upon Cassibelanus's murdering his Father Immanuentius, and depriving him of his Dominions. Cæsar promises to send back Mandubratius, if they will supply him with Provisions and deliver forty Hostages, to which they immediately agree. Several other States following the Example of the Trinobantes, Cæsar found himself in condition to attack the Capital City of Cassibelanus, where the Country People were retir'd with their Flocks and Herds (9.) What the Britons called a City was only a Wood fence'd with a Ditch to defend them against the Incursions of their Enemies. Tho' this Intrenchment seem'd very strong, Cæsar ordered it to be storm'd so briskly at two different Places, that the Britons not being able to stand the Assault, fled out at one of their

(1) Cæsar had no great Cause to boast of this his first Expedition, since, according to Bede, he lost the greatest Part of his Ships, with many of his Men, and all his Horse. I. l. c. 2. Orsius says, the Ships that were to bring the Horse were cast away in the Storm. Tyr. p. 30, 35. About Three hundred Soldiers that were in two of the Transports not being able to reach the same Port with the rest, were upon their landing set upon by the Morini, but rescu'd by a Party of Horse sent to their Relief. This Passage of Cæsar gives some light into the Number of Men in a Legion. These two Ships are expressly call'd Onerarie, or Ships of Burthen. Now if these two held Three hundred, the whole Eighty design'd for the Transportation of the Foot of two Legions, would carry Twelve thousand, and consequently there were about Six Thousand Foot in a Legion. And to compute the Number of Horse belonging to a Legion, we may consider that a Transport, sufficient for a Hundred and fifty Foot, will carry between Forty and fifty Horse. Consequently the Eighteen Transports design'd for the Horse had about Eight hundred on board, and so Four hundred will belong to each Legion. The Foot then in a Legion seems generally to have been about fifteen times as many as the Horse.

(2) Boulogne, says Tyrrhel and Brady; about Calais, says Horsley. Rowlands in his Mona Antiqua, p. 24, derives it from Porth-eitha, i. e. the utmost, or furthest Passage, observing that Cæsar only latinized the ancient Gaulish or British Names, leaving us to seek their Etymons not in the Roman but in the British Language. Horsley observes, that Cæsar calls the Passage the shortest and easiest, being about thirty Miles. Now by an accurate Survey the Distance at Calais from Land to Land is twenty-six English Miles, or twenty-eight and a half Roman, which shows how near Cæsar came to the Truth.

(3) Rapin by mistake says Six-score.

(4) This River could not be the Thames, that being too distant, but the Stour. So that the Battle very probably was fought on the Banks of the Stour to the North of the Town towards Sturry or Fordwich. The strong Place to which the Britons retreated after their Defeat, must have been Durovernum, or Canterbury, (twelve Miles from the Place of Cæsar's landing) which was taken (and possibly kept 'till Cæsar's Return) by the seventh Legion. This might afterwards be converted by the Romans into a Station, as they treated several other Towns of the Britons, as Cameldunum, Verulamum, Isurium, and others, the Capital Towns of several States. Horsley, p. 14.

(5) Upon the Shore about Deal, Sandon and Walmer, are a long Range of Heaps of Earth, where Camden thinks this Ship-Camp was, which, he says, by the People thereabouts was call'd Rome's-Work.

(6) Rapin by mistake says twenty. Cæsar's Words are, a mari circiter millia passuum cæloginta. The Borders of Cassibelanus's Territories extended to the Thames in Surry, over-against Oatlands, which lies Eighty Miles from the East Shore of Kent, where Cæsar landed. The Trinobantes inhabited Essex with part of Hertfordshire, Verulam being the chief Town of their Kingdom.

(7) These Stakes are just above Walton in Surry, and the Meadow facing them is call'd Coway. They are even now to be seen at Low-water, and one of them was pull'd out of the Thames last Year, but with great Difficulty: They are of Oak, and tho' they have lain so long in the Water, are as hard as Iron, and as black as Jet. At Shepperton they have several Knife-handles made of them. See Camden, p. 155. Bede, l. i. c. 2. Tyrrhel, p. 34.

(8) Cæsar does not mention a Stratagem he is said to make use of upon this Occasion. He caus'd an Elephant well-fenced with Iron, with a wooden Tower on his back full of Men, to be forced into the River; the Sight of which monstrous Creature, that look'd like a walking Battery, did not a little contribute to frighten the Britons from the opposite Shore. Polyænus Stratag. l. viii.

(9) This is suppos'd to be Verulamum, or the present St. Albans. It is certain London was not so considerable in Cæsar's Time as Verulamum, this last appearing to have been more ancient, and was a Municipium or Colony, when London was not.

Avenues, but not without great Numbers slain and taken, and leaving behind them abundance of Cattle.

*Year Kentish men attacked
Roman Camp.*
They are refused, and one taken Prisoner.
While Cæsar was advancing into the Enemies Country, the Kentishmen inhabiting on the South-Coast over against Gaul, drew their Forces together, with design to cut off the Romans that were left to guard their Ships. As soon as they were ready, they marched under the Conduct of four Kings, namely, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonus, and furiously attacked the Roman Camp; but after a long and obstinate Fight were repulsed, and King Cingetorix taken Prisoner.

Calpurnius begins Peace.
After so frequent Defeats, Cassibelanus, considering that most of his Kingdom was now in Subjection to the Romans, and several neighbouring States had made, or were ready to make their Submission, treats with them likewise, by the Mediation of Comius. He easily obtains a Peace, Cæsar's Resolution to return to Gaul not permitting him to pursue his Conquests in Britain. Besides, he consider'd that the Weather beginning to grow bad, would help Cassibelanus to defend himself the rest of the Campaign, as well as the whole ensuing Winter. By the Conditions of the Treaty, the Britons are annually to pay the Romans a certain Tribute; Cassibelanus is to deliver such a Number of Hostages, and leave Mandubratius in quiet Possession of his Dominions (1.) Tho' Cæsar had scarce Ships enough to transport his Army, he chose rather to stow his Men on board what Vessels he had, than run the hazard of being surpriz'd by the Autumnal Equinox. He embark'd them therefore in the best manner he could, and receiving the Hostages, puts to Sea, and safely arrives in Gaul (2).

Remarks on Cæsar's Account of his two Expeditions.
This is the Account given by that great General of his two Expeditions into Britain. And here we may observe, that tho' out of an affected Modesty, he refrains from all Commendations of himself, yet by the bare Recital of his Actions, he gives himself the highest Praises. For to make a Decent with two Legions only, in an Enemy's Country, in fight of an Army formidable for Number, Bravery, and Way of fighting; to force Enemies intrench'd on the Side of a River, and what is more wonderful, to pass the Thames at a Ford guarded by a numerous Army, stuck full of sharp Stakes, and withal so deep as to take the Soldiers up to their Chins; these, I say, are Actions that sufficiently speak their own Praise, and need no amplification. And if Cæsar in penning his own History, is charged with turning every thing to his Advantage, this Imputation seems to be no where more justly cast upon him than in the present Case. Indeed, one can't read the Particulars of his two British Expeditions, without being sensible that something is wanting, and what is pass'd over in silence was not to his Honour. I forbear to insist upon the great difficulty of knowing where the Ford he mentions could be, since in the very place he is thought to pass the Thames, there is no less than six Foot Water. But what I have been saying will appear still more evident, if we consider Cæsar's Design in attacking the Britons, and the Issue thereof. He sails from Gaul with a Resolution to conquer Great-Britain, and reduce the whole Island to a Roman Province. This is what Dion Cassius positively asserts. He every where gets the better of the Britons. He passes the Thames in spite of all Obstacles. Cassibelanus, vanquish'd and routed, disbands his Forces, not believing himself able to stand against him. Cæsar becomes Master of his Capital, and the Britons submit and sue for Peace. With all these Advantages he is contented to impose an easy Tribute on Cassibelanus, and without fortifying any one Place, or leaving any Troops in the Island, drops his first Design, fatished with restoring Mandubratius, as if the War had been undertaken purely for his sake. Does not this show that he was forc'd to be satisfied with so inconsiderable an Advantage? Lucan's Testimony is a further Confirmation of the Matter, who taxes him plainly with turning his Back to the Britons (3). Tho' Lucan was no Friend to him, he would not however have ventur'd to upbraid him with running away, without some Ground. Dion Cassius says, that in a Battle the Britons utterly routed the Roman Infantry, but were afterwards put in Disorder by the Cavalry (4). Horace and Tibullus intimate in several Places of their Works, that in their Days the Britons were not consider'd as a conquer'd Nation (5). All which evidently shows that the Fame acquir'd by Cæsar in these two Expeditions came far short of the Idea he would give of it in his Commentaries. But however this be, most certainly the Common-wealth reap'd no great Benefit by them; which doubtless was the Reason of Tacitus saying, Cæsar rather shew'd the Romans the way to Britain than put them in Possession of it.

After Cæsar's Death, who had render'd himself Sovereign of that Common-wealth whereof he was born a Subject, the Empire was so torn with Civil Wars that it was not possible for the Romans to think of Britain. So the Tribute was not paid, nor, it may be demanded for twenty Years. But when, after the Defeat and Death of Mark Anthony, Augustus was firmly settled in the Possession of the Empire, he undertakes to compel the Britons to stand to their Agreement with his Predecessor, and to that end advances as far as Gaul twice in order for Britain (6), but is prevented the first time, by a Revolt in Pannonia, and the second, by the Submission of the Britons, who send Ambassadors to sue for Peace, which he very readily grants. Britain, consider'd then as a wild uncultivated Country, did not seem to him worth the pains of conquering. Besides, he was determined not to enlarge the Bounds of the Empire, wisely considering that a State, like a Ship, cannot be managed when too vast and unwieldy: Yet as the Britons neglected to perform their Promise, he resolves in good earnest to go and subdue them: But hearing of his Design, they find means to appease him. Tenuantius, Successor of Cassibelanus, sends the same Emperor rich Presents, which were laid up in the Capitol. Cunobelinus his Successor, following his Example, keeps fair with the Romans. Nay, he order'd Money to be coin'd, some Pieces of which are still to be seen in the Cabinets of the Curious, with the five first Letters of his Name, C. u. n. o. b. or C. a. m. the three first of Camelodunum, his capital City on one Side, and on the Reverse, a Man sitting and coining Money with these Letters, T. A. S. C. I. A. by which Antiquaries understand that this Money was designed for the Payment of the Tribute (7).

Tiberius, Successor of Augustus, neglected Britain as a Country of little Consequence, it being unknown to him. Satisfied with the Respect shewn him by the Britons in sending back some of Germanicus's Soldiers that were shipwreck'd on their Coast, he left them to enjoy their Liberty.

Caligula, his Successor, would not doubtless have turned his Eyes towards Britain, if he had not by a Briton himself been drawn into the Project of conquering the Island. Adminius, Son of Cunobelinus, incurring his Father's Displeasure, and flying to Rome for Protection, finds means to persuade the Emperor that nothing was more easy than this Conquest. Caligula, whose Folly is well known, imagines, upon what the young Prince tells him, that the Sight of him is sufficient to subdue the Britons. Full of this Notion, he advances in Person to the Coast of Belgick Gaul, where he had ordered his Army to march. But being told, as he was embarking his Men, that the Britons stood ready to receive him on the other Side of the Water, his warlike Ardor cool'd, and he desisted from an Enterprize which began to appear too hazardous. However, as he was led by his Caprice to the most extravagant Actions, he went on board a Galley, ordering the People to row with all speed towards Britain, as if he intended to have alone the Glory of conquering the Island. But presently after, he is seen to return back as fast as he went off. As soon as he lands he harangues his Troops, as if he were going to employ them in some important Expedition. Having ended his Speech, a Charge is sounded just as if the Enemy were in view. Upon which, the whole Army, pursuant to an Order given to the principal Officers, fall to gathering of Cockleshells in their Helmets. The Emperor pleas'd with the Alacrity of his Soldiers on this Occasion, liberally rewards them, and sends Letters to Rome of his Success, wishing the Senate to decree him a Triumph. But being informed the Senate made some Difficulty to comply with his Order, he resolves to put all the Senators to Death. He would doubtless have executed his barbarous Purpose, had he not been depriv'd of the Power with his Life, by a Conspiracy soon after form'd against him.

After Julius Cæsar's second Invasion, to which some very improperly give the Name of Conquest, the Britons preserv'd their Liberty above ninety Years, during the

(1) Geoffrey of Monmouth says, Mandubratius was not restor'd to his Kingdom, but leaving Britain, betook himself again to Cæsar, and attended him to Rome. Cassibelanus reigned ten Years after Cæsar's Departure.

(2) It is conjectur'd that Cæsar's 2d Expedition was in May, and that he return'd to Gaul about the Middle of September. For in a Letter to Cicero from Britain, dated September 1, Cæsar says, He was come to the Sea-side in order to embark.

(3) Territa questis ostendit terga Britannis. Lucan.

(4) He says elsewhere, speaking of the Britons when pursu'd by Plautius, "They fled into Marshes and Woods, in hopes the Romans, tir'd with waiting to no purpose, would, like Julius Cæsar, retire without effecting any thing."

(5) Intactus aut Britannus ut descendere

Sacra catenatus viâ.

Hor. Epod. viii. 7. Rap.

Te manet invictus Romano Marte Britannus.

Tib. l. iv.

(6) Serves iturum Cæsarem in ultimos orbis Britannos.

Her. lib. i. 35. Rap.

(7) The Payments of the Britons were usually made in pieces of Brass and Iron Rings, and probably this Coin stamp'd by Cunobelin was for Tribute only, which the Romans exact'd in Gold and Silver, as may appear by the Word Taxia, which in British (says David Perceval) signifies a Tribute Penny, perhaps from th. Lat. n. Taxatio. For the Britons do not use the Letter A. Brad. p. 11. Tyr. p. 37. Camden, p. 109.

Reputation. He fought thirty Battles with the Britons, subdued two powerful Nations, and conquered the Isle of Wight. As all this was done under Plautius the Commander in Chief, he acquir'd great Reputation in this War. At length, being recalled, he goes and receives at Rome the Reward of his Services, the Senate having decreed him the Honour of an Ovation, or inferior Triumph. He was met by the Emperor without the Gates, who gave him the Right Hand as they walked, in Token of his great Esteem for him (1).

Ostorius Scapula was sent into Britain in the room of Plautius. He arrives in the midst of Winter, and finds the Britons making continual Inroads into the Roman Conquests. They never imagin'd the new Governor would march his Army at such a Season in an unknown Country. But he does not suffer them long to continue their Ravages. Drawing his Troops together, he forthwith marches against them with all Expedition, and defeating the first that stand their Ground, so disperses the rest in the end, that he has no more to fear from their Incurfions. However, not to be expos'd to continual Alarms, he resolves to confine them between the Avon and Severn, by means of Forts built between the two Rivers. Before he puts this Resolution in practice, he makes Camelodunum a military Colony. Much about the same time London was also made a [Trading] Colony, and that Part of Britain lying between the Thames and the Sea, was reduced into the Form of a Province, and called Britannia Prima.

The Iceni (2) not yet weakened by the foregoing Wars, having from the beginning been in Alliance with the Romans, were the first that oppos'd Ostorius's Design. Some neighbouring Nations followed their Example, and joining their Forces under one General, they encamp'd upon advantageous Ground, throwing up in haste a Breast-work of Flints to prevent the Attempts of the Horse. Tho' Ostorius was then without any but the auxiliary Forces (3), he attacked them however, ordering the Horse to dismount and support those that were to charge first. The Resistance of the Britons was more obstinate than expected. Nevertheless their Intrenchments were forced at last with great Slaughter on their Side. After this Victory, Ostorius turns his Arms against the Cangi (4), who keeping in small Parties, are quickly dispersed. The Roman Army was not far from the Sea that parts Ireland from Great-Britain, when the General is informed that the Brigantes (5) are in Arms. This News obliging him to defer the Execution of his first Design, he marches with all speed against the Brigantes, being willing to secure the Old, before he proceeds to new Conquests. The Insurrection is appeas'd by the Death of the chief Revolters. But the Silures (6), the bravest and most powerful of all the Britons, could not be tam'd, either by Clemency or Severity. Their Forces were so considerable that the Legions were obliged to march against them. They were headed by their King Caradacus, famous for his great Exploits, and universally esteem'd by his Countrymen, being accounted the best General Britain had ever produced. This Prince, whom the Nations in Alliance with the Silures had made Commander in Chief, was retired into the Country of the Ordovices (7), where assembling all his Forces, he resolves to expect the Romans. To that end he chuses an advantageous Post of very difficult Access, and draws up his Army on the Side of a steep Hill, with a little River (8) at the bottom, which tho' fordable in many Places, was of great Service to him. Moreover his Camp being furrounded with a fort of Rampart of Flints and Stones, he seem'd, thus posted, to be out of all Danger (9). These Difficulties are not sufficient to check the Romans, who appear before their Enemies with their wonted Bravery, and resolved to exert their utmost in Expectation of ending, by a single Battle, a War that kept them, as it were, in another World. The Britons on their part prepare for Battle with all possible Ardor, not questioning but they should free themselves that Day from the Roman Yoke. Their Leaders ride up and down, exhorting them to do their Duty, by all the Motives that could enflame their Courage, and excite them to brave Actions. Caradacus tells them, "This is the Day that will give them Liberty or perpetual Slavery; and bids them call to mind the Glory of their Ancestors, who drove Cæsar out of Britain, and freed their Country from the Dominions of the Romans." The Soldiers with loud Acclamations declare, they are ready to shed the last Drop of their Blood in Defence of their Liberty. The Resolution that appear'd in the Looks of the Britons startled the Roman General at first. But finding his Army extremely eager to engage, he makes the Signal of Battle, having first observ'd in what Places the River might best be forded. The Romans pass it without much difficulty, but before they can approach the Enemy's Camp, they are expos'd to a Shower of Darts by which many are kill'd and wounded. In spite of these Difficulties, they make several Breaches in the Rampart, which being nothing but loose Stones, is easily thrown down. As soon as they could use their Swords, it was not possible for the Britons to stand against the warlike and veteran Troops who quickly put them to flight. Besides the Loss sustained by the Britons in the Action, their Defeat was the more considerable by the taking of the Wife, Daughters and Brothers of Caradacus. This Victory was followed, in a few days, with an unexpected Happiness to Ostorius. Caradacus and deliver'd flying for Protection to Cartimandua Queen of the Brigantes, was by her deliver'd up to the Romans, for fear doubtless of drawing a victorious Army into her Country, should she think of protecting the vanquish'd Prince. He had now commanded the confederate Army of the Britons nine Years; and his Fame had reach'd as far as Rome, where all were surpris'd at his so long resisting the Roman Power. When the Emperor had notice of the Victory and taking of Caradacus, he order'd the Captives to be sent to Rome, that he might behold in Chains a Prince that had been talk'd of as a very formidable Enemy. On a Day appointed, the People being all present, and the Emperor seated on his Throne, there came first Caradacus's Vassals and Retinue, with the Caparisons and other Spoils of War, then his Wife, Daughters and Brothers, and lastly Caradacus himself, walking with a settled Countenance, without holding down his Head, or appearing too much dejected at his Misfortune. When he came near the Emperor, he made the following Speech, if it be true that Tacitus did not make it for him.

"If my Moderation had been as great as my Birth or Fortune, Rome had seen me this Day her Ally and not Captive, and perhaps she would not have disdain'd to rank in the Number of her Friends a Prince royally descended, and who commanded many Nations. My present Condition is as dishonourable to me, as it is glorious to you. I had Arms, Horses, Riches, and Grandeur. Is it strange I should part with them unwillingly? Does it follow, because you have a mind to rule over All, that therefore every one must tamely submit? Had I sooner been betray'd to you, neither your Glory nor my Misfortunes had been render'd so famous, and my Punishment would have been buried in eternal Oblivion:

it himself from the Palace of Barberini at Rome. It is as follows:

TI. CLAUDIO. CÆS.
AVGVSTO.
PONTIFICI. MAX. TR. P. IX.
COS. V IMP. XVI. P. P.
SENATVS. POPVL. Q. R. QVOD REGES. BRITANNIÆ. ABSQ.
VLA. JACTVRA. DOMVERIT.
GENTESQVE. BARBARAS.
PRIMVS. INDICIO. SVBEGERIT.

(1) From the following Words of Tacitus, the Wife of Plautius is supposed to be a Christian, and the first in Britain. Pomponia Graecina insignis Femina, Plautii, qui ovum de Britannis retulit nupta, ac suspectis sitis externa reâ, mariti judicio permilla. Annal. l. 10. c. 37. This Pomponia Graecina Wife of Plautius, and Clautia Rufina a British Lady, are supposed to be of the Saints that were in Cæsar's Household, mention'd by St. Paul. Clautia is celebrated by Marston for her admirable Beauty and Learning in the following Epigram.

Claudia cæruleis cum sit Ruffina Britannis
Edita, cur Latine pectora plebis habet?
Quale decus Formæ! Romanam dicere Matres
Italides possunt, Attides esse suam.

From painted Britains how was Claudia born?
The fair Barbarian how do Arts adorn!
When Roman Charms a Grecian Soul commend,
Athens and Rome may for the Damsel contend.

(2) The Inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire and Huntingdonshire. Rowland observes, that Cyn or Kyn signifies in British, Fi or Fore and King. Hence Kyn, or Kent, so called from being the First in Situation from the Continent, and Ueb-Kyn (Uen-ram-regis) i. e. next to Kyn or Kent.

(3) Every Legion had so many Auxiliaries, the Number of which is suppos'd, as to the Foot, to be the same with the Legion, but double, as to the Horse. Hesley, p. 57. The Auxiliaries were Foreigners, whereas the Legions were Romans.

(4) Generally suppos'd to be Inhabitants of the western Parts of Wales, but Hesley places them about Derbyshire, near the Brigantes, p. 35.

(5) Inhabitants of Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, Durham, Westmorland, Cumberland.

(6) Inhabitants of Hampshire, Radnorshire, Brecknockshire, Monmouthshire, Gloucestershire.

(7) Inhabitants of Merionethshire, Monmouthshire, Caernarvonshire, Flintshire, Denbighshire.

(8) Hesley takes this River to be the Severn rather than the Dee.

(9) In the Island of Shropshire where the Rivers Clune and Tend meet, is a Hill to which there is no Access, but at one place call'd Caer-Canadus, formerly from Canadus, where yet are to be seen the Relicks of these Stone-Ramparts. Hesley, p. 31.

"But

"But now if you preserve my Life, I shall be a standing Monument of your Clemency to future Ages." The Emperor moved with these Words generously pardons the Captives, and orders their Chains to be taken off. The first Use they make of their Liberty is to go and fall at the Empress's Feet, who, in all appearance, interceded for them. The Senate being assembled to consider of a due Reward for Ostorius, his Victory was spoken of in Terms very much to his Advantage. It was declar'd to equal Scipio's over Syphax, and Paulus Æmilius's over Perseus; and therefore it was resolv'd that the same Honours should be decreed him.

52. The Britons resume their Courage. Mean while, Ostorius's Reputation began to sink, either because he grew remiss after acquiring so great Fame, or because the Britons had exerted themselves more vigorously to repair the Disgrace of their late Defeat. They successfully attack'd the Troops that were left to build Forts in the Country of the Silures, and had not timely Relief come from the neighbouring Garrisons, would have cut them in pieces. The Commander and eight Captains, with a good Number of Soldiers, were slain. Another time they defeated the Roman Foragers, and put the Horse that guarded them in disorder. In this Action they improv'd their Advantage in such manner, that Ostorius was obliged to advance with the Legions, after having tried in vain to restore the Battle with Supplies of the light-arm'd Troops. The coming of the Legions reviv'd the Courage of the Romans, and forc'd the Britons to retreat tho' with little Loss. After that there were several Conflicts with various Success, according to the Circumstances of Time and Place.

The Silures are intractable. The Silures, of all the British Nations, were the most obstinate, being exasperated at the Emperor's saying, Britain would have no Peace, till, like the Sicambri, they were transported into some foreign Country. They surpriz'd two Cohorts, that by the Avarice of the Officers and greedy Desire of Pillage, were advanced too far into the Enemy's Quarters. By distributing the Spoil and Prisoners, they endeavour to draw in the rest of the Nations to revolt. Ostorius dies about this time with vexation for not being able to put an end to the War. The Britons rejoice at his Death, and the more for their ascribing it to his Grief that he could not stop the Progress of their Victories.

53. Aulus Didius succeeds him. As it was dangerous, in the present Posture of Affairs, for the Emperor to leave the Army long without a General, Aulus Didius is immediately sent over, who finds Matters in a worse Condition than ever, a Legion commanded by Manlius Valens having been defeated. The Loss however was not so great as reported. Nevertheless Didius himself magnified it very much, that he might gain the more Honour in restoring Affairs, or lessen the Disgrace, if the War should continue any time. His Arrival was a Check to the Silures, who, exalted with their late Success, were making Inroads into the Frontiers of the Roman Province.

The War kindles afresh. Mean while Venutius King of the Brigantes, Successor of Caractacus, in the Command of the Army, is perswaded by the Insinuations of Cartimandua his Queen, (the same that betray'd Caractacus) to enter into an Alliance with the Romans. As long as this Prince lived in a good understanding with his Queen, he suffered the Romans peaceably to enjoy their Conquests. Satisfied with preserving his own Dominions, without troubling himself about the Concerns of the other Nations. A Quarrel arising between him and his Queen, and ending in a domestick War, caused him to take other Measures (1). Tho' hitherto he had no Aversion to the Romans, he is now forced to declare against them, they having impolitically espoused the Cause of his Queen. This Partiality of theirs so enrages him that he uses all his Interest with his Countrymen to stir them up to a Revolt. The War is kindled afresh with greater Fury than ever, tho' in the absence of Didius, who, being very old, manag'd Affairs by his Lieutenants.

57. Veraninus succeeds Didius and dies. Veraninus who succeeded him in the Reign of Nero, died before he had done any thing remarkable. 'Tis true, his Head was full of vast Projects, and the Fame he had acquir'd in other Posts, gave Occasion to think him capable of executing the greatest Undertakings. But his Will, stuffed with flattering Praises of the Emperor, and full of vain Boasts, that in case he had lived but two Years longer he would have subdued all Britain, made him forfeit the good Opinion People had conceived of him.

58. Suetonius Paulinus was appointed to fill his Place. Great Matters were expected from this General, whose Merit was compar'd with Corbulo's, who had lately conquer'd Armenia. As he himself looked with Emulation on the Glory acquir'd by that great Man, he burn'd with desire to confirm by fresh Exploits, the good Opinion the World had entertain'd of his Experience and Bravery. The Moment he comes to his Government, he forms the Project of conquering the Isle of Mona (2), now called Anglesey. To that end, he passes the Foot over in flat-bottom'd Boats, the Sea being very shallow in that Place, the Horse following, some swimming, others fording (3). The Islanders are drawn up on the other Side, with the Women running up and down, dress'd like Furies, their Hair hanging loose, Firebrands in their Hands, and surrounded with the Druids, who with Hands lifted up to Heaven, pour out dreadful Curses and Imprecations. The Horror of this Sight so astonishes the Romans, that they stand stock still, exposed to the Enemies Darts. But at length, the Shame of being frightened by a Company of frantick Women and Priests, and the Exhortation of their General bringing them to their Senses and Courage, they fall upon the Enemy Sword in Hand, and become Masters of the Island. The first thing Paulinus did was to order all the consecrated Groves to be cut down, where the Islanders sacrificed their Captives, and consulted their Gods, by inspecting the Entrails of Men.

But whilst Paulinus is employed in this Expedition, an unexpected Turn obliges him to leave Mona in an abrupt manner, to go and settle Affairs of much greater Moment.

Prasutagus King of the Iceni dying, leaving by Will the Emperor and his Daughters Co-heirs to his great Treasures, in Expectation to procure by that means Nero's Protection for his Family and People. But this Precaution has a quite contrary Effect. Prasutagus is no sooner laid in his Grave, but the Emperor's Officers seize upon all his Effects in their Master's Name. Boadicea (4) his Widow, a Woman of great Courage and a high Spirit, opposing these unjust Proceedings, meets with fresh Cause of Discontent in the Contempt shown to her Remonstrances. As she is expressing, by her Complaints, her resentment of the Injury done to her Daughters, the brutishness of the Officers is such, that they order her to be publicly whipp'd. And then, not satisfied with so outrageous an Affront, they cause her Daughters to be ravish'd by the Soldiers.

The Britons look upon this strange Barbarity with such Indignation, that the whole Island is possessed with a Spirit of Revolt, which quickly breaks out into Action. The Iceni lead the Way, and are soon followed by their Neighbours the Trinobantes. Venutius and his Party join with them, and in short, all the Nations in Subjection to the Romans rise in Arms with one Consent, the City of London only excepted. The Roman Historians themselves own, that the Injustice and Violence of the Emperor's Officers gave the Britons but too just Cause to revolt. They were thrust out of their Possessions without any Form of Law, by the Veterans that were sent to settle in the Island. Catus Decianus, Nero's Procurator, without any regard to the Ordinance of Claudius, that left the Vanquish'd in Possession of their Goods, confiscated their Estates to the Emperor's use. The Petitions presented to him on that Occasion were all rejected, and without alledging any other Reason but his Will, which he made a Law, he minded nothing but his own, and his Master's Profit. Seneca himself, with all his noble Sentiments of Moderation and Disinterestedness which shine in his Writings, but were never seen in his Practice, is said to contribute very much to the Insurrection, by rigorously exacting on a sudden the Money he had lent some of the Britons upon Usury (5). This Treatment bred in the Minds of the People so great an Aversion to a foreign Yoke, that they were all unanimously determined to shake it off. Venutius, mortal Enemy of the Romans, cherishes the Rebellion to the utmost of his Power. The very Adherents of the Queen laying aside their domestick Quarrels, and renouncing the Friendship of the Romans, join with the rest of their Countrymen for the recovery of their Liberty.

Boadicea, animated with an ardent Desire of Revenge, heads the Revolters, and earnestly exhorts them to take Advantage of the Roman General's Absence to free themselves from Slavery, by putting their Oppressors, the Foreigners, all to the Sword. The Britons immediately embrace the Proposal, and fall in a sudden and furious manner upon the Romans dispersed in their Colonies, which were more carefully embellished than fortified, massacring all Suetonius Paulinus is sent into Britain. Tacit. Ann. l. 14.

Heaven's

Co. A general Insurrection in Britain. Tacitus, D. Cass. The Cause of it.

General Massacre of the Romans.

(1) She rejected him, and marries his Esquire Vellocatus, making him King. Tacit. l. 3.

(2) So call'd from Men, signifying in old British, the Furthest or End, in respect of its Situation from the Continent of Gaul. Rosal. p. 21.

(3) The Romans are suppos'd to have pass'd from Llan-eir-is Gair in Caernarvonshire to Llan Idan in Anglesey, which is still the shallowest Part of the Fretum, and there are remarkable Works yet visible near Llan Idan. See Camden, p. 675, 676.

(4) This Name is variously written, Xiphiine Dion's Epitomizer, has it Boudica; Tacitus calls her Voadicea, and Boudicea; Camden and others, Boadicea, but most usually Boadicea.

(5) Seneca is said by Dion Cassius to have in Britain about this time to the value of Three hundred thousand Pounds, as Camden computes it. Xiphil. in Ner. Stillig. Orig. Brit. p. 5.

*Cruelties executed upon
the Romans.*

without Distinction of Age or Sex. Unheard of Cruelties are acted upon this Occasion, and strange Punishments invented to glut the Fury of the enraged People. Wives are hung up with their Infants at their Breasts, to make them suffer in some measure a double Death. Virgins have their Breasts cut off and cramb'd into their Mouths, to make them seem in the Agonies of Death to eat their own Flesh. The Veterans at Cameldunum retiring into a Temple for Sanctuary, are sacrilegiously burn'd alive, rather than suffer'd to starve to Death. In a word, the Fury of the Britons is carried to that height, that not a single Roman escapes. Eighty Thousand (1) are computed to perish in this Massacre.

Let us reflect here a little on the Politicks of those Conquerors of the World, so great Masters in the Art of Government. Upon their subduing a Country, they immediately sent thither numerous Colonies, who by Degrees mixing and intermarrying with the Natives, secured to them their Conquests. Of this Britain is a remarkable Instance, where, tho' the Island had been conquered but eighteen Years before by Claudius, above eighty Thousand Romans were already settled, besides Paulinus's Army, and doubtless, some Garrisons in the fortified Places, which the Fury of the Britons could not penetrate.

Paulinus leaves Mona.

Paulinus receiving Advice of this Revolution, suddenly quits the Isle of Mona to march against the revolted Britons, who have now an Army of a Hundred Thousand Men, under the Conduct of Boadicea, whose noble Stature and heroic Courage make them hope she may have likewise all the Qualities of a General. This Princess fired with the Affronts she had received, ardently desires to engage with Paulinus, whose Army is only Ten thousand strong, in Expectation of completing her Revenge, by the Destruction of so inconsiderable Remains of the Enemy. Mean while, Paulinus expecting no Succours from any Place, is in great Straits. The ninth Legion, commanded by Petilius Cerialis, was just then entirely defeated. Pænius Posthumus, with a considerable Detachment of the Second, refused, contrary to the Law of Arms, to obey his General's Orders, to come and join him. Thus Paulinus is under a Necessity either of marching against his Enemies with his little Army, or of expecting them in some Town. He chuses the latter, and shuts himself up in London, but quickly alters his Resolution. Foreseeing his Endeavours to save that Colony will endanger the whole Province, he marches out notwithstanding the Cries and Intreaties of the Inhabitants not to abandon them to the Fury of the Rebels. However, with his handful of Troops, he seem'd little able to stand against an Army of a Hundred thousand Men. But great Men very often by their Courage and Experience find Means to extricate themselves out of the greatest Difficulties. Paulinus plainly sees that in such an Extremity he must either conquer or die, the Relief he might expect being too far off, and the Danger at hand. Therefore, instead of retiring from the Britons, now marching towards him, he resolves to meet them. This Resolution inspires his Troops with such Courage, that they readily follow him; so powerful is an Army's good Opinion of their General. Paulinus summons all his Experience to balance by his Conduct the Advantage of the Enemy's Numbers. He pitches upon a narrow Piece of Ground for the Field of Battle, with a Forest behind that secures him from Ambuscades in the Rear, and a large Plain before, where the Britons are encamp'd. He draws up the Legions close together in the Center, the light arm'd are placed round them, and the Horse make the two Wings. The Enemies swarm about the Plain in Battalions and Squadrons, exulting at their Numbers (2), and secure of Victory. Their Wives and Children are brought into the Field in Waggons, which line their Intrenchments, to be Witnesses of their Actions and Partners in the Spoil.

Boadicea's leaves the Army.

Boadicea, with her Daughters by her Side in the Chariot, rides up and down, addressing herself to the several Nations in the following manner, "That it was not the first time the Britons had been victorious under the Conduct of their Queens. That for her part she came not there, as one descended from Royal Progenitors, to fight for Empire or Riches, but as one of the common People, to avenge the Loss of their Liberty, the Wrongs done to her own Person, and the Violation of her Daughter's Chastity. That the Romans Luit was grown to that Height, that neither Old nor Young escap'd its Pollutions; but the Gods had already begun to punish them according to their Deserts; for one Legion that durst hazard a Battle was cut in Pieces, and the rest skulk'd in their Camp (3), or fled for their Lives; so that instead of being able to stand the Attack of a victorious Army, the very Shouts of so many Thousands would put them to flight. That if the Britons would but consider the Number of their Forces, and the Motives of the War, they would resolve to vanquish or die. That it was much better to fall honourably in Defence of their Liberty, than be expos'd again to the Outrages of the Romans. This was her Resolution; but as for the Men, they might, if they pleas'd, live and be Slaves." She is said at the end of her Speech to let loose a Hare, she concealed in her Bosom, as a good Omen of Victory.

Whilst Boadicea is endeavouring to animate the Britons, Paulinus is not idle at the Prospect of so great Danger. Tho' he is assured of the Bravery of his Troops, he exhorts them to despise the Clamour and Threats of the Barbarians. He represents to them, that "among the Enemy there were more Women than Soldiers, and that the greatest Part of them, having neither Arms nor Courage, would immediately take to their Heels, when they came to feel the Force of their victorious Arms. That in the most numerous Armies, the Decision of the Battle depended upon a few, and that their Glory would be so much the greater as it was the less divided. That they should take care only to keep their Ranks close, and fight Sword in Hand, after they had thrown their Darts. And lastly, that they should not lose time about the Spoil, which would be the certain Reward of their Victory." These Words are followed with such loud Acclamations, and the Resolution of the Soldiers appears so great, that the General not doubting of Success, orders a Charge to be sounded. The Romans dart their Javelins without quitting the Advantage of their Post. But their Quivers being emptied, they advance Sword in hand, seconded by the Auxiliaries, who fight with equal Bravery, in an Opinion there is no safety but in Victory. Whilst the Fight was carried on with Darts at a Distance, the Britons were in hopes the Romans, daunted at the Number of their Enemies, would take to flight. But when they see the Legions advancing Sword in hand, with short and thick Steps, and no Signs of Fear in their Looks, they fall into Disorder, which continually increases, there being no Leaders or Officers capable of repairing it (4). The Romans seeing them thus shaken, fall upon them with great Fury, and put the whole Army into the utmost Confusion, who now think only of saving themselves by Flight. At the same time, the Roman Horse in the Wings breaking through the British Cavalry, a terrible Rout ensues of the frighted Troops. 'Tis even with Difficulty they run away, by reason of the great Number of Carriages, full of unserviceable Multitudes, which first retiring, become an Obstacle to the Flight of the Army. The Roman Soldiers spare neither Age nor Sex, but sacrifice to their Revenge the Women and Children, and even the very Horses. This Victory equalled their most famous ones, if it be true, as Tacitus affirms, that Eighty thousand Britons were slain, with the Loss only of Four hundred Romans, and as many wounded. Boadicea escap'd falling into the Hands of the Conquerors, but was touch'd with so deep a Sense of her Shame and Loss, that she ended her Days with Poison. On the other Side, Pænius Posthumus who refused to obey his General, either to avoid the Punishment due to his Offence, or for Grief at losing his share of the Glory of the Victory, stabb'd himself.

How advantages to the Romans the Consequences of so great a Victory were, may be easily conceived. The Britons, in the utmost Conternation, without General or Army, fly before their Enemies without offering the least Resistance. Their Misery is farther increased by a Famine, brought upon themselves by neglecting to sow their Lands. All their hopes are, that the inconsiderable Number of their Enemies must oblige them to keep together, and thereby afford time to form another Army. But these hopes vanish upon the Romans receiving a strong Reinforcement from Germany. No doubt, as Matters then stood, Paulinus's Army would have been sufficient to complete the Conquest of Britain, if Dissensions arising among the Romans had not prevented them from improving their Advantages.

Julius Clafricanus, who succeeded Decianus in the Office of Procurator, disagreeing with Paulinus, studied to cross him in all his Designs. Probably the General would not suffer him to continue the Oppressions that occasioned the late Revolt. However this be, Clafricanus conceives so violent a Hatred for him, that he declares publicly, and even writes to the Emperor's Ministers at Rome, that there is no Prospect of ending the War, as long as the

(1) Rapin & H. W. Den Cassius. Tacitus says only Seventy Thousand, his Words are, ---ed Septuaginta milia Civium & Sacerdotum. Veneriamus Monasterium. So that Civium may refer chiefly to this Place, and Sacerdotum to London, which was only a Trading Colony.

(2) The Army consisted of 250,000 according to Den Cassius.

(3) According to Pænius Posthumus's Conduct, who seems to have refused to draw his Legion out of their Station or Camp. Hofley, p. 23.

(4) Their last Words are not in Tacitus.

Management is left to Paulinus. In all his Reports to the Emperor's Ministers, he imputes the good Success to Fortune, and the bad to the Governor's ill Conduct, intimating, that if another General were sent, it would be very easy to appease the Troubles without disobliging the Province. At last, Nero hearing of this Dissension, orders his Freedman Polycletus to go and learn the Cause. The Respect shown him by Paulinus was surprizing to the Britons, who could not conceive that such a General and a victorious Army should be accountable to a Freedman. This Respect however was not paid in vain. Polycletus in his Report to the Emperor, justifies Paulinus, and so manages that he keeps his Command. But in the end, Clasficius beginning afresh, prevails by his Friends and secret Practices, to have Paulinus relieved by Petronius Turpilianus, who being a Person of no Ambition, acted nothing memorable, hiding his Love of Ease and Sloth under the specious Name of the Love of Peace.

To him succeeds Trebellius Maximus, as indolent as himself, and famous for nothing during his Government but his Quarrel with Caelius Commander of the twentieth Legion. This Quarrel is carried to high, that great Part of the Army deserting their General, he is forced at length to fly to Vitellius, who commanded the Roman Army in Germany.

In the mean time Nero dying, the Britons enjoy some Respite, during the short Reigns of Galba and Otho, there being neither Governor nor General. The Roman Army was commanded only by Tribunes, among whom Caelius bore the chief Sway. Vitellius being come to the Empire, sends Vestius Bolanus into Britain, to take upon him the Command of the Army. The new Governor, little skilled in the Art of War, leaves the Britons in Quiet, and contents himself with gaining the Affections of the Soldiers, without having the Authority of a General. He continues in the Province till Vespasian, who succeeds Vitellius in the Imperial Throne, being informed of the Wants of Britain, sends thither Petilius Cerealis. Petilius, during his Government, attacks and defeats in several Battles the Brigantes, the most numerous and considerable of all the British Nations (1.) Julius Frontinus succeeds him and acquires no less Glory than his Predecessor. He subdues the warlike Silures, whose Country seemed, by its Situation, to screen them from all Attacks.

Towards the End of Vespasian's Reign, Julius Agricola is sent into Britain to succeed Frontinus. Here we begin to have fuller Accounts of the British Wars; for which we are wholly indebted to Tacitus, who has taken care to write the Life of his Father-in-law Agricola, in order to give that Lustre to his Actions they justly deserved, and which perhaps they would have wanted, had it not been for that illustrious Historian (2.)

Some time before Agricola was appointed Governor of Britain, the Ordovices had surpris'd and cut in pieces a Body of Roman Horse, quarter'd in their Frontiers. This Accident gave Occasion to apprehend the like again, and caus'd the Romans to expect with great Impatience the Arrival of a new Governor. The News that Agricola was to command them, revived their Courage. They did not question but under a General of so established a Reputation, they should quickly put an End to the War. However, he could not come till about the middle of Summer. Tho' he finds no Magazine for the Army, dispers'd in several Places for their better Subsistence, he draws them together without Delay. He immediately attacks the Ordovices, and notwithstanding the Difficulty of the Undertaking by reason of the incormodious Places he is forc'd to go thro' in quest of them, makes them pay dear for the Advantage they had lately gained. All the World was surpris'd to see him fighting the Enemies of the Empire upon his first Entrance, a Time usually spent by other Governors in Feasting and Diversions, or in receiving the Compliments of the Province. But there was still greater Reason to admire his Diligence, when he was seen, in this first Campaign, to attack the Isle of Mona, which the Romans had been forc'd to abandon, tho' he wanted flat-bottom'd Vessels for the Expedition. He order'd a choice Body of Auxiliaries, who were acquainted with the Shallows, to swim over, which they perform'd so dextrously, (being train'd up by the Custom of their native Country to manage in swimming themselves, their Horses and Arms) that the Inhabitants, astonish'd at the Sight, and never suspecting any such thing, surrender'd the Isle to the Romans without obliging them to draw a Sword.

War was not the only Affair that employ'd the new Governor. Whilst his Arms are triumphant, he carefully enquires about every thing relating to the Government of the Province, and the properest Means to keep the People in Obedience. This Enquiry shows him that the Britons are not to be tam'd by Arms alone, but that Lenity is no less necessary than Force. And therefore he spends the whole Winter after his first Campaign, in diligently regulating several Abuses crept in by the Avarice or Negligence of former Governors. He takes care to prevent all kind of Exactions; to cause Justice to be administered punctually and impartially; in a word, to remove every Occasion of Discontent from the Britons in Subjection to the Empire. This Proceeding gain'd their Affection to such a Degree, that he had no Cause to fear a Revolt whilst he should be employ'd in making new Conquests. Vespasian dying about this time, his Son Titus succeeds him, and knowing Agricola's great Merit, continues him in his Government.

In the Spring the General takes the Field again, and marches towards the North, where he makes some Conquests. He observ'd the Romans commonly lost in the Winter what they gain'd in the Summer, because they durst not venture to quarter in the conquer'd Countries, which were too much expos'd. To prevent this Inconvenience, he resolv'd to build Forts in proper Places, where Garrisons might be kept in the Winter, always ready to repulse the Enemy. As he was a great Master in the Art of Fortification, these Forts were built and situated in such manner, that the Romans were never under a Necessity to quit them, nor the Enemies ever able to take them (3.)

During the following Winter Agricola's chief Business was to soften the rough Manners of the Britons, and instill into them a Desire to imitate the Customs of the Romans. His Pains are not bestow'd in vain. Soon after, Britain is adorn'd with stately Temples, noble Porticos, and many fine Structures both publick and private, of a very different Taste from what had been hitherto seen. The British Nobles even pride themselves in speaking the Latin Tongue, to which a little before they were utterly averse. They dress likewise after the Roman manner, and in short, as Tacitus observes, are brought to esteem, as Politeness and good Breeding, what was only a Badge of their Slavery.

In his third Campaign, Agricola advances as far as the River Tweed, fortifying his Conquests with Castles and Fortresses in several Places.

The fourth Summer was spent in subduing the Nations inhabiting between the Tweed and the two Friths of Gloa and Bodotria, now call'd of Dunbritton and Edinburgh. These two Arms of the East and West Seas shoot so far into the Land, that they are parted only by an Isthmus of between thirty and forty Miles. Upon this Isthmus Agricola raises Forts and plants Garrisons for the Security of the Roman Province, which he had extended thus far. By this means the Nations yet unconquer'd, were pent up as it were in a separate Island.

What Agricola had done should, one would think, have satisfis'd his Ambition: But he was labouring also for the Glory of the Roman Name; which, as Tacitus expresses it, knew no Bounds. During the fifth Campaign, Agricola leads his Army beyond the Friths, where he discovers Countries and Nations, whose very Names were unknown to the Romans. Some of them he conquers, and leaves Garrisons in the Western Parts opposite to Ireland. His Design was to attempt the Conquest of that Island, that it might be a Check upon Britain, being perfectly inform'd of the State of the Country by a Lord banish'd from thence. Tacitus says, he heard his Father-in-law say, that with one Legion and a few Auxiliaries, he could easily become Master of that Island, the Conquest whereof would be of great Service to keep the Britons in Awe.

In his sixth Campaign, the Roman General passes Bodotria, ordering his Fleet to row along the Coasts, and discover the Creeks and Harbours in those Northern Parts. This was the first Roman Fleet that appear'd on those Seas, the Sight whereof inspir'd the Enemy with Terror, but the Romans with Courage, who having ventur'd upon those unknown Countries with some Dread, were extremely animated by the Communication they had with their Fleet, which always kept near the Shore.

(1) Their Capital was Isulium, call'd by Antonine Iflu-Brigantum, now Alborough in Yorkshire, which appears to have been a very large Station. It must be observ'd, that Encampments upon a March were by the Romans call'd Castris. Winter or Summer Quarters, Castra, Isberna, aut ostiva. The Word Statio is us'd by Cæsar, Tacitus, &c. for the Duty of Soldiers upon Guard, or for the Men employ'd in this Duty. But afterwards Statio was applied to a Fort or Place where the Soldiers lodg'd, and like Vegetius's Castella, were often built like Towns in the Borders of the Empire, where they were constant Fences against the Enemy. The Stations here in England were strong Fortifications, of no great Extent, adjoining to which were usually other Buildings, forming a sort of Town, to which the Station was in the nature of a Citadel.

(2) Tacitus's Life of Agricola is justly esteem'd a Master-Piece by the best Judges. The Strength and Vivacity of the Expression, the Beauty and Variety of Thought are almost infinitely. Horsley, p. 38.

(3) This Passage of Tacitus, (says Horsley) is almost incredible, tho' we extend it no farther than to the Time of Tacitus writing his History. There is perhaps a good deal of Compliment in it to Agricola, the Historian's Father-in-law and favourite Hero. It seems not to be well consistent with another Passage, perdomita Britannia & statim amissa. Hist. l. i. c. 2. The Forts built this Year by Agricola are suppos'd to be on the Borders, especially on the Western Side of the Island, along which Agricola march'd. Horsley, p. 40.

But while Agricola was advancing towards the North, a Report was spread that the northern Nations had drawn together a formidable Army and attack'd the Forts built on their Frontiers. The News of this Armament being confirm'd a few Days after by Deserters, the principal Officers of the Army advis'd the General to relinquish his Conquests beyond the Friths, and avoid the Shame of being compell'd to it by force. But he reject'd this Advice as injurious to his Master's Honour and Interest. Whilst he was deliberating upon this Affair, he had notice that the Enemies were coming upon him with an Army of numberless Multitudes, according to common Report. Apprehensive of being surrounded, he divided his Army into three Bodies, hearing the Enemy had done the same. This Precaution had like to have cost him dear. For the Enemies having Intelligence of it, alter their Resolution, and with united Forces set upon the ninth Legion in the Night as they lie encamp'd at a good distance from the rest of the Army. They surpriz'd the advanc'd Guard, and attacking the Camp with great fury, had like to become Masters of it. Agricola, upon notice of their march, made all possible haste to the Relief of the Legion. But for fear of being too late, he order'd the Horse to go before and maintain the Fight, till the rest of the Army came up. He appear'd at Day-break in Sight of the Enemies, who seeing him advance, would have retreated, but not having time were forc'd to continue the Fight. The Battle was fierce and obstinate. The Romans, that were almost defeated in their Camp, vigorously endeavour'd to repair their Disgrace, at the Sight of their Companions who were coming to their Assistance. And these, seeing the ninth Legion in danger, rush furiously upon the Enemy to relieve them. Both fought with such Courage and Bravery, that the Enemy began at last to give ground. The Fens favour'd their Retreat, otherwise the War had been terminated by that single Battle (1).

This Defeat, tho' considerable, dishearten'd not the Islanders. They imputed their Misfortune to Chance and other Circumstances, rather than to the Valour of the Romans, and resolv'd to try the Fortune of War once more. Having convey'd their Women and Children into the Towns, they came together from all Parts, and form'd a more numerous Army than the first, with a Resolution stoutly to defend their Liberty.

But whilst the Romans are preparing in the Winter to withstand the Efforts of their Enemies, and even to attack them, a Cohort of Ussippians, levied in Germany, form a Design to return home, and execute it with that Secrecy and Expedition, that it could not be prevented. A Captain and some Roman Soldiers, placed among them to discipline them, were killed, lest they should oppose the Design. Which done, these Germans seize upon two (2) small Vessels, kill one of the Pilots, and compel the other to conduct them, threatening to serve him as they had done his Companion: After which they set sail before their Intentions could be known. They had laid their Measures so ill that they were quickly in want of Provisions, and reduc'd to the Necessity of eating some of their Comrades. Those that remain'd alive, ignorant of the Art of Navigation, were driven ashore on the Coast of Friseland and made Slaves (3).

Upon opening the next Campaign, Agricola orders his Fleet to row along the Coast, to keep several Places in awe. At the same time he marches at the Head of his Troops, taking for Guides some Natives of known Fidelity, that were acquainted with the Ways. When he comes near the Grampian Mountain, he sees the Enemies drawn up to the Number of Thirty thousand, besides Volunteers, who flock'd together to be at a Battle, of which Liberty or Slavery was to be the Issue. Upon the Armies approaching each other, Galgacus, Commander of the Islanders, represents to them, "That being at the Extremity of the Isle, they have no Refuge left if vanquish'd, and therefore nothing but Victory can deliver them from perpetual Bondage." On the other Side, Agricola exhorts his Soldiers "to do their Duty, by the Consideration of their past Victories. Particularly he sets before their Eyes their sad Condition, if after being defeated, they are forc'd to seek for Shelter among the Britons, who for fifty Years together have felt the Force of their victorious Arms." Whilst the General is yet speaking, the Soldiers by their Looks discover their Eagerness to fight, and their Hopes of Victory. The Army was drawn up in such manner that the Auxiliary Foot were to bear the first Shock, in order to prevent as much as possible the Effusion of Roman Blood. The Legions were plac'd in the Rear to support the Auxiliaries in case of Repulse. Galgacus had rang'd his Men on the Side of a Hill, that his whole Army might be visible at once to the Romans, and strike them with the greater Terror. The Horse were drawn up on the Plain at the Bottom of the Hill, and the Chariots ran between the two Armies. Agricola apprehensive of being surrounded by these Multitudes, widened his Front, though he thereby weakened it, reject'd the Advice given him of ordering the Legions to advance. Then alighting from his Horse, full of Courage and Hopes, he went and headed the Legions. They fought some time with Darts, the Islanders being unwilling to quit the Advantage of their Post. Besides, their little Targets, and unwieldy pointless Swords, were not so proper for close fighting. But Agricola found means to compel them to it, by detaching two Cohorts of Batauvians, and as many of Tungrians, who fell upon them Sword in hand. The Islanders, unused to that Way of fighting, could not long withstand the Charge of these warlike Troops, who pressing them with the Points of their Bucklers, soon broke their foremost Battalions and began even to ascend the Hill. Those that followed them, animated by their Example, fought with the same Bravery, and without giving the Enemies time to rally, overthrew all that withstood them. Mean while, the British Horse began also to give Ground, and their Chariots were forc'd to drive up the Hill to assist the Foot that were in extreme Disorder. Tho' the Chariots at first somewhat daunted the Romans, yet did they but little Execution by reason of the unevenness of the Ground. The Hill being pretty steep, the Charioteers had no Command of the Horses, and ran without Distinction over Friends and Foes according as they came in their way. The Foot that were posted on the Top of the Hill, and had not yet engaged, seeing the Romans hotly pursuing their Victory, now made a Motion to surround them, because of the smallness of their Number. But Agricola perceiving it, detach'd four Squadrons of Horse, who not only withstood the Charge of the Foot, but entirely routed them. Then falling upon the Enemies in Flank that were still on the Plain, made great Slaughter of them. This Action completed the Victory. Galgacus finding it impossible to renew the Fight, retreated with the remains of his Troops. He lost Ten thousand Men in the Action; but on the side of the Romans there fell but Three hundred and forty: Among whom was Aulus Atticus, Captain of a Cohort, who by the Heat of Youth, and the Unruliness of his Horse, was carried into the midst of the Enemies. The Conquerors pass the following Night with Joy and Gladness, and the Vanquish'd with Lamentations and Sorrow, taking Advantage of the Darkness to escape the Pursuit of the Romans. Far from any Thoughts of rallying, their Flight was so hasty, that when Day appeared it was in vain to pursue them (4). Agricola seeing they were entirely dispers'd, the Summer almost spent, and unsafe to send his Army to waste the Enemy's Country, march'd back into the Territories of the Horosians (5), from whom he received Hostages. He march'd slowly, to strike Terror into the Britons, and in Expectation of his Fleet, which having alarm'd all the northern Coast, returned about the end of the Summer, and anchor'd in the Port of Trutulum (6).

Domitian, now Emperor upon the Death of his Brother Titus, receives the News of this Victory with a seeming Satisfaction, tho' inwardly he repines at the Reputation Agricola gained by it. Envy not suffering him to continue him in his Post where his Fame might still have an additional Lustre, recalls him on pretence of promoting him to the Government of Syria. But after causing the Senate to decree him a Statue crown'd with Laurel, he sends him out of the World with a Dose of Poison. In this manner he rewarded the Service that great Man had done the Empire. This unworthy Emperor could not bear the Fame of a General whose noble Actions reproach'd him with the imaginary Triumph decreed him as Conqueror of the Germans, in which he had caused Slaves to be disguised like Captives.

Agricola gave the finishing Blow to the Liberty of Britain by his Valour and prudent Conduct, all that Part of the Island lying South of the two Friths, was reduced to

(1) This Battle was fought, according to Gordon, in the County of Dorset; for there is a Roman Camp in Sir John Mordaunt's Ground at Leoburn, two Miles from Leoburn, and a large Morass near it, and formerly a Wood. Also near this Place is a small Village call'd Leoburn, which in the old Language signifies a Place of Battle. Horsley, p. 44.

(2) Tacitus says, three. Vit. Agr.

(3) Tacitus says, after a strange Adventure sailing round Britannia, they were taken first by the Saxons, then by the Frisians. And being bought and sold, some of them at last in Ireland were brought to the Coast where the Romans were, who told the Adventure, and were afterwards taken up by the Romans.

(4) Mr. Gordon supposes this Battle to be fought in Strathern, half a Mile from the Kirk of C. Mervin, there being a remarkable Encampment in that Place.

(5) Mr. Gordon says Highlanders. Camden places them in Essex. But his Annotator thinks they should be placed between South-Essex and North-Essex in Anglia. See Camden, p. 845.

(6) Some read Britannia, most probably it should be Rutupensis for Rutupensis or Ritupensis. So that when Agricola's Fleet, (that lay in the Bay during the Battle) arriv'd there, having gone North about by the Orkneys, 'tis plain they had sail'd quite round the Island, because they had sail'd before from Portus Rutupensis to Britannia. For Tacitus says, Testulenferum Portum tenuit, unde proxima lateri Britannia &c. Vit. Agr. c. 5.

a Roman Province. As for the northern Parts, they were left to the Inhabitants as a wild uncultivated Country, not worth the conquering or keeping. Only strong Garrisons were plac'd in the Fortresses built on this Side the Friths.

The Britons
begin to be civiliz'd.

Tho' the Loss of their Liberty seem'd to be an irreparable Damage to the Britons, it was in some measure repaired by the great Alteration for the better in their Customs and Manners, after their being subject to the Empire. In a short time they were seen to lay aside their rude and savage ways, and assume the Politeness of the Conquerors. Arts and Sciences, little regarded by the Britons before this Revolution, flourish'd among them as much as in any other Part of the Roman Dominions. In a word, from mere Savages the Britons were become polite and civiliz'd, an Advantage the most northern Parts of the Island have not yet attained. After this Reformation, they made but faint Struggles for the Recovery of their Liberty, being pleas'd, for the most part, with their Servitude. It must however be noted, that a great many chose to lose their Possessions, and retire into the North among the Picts and Scots, rather than live in Subjection to the Roman Yoke. These were the Men that joining with those that afforded them Refuge, made continual War with the Romans, in maintenance of that precious Liberty their unhappy Country had lost. They spared not even their Countrymen, whom they looked upon with Horror for being pleas'd with their Slavery. These were the Men that with the Picts and Scots obliged Emperors themselves to come over in Person and oppose the Efforts of their invincible Courage.

Policy of the Romans with regard to conquer'd Countries.

As for the Subjects of the Empire, they endured all the Hardships that are the usual Lot of the Vanquished. Exorbitant Taxes were laid upon them on numberless Pretences. Their Estates were taken from them and given to the Veterans, that were continually coming to settle in the Island. The Flower of their Youth were made Soldiers, and dispers'd in the other Provinces of the Empire. Such was the Roman Policy. They sent away whole Bodies levied in a conquered Country, into other remote Regions. For Instance, the Britons into Pannonia, the Batavians into Illyria, the Germans into Britain, to keep them at a Distance from their own Country. By thus draining the conquered Nations of their main Strength, they disabled them from revolting, and at the same time made use of them to acquire new Conquests.

85.
Lucullus Governor of Britain.

After Agricola's Departure from Britain, we have but a slender Account of what pass'd in the Island till the Reign of Adrian. We only know that Sallustius Lucullus was sent thither by Domitian, to whose Suspicions or Jealousy he quickly fell a Sacrifice. 'Tis to be presumed, the Subjects of the Empire were quiet, and the Inhabitants of the North suffer'd to enjoy their Liberty in Peace. The Roman Historians mention also in the Reigns of Nerva and Trajan some Commotions in the Island that were quickly appeas'd; but the Particulars are unknown. It may likewise be observed in this Interval, the Romans after their Conquests, suffer'd Kings to be in Britain; for they gloried in having such for their Subjects. Juvenal speaks of King Arviragus, who reign'd in some Part of the Island under Domitian (1).

Arviragus
King of the Britons.

Sat. IV.
v. 123.

117.
Julius Severus made Governor.
Spartian in Hadrianus.

In the first Year of Adrian (2), the northern People, a mixture, as suppos'd, of Picts, Scots, and Britains, but confounded by the Roman Historians under the Name of Caledonians, made an Irruption into the Roman Province. Their first Exploit was to demolish some of Agricola's Fortreffes between the two Friths. Adrian being informed of these Commotions, appoints Julius Severus Governor of Britain, but before he has time to perform any thing, he is suddenly recalled and employed elsewhere (3). Mean time, the Caledonians continuing to infest the Roman Territories, the Emperor resolves to go over in Person and subdue these fierce and troublesome People. As soon as they hear of his Arrival, they relinquish the Country they were possess'd of, and retire to the North. Adrian however advances as far as York, where he meets some of Agricola's old Soldiers, that had been with him in the northern Parts. The Description these give him of the Country he intend'd to conquer, diverts him from pursuing his Expedition. Besides that the Bogs and Mountains he was to pass, would have engag'd him in a War more laborious than honourable, he easily perceiv'd, that, should his Undertaking be crown'd with Success, it would procure no great Advantages to the Empire. Wherefore he comes to a Resolution to leave to the Caledonians all the Country between the two Friths and the Tine, in hopes by thus enlarging their Bounds to keep them quiet. But at the same time to secure the Roman Province from their Incursions, he causes a Rampart of Earth to be thrown up, covered with Turf, from the Mouth of the Tine to Solway-Frith. This Rampart was eighty Miles in length, and ran quite cross the Country from East to West, by which he secur'd the southern Parts, leaving the Caledonians all the Lands between the new Rampart and the Isthmus that parts the two Friths (4). Having thus settled Matters in the Island, he returns to Rome, and is honoured with the Title of Restorer of Britain, as appears by some Medals.

120 Adrian goes over in Person.

He parts the Roman Province from the Northern Countries by a Rampart.

Enmity between the Northern and Southern Brittons.

They grew more civil-iz'd.

The Northern People destroy Adrian's
Rampart.

Capitolin in Antonin.

138.
Lollius Urbicus raises another Rampart.

140.

After these last Irruptions of the Northern People, there was all along a mortal Enmity betwixt them and the southern Britons. These last finding themselves entirely separated by Inclination and Interest from the rest of the Inhabitants of the Island, were the more forward to embrace the Customs and Manners of the Romans. Afterwards by means of the Arts and Sciences, they came by degrees capable of being instructed in the Christian Religion, which till then was scarce known in the Island.

How strong soever Adrian's Rampart might be, it was not sufficient to prevent the Inroads of the northern People. Indeed, they behaved peaceably as long as there were Roman Troops enough on their Borders to defend the Rampart. But the Moment these were removed, as it sometimes happened, being wanted elsewhere, they began their usual Ravages. Nay, in the Reign of Antoninus Pius (5), not satisfied with their Booty, they destroy'd the Rampart in several Places. Antoninus being informed of it, and fearing their Boldness, if not curb'd, would carry them to greater Undertakings, orders Lollius Urbicus to go and quell them. The new Governor, (having first subdued the Brigantes, who endeavour'd to shake off the Roman Yoke) in order to put a stop to the northern Irruptions, raises another Rampart on the Neck of Land between the two Friths, where Agricola had formerly built his Fortresses. Thus the Inhabitants of the North were confin'd within narrower Bounds than before. By means of this Rampart and a Camp at a little Distance where Troops were kept ready to march on occasion, he compell'd the Caledonians to remain peaceably in their Country. Tho' Antoninus was never in Britain himself, this Expedition, as done by his Orders, and under his Auspices, gain'd him the Title of Britannicus (6).

Marcus

(1) Under Pianthus and Olanius, in the Reign of Claudius, some Places (say Taditis) were given to King Cogidamus, who continued faithful to the Romans. Over what People he was King does not appear; Camden thinks the Regni; Dr. Gale the Segnnaei. However, there was lately found at Chichester a very curious Inscription, relating to this Cogidamus. The Stone was found in a Cellar under the Corner House of St. Martin's-Lane; it is about two Foot nine Inches broad, and very near three Foot long. It is now fix'd in the Wall of the House where it was found. The Inscription, somewhat defac'd, is as follows:

.. EPTVNO. ET MINERVAE
TEMPLVM

.... O. SALVTE. DOMVS. DIVINAE
.... AVCTORITATE TIB. CLAVD.
.... GIDVBN. R. EGA AVG. IN BRIT
.... GIVM. FABOR. ET QVI IN EO
.... D. S. D. DONANTE AREAM
.... ENTE PVVENTINI FIL.

The Stone in digging up was broken in four Parts, of which one is not taken up, lying under the Foundation of the next House. See Philosophical Transactions, N. 379.

(2) Here is a Gap of above thirty Years, from the Year 85 to 117, during which it is suppos'd the Romans lost much of their Conquests here.

(3) Proculus Licinus succeeds Severus in the Government of Britain, in the Year 120. Severus was recalled to go against the Yezes. Dion. l. 69.

(4) Adrian's Wall or Valium was entirely of Earth. The whole Work consist'd of the following Parts: 1. The North Agger; 2. The Ditch; 3. The principal Vallum; 4. The South Agger. The Ditch at Hartley-Hill, where the original Breadth and Depth is very apparent, measures near nine Foot deep and eleven over. The Height and Thickness of the Vallum and Aggers cannot be exactly known. The Distance of the North Agger from the Ditch is about 24 Foot, and That of the South Agger was originally thirty, tho' lessen'd at present by the spreading of the Earth.

(5) Here is another Gap of 18 Years, from 120 to 138.

(6) From Antoninus's building his Wall in 140 to 165, we meet with no Occurrences, nor from thence to 183. Antoninus's Wall, like Severus's, had a Series of Forts or Stations, which are suppos'd (some at least) to be prior to the Wall, and the same that were built by Agricola. This Wall reaches from the Frith of Forth to the Frith of Chide, as appears by Inscriptions. It begins at Caer-iddon, and runs through Mamul, Lancry, Camelon, Rough-Castle, Duck's Head, Castle-cary-ford, Wetherwood-ford, Covey-Hill, Barhill-ford, Auchendary, Kirkcaldie, Gadder, Bennet, Near Kirkpatrick, Castle-hill-ford, Dunrover, Old Kirkpatrick, ending at Dunlop near Dunbarton, where stood the old City of Albion, afterwards Dunbarton, i. e. the Town of the Britons. Hesley (who had it survey'd) takes the Wall to have been near forty Roman Miles, that is (allowing fourteen Roman to thirteen English) a little above thirty-seven or four Miles. By the Inscriptions showing the Part that was raised by the Cohorts of the Legio Secunda, &c. the Number of Paces amount to 39720, that is thirty-nine Roman Miles, and seven Hundred and twenty-six Paces. It was built of Turf, upon a Foundation of Stone, four Yards thick. To this Work is join'd a great Ditch, larger than that of Severus, on the South-side of which was the main Agger, Vallum or Rampart, and South of the Vallum a large military Way well pav'd, and in several Places very magnificent and beautiful. How this Work came to be call'd Grim's Dike or Graham's Dike does not appear. It is said that Graham in the Highland Tongue signifies Blue, then Graham's Dike will be the same as the Black Dike.

Thus to be read according to Roger Gale, Esq;

Neptuno & Minervae templum pro salute domus divinae ex auctoritate Titerii Claudi Cogidabni regis legati Augusti in Britannia collegium laborum & qui in eo a factis sunt de suo dedicaverunt donante aerem Pudente Pudentini filio.

165. Calphurnius Agricola his Successor gave the Government of Britain to Calphurnius Agricola. This Governor checks the Insolence of the Caledonians, and strengthens the Emperor's Dominion over such of the Britons as seem to bear their Yoke with the most Reluctance. It was in the Reign of Marcus Aurelius, that Lucius, a British King, embrac'd the Christian Religion, which had been long before planted in the Island; but for want of due Cultivation, had taken no deep Root. I shall speak more largely of this King in the State of the British Church.

183. Julius in Britain. During the Reign of Commodus, Successor of Marcus Aurelius, there were great Commotions in Britain. The Northern Men taking up Arms, cut in pieces the Roman Army, commanded by an unexperienc'd General, and make great Ravages in the Province. All Britain was in Danger of being lost, if the Emperor had not speedily sent Ulpus Marcellus, a General of great Reputation. The new Governor defeats the Rebels in several Encounters, and by his Conduct puts an End, in a very short Space, to this dangerous War, that had made his Master extremely uneasy.

184. Ulpus Marcellus is Governor. During his Stay in the Island, he observ'd that the Want of Discipline in the Roman Army, was the sole Foundation of the Boldness of the Northern People, and the chief Cause of the Advantages gain'd by them over the former Governors. He undertakes therefore to bring it to its antient Strictness, which he happily accomplishes. But his Services were repaid with Ingratitude. The Emperor, not content with depriving him of his Government, was upon the Point of putting him to Death. This unworthy Prince, like Domitian, could not behold distinguished Merit without Suspicion and Envy.

186. Marcellus no sooner leaves Britain, but the Army mutiny upon Perennis the Emperor's Favourite, breaking or calling home all the old Officers, and putting his Creatures in their Place. The Mutiny is carried so far, that the Army send a Body of fifteen hundred Men to demand Justice of the Emperor against Perennis. This Troop marching to Rome, without any Obstacle, are met by the Emperor without the City, who demands of the Leaders the Cause of their Discontent. "They were come, (they said) to offer him their Assistance against Perennis, acquainting him withal how that dangerous Minister had by degrees cashier'd the bravest Officers, and filled the Army with his Creatures, a clear Evidence of his ill Designs." Commodus having been jealous of him for some time, delivers him up to the Soldiers, who execute him upon the Spot.

187. The Army mutiny on a point of Perennis, and send a Detachment to Rome. Mean while it was necessary to send into Britain some Person of Authority to suppress the mutinous Temper of the Army. Pertinax, afterwards Emperor, being pitch'd upon for this Service, resolves to proceed according to the Rigour of military Discipline. Whereupon the ninth Legion rais'd a Mutiny, which is not appeased without Bloodshed. The General himself is wounded, and saves his Life only by being left for dead among the Slain. However, in spite of all Obstacles he gains his Point, and brings the Army at last to submit. But as he was not beloved by the Soldiers, he desir'd to be dismissed from his Office, and Clodius Albinus was sent in his room. Albinus being recalled upon a Suspicion conceived of him by Commodus, Junius Severus was ordered to go and relieve him.

188. Pertinax made Governor. Pertinax being come to the Empire, after the Death of Commodus, makes the same Clodius Albinus, lately recalled, Governor of Britain. He was continued in that Post by Julian, Successor of Pertinax. Albinus gains the Affection of the Soldiers by his Liberalities, to such a Degree, that after Julian's Death they proclaim him Emperor. At the same time, Septimius Severus in Pannonia, and Pescennius Niger in Syria, receive the same Honour from their respective Armies. Severus being nearest Rome, hastens thither to receive from the Senate the Confirmation of the Dignity conferred on him by the Soldiers. But notwithstanding the Senate's Decree, the other two Emperors persisting in their Claims, put Severus to a stand. His Rivals

190. Clodius Albinus is made Governor, and Capitulin. Severus hearing of this Revolt, but not knowing the Cause, orders the Rebels to be all slain

192. Succeeded by Junius Severus. After this Treaty Britain remains in Quiet till the fifteenth Year of Severus, when the Caledonians renew their Incursions into the Roman Province. The Roman Soldiers having enjoyed several Years Peace, were grown so effeminate and negligent, that they seem'd never to have had the least Tincture of Military Discipline. It was this that emboldened the Caledonians, and made them think they should not neglect so fair an Opportunity to attack their Neighbours, who till then had appeared so formidable to them.

193. Albinus is sent again into Britain. They make such Progress, that the Emperor, tho' Sixty Years of Age, and afflicted with the Gout, resolves to go in Person and chastise their Insolence. His Intent was, once for all, to put an end to the continual Commotions in Britain, by the entire Conquest of the North. To that purpose he draws together a numerous Army, and sets out for Britain, accompanied by his Sons Caracalla and Geta. The Caledonians, when they hear of his Arrival, send Ambassadors to demand Peace upon honourable Terms. But he refuses to hearken to them, unless they will submit to his Mercy; which they not consenting to, he marches towards their Country with his eldest Son Caracalla, leaving Geta at London to take care of the Southern Parts.

It was with infinite Toil that he penetrated to the utmost Bounds of the North, cutting down Woods, draining Bogs, or filling them with Bains. By this hard Duty, and the continual Ambuscades of the Enemy, he lost fifty thousand Men. (1). However, notwithstanding all Difficulties in his Way, he accomplishes his Design, and subdues these fierce and hitherto unconquer'd People. But as soon as he had executed his Project, he perceived how fruitless it was, since he could not possibly keep the Country in Subjection without a great Army always on the Spot. This Consideration made him sensible, it was better to relinquish these Conquests than to keep them. And therefore, confining himself to Adrian's former Project, he only divides the Island into two Parts by a Wall (2), in the Place where Adrian threw up his Rampart. This Wall, of which there are still some Remains, was called by the antient Britons Mur Severi, or Severus's Wall (3), and must not be, as it is by some, confounded with the Rampart rais'd by Lollius Urbicus between the two Friths. The Emperor having nothing more to do in the North, returns to York, leaving the finishing of the Wall and Command of the Army to his Son Caracalla. This Expedition got him, or caused him to assume, the Title of Britannicus Maximus. Caracalla, no longer refrained by the Emperor his Father's Presence, suffers the Soldiers to commit all manner of Licentiousness. So that the Caledonians, unused to the Yoke, take up Arms with one accord. Severus hearing of this Revolt, but not knowing the Cause, orders the Rebels to be all slain were at the two Extremities of the Empire, and consequently, while he marches against one, there was Danger of the other's making too great a Progress. He judges it necessary therefore to use Diffimulation with Albinus, making him believe he is willing to share the Empire with him. This Offer being accepted, Severus draws all his Forces together, and goes and fights Pescennius, who at length is vanquish'd and slain in Battle; after which Severus considers how to get rid of Albinus likewise. He tries first to assassinate him by Villains hired and sent into Britain for that purpose. But this Way failing, he resolves to employ Force; and causing Albinus to be declared Enemy of the State, marches against him. Albinus was now with his Army in Gaul, intending to meet him and decide the Quarrel by a Battle. And accordingly it was decided near Lyons, where the two Emperors fought with equal Bravery, tho' not with equal Fortune. Albinus is defeated and slain, and by his Death Severus remains sole Possessor of the Empire. Shortly after he divided Britain into two Governments. The First containing the Southern Parts, was given to Heracitus, and Virius Lupus had the Second, consisting of the Northern Provinces bordering upon the Caledonians, by whom he was so infested, that he was forced at last to purchase a Peace with Money.

After this Treaty Britain remains in Quiet till the fifteenth Year of Severus, when the Caledonians renew their Incursions into the Roman Province. The Roman Soldiers having enjoyed several Years Peace, were grown so effeminate and negligent, that they seem'd never to have had the least Tincture of Military Discipline. It was this that emboldened the Caledonians, and made them think they should not neglect so fair an Opportunity to attack their Neighbours, who till then had appeared so formidable to them. They make such Progress, that the Emperor, tho' Sixty Years of Age, and afflicted with the Gout, resolves to go in Person and chastise their Insolence. His Intent was, once for all, to put an end to the continual Commotions in Britain, by the entire Conquest of the North. To that purpose he draws together a numerous Army, and sets out for Britain, accompanied by his Sons Caracalla and Geta. The Caledonians, when they hear of his Arrival, send Ambassadors to demand Peace upon honourable Terms. But he refuses to hearken to them, unless they will submit to his Mercy; which they not consenting to, he marches towards their Country with his eldest Son Caracalla, leaving Geta at London to take care of the Southern Parts.

It was with infinite Toil that he penetrated to the utmost Bounds of the North, cutting down Woods, draining Bogs, or filling them with Bains. By this hard Duty, and the continual Ambuscades of the Enemy, he lost fifty thousand Men. (1). However, notwithstanding all Difficulties in his Way, he accomplishes his Design, and subdues these fierce and hitherto unconquer'd People. But as soon as he had executed his Project, he perceived how fruitless it was, since he could not possibly keep the Country in Subjection without a great Army always on the Spot. This Consideration made him sensible, it was better to relinquish these Conquests than to keep them. And therefore, confining himself to Adrian's former Project, he only divides the Island into two Parts by a Wall (2), in the Place where Adrian threw up his Rampart. This Wall, of which there are still some Remains, was called by the antient Britons Mur Severi, or Severus's Wall (3), and must not be, as it is by some, confounded with the Rampart rais'd by Lollius Urbicus between the two Friths. The Emperor having nothing more to do in the North, returns to York, leaving the finishing of the Wall and Command of the Army to his Son Caracalla. This Expedition got him, or caused him to assume, the Title of Britannicus Maximus. Caracalla, no longer refrained by the Emperor his Father's Presence, suffers the Soldiers to commit all manner of Licentiousness. So that the Caledonians, unused to the Yoke, take up Arms with one accord. Severus hearing of this Revolt, but not knowing the Cause, orders the Rebels to be all slain

Dike. There is a military Way near Salisbury in Hampshire, call'd now Grime's Dike. The's annex'd to Gratam, is, doubtless, owing to the Opinion of its being the Name of a Man. The common Story is, that one of this Name broke through the Wall, and to give his own Name to it. Within sight of the Wall stands an antient Building, call'd Arthur's Oven, in the Shape of the Pantheon at Rome, twenty-two Feet high, and nineteen and a half in Diameter. Hervey takes it to have been a funeral Monument. It stands on the North side of the Wall. See a large Description of these Things in Book I. Chap. 10. of Horsley's Britan. Rom.

(1) Hervey imagines from this great Loss of Men, that Severus's Wall must be reckon'd among these Works, tho' by much the greatest of them, p. 67.

(2) Severus's Wall was of Free-Stone, as is certain from what is yet visible. In some Places, where the Foundation was not good, they seem to have made use of oaken Piles. The inner Part of this Wall is filled with pretty large, and mostly broad and thin Stones, always set edge-ways, somewhat oblique. Upon these the running Mortar or Cement was pour'd, and by this Contrivance the whole Wall was bound as firm as a Rock. These Stones are suppos'd to have been brought from Helbeck near on the Gord and Leuze-Crag, as appears from an Inscription on the Rock that hangs over the Gelt. The Wall generally measures about eight Foot thick, and twelve high. Upon the Wall were plac'd Castles or Chefters sixty Foot square, about six Furlongs and a half from each other, and Turrets four Yards square, about three hundred Yards from each other. There seems to have been four Turrets between every two Castles. The Centinels plac'd in the Turrets being within Call, the Communication quite along the Wall might be kept up, without having Recourse to the Fitches or Poles laid under Ground to convey the Sound; tho' this seems to be credited by Exbard and others. The Wall is trac'd from Cagnon's Haye through Ascuta, Bezwel-Hell, Ratcliffe, Halton-Chapels, Warwick-Chapels, Caracallaburg, Huffsteds, Great-Chefters, Thirlwell-Castle, Burdigwald, Cambeck-Fort, Water-Crest, Stancie's, Brugh, Drumbrugh, to Bath, sixty-eight Miles, three Furlongs. And therefore it is a wonder that such great Men as Usher, Birkton, Banman, Dr. Smith, and others, should say the Wall reach'd only to the Esk, when the contrary, upon View, is plain to a Demonstration. It was not built exactly upon Adrian's Wall, there being a good Distance sometimes between them. It is observable that the Legenary Soldiers were employ'd in building this Wall, as they generally were in Works of this Nature. This is evident from the Centinels Intrenchments on the Stones of the Wall, showing what Part was built by each Centuria. A good Hint how Soldiers may be usefully employ'd in peaceable Times.

(3) The English call it the Pret-wall, because it parted the Picts from the Britons. Rapin.

cred (1), which made them fear he intended an utter Extirpation of them. He dies shortly after at York, and the two Princes his Sons, succeeding him, conclude a Peace with the Caledonians, and return to Rome.

As nothing very memorable passed in Britain during the Reigns of Severus's immediate Successors, I might fill up this Void with an Inquiry, who were these northern People or Caledonians (2) so often mentioned? But this is a Subject fitter for a Dissertation than a History. It suffices to inform the Reader, that some maintain these Caledonians to be Picts and Scots, with a mixture of southern Britons. Others affirm, the Scots settled not in the Island 'till the beginning of the sixth Century, and that the Caledonians in Severus's Time, were no other than Britons, that had all along inhabited those Parts, or fled thither after the Roman Invasion. But tho' as to the History, the Name of these People be not very material, I shall add here, that for my part, I think the Reasons alledged in proof of the Picts and Scots not being yet settled in the Island, to be insufficient, tho' it may be, their Settlement is of a later Date than pretended by the Scottish Historians (3).

What is known of the Affairs of Britain from the Death of Severus to the Reign of Dioclesian, is inconsiderable (4), and amounts to no more than this. There is ground to suppose that some of the thirty Tyrants (5) who were in Possession of the Empire for some time, were acknowledged, if not personally present, in Britain. This appears the more probable, as the Coins of Lollianus, Victorinus, Posthumius, and others of these pretended Emperors, are commonly found in England. Bonifus, who attempted to usurp the Empire under Tacitus and Aurelian, was born in Britain. 'Tis known moreover, that a Governor sent hither by Probus, assumed the Imperial Purple, and was shortly after killed by Victorinus, who had recommended him to the Emperor. Two other Particulars of the Reign of Probus with respect to Britain, ought to be recorded. This Emperor was the first that permitted the Britons (6) to plant Vines as well as the Gauls or Spaniards. But in all appearance, no great Benefit was reaped by this Permission. The Emperor Probus also, after subduing the Vandals and Burgundians, sent over great Number of them into Britain (7). These new Colonies are generally thought to have been settled on Gogmagog-Hill near Cambridge, where there remains to this Day a Fortification, imagined to be the Work of these Foreigners. It is however more probably ascribed to the Danes, who were long Masters of Cambridge.

In the Beginning of Dioclesian's Reign, Carausius had the Command of a Fleet, with Orders to scour the Seas of the pyrratical Franks and Saxons, that perpetually infested the Belgick, Armorican, and British Coasts. Carausius finds means to enrich himself immensely, by plundering the Pyrates, or going Shares with them in their Spoils. After which, he begins by degrees to receive the Emperor's Commands with less Respect and Submission. Maximian was then Emperor of the West, Dioclesian of the East. Carausius's Haughtiness breeding in Maximian's Suspicions that were but too well grounded, he resolves to have him assassinated. Upon notice hereof, Carausius immediately assumes the Imperial Purple, pursuant to the Scheme he had laid. As his Riches had acquired him a great Interest in the Army, his Authority was readily acknowledged in the Island. Maximian, surpris'd at his Boldness, advances as far as Gaul with design to chastize him. But finding him too well established, he alters his Resolution, and thinks it more proper to associate him into the Empire, and leave him Britan for his Share. There are Silver Coins still found in England of these two Emperors, having on the Reverse, two Hands joined together with these Words, Concordia Augg (8).

This forced Agreement not removing Maximian's desire to be rid of his Associate, he commits the Execution of his Design to Constantius Chlorus lately made Cæsar, giving him an Army answerable to the greatness of the Undertaking. As Carausius was retired into Britain, Constantius thought it necessary in the first place to become Master of Boulogne, that Town being as it were the Door into Britain from Gaul. Whilst he is employed in the Siege, Carausius is slain by Electus, who assumes the Title of Emperor. Whereupon, Constantius raises the Siege of Boulogne, and passes into Britain in order to drive the Usurper from thence, before he has time to fortify himself. Shortly after, Alectus is killed by Asclepiodotus, who assuming likewise the Imperial Dignity, loses his Life afterwards in a Battle.

Whilst these petty Tyrants are contending for the Possession of Britain, Dioclesian and Maximian, both on a Day, resign the Empire, one in the East, the other in the West. Galerius and Constantius succeeding them, the last, as Emperor of the West, had Britain in his Division. Some Commotions in the Islands obliging him to go thither in Person, he dies at York (9), in the beginning of an Expedition against the northern People, now distinguished by the Names of Deucædonians and Vecturians (10). Constantius, before he expired, had the Satisfaction to see his Son Constantine succeed him. Some think Constantine was born in Britain, of Helena Daughter of Coel King of Colchester (11). But this at best is only Conjecture. However, this Prince, at first only Emperor of the West, vanquished his Rivals, and became in the end Master of both Empires.

The Britons, as long as Constantine ruled, lived in profound Tranquillity. His Reign was remarkable for three Circumstances in which Britain was concerned. The first is, the Liberty granted by this Emperor throughout all the Roman Empire, of professing the Christian Religion, which Britain enjoyed as well as the rest of the Provinces. The Second is, the general Regulation made by this same Prince for the better Government of his Dominions. He divided the whole Empire into four large Præfectures, namely, Italy, Gaul, the East, and Illyria, in which were contained fourteen great Dioceses or Provinces. Britain, one of the fourteen, was subject to the Præfect of Gaul, and governed by a Vicarius or Deputy under him (12). Before Constantine

(1) Repeating these Lines of Homer—Μῆτις ὑπερβοῦν &c.

—None our Arms shall spare,
None shall escape the Fury of the War;
Children unborn shall die—Il. 2.

(2) That is, Cillyddion, Borders in the British Tongue, whom Bishop Lloyd supposes to be first called Picts, about the Year of our Lord 300. Tho' at the same time they that liv'd next the Roman Frontiers were still called Caledones or Borders. Ammianus, who writ eighty Years after, says there were two Nations of the Picts which were called Diatædones and Chæthibædones, that is, in British, the Southern Caledones, or Borders, and the Northern Men. (Dia and Chæth, right and left, being anciently us'd for South and North) the same, no doubt, that were afterwards call'd the South and North Picts, separated (see Dale says) by a ledge of high and steep Mountains or Granit-bain-Hills; amongst which Hills the Country is called Bruid-Albin, i.e. Hill-of-Albin, and the highest of them is called Drum-Albin, i.e. Ridge of Albin. This perhaps is the only Remains of that most ancient Name of this Island. See Ann. Max. l. 27. p. 346. Usser. prim. p. 80, and 586. Bede, Hist. l. 3. c. 4. Paneg. ad Const. p. 235. Eumen. Paneg. ad Const. p. 258.

(3) Lloyd seems to have set this Matter in a clear Light in his Proofs of the following Particulars. 1. That the Inhabitants of Ireland or the Scots were never in Britain before the Year 300. 2. About that time they began their Incursions, but settled not here 'till after the Decay of the Roman Empire, when the Saxons conquer'd the best part of Britain, calling it England. 3. Then part of the Scots or Irish seated themselves among the Picts, and abut the Year 500 erected the Kingdom of Argyle, and held it a long while peaceably. 4. About the Year 850, they conquer'd all that was North of Graham's Dike. 5. After the Year 900 they get the rest of the Country, and it came to be called Scotland. This seems to be the most probable Account of this much contested Affair, which the Reader may see at large in Lloyd's Historical Account, &c. p. 5—46. It may not be amiss to lay before the Reader one Argument alledg'd by Buchanan in favour of the Antiquity of the Scots in Britain. In Paneg. Maximiano, A. p. 258. The Orator comparing Constantius's Victory over Carausius, with that formerly gain'd by Cæsar over the Britons, says, Ad hæc, natio etiam tunc rudis & Soli Britanni, Pictis modo & Hibernis affluata hostibus adhuc seminudis, facile Romanis armis signisque cessant. Hence Buchanan infers the Scots were in Britain in Cæsar's Time, by supposing Soli Britanni to be the Genitive Case. For then the Sense will be This: Moreover the Nation (conquer'd by Cæsar) being yet rude, and us'd to no other Enemies but Picts and Irish of the British Soil, &c. that is, says he, Scots settled in Britain. But the English Writers seemingly more justly render the Words thus: The Nation being yet rude, and only Britons, us'd to no other Enemies but Picts and Irish, easily yielded to the Roman Arms and Ensigns. Hence the Irish here spoken of are not said to dwell in British Soil, as Buchanan would have it.

(4) That is, from 211, to 286. But notwithstanding the Silence of the Roman Historians, we learn from Inscriptions the Names of three Præfectors under Gordian III. viz. Macellus Fufius, Cnecus Lucilianus, (both mentioned in two Inscriptions found at Lancaster in the County of Durham) and Nonnius Philippius, (in one found at old Carlisle, dated 242.)

(5) The thirty Tyrants rose up in the Reign of Gallienus, about the Year 260.

(6) Eutropius has it, Vinea Gallos & Pannonos (instead of Britannos) habere permittit. l. 9. c. 17.

(7) Who are said to be of great use to the Romans in quelling Insurrections. Milt. Hist. Eng. p. 102.

(8) They have on the Reverse PROVIDENTIA AVGG, or PAX AVGG, shewing there were three Emperors at this time. See Batt. Antig. Ratup. p. 65.

(9) Nennius says, that in his Time the Tomb of Constantius was shewn juxta urbem que vocatur Caer-Constant, i.e. York, or as others, Caer-Martben c. 21. p. 103.

(10) See Note above the Word Caledonians.

(11) Usser, Camden and Stillingfleet have endeavour'd to render this Opinion probable, and pretend that Constantius was forc'd to put away Helena, Mother of Constantine, and marry a Daughter of Maximian. Rapin.

(12) 'Till Constantine's Time the Governor of Britain was call'd the Præfect's Prætor or Lieutenant. But afterwards (as appears in the Notitia of the Empire) the Island was govern'd by a Vicar or Deputy, under the Præfect's Prætor of Gaul. See Usser. Hist. l. 2. p. 688. The Ensigns of his Government were, 1. A Draught of the five Provinces of Britannia express'd in several Buildings, with their Names on the triangular Form of the Island, as if they comprehended the whole Island. 2. The Book of their Instructions cover'd with Green, and the Commission in a gilt Cover, with several Letters inscribed on the Book. The Letters were, F. L. I. N. T. A. L. L. C. O. M. O. R. D. P. R. i. e. Fions libri jussu nostro transcripti a laterculis continentis mandata ordinaria principis. There were two Books call'd the Laterculum Majus, and the Laterculum Minus. The first contain'd the Names, Instructions, &c. of the higher Officers, as the second did those of the inferior Officers. See Pancius in Not. Imperii.

sub. fies int. Ireland.
Poison, swallow the Bait, and readily join with the Romans for the sake of the promised Advantage. Presently after, the Scots being attacked by these two united Powers, are forced to abandon their Country and fly into Ireland, and the adjacent Isles. Maximus, according to his Promise, suffers his Allies to take possession of the Lands deserted by the Scots. But whilst he is considering of Means to subdue them in their Turn, Affairs of greater Importance relating to himself, oblige him to form new Projects.

378. Whilst this General was employed in enlarging the Bounds of the Empire, Gratian, joint Emperor of the West with Valentinian his Brother, associates Theodosius the Younger, Son of Theodosius the Elder, who had commanded in Britain. This Choice, tho' universally applauded, displeases Maximus, who thinks himself more worthy of the Purple than the Person invested with it. He takes the Preference given by Gratian to Theodosius as a heinous Affront, and therefore can't bear the Thought of serving so ungrateful a Master, and a young Prince so much in his Opinion beneath him in Merit. The Vexation to see himself thus slighted, throws him into a Resolution to assume the Imperial Dignity, and so put himself upon an Equality with the Person Gratian had given him for Sovereign. After forming this Project, he alters his Measures. Instead of making War upon the Picts, according to his former Resolution, he thinks only how to gain their Friendship. His Intent was to leave Britain in quiet and attached to his Interest, whilst he was elsewhere employed against the three Emperors, from whom he designed to wrest the Empire. But an unexpected War arising in Britain, prevented him from discovering his Purpose so soon as he intended. The Scots, strengthened with the Assistance of the Irish, make an Irruption into the North, and endeavour to recover the Dominions from whence they were chased. Maximus therefore is forced to employ against them the Forces prepared for the Execution of his other Projects. He defeats them several times, and at length drives them back into Ireland, where he makes a Show of following them, to deprive them of that Refuge, and punish the Irish. But the Irish dreading to see a Roman Army in their Island, send to him to make his own Terms, which he did in a much more favourable manner than they expected, with intent to stifle all Seeds of Division and Discontent, that might any way frustrate his principal Design.

He assumes the Title of Emperor.
Gildas, n. 10. Bede, l. 1. c. 9.
388. Is beheaded by Theodosius.
392. Affairs of the Empire.
After these Troubles are appeased, Maximus assumes the Imperial Purple, and quits Britain to go and fight Gratian. He leads all the Roman Forces into Gaul, with a considerable Body of such Britons as are fit to bear Arms. Thus Britain was on a sudden destitute of Soldiers, and consequently so weak that she could not defend herself in case of Attack. The Roman Historians inform us, that Maximus causing Gratian to be assassinated as he was flying into Italy, and dethroning Valentinian II. was himself vanquished and beheaded by Theodosius. This Victory procured the Restoration of Valentinian, who was soon after murdered by Arbogastes, and Eugenius placed on the Throne. Theodosius was therefore forced to fight the new Usurper, who met with the same Fate as Maximus. Eugenius being dead, Arbogastes despairing to escape due Punishment, lays violent Hands on himself (1). Thus Theodosius remains sole Master of the Empire, and keeps Possession as long as he lives. The Fame of his Victories, and the Mildness of his Government keep his Subjects in Obedience, and his Neighbours in Awe. The Picts in particular, lived peaceably in their Country without molesting the Britons.

393. Honorius Emperor of the W. Bede, l. 1. c. 4.
Victorinus sent into Britain.
He treats the Picts ill.
After the Death of Theodosius, the Empire was divided between his two Sons. Arcadius was Emperor of the East, and Honorius of the West. As Honorius was very young, the famous Stilico, by the Emperor his Father's Order, was Regent during his Minority. His first Care was to send a Governor into Britain with a Legion, to curb the Insolence of the Picts, who after Theodosius's Death, began to make Inroads into the Roman Province. He made choice of Victorinus, a Person of a fierce and arrogant Temper, who not satisfied with cooping up the Picts in their Country, treated them as Subjects of the Empire. He pretended to stretch his Authority so far as to forbid them to crown another King in the room of Hengist, whom Death had just taken out of the World. This Proceeding convinced the Picts, Victorinus had a Design to attack them, and laid them under Apprehensions that after having helped to drive out the Scots, they should be forced to follow them now that they could no longer depend upon the Assistance of their Neighbours, as formerly. They considered, by the Retreat of the Scots, they were deprived of an Aid, which in time to come might be to them very necessary. The little Regard the Roman Governor had for them making them apprehensive he had form'd some Design against their Liberty, they thought of Means to avoid their Ruin, by repairing the Error they had committed. In this State of Fear and Uncertainty, they resolved to recall the Scots. To which end they send an honorable Embassy to Fergus, a Prince of the Blood-Royal of Scotland, who was retir'd into Denmark, and invite him with his Countrymen to come and take possession again of the Country they were forc'd to abandon. As a farther Inducement they promise him the Command of their Army in the War with the Romans, which to them seem'd unavoidable. Fergus accepts these Offers, and acquaints the fugitive Scots that he is ready to lead them back into their Country. There could never be a more favorable Juncture: The Roman Empire was not only rent with intestine Troubles by the Discord which reign'd among the Governors, but powerfully attacked by barbarous Nations that ravag'd the Borders. These Disorders had obliged Stilico to recall Victorinus with his Legion, and employ him in other Parts, where the Occasion was more urgent. At this very Juncture the Scots re-enter the Island under the Conduct of Fergus, whom they unanimously chuse for their King (2).

As soon as Fergus II is seated in the Throne, he meditates Revenge upon the Romans, which to him appears the more easy to effect, as they are extremely weaken'd by the Departure of Victorinus. Pursuant to this Resolution, he assembles the Forces of both Nations, of which he was invested with the Command, and after taking the Fortresses built by Theodosius the Elder, between the two Friths, advances to Severus's Wall. The small Number of Troops left by the Romans in the Island not being able to defend a Wall of so great Length, the Picts and Scots enter the Roman Province with little or no Difficulty, and lay waste the Country.

After Britain had submitted to the Roman Yoke, a great Number of Foreign Families removed thither, sprung for the most part from the Veteran Soldiers, settled there. These Families had so mixt with the Natives, that they now made but one People, governed by Officers sent from Rome. I shall therefore call this mixt People henceforward by the Name of Britons, because the Romans and other Foreigners, as well as the Natives, had the same Interest to defend Britain, now become their common Country. The Britons then finding themselves thus harrassed by their Neighbours, and despairing of Assistance from Rome, resolve to elect an Emperor, whose Interest it should be to protect them. Their Choice falls upon one Marcus an Officer of great Credit among them; but the new Sovereign not having the good Fortune to please all the World, is quickly slain or dethroned, and another, call'd Gratian, chosen in his room. This last being a Man of a cruel and bloody Disposition, meets the same Fate, four Months after his Election.

As these two first Emperors did not answer Expectation, Constantine a common Soldier was next raised to the Imperial Dignity purely for the sake of his Name, which was thought to be fortunate. The new Emperor being a Man of Courage, and of a Genius far above his former Condition, beats back the northern People into their Country, and then concludes a Peace with them. This Success inspiring him with a higher Conceit of his Merit and Fortune, he is not content to reign in Britain only, but forms a Design to become Master of the whole Empire. To this end he draws together the Remains of those that can bear Arms, as well Romans as Islanders, and forming an Army, passes into Gaul. His Intention was to improve the present favorable Juncture. Honorius was then attacked by Alaric King of the Goths, who a few Years after, became Master of Rome. Whilst Constantine is making Preparations, he sends Ambassadors to Honorius, to acquaint him with his being chosen Emperor by Britain, and to excuse his accepting the Imperial Dignity without his Knowledge. Honorius, now pressed by Alaric, is forc'd to admit of Constantine's Excuses, and own him for his Associate in the Empire. The Emperor's Condescension is not capable of satisfying the ambitious Constantine, whose Designs and Hopes are vastly enlarged. At his Arrival in Gaul, he associates his Son Constans, taken out of the Monastery at Winchester; and leaving him an Army to maintain his Authority in these Provinces, marches towards the Alps in order to pass into Italy and dethrone Honorius. Constans had for General of his Troops one Gerontius, who by his prudent Conduct, not only made his Master respected in Gaul, but also put him in possession of Spain. The young Emperor was so exalted with this unexpected Success, that for fear the Honour which he thought wholly belonged to himself, should be ascrib'd to Gerontius, he removed him from his Post. So ungrateful a Return goes not long unpunished. Gerontius, exasperated at the Affront, finds Means to assemble the Army, and causing Maximus, and

(1) Horsley says he saw a curious Medal of his at Newcastle, though he could never learn where it was found, p. 74.

(2) The Scotch Writers are here R.W'd, though accus'd by the English of vending many Fables. Rapin. See Note, p. 21.

Friend of his, to be proclaim'd Emperor, gains the Majority to his Side. Then he goes and besieges Conflans in Vienna, where he was retir'd. That Town not being then in condition to stand a long Siege, Conflans in a Sally wilfully rushes upon his Death, for fear of falling into the Hands of his Enemy.

Constantine seeing the Face of Affairs altered by the Revolt of Gerontius, and the Death of his Son, lays aside his Design of going into Italy, and retires to Arles, where he is besieged by Gerontius. But while Gerontius is pleas'd with the Hopes of having him soon in his own Power, he is forced on a sudden to raise the Siege, and march against a more formidable Enemy. Count Constantius, to whom Honorius had given the Command of his Armies, upon the Peace lately concluded between the Emperor and the King of the Goths (1), was advancing with all speed to curb the Insolence of the Tyrants of Gaul. Upon his Approach, Gerontius is suddenly deserted by his Army, and forced to fly into Spain, where he is slain by his own People. Constantine had no better Fortune than Gerontius. He was taken at Arles, with his Son Julian and his Brother Sebastian. Tho' before the Surrender of the Town he had taken Priests Orders, he was nevertheless sent to the Emperor and beheaded.

The Britons thus left to themselves after the Departure of the Roman Soldiers and the Flower of their Youth, are quickly reduced to great Extremities. The Picts and Scots continue their Ravages without Opposition, by reason of the Weakness of their Enemies. This wretched State held some Years, and the Romans were not able to help it. They were too much taken up with their own Affairs to think of Britain. The Goths had renewed the War under the Conduct of Alaric, and having taken and sacked the City of Rome, were now in possession of Gaul (2). On the other side, the Suevi, Vandals (3), Cotti, and Alani (4), had over-run Spain. In vain therefore do the Britons implore the Emperor's Assistance. He is neither able nor willing to give them any; Britain, so carefully preserved by his Predecessors, beginning now to be a Burden. Wherefore to free himself at once from their Importunities, he voluntarily resigns the Sovereignty of the Island, and discharges the Inhabitants of their Allegiance to the Empire. This solemn Renunciation was made in the Year 410, a little after Alaric's taking of Rome.

The Liberty the Britons had thus recovered, served only to render them more miserable. Whereas before they might claim the Protection of the Emperor, they were now destitute of all Hopes of Assistance. However, the Affairs of the Romans happening afterwards to be somewhat restored under Valentinian III, by the Victories of the famous Ætius over the Wisigoths and Burgundians, this General, out of Pity to the wretched Condition of the Britons, sends them a Legion commanded by Gallio of Ravenna, or as some say, by Maximian. This Aid arriving unexpectedly, beat back with ease the Northern Nations, and forced them to retire into the Country. But the Emperor having occasion for the Legion, they were recalled just as the Enemies were preparing to renew their Devastations.

Before his Departure the Roman Commander told the Britons plainly, they were to expect no farther Assistance from the Emperor, who was wholly employed elsewhere against the northern Nations of Europe, whose Ravages extended to all parts of the Empire. After this Declaration, he advises them to inure themselves to Arms, that they may be able to withstand the continual Attacks of their Enemies; and considering their Weakness, exhorts them to repair the Wall of Severus to serve them for a Barrier; offering them the Assistance of his Soldiers and his own Direction in the Work. What could the Britons do in this their Extremity? They had no other Method to take, but That propos'd to them by the Roman Captain, and therefore fell to work upon their Wall with all possible Diligence, which as soon as they had finished, the Romans took their last Farewel of Britain never to return more. The End of the Roman Dominion over Britain is to be fix'd to the Time of this Legion leaving the Island, in the Year 426 to 427 (5).

The Picts and Scots, who lived in strict Union after the Coronation of Fergus, began their Hostilities against the Britons with more Confidence than ever, when they heard of the Departure of the Roman Forces. The Wall of Severus lately repaired, is attacked afresh, and abandon'd at last, being defended only by Britons little us'd to War. After which, the northern People made large Branches in several Places, that it might be no Obstacle to their future Invasions into their Enemies Country. About this Time Constantine dies as he is returning to Ireland, leaving his young Son Eugenius II a Minor, under the Regency of Graham his Grandfather by his Mother's Side.

The Weakness of the Britons was then so great, that despairing to resist their Enemies, they abandon'd part of their Country, and retired more Southward. Whereupon the Picts and Scots, grown more bold by their Advantages, form new Projects, and think of Means to drive the Britons entirely out of the Island. To this end they resolve to send for Colonies from Ireland and the adjacent Isles, to people the Lands forsaken by the Britons, as well as those they hope to take from them hereafter. But Graham prevents, by his Authority, the Execution of this Project, fearing the Return of the Romans, and the making Scotland the Scene of the War. It may be, he was not altogether ignorant of the sad Condition then of the Roman Empire; but knew not how low it was; and therefore, thought fit to oppose the Designs of the Scots, and prefer a solid Peace, with some real, tho' not great, Advantages, to a War which, as he imagined, might be attended with dangerous Consequences. A Peace then was offer'd to the Britons upon honorable Terms, and by them gladly accepted. By the Treaty the Wall of Severus was to be the common Boundary of the two Nations. But for this Advantage the Britons were oblig'd to pay a considerable Sum of Money. The Scots thinking this Peace not advantageous enough, loudly murmur'd at it; but Graham took care to see it observ'd during his Administration.

As soon as Eugenius II was of Age to take the Reins of the Government into his own Hands, he resolv'd to break a Treaty, which his Subjects had protested against. He knew the Romans were not in condition to assist Britain, and the Opportunity appear'd too favourable to be neglected. Pursuant to this Resolution, he sends Ambassadors to the Britons, and haughtily demands all the Lands possess'd by the Scots before the late Treaty. The Chief of the Britons, surpriz'd at this unexpected Demand, convene a general Assembly to consider of an Answer to the King of Scotland. The Majority of the Assembly, provok'd at the Haughtiness of their Neighbors, and knowing they only wanted an Excuse to renew the War, were of opinion to reject their Demand. "It is easy (say they) to perceive the Scots will not be satisfied hereafter with their present Demands. Their Aim is only to have an Entrance into the Country, that they may with less Difficulty become Masters of the whole; and it will be an easier Task to prevent them from entering, than to drive them out when once they are settled. In short, since a War is unavoidable, it will be very imprudent to grant what they demand, under colour of preserving a Peace which cannot last long." Others not so warm, knowing the extreme Weakness of the Nation, were of another Mind. They were for finding some Expedient to satisfy the Scots, and avoid if possible, a War which must prove fatal to the Britons. "They desire the Assembly to consider what prodigious Numbers of Soldiers were drawn out of the Island by the Romans to supply their Armies abroad; how many Maximus carried with him that were settled in Gaul; and lastly how the Country was drain'd of all that could bear Arms by Constantine. To this they add, the Weakness of the Nation was but too visible in their late War with the Scots, when their frequent Defeats oblig'd them to abandon the very Lands now demanded, the Possession of which was entirely owing to the Generosity of Graham; it is therefore better for the Britons to give up freely what they cannot keep, than for the sake of that, to run the risk of losing their All."

Tho' these Reasons were very weighty, they were overrul'd by the violent Party, and Conan one of the wisest and most powerful of the Nation, for dwelling too long upon the Advantages of Peace, was deem'd a Traitor, and torn in pieces by them. After that none daring to oppose it, the Ambassadors were sent back with an insulting Answer. This hasty Resolution was followed with a War more destructive to the Britons than their former ones, and which entirely weaken'd them by the Loss of fourteen or fifteen thousand Men in one single Battle. Reduc'd to Extremity, they have no course left but to sue in a suppliant manner for that Peace they so haughtily refused. They obtain it indeed, but upon very hard Terms. By the new Treaty, they are oblig'd to give up all the Country north

(1) In the Year 404 or 405. Rapin.

(2) In 404 or 405 Honorius made a Treaty with Alaric, who retir'd into Illyria, from whence he returned in 409 or 410, and then it was he took Rome. Rapin.

(3) Northern People from Syria about the Lake Mæotis and River Tanais of Gothic Original, and call'd Floods from the Word Wald in German, because they often changed their Places of Abode. At last they fix'd near the Mouth of the Baltic Sea towards Germany, which from them was call'd Vandania. The Scots were of the same Original, & nam'd from the Word Scythia, of the same Import with Wald. This was a part of Germany beyond the Danube, now call'd Saxonia. Boady, p. 37.

(4) The Alani were said not far from the Head of the River Tanais or Dnieper. Ibid.

(5) Strabo thinks it was in the Year 413. Rapin.

of the Humber, of which the Picts and Scots as waging War in common, take possession (1).

Causes of the Britons Weakness
The extreme Weakness of the Britons will not be thought strange, if it be considered in the first Place, they were not used to War. The Romans, who had long been Masters of the Island, never suffered them to exercise their Arms; it being their Custom always to employ foreign Troops in their Conquests. For this reason the Soldiers levied in Britain were sent into other Provinces, from whence they never return'd. These Levies were so numerous that there were twelve considerable Bodies of Britons in the Roman Armies dispersed in the several Provinces of the Empire, and always recruited from Britain. In the next place, Maximus and Constantine led such great Armies from thence, as almost drain'd the Island of Men fit to bear Arms. In fine, if to this be added the late Losses sustained by the Britons after the Departure of the Romans, it is no Wonder they became so easy a Prey to their Enemies.

Confusion in the History of these Days.
From this Time to the coming in of the Saxons, the History of Britain is very confused, by reason of the Disagreement of the Writers, which makes it very difficult to discover the Truth, and much more so to fix all the Dates. What can be gathered with any certainty is, that the Britons elected several Kings, whose Actions are unknown; and that these Kings were establish'd, and afterwards kill'd or dethron'd, according to the Humour and Interest of the leading Men. Probably too, several Kings reign'd at the same time in different Provinces, and by their Discord and Wars contributed to the weakening one another. To complete their Misfortunes, Britain was afflicted with a cruel Famine, which rag'd also in most Parts of the World. This terrible Scourge render'd the Country quite desolate, People dying with Hunger by thousands. In this extreme Distress, Multitudes of poor Wretches, to save their Lives, fly into Armorica, where great part of Maximus's Army was already settled. Others, rather than starve with Hunger, threw themselves upon the Picts and Scots. Amidst these Desolations, the northern People, their irreconcilable Enemies, taking Advantage of their Misfortunes, break the Treaty, and passing the Humber, ravage the Country in a merciless manner.

The Britons Letter to Ætius.
The miserable State of the Britons forces them to apply once more to the Romans for Assistance. They send upon this Occasion, a very moving Letter to Ætius then in Gaul (2). We know not (say they) which way to turn us. The Barbarians drive us to the Sea, and the Sea forces us back to the Barbarians; between which we have only the choice of two Deaths, either to be swallowed up by the Waves, or butcher'd by the Sword. Ætius was then preparing to repulse Attila, who was entered Gaul with an Army of eighty thousand Men, and therefore not being in condition to grant their Request, sent them word that the Affairs of the Empire would not suffer him to assist them, neither were they to depend upon him (3). So mortifying an Answer threw the miserable Britons into the utmost Consternation, not knowing what Measures to take, to free themselves from their unfortunate Circumstances. In this Distress, it is judged proper by the chief Men of the Nation to call a General Assembly, and consider of some possible Remedy for their Calamities, which daily increase. They agreed at last to chuse a Monarch (4) as the only Expedient to save them from Destruction, in expectation, that when united under one Head, their Divisions would cease, and their Enemies be more strongly resisted. But the Discord that reign'd among the principal Members of the State, prevented the good Effects of this Expedient. Several Great Men, having fortified themselves in diverse Parts, acted like Sovereigns. All these petty Tyrants, jealous of one another, far from owning the Monarch elect, fought only to destroy him, in order to be chosen in his room. It was therefore impossible for these Monarchs to subsist long, since not being agreeable to all, the Male-contents joined together for their Destruction: Thus the Britons, whilst they endeavour to unite themselves under one Head, are plung'd the deeper into Anarchy and Confusion.

We know not the Names of any of these Monarchs 'till Vortigern, Count or King of the Dunmonij (5), elected in the Year 445. This Prince, as he was the most powerful and ambitious, could never brook a Superior, and therefore was all along a profess'd Enemy to the preceding Monarchs, and contributed to their Ruin. Nay, 'tis affirmed by Historians, that he assassinated his Predecessor to make room for himself. Those that imagine Constantine Son of Constantine kill'd at the Siege of Vienne, to be his immediate Predecessor, are certainly mistaken, since there was at least forty Years space between the Death of Constantine and the Election of Vortigern (6).

The new Monarch was by no means qualified to restore the Affairs of the Britons. As he attain'd to the supreme Dignity by Artifice and Cabal, he wholly bent his Thoughts to maintain himself in the Throne by the same wicked Methods, regardless of the general Welfare of his Subjects. He was moreover of a cruel and avaritious Temper, addicted to many Vices; and so lewd, that he debauch'd his own Daughter, by flattering her with Hopes of being a Queen (7). Mean while there was a Necessity to think of repulsing the Enemies, and Vortigern knew himself incapable of such an Undertaking, though he had been chosen for that very purpose. But what troubled and perplex'd him most, was, his being so little belov'd by the People, and the continual Fear of being dethron'd. The Examples of the Monarchs his Predecessors being never out of his Mind, he was apprehensive the same Course would be taken with him, since he was so little able to answer the good Opinion conceiv'd of him when rais'd to the Throne. Living thus in equal Dread of the Enemies of the State and of his own Subjects, he fancied he had devised an Expedient to free himself from the Danger of the one, and Plots of the other. But as he could not put his Design in practise without the Consent of the Britons, he calls a General-Assembly, and makes a long Speech, before he comes to the Point. "He describes in a strong and lively Manner the extreme Misery of the Nation: Accuses the Romans of being the sole Cause of the Misfortunes of the Britons, by draining the Island of all her Youth fit to bear Arms, and then leaving her to the Insults of her Neighbours. He enlarges upon the great Losses sustained since by the Britons, and the manifest Danger of being either driven out of their Country, or utterly destroy'd, by reason of their Weakness. For his part, he is always ready to hazard his Life for the Service of the Nation: but considering the few Troops in his Power, and the little Union between the principal Members of the State, he has no Hopes that his weak Endeavours will be able to rescue his Subjects from their present Calamities. In this melancholy State of Affairs,

(1) From Severus's Wall to the Humber is eighty Miles. Rapin.

(2) The Britons calling, in their Letter, Ætius Consul, hath made some call this Fact in question, because his Name is not found in the Roman Festi; but, as Mr. Selden observes, the Name of Consul was frequently given to illustrious Persons, tho' they were not actually Consuls. Not. on Poly-Olb. p. 84.

(3) As this is the last mention of the Romans, it may not be amiss to give a brief Account of the Legions that came into the Island. Julius Cæsar brought with him the first time the tenth, and tenth his favorite Legion. In his second Descent he brought five Legions, but which they were, except the tenth, is unknown. All three return'd the same Year they came. Under Claudius came four Legions (with their proper Auxiliaries, making an Army of about Fifty Thousand Men) namely the second, the ninth, the fourteenth and the twentieth. The second called Legio secunda Augusta, came hither under the Command of Vespasian, and continued here to the very last. They were concern'd in building the Roman Wall in Scotland, as appears from the Inscriptions. Their usual Quarters were at Caerleon, tho' they were removed from thence at last, being plac'd at Rutupæ in the Notitia, where they are call'd Legio secunda Eboracensis five Secunda, i. e. Those of the second Legion, as the Quartani, Quarta-decuma, &c. are those of the fifth and fourteenth in Tacitus. Ptolemy places this Legion at Iffa Dunmonium, or Exeter, which might be mistaken for Iffa Silurum or Caer-leon. The ninth was cut in pieces by Boadicea; it was recruited with two thousand Soldiers, and eight auxiliary Cohorts, but attack'd again, as being the weakest, by the Caledonians. After which, being no more heard of, it was either broke or incorporated with the sixth Legion brought over by Hadrian. It is suppos'd to have been stationed at Fork where an Inscription was found with these Words, Legio nona Victrix. The fourteenth was the only Legion, says Tacitus, that together with the Vexillum of the twentieth (that is, six hundred select Men of a Legion) was entirely engag'd in the Battle with Boadicea's Army. This Legion was recalled by Nero, order'd back by Vitellius, and sent for again by Vespasian; after which they seem never to have return'd to Britain any more. As they left Britain before the Humour of erecting Inscriptions, it is no Wonder they are not mention'd in any. The twentieth is thus express'd in the Roman Inscriptions. J. E. G. XX. V. V. That is, Legio vicesima Valens (or Valeria) Victrix. The stated Quarters of this Legion was Deva or West-Chester, which probably was therefore honour'd with the Name of a Colony, as in one of Gata's Coins with this Legend, COLONIA DIVANA LEGIO XX VICTRIX. This Legion was with the second employ'd in building the Roman Forts and Walls. It does not appear when they left Britain. Between these four Legions, there came with Hadrian the sixth, usually thus express'd, L. E. G. VI. V. P. F. that is, Legio sexta Victrix Pia Fidelis. This Legion was a long Time in Britain. They are frequently mention'd in the Inscriptions on Severus's Wall. Their stated Quarters were at York. From what has been said it appears, that for twenty five Years (from Claudius's Invasion, till the fourteenth was recall'd by Nero, and afterwards by Vespasian) there were four Legions in Britain. From the first Year of Vespasian to Hadrian's Reign, only three; and from Hadrian's time (when the sixth came over) to the lowest Empire, there were still but three; the ninth being broke or incorporated with the sixth. The Reader may see a large Account of these Things in Hopley. B. I. c. 6.

(4) By Monarch here is to be understood, one superior to the other Heads, or Kings, on whom they were in some Measure dependent. See Selden and Maltebrun. Rapin.

(5) Inhabitants of Deven and Cornwal. Rouland thinks Dunmonium is the true Word for Devenport, and Dunmonium for Devenport, or the British Dy-fuiri. The Cornish write and pronounce (d) as (2). He derives both these Words from Môn, signifying the utmost or farthest.

(6) Alford and others place Vortigern's Election between 430 and 436. The common Opinion is followed here, which appears to be most probable. Rapin.

(7) This Story of Vortigern's incest seems altogether unlikely. At least, the Dialogue between Vortigern and St. German, and his being condemn'd in a great Council of Clergy and Laity, in which St. German presided, is certainly false, that Saint being dead a Year before the Saxons arriv'd in Britain. And indeed, when is it that he should commit this Crime? Not before he married Rowena, for Nennius places it afterwards; nor could it well be during the time of his Marriage with her, since, as the same Author relates, she continued his Wife long after, when he was taken Prisoner by Hengist, and it is very strange he should fall in Love with his own Daughter, when he had another Wife, whom he is said to love so well, that he was divorc'd from his first for her sake. See Jyrral, Vol. I. p. 127, 128.

"he sees but one way to save his Country from the Destructions she is threaten'd with, and That is, to call in to their Assistance a Nation, that by their victorious Arms were settled in Germany, upon the Lands of the Romans. Then tells them, he means the Saxons; adding, they have indeed done some Damage to the Britons by their Pyracies, but are now ready to repair it with Advantage; since they can free them from the continual Irruptions of the Picts and Scots. This People, being parted from Britain by a small Arm of the Sea only, can be as speedy with their Aid as their pressing Occasions require: they are already grown formidable to the northern Nations, and by the Arrival of some of their Troops the Britons will quickly be in condition to resist their Enemies, and perhaps repay them in their own Coin." He concludes with representing, "the thing will hardly admit of Debate; the Britons cannot be without a foreign Aid, and none but the Saxons are in condition to give them Assistance."

His Proposal is approved.
St. Dunstons.
Ch. Brit.

The Fears all were seiz'd with, and the Hopes of still enjoying their native Country, and recovering their lost Estates, and no doubt the Desire of Revenge, conspired to a joyful Reception of Vortigern's Proposal. But when they came to consider of the Terms to be offer'd the Saxons, great Debates arose. The Monarch, whose secret Purpose was to strengthen himself as well against his own Subjects as foreign Enemies, mov'd, the allotting them some Province, that their own Interest might induce them to wage War more heartily and vigorously. But as no Lands could be assigned them but what belong'd to some of the Assembly, it was no easy Matter to agree on this Point. At length, after great Disputes, it was resolv'd that the Saxons should have the Isle of Thanet in Kent, as being a proper Place to land their Forces, and convenient for them whenever they wanted to return into their own Country. It was farther agreed, that the Saxon Soldiers should be allowed Pay, which should be settled by Agreement on both Sides. After this Resolution, Ambassadors were appointed to negotiate the Affair in Germany. Vortigern, pleas'd with having carried his Point without incurring Suspicion, imagin'd himself out of the Reach of all Danger. But see how blind and short-sighted is human Wisdom! This very Expedient, by the direction of divine Providence, prov'd his own and the Nation's Ruin.

The Isle of Thanet is given to the Saxons.

Ambassadors are named to negotiate
the Saxons.
Vortigern's
Policy proves injurious to his Country.

But before I proceed to the Effects of this pernicious Advice, it will be necessary to give a more particular Account of these Saxons, who are to be the chief Subject of our History. They were so little known before their coming into Britain, and what is said of their Original so uncertain, that 'tis no wonder this Subject is but very slightly touch'd upon by the Generality of the English Historians. Some barely say, the Saxons were called in to the Assistance of Britain, without any farther Addition concerning them. Others say only, the Saxons were a German People, without mentioning the Parts they inhabited. Some again add, they were Pyrates from the Cimbrian Chersonesus, that came and settled on the Coasts of the German Ocean. But as these Coasts are of a vast Extent, we are not much the wiser for that. In short, the most probable Account I can gather from the several Authors that have writ of this People, is as follows.

Coming of the Saxons
and their Conquests in Germany.
Sharnham.

About this Time the Romans began to extend their Conquests into Germany, the Inhabitants of the Cimbrian Chersonesus, now called Jutland, leaving their Country, advanced towards the South. They possess'd themselves at first of the northern Parts of Germany, and doubtless spent some Years in settling themselves in those Quarters. But as the Romans had not yet penetrated so far, and we have no antient Histories of the northern Countries, nor even of the western, but what the Romans have left us, there is little known of the first Irruptions made by the northern People into Germany. The Cimbri continually pushing their Conquests to the Southward, and the Romans advancing to the Northward, they at last approach'd one another. Then it was that the Romans had Opportunity to learn in some measure, the State of these hitherto unknown Nations.

Their Historians however speak very confusedly of them, giving sometimes different Names to the same People, and sometimes the same Name to different Nations. The Cimbri that came from the Cimbrian Chersonesus, were divided into three Bands, one taking the Name of Suevi, another of Franks, and a third of Saxons. Some will have the Franks to be a Branch of the Suevi. However that be, these three Nations, continually advancing Southwards, came at length to the Frontiers of the Roman Empire; the Suevi towards Italy, the Franks to the South-West, towards the Coast of Belgic-Gaul, and the Saxons to the West, towards the German Ocean. The Suevi especially were so terrible to the antient Germans, that they looked upon them as a Match for the Immortal Gods, as Cæsar says in his Commentaries. As for the Franks, they are known to have over-run the whole Province of Gaul, and founded the noble and antient Kingdom of France.

Cæf. 1. 4.
Stillington.

The Saxons possess'd themselves of those Tracts of Land lying between the Rhine and the Elbe. Their Territories bounded on the West by the German Ocean, extended Eastward to the Borders of Thuringen. Consequently they were Masters of Saxony, Westphalia, and all that part of the Low-Countries lying North of the Rhine. The Nations subdu'd by these Conquerors were in time called Saxons, in like manner as the Inhabitants of Gaul were named Franks or French, after their Subjection to the Franks. But however, whether the Saxons were not so rapid in their Conquests as the Suevi, or the Course they took made it longer before they approach'd the Romans, 'tis certain they were not so soon known. The first Roman Historians that mention them, at least by the Name of Saxons, are Eutropius and Orosius, who inform us that Carausius (as I have elsewhere taken notice) was sent to clear the Seas of the pyratelical Franks and Saxons. From that time they became formidable to the Romans, and oblig'd them to keep standing Forces to guard both the German and British Coasts, with a General Officer filed the Præfect, or Count of the Saxon Coasts. Upon the Decline of the Roman Empire, after the Death of Theodosius, the Saxons taking Advantage of its Weakness, made themselves Masters of the whole Country along the Coast of the German Ocean, and even extended their Conquests as far as the Isles of Zealand. Hence the Frisians, Batavians, and the neighbouring Nations were hardly known by any other Name but that of the Saxons.

Tho' several Authors have writ of the Saxons, we are still in the Dark as to their Original, or how to distinguish the Nations called by that general Name. And therefore the beginning of their History remains very confus'd and intricate, it being almost impossible it should be otherwise, considering, Authors for the most part have made no Distinction of Times or Places. One while, they are consider'd just as they left their own Country, and then are confounded with the Franks and Suevi, under the Name of Cimbri. Another while, they are view'd as beginning their Conquests towards the North-west of the Continent, and then they are represented as seated North of the Frisians, Batavians, Marsians, and other Nations of those Parts subject to the Romans. Some have placed them at once along the Coast of the German Ocean, and Banks of the Rhine, and even in the Isles of Zealand, as if they had from the very first inhabited these Regions. Others again, not considering that all their Conquests were term'd Saxony, and finding Saxons in the eastern Parts of Westphalia, have imagin'd they were a different People from those inhabiting on the Rhine. Just as if speaking of the Franks, I should make different Nations of those that conquered Gaul and those that settled in the Narbonnoise. However this be, it is certain when the Britons sent to desire their Assistance, the Saxons were in Possession of Westphalia, Saxony, East and West-Friseland, Holland and Zealand.

Stillington.
Orig. Brit.
Sheringham.
de Orig. Anglo.

Eyndius,
Chron. 26.

I could wish the Origin of the Saxons were as well known as their Conquests: it would be a Pleasure to give here an Abstract of their History to the Time of their settling in Great-Britain. But the thing is impossible, such Obscurity do we meet with in the Authors that have studied this Subject. Some take up the Saxons at the Tower of Babel, and leading them from Country to Country, settle them at last in Saxony, so called from them. Others derive them from the Sacæ or Saffones of Asia, mentioned by Pliny. There are who will have them to be originally from Persia, because of the Affinity between several Saxon and Persian Words (1). But they that are willing to spare the Pains of so laborious a Search, are content to begin their History from the time of their coming forth from the Cimbrian Chersonesus. It is not impossible, perhaps, to reconcile most of the Opinions concerning this Matter, tho' seemingly very different, if Regard be had to the Times of their several Migrations. But since, in the main, Conjectures only are to be had, it is better to proceed at once to what is more certain.

The Saxons had for some time been in possession of the Cimbrian Chersonesus, when driven thence by the Goths, (from whom that Peninsula was call'd Gothland or Jutland) they came and settled in Germany, in the Parts now called Lower-Saxony. Between that Country and the Chersonesus, were a People known by the Name of Angles, inhabiting about Slefwick in Holstein. Probably the little Country of Anglen in those Parts was so named from them,

Th. A. 26.

(1) Joseph Scaliger says, that Fader, Muder, Brader, Tackter, Band, and the like, are still used in the Persian Language, in the same Sense as Father, Mother, Brother, Daughter, Band, are with us.

or they from the Country (1). However this be, the Angles joining with the Saxons when they came out of the Gherfonesus to make Conquests in Germany, became in a manner but one Nation with them. Though, doubtless from the major Part, they were generally call'd Saxons, yet they had sometimes the compound Name of Anglo-Saxons given them. Great Numbers of Goths mix'd likewise with them to share in their Conquests. These are call'd Wites (2) by Bede, and commonly known by the Name of Jutes, or (which is the same) Goths. It can hardly be doubted that these three Nations were united before their coming into Britain, when we consider the good Understanding between them all the while they were employed in establishing themselves in the Island, as will be seen in the Course of this History. It will be found that they acted always in concert; that their Interests were never different, and that the Government settled by them, is a clear Evidence, they look'd upon themselves as one and the same People.

Etymology of the Name of the Saxons.

The true Etymology of the Name Saxon is as difficult to be discovered as their Origin. They that derive them from the Sacæ of Asia, are indeed at no great loss in this Point. But the most common Opinion is, that the Word Saxon comes from Seax, which in their Language signifies a kind of Weapon or Sword. They had two sorts, a long one worn by their Side or at their Back; and another shorter, serving for a Bayonet or Dagger. They were both in the Shape of a Cutlance (3).

Manners and Government of the Saxons.

Not to dwell too long upon Conjectures, I shall briefly speak of their Manners, Government and Religion. It suffices to observe, that in their Customs and Manners, they very much resemble the antient Germans, as described by Tacitus. They were naturally brave and warlike both by Land and Sea, witness their many Conquests. But to their Enemies they were severe and cruel, especially to their Prisoners of War, whom they sacrificed to their Gods.

Their Government.

Their Dominions were divided into twelve Governments or Provinces, each of which had a Chief or Head accountable to the General-Assembly of the Nation. In time of War they chose a General who commanded their Armies, and was invested with almost Sovereign Power: but at the End of the War, his Authority, like that of the Roman Dictator, ceased. The Center of their Empire was at Brunswick.

As for their Religion, it was the same with that of the other northern Nations, and some Part of Germany. The British Saxons embraced Christianity about the End of the sixth, or Beginning of the seventh Century. But those that remain'd in Germany were not converted 'till the ninth, by the Care or rather Violence of Charlemain, by whom they were subdued. Their principal Gods before their Conversion were the Sun, Moon, Tuisco, Woden, Thor, Friga or Fræa, and Seater. To these were consecrated the seven Days of the Week, as appears by the present names of these Days among the Germans, Flemings, and English. Tuisco is said to be the Grandson of Japhet, and to have peopled first the North of Europe. Teutch, as the Germans call themselves, is probably derived from Tuisco. The God Thor, from whence comes the Word Thunder or Dunder, was the same among the Saxons as Jupiter among the Romans, that is to say, the Thunderer. Woden was the God of War, because under his Conduct the first Saxons came forth from their Country, and made large Conquests. Their chief Families consider'd him as their Founder, and gloried in being descended from him. Probably however there were two of this Name, that are often confounded; one more antient, worshipped as a God, another not so old, from whom sprung the Families of the Saxon Leaders. There are still in England some Footsteps of the Name of Woden in Those of several Places, as Wansdike, Wansborough, &c. which are Contractions of Wodens-dike and Wodens-borough. Fræa the Wife of Woden was the Venus of the Saxons. She was worshipp'd in the Shape of an Hermaphrodite, as being Goddesses of both Sexes. Ermenfwol, the same as Mercury, was another of their Gods, with others common to them with all the northern Nations. This is the best and clearest Account I could meet with of the Saxons, whom the Britons, by Vortigern's Advice, call'd in to their Assistance.

THE

STATE of the BRITISH-CHURCH,

FROM

The Conversion of the BRITONS, to the Calling in of the SAXONS.

State of the Church.

AFTER Christianity was establish'd in the World, the Civil and Ecclesiastical Affairs of Kingdoms were so interwoven, that there was no knowing the one, without being acquainted with the other. It is necessary therefore to add to our History, a general Knowledge of the Progress of the Christian Religion in Great-Britain. I intend to do this from time to time, by short Abstracts, shewing the Situation of the Affairs of the Church in every Century, and withal their Relation to those of the State. But as I shall not have occasion to speak of the English Church before the Conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, it will not be improper to represent first the State of the British Church under the Romans.

Before the Birth of our Saviour, the Britons, like the rest of the World, the Jews only excepted, were Idolaters. They not only worshipp'd false Gods, but, if their own Historians are to be credited, had as many and as extravagant ones as the Egyptians themselves. Andate the Goddess of Victory, was one of their principal

The State of the British Church. Gildas, n. 2.

(1) This Country (Camden observes) reaching into the more inland parts of Germany, at so great a Distance from the Sea, we must seek some other Place where to seat our Angles; and Bede has directed us to look for them between the Saxons and Jutes. "The Angles (says he) come out of that Country, which is called Angulus, and is said from that time to lie waste, between the Countries of the Jutes and Saxons." Seeing between Jutland and Frisland (the ancient Seat of the Saxons) there is a small Province in the Kingdom of Denmark under the City of Flemburg call'd at this Day Angel, which Lindebergius in his Epistles terms Little-England. I am pretty well assured, says Camden, that I have found the ancient Seat of our Forefathers; and that from this very Place the Angles came into our Island. "Old Anglia, (says Ethelward an antient Author) is situated between the Saxons and Grets, the Capital Town whereof is call'd in Saxon, Sleswick, but by the Danes, Haitby." In the very same place, Petronius seems to seat the Saxons. So that the middle-age Poet is probably in the right.

—Saxonia protulit Anglos;
Hoc patet in lingua, niveoque colore—

Their Rise to Saxony the Angles owe
Their Language, this, and native Whiteness flows.

(2) So it is in the old Edition of Bede; but in Mr. Whelock's, instead of Vitis there is Jutis.

(3) This Etymology gave occasion to these Verses in Engelbustus, Quippe brevis gladius apud illos Saxa vocatur,

Unde sibi Saxo nomen traxisse putatur.

The Saxon People did, as most believe,
Their Names from Saxa, a short Sword, receive.

Camden approves of the Conjecture of those learned Germans, who imagine that the Saxons are descended from the Sacæ, the most considerable People of Asia, that they are so call'd, as if one should say, Sacajones, that is, Sons of the Sacæ; and that out of Scythia or Sarmatia Asatica, they came by little and little into Europe along with the Getes, the Suevi and the Daci, this in my Judgment (says Camden) deserves credit the best of any other. But his Annotator observes, This Original of the Saxons from the Sacæ of Asia may be thought too far fetch'd unless there were some fair historical Account, how the Saxons came to be propagated by those Sacæ, and no such Account being given, it may seem to be little more than a possibility. Nor may that other Original from the short Swords call'd Sacbs, seem altogether vain, when it is consider'd, that the Quirites had their Name from Quiris, a short Spear; and the Sieghians from Segeten, to shoot with a Bow. Tacitus also speaking of some of the Northern Germans, says, "That the common Badges they wear, are round Shields and short Swords;" and the Arms of Saxony to this Day, as Pontanus observes, are two short Swords a-crois. See Camd. Itin. l. p. CLVI.

Deities (1). They had also Gods, to whom they attributed the same Powers the Greeks and Romans did to their Apollo and Diana. But seeing the Druids, who had the sole Management of Religious Affairs, never committed any of their Mysteries to Writing, it is no wonder we know nothing more concerning their Worship and Ceremonies, than what has already been taken notice of in the Introduction.

Though it be difficult to know the precise time, yet all agree the Gospel was preached in Great-Britain soon after our Saviour's Death. But those who place this Event in the Reign of Tiberius, don't consider the first Gentile, Cornelius, was not converted till the year of our Lord 40. that is, three Years after the Death of that Emperor. Baronius, upon the questionable Authority of Simeon Metaphrastes (2), which he himself justly rejects on several other Occasions, says, St. Peter first preached to the Britons. This Opinion is the more improbable, because it is certain St. Peter performed the Office of an Apostle chiefly in the Eastern Countries. Others affirm, that Simon Zelotes, one of the twelve Apostles, undertook the Conversion of the Britons. Nicophorus Callistus (3), Dorotheus, in his Synopsis, and the Greek Calendar (4) say, this Apostle was crucified and buried in Britain. At the same time we find in the Roman Martyrology, and in those of Bede, Adm, and Ufuand, that St. Simon suffered Martyrdom in Perfia.

The most current Opinion for some time was, that Joseph of Arimathea first preached to the Britons. Tho' this Tradition, supported by the sole Testimony of William of Malmshury, a Writer of the XIIth Century, stands upon no better Foundation than those above-mentioned, it has however been deem'd incontestable. Malmshury, in proof of the Antiquity of the Church of Glaston or Glastenbury, says, after Freculphus, that upon the Martyrdom of St. Stephen, the Apostles were dispersed throughout the whole World. St. Philip, (continues the Historian) at his coming among the Franks, sent twelve of his Disciples, with Joseph of Arimathea as their Head, to propagate the Gospel in Great-Britain, where they arrived in the Year of our Lord 61. After some Opposition from the Inhabitants, a certain King gave them a little Spot of Ground, surrounded with Fens and Bushes to dwell in. Not long after, two other neighbouring Kings having allowed them twelve Hides of Land for their Subsistence, the Angel Gabriel commanded them from God, to build a Church in a Place now call'd Glaston, but at that time Insuitrin (5). This Church was finished in the Year 63, and as the Historian adds, was dedicated by our Saviour himself, as a Mark of Distinction, to the Virgin Mary. In proof of this Relation in the first Place, is produced a Manuscript Chronicle in the Abbey of Glastenbury, in which it appears that the King's Name, who made the first Present to Joseph, was Arviragus. To this may be answered that indeed Juvénal mentions a British King by that Name in the Reign of Domitian. But this is nothing to the purpose, unless it can be proved that Arviragus lived in the time of Nero, since it is supposed the Land the Church stood upon was given to Joseph in the Year 61. In the next place is alledged St. Patrick's Charter, wherein it is said, that Glaston Church was founded by twelve Disciples of St. James and St. Philip the Apostles. But besides several Marks of Forgery, there is no mention in this Charter of Joseph of Arimathea. In the third Place is produced a Charter of Ina King of the West-Saxons, who lived in the VIIIth Century, which makes the Church of Glaston the most antient of all the British Churches. But neither in this Charter, whose authenticity is still more questionable, is there any mention of Joseph. To strengthen all these Proofs, a Charter of Henry II, King of England is produced, wherein King Henry assures us, that upon Examination he found it well attested, that the Church of Glastenbury was founded by the Disciples of the Apostles, and consecrated to the Virgin Mary by Jesus Christ himself. But this Assertion of King Henry, being grounded only upon the foregoing Proofs, is not to be regarded. Moreover it is certain, that the Franks were unknown, at the time St. Philip is said to come into their Country. Besides, Eusebius and several others affirm, that this Apostle went and preached in Phrygia, and suffered Martyrdom at Hierapolis. Then for the Hydelands given to the Disciples of the Apostles, the Word Hyde alone is a sufficient Refutation of that Story, since it is a Saxon Term; and every one knows the Saxons came not to Britain till the Year 449. I think it needless to dwell any longer upon this Subject. Whoever has a Mind to see the Reasons more at large against this Tradition of Joseph of Arimathea, will find them in Collier's Ecclesiastical History.

Though the exact time of the Conversion of the Britons be uncertain, it is very probable the Gospel was preached in the Island not long after the Death of Christ. Theodoret assures us, the Britons were converted by the Apostles. Eusebius speaking of the Dangers the Apostles were exposed to in propagating the Gospel in the most remote Countries, mentions among the rest, the British Isles. Now the likeliest time to be assigned for the Conversion of the Britons, if it was in the Apostles Days, is that between the Victory of Claudius and the Defeat of Boadicea. For at the time of the General Revolt, there were in the Island above 80,000 Romans, among whom very probably were some Christians; the Gospel having now got footing in many places, particularly at Rome. Upon this Supposition, there is no Absurdity in asserting with several modern Authors, that St. Paul first preach'd the Gospel in Britain. It is certain this Apostle, in the eight Years between his first Imprisonment at Rome, and his Return to Jerusalem, propagated the Christian Religion in several Places, especially in the Western Countries. He informs us of his Design of going to Spain; and it is not unlikely but his Desire of converting the Britons might carry him into their Island. This Opinion may be supported by the Testimony of Venerabilis Fortunatus in his Poem upon the Life of St. Martin, where he speaks of the Travels of St. Paul (6). But after all, these are only Conjectures, and of no other use but to make it more credible that the Gospel was planted in Britain soon after the Death of our Lord.

But supposing this Opinion were proved beyond all Dispute, it may be presum'd the Christian Faith had taken no deep Root in the Island; since, according to several Authors, Lucius a British King, sent Ambassadors to Pope Eleutherius to desire him to send over some Missionaries to instruct him in the Christian Religion. Now is it likely that Lucius should send so far for what he might have had in his own Country, had there been at that time any Churches, or even any considerable number of Christians, in Britain? However this be, Lucius having some Knowledge of the Christian Religion, and desiring to be more fully instructed, sends Elwan and Medwin to Eleutherius the twelfth Bishop of Rome, to crave the wanted Assistance. Eleutherius very joyfully embraces the Opportunity of replanting Christianity in Great-Britain, where probably it had been rooted out by the Violence of Persecutions. He immediately sets about instructing Elwan and Medwin the two Ambassadors; and after baptizing and consecrating them Bishops, sends them back to their own Country. By their Means the Gospel flourished again in Britain, where it afterwards spread far and wide. I omit the many things that are said of this Lucius, particularly his building great Numbers of Churches in London, because it is not likely the Romans would suffer it. Neither shall I say any thing of his Travels, wherein he is said to convert several Nations, especially the Grisons, in whose Country he was martyred, there being no Grounds for these Things. It is possible however, some Christian named Lucius might preach the Gospel to the Grisons, and suffer Martyrdom at Coire.

From the Conversion of Lucius to the Dioclesian Persecution, the Ecclesiastical History of Britain is intirely unknown. It is very probable however, that during that Interval of eight Years, the Christian Religion made great Progress in the Island, as appears from Tertullian, Origen, Bede, and Gildas. But what puts the thing out of all dispute, is, the Multitude of British Martyrs that suffered during the dreadful Persecution under Dioclesian and Maximinian his Collegue. Among these Martyrs St. Alban converted at Verulam (7) by a Priest, whom he had harbored in his House, is reckon'd the first. He was followed by a great many more, as History informs us. How well inclined soever Constantius Chlorus might be to favour the Christians, he could not, whilst Governor of Britain, dispense with Edicts of the Emperors, having then the Title of Cesar only, which gave him no Power to oppose their Laws. But as soon as he came to the Empire, he put a stop to this violent Persecution, and gave the Christians some respite. Constantine his Son did yet more, for under him the Christian Religion flourish'd throughout the Roman Empire, particularly in Great-Britain, where some pretend he was born.

(1) She had a famous Temple at Camaldunum. Tyr. p. 24.

(2) A Writer of the Xth Century, is called from writing the Lives of the Saints. He was a Lay-man.

(3) A Greek Historian of the XIVth Century. He wrote an Ecclesiastical History, of which there is only extant to the Year 610.

(4) Or Martyrology.

(5) That is, in the British Language, The Town of Glaston. Glaston or Glaston-town means the same in English. Rapin.

(6) Transiit & Oceanum, vel quâ facit Insula Portum, Quisque Britannus habet terras, quaque ultima Thule. Rapin.

(7) Call'd afterwards from him St. Alban. Rapin.

Progress of the Christian Religion in Britain.
Spelman.
Conc. Vol. I.

Sulp. Sever.
Hist. Ec. l. 2.

The British falsely charged with.
Arianism.
Stillingfleet.

Pelagianism
in Britain.
Stillingfleet.
Orig. Brit.

Bede, l. 1.
c. 14.

Id. c. 27.

After this happy Change the Christians multiplied exceedingly, and the Island abounded with Churches. Some affirm there were British Bishops at the Council of Nice in 325. But though this cannot be sufficiently proved, it is not at all unlikely, since twenty two Years after there were for certain three British Bishops at the Council of Arles (1); as there were also some at the Council of Ariminum in 359, but so poor that their Charges were born by their Brethren (2). Their signing at this Council the Confession of Faith, wherein the Term Consubstantial was omitted, gave Occasion to some to imagine that Arianism was spread in Britain. But a modern Author has made it appear that the Faith of the British Church was the same in this Respect both before and after this Council, which had not the Effect the Hereticks promised themselves.

The British Church was much more justly accused of Pelagianism. Certain it is, several Bishops were seduced, not by Pelagius himself, who, though a Native of Britain, never returned to propagate his Errors, but by Agricola one of his Disciples. The Orthodox Bishops perceiving the Infection to spread, sent to desire their Brethren in Gaul to assist them in confuting this Heresy. The Gaulish Prelates touch'd with the Danger of the British Church, met in Council, and deputed Germanus Bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus Bishop of Troye to go and assist their Brethren in Britain. At Verulam, in a Conference with the Pelagians, they defended the Truth with such Strength and Evidence, that they turned many from their Errors. But after their Departure, the Hereticks gaining Ground again, Germanus was desired once more to come over. Though he was now very old, he undertook a second Voyage into Britain, in Company with Severus Bishop of Troye. Germanus despairing to convince the Hereticks by Arguments, because of their Obstinacy, caused the Edict of Valentinian III, that condemns all Hereticks to Banishment, to be put in Execution against them. Before he left Britain, he erected Schools, which produced afterwards many Bishops famous for their Learning and Piety.

From this time to the Arrival of the Saxons we know but little of the Affairs of the British Church. No doubt the frequent Wars with the Picts and Scots, by destroying their Churches, and what is worse, by introducing a Corruption of Manners among the Clergy as well as Laiety, were very prejudicial to the Christians. However, if we may believe Gildas and Bede, it was not so much the Wars as the excessive Plenty immediately after the Famine, that corrupted the Manners of the Britons. The People, say these Historians, from a State of extreme Want, being on a sudden surrounded with Plenty, abandoned themselves to all manner of Wickedness. The quiet they enjoyed by their Peace with the northern Nations, was spent only in sinking deeper into Excess and Debauchery. The Clergy outdoing even the Laiety, became exceeding vicious. Gluttony, Drunkenness, Avarice, Luxury, reigning among the Ecclesiasticks, they no longer preached to their Flocks the Precepts of the Gospel, which they themselves so little regarded. To this general Corruption, according to these two Historians, are to be ascribed the Calamities which fell upon the British Nation, and which are the Subject of the following Book.

Corruptions of the Bri-tons the Cause of their Miseries.

Gildas, n. 19.
Bede, l. 1.
c. 14.

(1) The Council of Arles was in 314, about twelve Years before the Council of Nice. The three Bishops are supposed to be Those of London, York, and probably Caerleon. They had with them a Priest and a Deacon.

(2) Du Pin says, the Bishops of France and Britain chose rather to bear their own Expences than accept of the Emperor's Allowance, which they thought was beneath them. But it is more likely they accepted of the Emperor's Allowance, since they were but poorly endow'd under the Roman Emperors. And this perhaps may be the Reason why we find so few of them at any of those Councils that were held beyond the Seas.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK II.

From the Arrival of the SAXONS to the Retreat of the BRITONS into Wales. Containing about the Space of a Hundred and Thirty Years.

The Britons
unadvisedly
call in the Saxons to their Aid.

LN a desperate Disease, a desperate Remedy is us'd without scruple, because the Benefit only is consider'd that may be receiv'd by it. The Britons, tho' frequent Sufferers by the Incurfions of the Saxons, fix'd their Thoughts solely on the Valour of that Nation, believing them alone capable of freeing them from their present Calamities. Had there been a Choice to make, perhaps they would have weigh'd the Inconveniences as well as Conveniences of calling in the Saxons to their Aid. But as they had no other Course to take, they never attended to what a just Fear might have suggested to them. Besides, Vortigern strove to divert them from the Considerations that might have induc'd them to alter their Resolution, by carefully displaying the Advantages that would be procur'd by the Assistance of the Saxons. By feeding their Hopes with his flattering Speeches, he prevented them from maturely reflecting on the Consequences of their Proceedings. Every Man therefore being wholly intent upon freeing himself from the present Evils, the Ambassadors were sent away in all haste, and the Negotiation strongly recommended to their Care, on the Success whereof entirely depended, as they imagin'd, the Safety of their Country. The Dominion of the Saxons reach'd then to the German Ocean, and their Conquests had been carried even into Zealand. Upon the Arrival of the British Ambassadors, Witigisl, General of the Saxons, having called an Assembly to hear what they had to propose, the Head of the Ambassy made the following Speech:

The Ambassadors are sent away.

The Speech to the Saxons.

"Illustrious and Generous Saxons, the Britons, harass'd and oppress'd by the continual Inroads of the Picts and Scots, their Neighbours and Enemies, sent us to you to implore your Assistance. The Fame of your Victories has reach'd our Ears. We are sensible your Arms are irresistible, and therefore are come to sue for your Protection. Britain for many Years made a considerable Part of the Roman Empire; but our Masters having abandon'd us, we know no Nation more powerful than "your selves, or better able to protect us. Grant but our Request, and in return we offer all that a rich and fertile Country, such as ours is, can afford. Put what Price you please on our Protection: We shall submit to what Terms you yourselves shall judge reasonable, provided by your Aid we are enabled to drive the Enemy out of our Country." (1)

The Britons having thus declared the Cause of their coming, the Saxon General return'd this short Answer; "Be assured the Saxons will stand by you in your pressing Necessities." So favorable an Answer inspiring the Ambassadors with hopes of Success in their Negotiation, they us'd their utmost Endeavours to bring it to a speedy Conclusion. At last they had the Satisfaction to obtain an Aid of nine thousand Men, on certain Terms, the principal whereof was, That the Saxons should be put in Possession of the Isle of Thanet, adjacent to Kent, where they were to land, and their Troops paid, and maintain'd by the Britons.

Britain was not unknown to the Saxons. They had long before begun to render themselves formidable to the Eastern Coasts of the Island, where they had even made several Descents. If they had not yet attempted any Conquests there, it was because Those they had undertaken on the Continent were thought to be of more Importance. It may be too, as they were hitherto ignorant of the Weakness of the Britons, they were afraid of engaging in any great Enterprize. However this be, the present Ambassy, at such a juncture, was extremely proper to raise a Desire to settle in their Country. The Britons were themselves the Discoverers of their Weakness. On the other Hand, the Saxons were now seated along the Coasts of the German Ocean, from whence they might always have an Eye to what pass'd in Britain. It is no wonder therefore, if without much Deliberation, they promis'd their Assistance to the Britons, since they intended to improve so fair an Opportunity of settling in the Island. Hengist and Horsa (2), both Sons of Witigisl, were appointed to command the Troops designed for the Aid of the Britons.

The Saxons
from the Pre-ject of settling
in Britain.
Geoff. Mon.
Malm.

Hengist and Horsa command the Saxon
Troops.

(1) Witigisl, a Saxon Historian, puts these Words in the Mouth of the British Ambassadors, and it can't be denied that they are very natural, considering the deplorable Condition of the Britons. Rapin. Witigisl liv'd in the IXth Century. The absolute Subjection in this Speech is thought to be more than the Britons promis'd, it not being mention'd by Bede or Ethelward, both Saxons. Their quarrelling with the Britons afterwards about their Pay, as Gildas expressly says, shows they came over as Mercenary Soldiers. See Note below from Geoffrey of Monmouth, p. 19.

(2) Hengist signifies a Stone-Hill; and Horsa a Horse. It was usual with the Saxons to give their Children the Names of Animals. Rapin. Hence calling us at this Day, the Name, Lamb, Swine, Fox, Beast, &c. The Romans had the same Customs, whence Catulus, Asinus, &c.

BRITANNIA SAXONICA

Hengist's
Character.
Verteg.

Hengist was about thirty Years old. He first bore Arms under his Father Witigisl; after which, for his Improvement in the Art of War, he went and served in the Roman Armies, where the Emperors generally kept some Saxon Troops in their Pay. This young Warrior was endow'd with all the necessary Qualifications for accomplishing the Undertaking committed to his Management. His Valour and Experience, the Solidity of his Judgment, his Address, his easy and engaging Behaviour, warranted in some Measure his Success. All these excellent Qualities determined the Saxon General to procure for his Son so fair an occasion to display his Talents. As for his Brother Horfa, nothing particular is said of him.

The Saxons, notwithstanding their Promise, did not think proper to send over at once so considerable a Body of Forces as nine Thousand Men, into a Country but imperfectly known to them. Wherefore, pretending the rest were not ready by reason of their great Distancing from the Place of Imbarkation, they caused only a Part to be put on board three Vessels (1). The very Name of these Vessels plainly enough demonstrates they could hold but a very inconsiderable Number (2). The Historians have not expressly marked the Place of this first Imbarkation. It may very probably be conjectured to have been in Zealand, as that Country was then in the Possession of the Saxons. Besides it would have been difficult to chuse a more convenient Place, or one nearer the Isle of Thanet, where these Forces were to land.

Vortigern, having his own, much more than the Nation's Interest at Heart, was highly delighted with the Success of his Embassy. He was not ignorant how his Subjects stood affected towards him. And this no less than the Desire of repulsing the common Enemy had moved him to sue for the Assistance of the Saxons, flattering himself that he should easily engage these Foreigners to grant him a particular Protection. With this View and Expectation he goes to the Sea-side, and waits their coming, to prepossess them in his Favour, by his Civility and Respect.

Mean while Hengist and Horfa setting sail, arrive at Ebbsfleet in the Isle of Thanet. These first Saxon Troops are said by most Historians to land in the Year 449, though by some this Event is placed a few Years sooner or later. Vortigern receives his new Friends with extraordinary Carresses, putting them immediately in possession of the Isle according to Agreement. When they had refreshed themselves a little, he led them against the Picts and Scots that were advanced as far as Stamford in Lincolnshire. In the first Battle, the Islanders according to Custom, began with throwing their Darts, which made but little Impression on warlike Troops that despised that way of fighting. The Saxons having stood this first Charge without the least Motion, advanced in good Order, and coming to close fight, quickly routed Enemies already terrified by their very Looks. The northern Men frightened at the Sight of these Foreigners, and forc'd to engage in a different Manner from what they were used to, made but a faint Resistance, and soon left their new Enemies in possession of the Field of Battle. Their future Attempts had no better Success, and in all their Encounters with the Saxons, they were continually worsted. Being quite discouraged by these frequent Defeats, they abandon their Conquests by degrees, and retire into their own Country, dreading nothing so much as engaging with the Saxons.

Vortigern was overjoyed to see his Projects succeed thus far so happily. But his main Point, the winning the Saxons to his particular Interest, was yet unexecuted. To that end, he presents the two Saxon Brothers with some Lands in Lincolnshire, where they gave the Enemies the first repulse (3). But if Vortigern was pursuing his Ends, Hengist was no less mindful of his own Interest. The Moment he perceives the Weakness of the Britons, he entertains Hopes of procuring a Settlement in Britain, and begins to lay his Measures accordingly. But he must proceed by degrees, and find means to execute his Design, without discovering his Intentions. The Lands given him by Vortigern, furnish him with an Opportunity to cause the Britons to fall into the Snare he intends to lay for them. He represents to the King, that the Service he was doing the Britons in the North, keeping him at a Distance from the Isle of Thanet, he had no place to secure the Booty taken from the Enemies, and therefore had reason to fear that whilst he was employed in the northern Wars, he might be deprived of the Fruits of his Labours. For this Cause, he desires leave to build a little Fort somewhere on the Lands lately given him. Vortigern, who sought all Occasions to please him, readily complies with his Request. If Hengist builds a Thong-caster. most of the Historians may be credited, he only desired to wall in as much Land as an Ox-hide could furround, which being granted, he cut the Hide into small Thongs, and enclosing with them a Space large enough for his purpose, hastily ran up a Fort, before the Britons had time to oppose it. This Circumstance seems to be confirmed by the Name of the Fort it self, Thong-caster (4), that is, the Castle of Thongs (5). It may indeed be objected, that the Name of this Castle gave occasion to apply it to the Story Justin relates of Dido when going to build Carthage. But Justin, 1. 18. on the other hand, Hengist whilst he served in the Roman Armies, might, very possibly, be informed of this Artifice of Dido's, and practise it in Britain.

The Britons seeing a Castle built in the Heart of their Country, begin to murmur against their King, and suspect him of secretly favoring the Saxons. These Murmurs gave Hengist Opportunity, who had now divid'd into Vortigern's private Intentions, to make an Advantage of that Prince's Circumstances. He represents to him, "That the Britons are grown so insolent since their Deliverance from their Enemies, that they only wait an Opportunity to rob him of his Crown, and give it to another." "That this Intimation, coming from good Hands, ought to make him sensible that the Rebellion of his Subjects is no less to be feared, than the Invasion of the Picts and Scots; and therefore advises him to secure himself from the approaching Storm, by sending for more Saxons, and strengthening himself with their Aid against the ill Practices of his Subjects. The rest of the Saxons, (continues he,) design'd for the Assistance of Britain, are all ready, and only wait your Orders." Vortigern gladly embraces this Advice, which suits so well with his Projects. Instead of raising Objections, he himself presses the Saxon General to execute a Design which to him seems so advantageous. Hengist having thus obtain'd Vortigern's Consent, desires his Father Witigisl to send over the rest of the Forces out of Hand. He acquaints him with the Fruitfulness of the Country, and Effeminacy of the Inhabitants, assuring him, if the Saxons wisely improved this Opportunity, they might hope for a Settlement in Britain, no less advantageous and glorious than what they enjoy'd in Germany. Witigisl, who had great Expectations from his Son's Expedition, sends the desired Supplies without Delay. He equips sixteen large Vessels to transport the Forces, and with them sends Efcus and Rowena, eldest Son and Niece (6) of Hengist. This second Body of Saxons arriv'd in Britain in 450, about a Year after the first.

As soon as the British Monarch and the Saxon General saw themselves thus strengthen'd, they behav'd in a very different Manner to the Britons from what they had done before. Vortigern grown more powerful, renders himself more absolute. He treats his Subjects with great Haughtiness, and thereby more strongly confirms their Suspicions of him. He even makes no scruple to assign Habitations for the New-comers, without ever advising with his Subjects. From that time a strict Union is form'd between Vortigern and Hengist. They had need of each other for their mutual Defence against the Britons, who publicly express'd their Discontent.

Mean while, Hengist forgot nothing that could promote his Designs. Above all, he studies to know the Humor and Character of Vortigern, and easily perceives Love and Pleasure to be his predominant Passion. Accordingly he lays a Snare, which he thinks, the Monarch can hardly escape falling into. Having express'd on several Occasions, his Acknowledgments for the many Favors received at his Hands, he intreats him to honour him with his Company at Thong-caster, where he earnestly desires to entertain him, and shew him some Marks of his Respect and Gratitude. Vortigern readily accepts of this Invitation, considering it as a fresh Means to strengthen the Friendship contracted with the Heads of the Saxons, and which is so expedient for him. Hengist receives him with all the Respect due to a great King, his Friend and Benefactor. A splendid and exquisite Entertainment is prepared for him, but nothing pleases the Royal Guest so much as the young Rowena, the

The Britons
complain of Vortigern's

Hengist offers him Assistance.
Nenn. c. 37.

Vortigern accepts it.

Hengist instills a Desire into the Saxons to settle in Britain.
Malm. l. 1.

Arrival of a fresh Body of Saxons, with Efcus and Rowena.
450.
Malm.

Vortigern and Hengist behave haughtily to the Britons.
Flor. Wig.

Hengist lays a Snare for Vortigern.
Malm.

He invites him to Thong-caster.

Vortigern agrees to it.

Eyndius
Chron. Zel.

449.
The Saxons arrive in Britain.
Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.
p. 39.

First Battle between the Saxons and northern People.

Malm. l. 1.

Vortigern gives Hengist some Lands near Lincoln.
Nenn.
G. Monm.
l. 3. c. 2.
Lough.
Chron. Reg.

(1) Geoffrey of Monmouth says, these three Ships, full of armed Men, happen'd to come to Kent by chance, and that the Generals Hengist and Horfa being brought before Vortigern, he retained them and their Troop in his Service, l. 6. c. 10.

(2) They are call'd by the Historians in Latin, Crales; in Danish, Iols; in English, Kelds. Rapin. It is said in Camden. p. cxxii. that Krales was a general Name for their Ships. — Cydis, nostra lingua, longis navibus. — Gild. p. 7. Malm. p. 8. Bede, l. 1. c. 15. It must be noted, that ce, ci, in Saxon, is pronounced like ke, ki.

(3) Some say these Lands were in Kent. But Geoffrey of Monmouth affirms, they were in Landesia Regione, or rather Lindesia in Lindsey. Londum is Latin for London, Geoff. Mon. l. 6. c. 11. Rapin by mistake quotes Nennius.

(4) Acceptum flum factu de nomine Thorum

Thurmo quantum poterat circumdare tecto.

Epit. of the Hist. of Eng. in Latin Verse. Rapin.

(5) Caster, (in Saxon Thung-caster, in Welsh Cuer-Egwy, both signifying the same Thing,) lies about six Miles from Grimsby in Lincolnshire.

(6) Ulfar, it seems, is the only one who affirms she was Hengist's Niece. See Speed p. 283. But Makysburg, p. 9. Matt. Westm. p. 156. Hanting, p. 310. Geoff. Monm. l. 6. c. 12. all agree in saying she was Hengist's Daughter.

and falls in Love with Rowena.

Geoff. Mon.
l. 6. c. 12.

He demands her in Marriage.

Hengist
starts Difficulties.

Vortigern finds means to remove them all.

He promises
Hengist the Province of Kent.

Whereupon the Marriage is concluded, and Hengist takes Possession.
Nenn.
Geoff. Mon.
l. 3. c. 1.

The Britons
murmur against Vortigern.

Hengist
forms new Projects.
G. Mon. l. 4.
Malm.

greatest Beauty of her time. Hengist her Uncle, under colour of doing Honor to Vortigern, but in reality that he might, during the Feast, feed his Eyes with so lovely an Object, ordered her to place herself just before the King. The Contrivance succeeded as Hengist expected. Vortigern keeps his Eyes continually fix'd on Rowena, who by her Looks gives him to understand, she is not insensible of the Honor he does her. Hengist perceiving with Joy the sudden Effect of Rowena's Charms on the King, is unwilling to give his growing Passion time to cool. He makes a Sign to his Niece, who immediately going to the Side-Board, fills a Gold Cup with Wine, and presents it on her Knees to the King, saying in her Language, Liever Kyning, waß heil, that is, Lord King, your Health. Vortigern agreeably surprized, turns to his Interpreter and asks what she said, and how he must answer her after the Saxon manner. Being informed, he looks very amorously on Rowena, and answers in Saxon; Drinck Heil, that is, Do you your self drink the Health. Whereupon, Rowena just putting the Cup to her Lips, presents it to the King, who taking it, rises up immediately and gives her a Salute. Rowena receives it in a very respectful manner, as sensible of the great Honour done her, and making a profound Reverence, withdraws, leaving the Monarch full of Love and Desire. This may be called a very fatal Moment for Britain, as will be seen hereafter. So true it is, the greatest Events spring sometimes from Things that appear at first of very little Consequence.

From that time Vortigern's Thoughts are wholly employed how to secure the Possession of Rowena. Tho' he has a Wife, his Passion causing him to overlook all Obstacles, he demands her in Marriage. But Hengist, willing by Difficulties to inflame the King's Desires, answers, he cannot, contrary to the Custom of the Saxons, give his Niece to a Prince already married, adding, Rowena was not entirely in his disposal; and the Princes of his Nation, and particularly his Father, would not perhaps ever consent she should be married to a Christian Prince, how honorable soever the Alliance might be. But the amorous Vortigern, who burns with excessive Desire to enjoy Rowena, finds Expedients to overcome all these Difficulties. He begins with divorcing his Wife, by whom he had several Children. Then he promises Rowena the free Exercise of her Religion, and to stop the Mouths of the Saxon Princes, whose Reproaches Hengist seems to fear, devises an Expedient, (or perhaps it is suggested to him) by which, as he imagines, he may reconcile Love and Policy. And this was to invest Hengist and Horfa with the Sovereignty of Kent, and give them leave to people it with Saxons. The Moment he came to this Resolution, all Obstacles began to vanish, and the politick Saxon, who had seem'd backward only to make the better Bargain, thought it time to give his Consent. He delivers therefore his Niece to the amorous Monarch, and takes Possession of Kent, magnifying this Proof of his Respect and Gratitude, as if the King were highly obliged to him. Vortigern was so blinded by his Passion, that he thought himself a great Gainer by the Exchange (1). This Agreement was made so privately, that Gorogus (2), Prince or Governor of Kent, was dispossessed before he could take any Measures to oppose it. So impatient was Vortigern to conclude this fatal Bargain! In vain did the Britons murmur against this Marriage, and complain of the King's Bounty. Hengist, regardless of their Murmurs, strengthened himself as much as possible in his new Sovereignty, considering withal of fresh means to aggrandize himself. But before he discovered his Intention, he wanted to be out of danger from the Britons, who plainly shewed how they stood affected towards him. Ever since it was known he intended to settle in the Island they could no longer rely on him, or rather, look'd upon him as a professed Enemy.

Whilst the Britons were venting their fruitless Complaints against their Monarch and the Saxons, Hengist was seriously thinking of his Concerns. Tho' he had a good Body of Troops under his Command, that was not sufficient to enable him to execute his vast Projects. He thought it proper therefore to conceal them till he was in condition to declare his Intentions. The Situation Vortigern was in, made him hope it was not impossible to make that Prince subservient to his Designs, whilst he should imagine he was labouring only for himself. To that end, he pretended to be more attach'd than ever to his Person and Interest, and endeavoured by sundry means to persuade him he was entirely devoted to his Service. His Aim was to induce him gradually by these Marks of Affection, to be wholly guided by his Counsels. When he thought he had sufficiently gain'd his Confidence, he represented to him, "That his Subjects were displeased

"vorable Opportunity to execute the ill Designs they had form'd: That an Opportunity would infallibly offer when the Saxon Troops should be employed in the northern Wars; and then being destitute of the Assistance of his Friends, he would be in danger of being expos'd to the Insults of those that hated him: That he thought himself obliged to acquaint him, his Subjects held Intelligence with Ambrosius Aurelianus, who was at the Court of Aldroen King of Armorica, and probably had conspired to set that Prince on the Throne." There was some ground for Hengist's thus artfully hinting the Danger Vortigern was in from Ambrosius. That Prince was of Roman Extraction, and according to the general Opinion, Son of one of the Monarchs elected by the Britons after the Departure of the Romans (3). As he was very young when his Father died, his Youth screened him from the Jealousy of those that ascended the Throne immediately or shortly after. But it was otherwise when Vortigern came to the Crown. A strong Party being form'd in favor of Ambrosius, the new Monarch was so filled with Suspicions, that he sought means to destroy the young Prince. The Danger Ambrosius was expos'd to obliging him to quit Britain, he retired to Aldroen his Relation, where he was waiting for a favorable opportunity to come and head his Party. This being the Case between Vortigern and Ambrosius, what the Saxon Prince said could not but make deep Impression on his Mind.

By these continual Marks of a seemingly disinterested Friendship, Hengist led the British Monarch by degrees to seek of his own accord, the means he design'd to furnish him with, namely, the sending for a greater Number of Saxon Troops. His Aim was to put himself in condition to have nothing to fear from the Britons, and withal to be independent of the King; which he could not attain to but by the means he intended. Vortigern, despairing ever to regain the Affection of his Subjects, and considering Ambrosius, tho' absent, as a very dangerous Rival, saw his whole Refuge lay in the Saxon Prince, whom he deemed his best Friend, and accordingly to him it was he applied for Advice and Assistance. Hengist tells him, "All the Saxons in Britain are at his Devotion, but their Number is too inconsiderable to protect him." Adding, "The Britons, in all likelihood, will not fail to shew their Discontent, whilst the Saxons are in the North, and therefore he sees but one way to secure the King from their Plots, which is, to send for more Saxons to be commanded by trusty Leaders, who will implicitly follow his Orders." This Advice being agreeable to Vortigern's Intentions, he immediately clothes with it. Hengist promises to send the new Troops into the North, against the Picts and Scots, whilst he stays himself in Kent to have an Eye upon the Male-contents. This Precaution seem'd very proper to prevent the Insurrection of the Britons, who by that means would be hemm'd in by the Saxon Forces.

Hengist having obtained the King's Consent, sent for a Fleet of forty Ships, conducted by Offa his Brother, who brought with him his Son Ebusa, and a great Number of Saxon Troops. These New-Comers begin with ravishing the Orcaides, then making a Descent on the Coasts of the Picts, oblige the Inhabitants to retire Northwards. As soon as the Picts had thus deserted part of their Country, the Saxons seated themselves there so strongly, that it was not possible to dispossess them. At first they settled on the North-side of the Tine towards the East. Afterwards they advanc'd towards the South, and drove the Britons beyond the Humber; but this was done by degrees. This third Body of Saxons arriv'd in 452, three Years after the First. With these fresh Supplies, Hengist found himself strong enough to be in no great fear of any Attempt from the Britons: Nay, he began to shew less Respect for Vortigern, and under colour of wanting frequent Recruits to keep up the Number of his Forces, sent for continual Supplies from Germany without asking his Leave. At length he throws away the Mask, and making bitter Complaints that the Saxons were not duly paid according to Agreement, boldly demands the Arrears, threatening, without prompt and full payment, to do himself Justice.

The Britons, surprized at these Menaces, and greatly mortified to see Hengist in a condition to do as he proudly threatened, began to rouse themselves, and think of means to free themselves from these Foreigners. Vortimer, eldest Son of Vortigern, had beheld hitherto with extreme Regret, how the Saxons, by his Father's Fault, strengthened themselves daily, and had very much dreaded the Consequences thereof. As soon as he saw the Britons in Emotion, he improv'd the Opportunity, and represented to the leading Men that it was time to apply an effectual Remedy to the Evils they lay under. He told them, his Father's Cowardice, or perhaps Treachery, had been the Occasion of the Saxons

Ambrosius,
not to be war-
st. Lingheet.
Orig. p. 319d
Gild. p. 9.

Brit. Hist.
l. 3. c. 1.

452.
Offa and Ebusa come and settle in the North with Saxon Troops.
Nenn.
Geoff. Mon.
Cam.

Gild. Bede,
l. 1. c. 15.

453.
Vortimer encourages the Britons to drive out
the Saxons.
Malm. l. 1.
c. 1.

(1) This Story of Rowena is the less authentick, for not being mentioned by Bede or Gildas, and related by Nennius as a Report only.
(2) Gandon takes Gorogus to be the Name of an Office or Employment. See Langbain, Cleric. Reg. Angl. Rapin.
(3) He is said by several to be Son of Constantine, beheaded by Honorius.

becoming so powerful; that it was necessary therefore to prevent Vortigern from heaping any more Favours on these Foreigners, to the Prejudice of the British Nation, which was in danger of being over-run, if Measures were not taken to put a Stop to their growing Power. The Britons, convinc'd by these Reasons, awak'd at last out of their Lethargy, and by Vortimer's Instigations, the most powerful of them having entered into a private Confederacy, of which Vortigern had not the least Notice, suddenly compell'd him to make his Son Partner with him in the Government, and to leave the Administration of Affairs to his Care. The Plot was so well laid, that in an Instant Vortigern saw himself without either Fortrefs, or Troops, or Credit, and constrain'd to do whatever was desir'd, he not having time to call the Saxons to his Aid. As he had not mistrusted his own Son, he had taken no care to guard against him. Thus Vortimer was invested with the whole royal Authority, leaving his Father only the empty Title of King without any Power (1).

The new Monarch found no great Difficulty to persuade the Britons, that nothing but Force could drive the Saxons out of their Country. It was but too plain, from their Proceedings, that they did not design to go away voluntarily. The War therefore being resolv'd, the Britons made Preparations to rid themselves of their Guests, whom they look'd upon as their mortal Enemies. Hengist, for his part, finding he was like to have a fierce War upon his Hands, made haste and concluded a Peace with the Picts, who were proud of having for Allies Men so formidable for their Arms. This Precaution enabled him to make a powerful Diversion in the North by the Help of the Picts, assisted by the Saxons lately settled in those Parts. As for Kent, Hengist look'd upon himself to be strong enough there to make head against Vortimer, who was preparing to attack him.

I am now going to enter upon the Recital of a War, which, after numberless Engagements, render'd the Saxons Masters of Britain. An Event so remote from the Expectations of the Britons when they sent for the Saxons to assist them, affords Matter of Wonder and Admiration at the Short-sightedness of Men, and the Uncertainty of their Counsels! But before I relate the Issue of this War, it will be proper to acquaint the Reader that he is not to expect a full and particular Account of Matters. Historians have been contented with relating some certain Facts, which just serve to carry on the Thread of the History, but hardly give us a general Idea of that Revolution which peopled Britain with new Inhabitants, and introduced a new Face of Things over the whole Island.

The Britons and Saxons being prepared for War were not long before they came to an Engagement. In the first Campaign, the two Armies met at Eglesford (2) in Kent, the Saxons being commanded by Hengist and Horfa, and the Britons by Vortimer. The first Battle, according to the Historians, was very bloody. Hengist lost Horfa, (3) his Brother, and with his own Hand slew Catigern (4), youngest Brother of Vortimer. If we may believe the British Historians, Vortimer not only obtain'd a complete Victory over the Saxons, but driving Hengist as far as the Isle of Thanet, compell'd him to embark and fly into Germany. But by what follow'd after this Battle, it is evident, if the Saxons were not victorious, at least they were not vanquish'd (5), since all their Historians unanimously affirm, that this very Year 455, immediately after the Battle, Hengist first took upon him the Title of King of Kent, which doubtless he would not have done, had he been defeated and obliged to fly into Germany.

One must not be surpris'd to find so great Contrariety among the Historians concerning Events so remote from our Time; when even the Authors that write of what has pass'd in our Days, very rarely agree in Facts, which by their late Date, might easily be known.

Two Years after, another Battle was fought near Crecaford (6) in Kent, wherein Vortimer was entirely defeated with the Loss of more than 4000 Men and his best Officers. Not being able to keep the Field, he was forced to shut himself up in London, till he could draw another Army together. In the mean while Hengist, to strike the greater Terror into the Britons, ravaged the Country in a merciless manner. They that were most expos'd to the Fury of the Saxons, quitted their Houses, and fled to the Woods for Refuge. Some abandon'd their Country, and retir'd into Armorica, where they were civilly receiv'd by King Aldroen. During these Devastations, the very Churches were not spared, but all that were in the Neighbourhood of the Saxons were reduc'd to Ashes. These barbarous Pagans, joining to their natural Fierceness a Religious Zeal, thought they honoured their Gods, by inhumanly treating the Christians, especially the Ecclesiastics, who were most cruelly dealt with.

The Britons being reduc'd to this Extremity, their Chiefs assembled themselves to consider of Means to prevent their total Ruin. Guithelin, Archbishop of London, and Head of Ambrosius's Party, advis'd them to apply to the King of Armorica for Assistance. He represented to them, "That as Aldroen had always shewn great civilities to the Britons, there was Room to hope he would not abandon them in this their pressing Necessity." Adding, "that since Vortigern and Vortimer were no longer to be depended upon, he thought it necessary to invite over Ambrosius Aurelianus, who being sprung from Illustrious Ancestors, and having all the Qualifications to be desir'd in a General, would, in all Probability, by his Valour and Conduct, free them from their present Danger." As they had always hated Vortigern, and, since his last Defeat, were dissatisfied with Vortimer, the common, though unjust Fate of vanquish'd Generals, they readily embrac'd the Archbishop's Advice, and desir'd him to go himself and negotiate the Affair; which he gladly undertook, as enabling him to accomplish a Design he had long been forming. He sets out immediately for Armorica, and laying before Aldroen the deplorable Condition of the Britons, obtain'd with ease the Aid he demanded. Aldroen, who had so generously receiv'd all the fugitive Britons, was willing to give the Nation a farther Proof of his Friendship, by granting them an Aid of Ten thousand Men. He plac'd Ambrosius at their Head, who conducted them safely to Totness. This General was receiv'd with great Demonstrations of Joy, being look'd upon as the only Support of the sinking Britons. But this Joy was not universal: Vortimer's Party, still powerful, consider'd Ambrosius as one come to usurp the Crown, under colour of defending it. And Vortimer himself threatned to punish severely those that should join him. Thus the miserable Britons, always a Prey to their intestine Divisions, instead of uniting against the common Enemy, prepared to destroy one another.

Mean while, Ambrosius and Guithelin perceiving the Conjunction to be favorable, conspir'd the Ruin of Vortigern and Vortimer. They began with representing to their Party, "that vain were the Hopes of driving out the Saxons, under the Conduct of these two Kings, the Son being a Prince without Courage or Experience, and the Father an Enemy to the Nation, as appear'd by his strict Union with the Enemies of the State; not to mention his excessive Liberalities, which oblig'd his Subjects to take the Administration out of his Hands. That in vain therefore were their Preparations to drive out the Foreigners, if these two domestick Enemies were not first destroy'd, who were in Arms only to favour and assist them." On the other hand, Vortigern and Vortimer told their Friends, "that Ambrosius, under pretence of assisting, was come to subdue them: That the Archbishop was an ambitious Man, who sought to put the Crown on the Head of Ambrosius, only to get the Administration of the Government into his own Hands, than which, such was his Arrogance, nothing should more be dreaded by the Britons: That they must wilfully shut their Eyes not to see, that the Designs of these two Heads of their Party, were directly opposite to the Good of the Kingdom: That instead of marching their fresh Troops against the Saxons, they had done nothing since their Arrival, but caball'd with the People, and taken Measures to oppress those who were in Arms for the Defence of their Country.

The mutual Animosity of the two Parties was so violent, that they soon came to Blows, each preferring his private to the public Interest. The first Battle was fought near Catwaloph (7) in Carmarthenshire. As it is difficult from the confus'd Accounts of Historians, to know on which side Victory inclin'd in this and several other Engagements, I shall only observe that the civil Wars lasted till the Year 465, to the great weakening of the Britons, whilst the Saxons had time to strengthen themselves both in Kent and beyond the Humber. To so wretched a State were the Britons at last reduc'd, that numbers of them, harra's'd one while by the Civil War, another while by the Saxons, abandon'd their native Country, where they could no longer subsist.

A Dutch Writer informs us, that some of those unfortunate Wretches going on board of a Galley, and rowing toward the mouth of the Rhine, landed at Catwick near Leyden, where they settled by the Sea-side in an old Roman Camp, to which they gave the Name of Brittenburge.

Thus Britain for seven or eight Years suffer'd all the Calamities of a Civil War. At length the wisest of both Parties, considering their Dissention would be the Cause of their common Ruin, made up the Breach by parting the Kingdom between the contending Princes. The two British Kings had the Eastern, and Ambrosius the Western Part, divided from 454.

Vortigern is compell'd to effaciate his Son.

The War against the Saxons resulted upon.

455.
The Battle of Eglesford.
After Me-
nev. Gab.
Aethelwendus. Flor.
Wigorn.
Annal. Sax.
Ranu ph.
Ceiti. Poly-
chron.
G. Malmib.
l. 1. c. 1.

Hengist
takes the Title of King of Kent.
Bede.
Ann. Sax.

457.
The Battle of Crecaford.
Gildas.
Bede, l. 1.
Hen. Hun-tingd. l. 2.
Sax. Ann.

The Britons desire the Assistance of the King of Armorica, by the Advice of Guithelin Archbishop of London.
G. Monm.
Hist. l. 6.

458.
Ambrosius
lands with 10,000 Men.
G. Monm.

Ambrosius
and Guithelin conspire
the Ruin of the two British Kings.

They accuse
Ambrosius
of aspiring to the Crown.

Civil Wars
among the Britons.

458.
Battle of Catwaloph.
Bede, l. 1.
c. 22.
Hunting-
l. 2.

A Band of Britons flee into Holland.
Joh. Leyden.

465.
The End of the Civil Wars.
Nennius.

(1) All Historians agree not in this Point. Some will have it that he voluntarily made his Son Partner with him. Rapin.

(2) Now Aylesford.

(3) He was buried at Ilsted, so call'd from him.

(4) He was buried near Aylesford, where four great Stones stand end-end, with others across them, like Stone-enge. Camden.

(5) R. Huden expressly says, that Hengist got the Victory, p. 223.

(6) Now Crayford, from the River Creca now Crece. See Camden. Rapin.

(7) Perhaps the Town now call'd Kydavilly; Lat. Catguilia. Lambard's Dr. Topogr.

N. 2. V O L. I.

one another by the Roman High-way, called afterwards Watling street (1). From hence may be dated the beginning of the Reign of Ambrosius.

The Saxons, upon the Union of the two Parties, join'd their Forces also. In the first Engagement, Hengist lost Wipped, one of his principal Officers, from whom the Field of Battle was called Wipped's-Fleet (2). Here the British and Saxon Historians, according to Custom, give us contradictory Accounts. The last say, their Countrymen obtained that Day a signal Victory. Whereas the others affirm, that Vortimer, who commanded the Army, routed the Saxons, and compelled Hengist a second time to fly into Germany. But it appears by what followed, that the Advantage was on the Side of the Saxons. I will even venture to say, contrary to the Opinion of some noted Historians, that in all likelihood Hengist never returned to Germany. Not so much as one Author marks either the Time or Place of his second Landing, tho' they were no less necessary to be observ'd than Those of his first.

In this War it was, that the famous Arthur, at fourteen Years of Age, made his first Appearance in the British Armies, under Ambrosius. His Inclination for War made him take upon him betimes the Profession of a Soldier, which he never quitted during his Life. He succeeded Gorlous his Father in the Kingdom of Danmonium (3) in 467. He was no sooner on the Throne, but he had a War to maintain against Howel King of Areclute (4), in the Neighbourhood of Scotland. This Prince is said, out of Envy to the Glory Arthur had acquired, to enter into an Alliance against him with the Saxons in the North. But instead of lessening his Reputation, he served to increase it considerably. Arthur beating him back to the Isle of Mona, gave him Battle, and slew him with his own Hand. He gain'd this Victory in 470, being then about eighteen Years old. We shall see him hereafter signalizing himself by Actions more glorious, as well as more beneficial to his Country.

The War continuing between the two Nations, a Battle lost by the Britons in 473, put their Affairs in extreme Disorder, and gave the Saxon Prince Opportunity of enlarging his Territories. At length Vortimer, the principal Promoter of the War, died in 475, poisoned, as some say, by Rowena his Mother-in-law, thro' the Suggestion of Hengist (5). The British Historians would fain make, at any rate, a Hero of Vortimer, by attributing to him many signal Victories over the Saxons. But the Growth of these last in Power and Dominion, notwithstanding their pretended Defeats, is a clear Evidence, that the Advantages of Vortimer were neither considerable, nor even real. His Death brought some Quiet to Britain, if a deceitful Calm, that prov'd the Ruin of the Britons, may be so call'd.

After a Twenty Years War, both Sides began to shew an Inclination for Peace, which Vortimer had always strenuously oppos'd, fearing when the War was over with the Saxons, he should be oblig'd to begin another with Ambrosius, who had the Hearts of the People, and could hardly bear to see Vortigern, and his Son on the Throne, though deprived of half their Dominions. The Peace was concluded, on condition each Party should keep what he possess'd. Hengist, who had entertain'd Hopes of conquering all Britain, was not a little concern'd to find himself so much disappointed. He comforted himself however with the Thoughts of doing by Policy, what he could not effect by Force.

When we reflect on the Weakness and Dispiritedness of the Britons before the Arrival of Hengist, it must be surprizing to see them able to stand against the Saxons in the first War, which lasted so long. Those very Britons, who after the Departure of the Romans, scarce dared to look the Picts and Scots in the Face, successfully defended themselves against both Saxons and Picts: Nay, they even frequently ventur'd to attack the Saxons in the Height of their Strength, and put them in fear of losing the Country of Kent, delivered to them by Vortigern. And if they could not wrest it from them, at least they prevented them from enlarging their Conquests. A long War teaches at length the most unwarlike Nation the Use of Arms, and very often enables them to repair in the End the Losses they sustain'd in the Beginning.

Had the Saxons invaded Britain at first with a numerous Army, in all Appearance they would have conquered the Whole in a very little Time. But sending over only a small Number of Supplies, they spun the War out to a great Length, and by that Means taught the Britons a Trade, which the Romans had done all they could to make them forget. Of This, there have been many other Instances. It may be said perhaps, that whilst they defended themselves in the South, they lost Ground in the North. But it must be considered, the Country beyond the Humber was lost to them, before the Coming of Hengist, and that the Saxons took it from the Picts and Scots, and not from the Britons. We are ignorant of what Oeta and Ebuja did during this long War. It is to be supposed they assisted Hengist by frequent Diversions, and even sent him Supplies by Sea, which they could not do by Land, because of marching through the Enemy's Country.

Hengist, After all his Hopes of becoming Master of Britain, saw himself with extreme Regret reduc'd to the Kingdom of Kent. He had acquainted the Saxon Princes in Germany, that, provided they sent him Supplies, he could easily procure them a lasting Settlement in the Island. And yet after twenty Years War, he found there was but little Appearance of his being as good as his Word. The falling off of Vortigern, and the Valour of Ambrosius, join'd to a Conduct which equalled him to the most famous Generals, seem'd to lay invincible Obstacles in his Way. However, he was resolv'd not to give over his Design, but endeavour to do That by Fraud which he could not accomplish by Force. To this end he contriv'd a Plot, that by its Blackness sullied the Glory of all his former Actions. As soon as the Peace was concluded, he pretended to be mighty well pleas'd with it, and behaved in such a manner as shew'd he had no Design of enlarging his Conquests. The Britons, charm'd with this seeming Moderation, were easily comforted for the Loss of Kent, imagining they knew the worst, and, perhaps, hoping one Day to meet with a favourable Juncture to recover it again. In the mean Time, not to provoke a Prince whose Valour they had so often experienced, they lived in an amicable manner with him. In short, their Animosity against the Saxons by degrees entirely vanish'd. Hengist omitted nothing to keep them in a Security, which would lead them into the Snare he was preparing for them. He let them know, his Intention being to live in perfect Union with them, he should be glad from Time to Time to keep up the good Understanding between the two Nations by Parties of Pleasure. Vortigern, a passionate Lover of such Diversions, joyfully accepted his Proposal, and went so far as to pay him the first Visit, accompanied with 300 of his principal Subjects. Hengist receiv'd them seemingly in a very respectful and cordial Manner, which charmed the British Lords. His Entertainment was splendid, and nothing was wanting to divert them. But towards the End of the Feast, the Scene was changed. Hengist had order'd Matters so, that having artfully rais'd some Subject of Dispute, at a certain Signal given, the British Lords were all murder'd (6). Vortigern, because Hengist had need of him, was only made Prisoner. In vain did he complain of this base Treachery; he could not obtain his Liberty without delivering up to the Saxons a great Tract of Land bordering upon Kent, with which Hengist enlarg'd his narrow Territories. This was afterwards divided into three Provinces, called by the Saxons, Suffex, Effex, and Middlesex, which Names they retain to this Day. Moreover, not content with this Acquisition, Hengist ravaged the neighbouring Country in a merciless Manner, and became Master of London, Lincoln, and Winchester.

The Indignation of the Britons at this barbarous Action was so great, that they could not look upon a Saxon without Horror. But this fatal Event was attended with farther Consequences. Vortigern, as he had given his Subjects, more than once, cause to think him a Friend to the Saxons, was reckon'd an Accomplice in the Massacre, since he alone was spar'd. And therefore they all deserted him, and acknowledged Ambrosius (7) for their Sovereign, except a few Friends, who were of little Service to him in his sinking Condition.

(1) The Romans, for the more convenient going from Colony to Colony, had their publick Highways called Via Consulares, Pratoria, Regia, &c. but by Ride and the Moderns, Strata, or Streets. (Hence the many Strettons, i. e. Towns on these Streets). There were four in England, Watling-Street, Icknild-Street, Ermin-Street, and Foss-way. Two of these Ways are extended cross the Breadth of the Kingdom, the other two thro' the Length of it. The Tracks of these four Ways, are, and have been, for many Ages, very obscure; and it is not yet sufficiently clear'd, where any one of them distinctly went. Brady, p. 41. Hist. Eng.

(2) Wipped: flautum. See Glossar. Saxon. In all probability Ipswich in Suffolk. See Langborn. Camden thinks it was in the Isle of Thanet, but that could not be. Rapin.

(3) Cornwall and Devon. There were several petty Kings dependant on the chief Monarch. Rapin.

(4) Or Alclud. This Kingdom contain'd Part of Cumberland and Lenox. Dunbritton was afterwards the Name of the Capital. Camd. p. 918.

(5) He was buried at Lincoln. Nennius, c. 46.

(6) The Signal was, Nimede cure Seaxes, (i. e.) Pull out your Daggers. Stillingfleet doubts the Truth of this Fact, because Witekind relates one like it that happen'd in Germany. But it might be repeated in Britain. Rapin. This Massacre was committed on the 1st of May. Higd. In Memory of it, Ambrosius is said to have built Stonehenge near Salisbury. G. Monm. l. 8. As it has been justly wonder'd at how Stones of twenty or thirty Tons could be rais'd so high as they are, it won't be amiss to give the Reader Mr. Rowland's Hypothesis in his Mona Antiqua. Small Mounts were thrown up with sloping Sides and level at the Top. Up these Sides with great Leavers and Pullies by little and little they roll'd and heav'd up the Stones they design'd to erect; then laying them along on the Top of the Hillock, they dug Holes in the Earth at the End of the Stones, as deep as the Stones were long, into which they let them slip trait on Ends with their Tops level with the Tops of the Mount, then placing other Stones upon these, and taking away the Earth almost to the Bottom of the Supporters, there appear'd what we call Stone-henge, Rollrick or Cromlech.

(7) Barinius confounds Ambrosius Aurelianus, with another Aurelian. Rapin.

476. Ambrosius, as soon as he saw himself sole Monarch of the Britons, assum'd the Imperial Purple, after the manner of the Roman Emperors, creating at the same Time Prince Arthur, who had signaliz'd himself in the War by many brave Actions, a Patrician (1). Could Britain have been sav'd, it would doubtless have been so by these two great Princes, who had all the Qualities of the most celebrated Heroes in an eminent Degree. But its Fate was determin'd. This noble Country, was destin'd to undergo an extraordinary Revolution, and become a Prey to the Saxons. All that Ambrosius and Arthur could do was to put off its Ruin for a Time.

Mean while, Hengist was not a little perplex'd to see his Country quite dispeopled; for the Inhabitants refusing to live under a Prince that had given such evident Proofs of his Treachery and Cruelty, retir'd in Crowds into the other Provinces; so that his new Dominions were of no Use to him there not being Hands enough to cultivate the Lands.

In this Perplexity, he resolv'd to send for Ella, a Saxon General, from Germany, promising Part of the Territories granted him by Vortigern. Ella receiv'd the Offer with Joy, and shortly after arriv'd in Britain, with his Sons Baldulphus, Colgrin, and Ciffa an Infant. He landed his Troops at Whitering in Suffex, but not without Opposition. The Inhabitants of the Country rising to prevent his Entrance, he became not Master of the Shore till after a long Battle. At length he drove the Britons as far as the Forest of Andredswald (2), at that Time 65 Miles in Length, and 30 in Breadth. The Retreat of the Britons gave the Saxons Opportunity to settle by degrees along the Coast and towards the Thames. During the nine Years they were employ'd in extending their Conquests in those Parts, they had continual Wars with the Britons, the Particulars whereof are unknown. We are only told that the Saxons, settled along the southern Coast, were call'd Sud or South Saxons, and their Country Suffex. Hengist took care to strengthen himself, in the best manner he could, in the rest of the Country given him, and planted Colonies of his own Countrymen. Those that were seated to the East were called East Saxons, and their Country, Essex. The Country between Essex and Suffex, was term'd Middlesex. As for Kent, it retained its ancient Name, the only one perhaps the Saxons did not alter.

Hengist having thus settled Matters, gave those Soldiers, that desir'd it, leave to return into Germany. At their Arrival on the Continent, they built the Castle of Leyden, which is ascrib'd to Hengist himself by a Dutch Poet, as well as by several others, who were of Opinion that he went back into Germany (3).

The Britons were not then in a condition to think of recovering the Provinces usurp'd by the Saxons. Harra's'd by almost continual Wars for 60 Years together, it was time to breathe a while. However, they were griev'd to see the Saxons so firmly settled in the Country, and in a Capacity of strengthening themselves, by the Convenience of sending, whenever they pleas'd, for fresh Supplies from Germany. But they were forc'd to be patient, till their almost quite exhausted Forces were repair'd. Accordingly, without any previous Truce or Treaty of Peace, both Sides lay quiet for nine Years. Hengist, no less than the Britons, had need of some Respite, to put the Affairs of his Kingdom in order. During this Interval, Ella gain'd Ground, the Britons not daring to oppose him, for fear of giving Hengist a Pretence to renew the War, which it was their Design to avoid.

The Britons having had time to recover their Strength, began to solicit Ambrosius to take up Arms. They represented to him, "That the longer the Saxons were left in " quiet, the stronger they grew: That since the War " ceas'd, Britain abounded with young Soldiers, fit to " fight for their Country; if this Opportunity therefore " was let slip, they might perhaps expect another in vain." Ambrosius told them, "he was convinc'd, as well as " they, of the Necessity to exert their utmost to expel the " Foreigners, but there was no hopes of succeeding as long " as Vortigern was alive; That although he was old, and " in appearance incapable of acting, he had a powerful " Party, that would not fail of raising new Disturbances " as soon as the War broke out: That they had found by " fatal Experience, ever since the Arrival of the Saxons, " he had always favour'd them." In fine, "he put them " in mind, that all their Losses were owing to their Divi- " sions, and as these Divisions still prevail'd, it was to no " purpose to expect any better Success." He concluded with saying, "they had but one of these two Ways to " take, either to let the Saxons remain in quiet till Vortigern's Death, or to rid themselves of that domestick " Enemy, and unite their Forces against the Foreigners." Such was the Hatred of the Generality of the Britons against Vortigern, that they resolv'd immediately upon the latter of the two Methods, and with one Consent, prepared to put their Resolution in practice with all possible Secrecy and Expedition. Vortigern so little expected to be attack'd, that he was like to have fallen into the Hands of Ambrosius. He had but just time to throw himself into a Castle in Wales, where he was not very secure. Ambrosius willing to complete his Work, instantly went and besieg'd him, being resolv'd not to let him escape. During the Siege, the Castle, whether by Accident, or the Engines of the Besiegers, taking Fire, was burnt to Ashes, and the unfortunate Vortigern perished in the Flames. This was the End of that Prince, advanced to a great Age, after a troublesome Reign of forty Years. He had, besides a Daughter, three Sons by his first Wife, Vortimer, Catigern slain in a Battle with the Saxons, and Pascentius, of whom I shall speak hereafter. By his Daughter, whom he debauch'd, he had a Son nam'd Faustus, who pass'd his Life in a Monastery, where he was distinguished for his Piety.

Ambrosius being thus rid of a very formidable, as he ever thought, and hated Rival, renewed the War against the Saxons, which had been interrupted by the Weakness of both Parties, and the Divisions of the Britons. The Particulars of this War, after its renewal, are very imperfectly known: But considering the Valour and Activity of the two Generals, it may be supposed to have been very sharp. Historians relate but one remarkable Event, namely, the signal Victory obtained by Ambrosius, in the Year 487, over Ella and his two eldest Sons. This is properly the first Victory the Britons could indisputably boast of, whatever their Historians say to the contrary. This Defeat obliged the Saxon General to retire to his strong Holds, in expectation of fresh Supplies, sent for from Germany.

Hengist lived not to see the End of this War. He died in 488, aged about 69, of which he had pass'd 39 in Britain, and 33 on the Throne of Kent, (4). He cannot be denied the Glory of being one of the bravest and most prudent Generals of his Time. It were to be wish'd for the English, that the Founder of their Monarchy had not, as I may say, cemented his Throne with the Blood of so many British Lords, whom he treacherously murdered. An Action that must leave an indelible Stain on his Memory. Had it not been for this, his Reputation would have been uncommon, since by his Conduct and Valour he happily accomplished a Design, the Execution whereof was extremely difficult. Besides Kent given him by Vortigern, and considerably enlarged by the Acquisition of Essex and Middlesex, he was in possession of some Lands in Lincolnshire, where he built Thong Castr. The Saxons beyond the Humber acknowledg'd him for their Sovereign. He left two Sons, Escus who succeeded him in the Kingdom of Kent, and Andoacer who staid in Germany.

After the Defeat of Ella, about a Year before the Death of Hengist, Escus had sent him into the North, to assist Oeta and Ebuja against the Britons. But as soon as he had Notice of his Father's Death he hasten'd to Kent to take Possession of the Kingdom. In the mean Time Ambrosius improving his Victory, retook London, Winchester and Lincoln, seiz'd by the Saxons, after the Massacre of the British Nobles. Escus, wanting the Qualities of his Father, never endeavour'd to recover these Places, but prefer'd his Ease before the Fatigues of War. In all Probability he obtain'd a Truce, since in the three following Years, there is no mention of any Hostilities on either Side.

During this Calm, Arthur, who had all along assist'd Ambrosius, finding his Presence was not absolutely necessary in his own Country, made a Voyage to Jerusalem. Ambrosius, in the mean while, by the Assistance of Samson Bishop of Dol, whom he had sent for from Armorica, and made Archbishop of York, regulated the Affairs of the Church, that were in extreme Disorder by reason of the foregoing Wars.

The Truce or Discontinuance of the War lasted but three Years. The Northumbrian Saxons beginning to stir in 491, Arthur, who was return'd from his Voyage, march'd against, and defeated them. At the same time Ella having receiv'd a strong Reinforcement from Germany, went and besieg'd Andred-Ceaster (5), situated in the Forest of Andred's Wald. The Resistance of the Besieged, and an Army of the Enemy posted on an advantageous Ground,

(1) P. Arthur must have been created a Patrician by Ambrosius, since there was then no other Emperor in the West. Odoacer King of the Herali reigning then in Italy, had never any Pretensions to Britain. Rapin. See Nicholson's Histor. Librar. p. 35.

(2) Andredswald, as Camden says, was 120 Miles long. It is now called Wald or Wild. Camd. p. 166.

(3) *Quem circumdato, mœnium ut ambitu,
Sic arcuatis fornicibus novum,
Potatur Hengistus, Britanno
Orbe redux, posuisse victor.* Deusa. Rapin.

(4) Some British or Welsh Writers tell us, Hengist was taken Prisoner and beheaded by the Britons. G. Monm. M. Westm. But the Saxons unanimously assure us he died a natural Death. Rapin.

(5) In Latin, Anderida. In the Reign of Edw. I. a little Town called Newenden was built in the same Place. Rapin. Sumner takes Anderida to be Pemsey or Hastings, in Suffex. Hist. of Rom. For.

made him lose a great deal of Time. But at length, after a vigorous Defence, the Town was carried by Storm, and entirely destroy'd. Immediately after this, Ella assum'd the Title of King of Suffex or of the South-Saxons, which he durst not do while Hengist was alive. This Second Saxon Kingdom contain'd the present Counties of Suffex and Surrey. Ella was also elected Monarch or General of the Saxons in the room of Hengist. For it must be observ'd altho' Hengist was only King of Kent, yet was he consider'd also as Head of all the Saxons, according to the Custom of that Nation in Germany, where, in time of War, they had always their General in Chief, accountable only to the States. This same Custom the Saxons continued in Britain, and always elected a General, whom some Writers stile Monarch, because, as we shall see hereafter, he was Head over several Kings. In all appearance, Hengist's Son thought himself incapable to discharge this High Office, since he suffer'd Ella to be invest'd with it.

494. About two Years after, Arthur defeated the Northumbrian Saxons again, on the Banks of the River Dugles (1), where he had routed them three Years before.

495. The Year 495 was very remarkable for the Arrival of Cerdic, a Saxon General, not only upon the Account of his Conquests, but chiefly because from him the Kings of England are descended, in the Male Line, down to Edward the Confessor, and in the Female, down to the illustrious Prince, who now sits on the Throne. If we trace him higher, we find, by the Saxon Annals, that he sprung from Woden, the Root of all the principal Families of the Saxons. He was famous also for founding a Kingdom to which all the rest in the end became subject, and consequently, he is to be look'd upon, if not as the first, at least as one of the principal Founders of the English Monarchy. This warlike Prince having acquired great Reputation in Germany, and finding no farther Employment there, resolv'd to seek his Fortune in Britain, where he knew many Families of his Nation had already establish'd themselves. To that purpose he equip'd five Vessels, and taking his Son Cenric, advanc'd to Man's Estate, with him, now sail'd for Britain.

Ella, as I said, brought with him his three Sons Baldulph, Colgrin, and Cissa who was very young; and the two Eldest treading in their Father's Steps, bravely assist'd him. They are call'd by some Cismentius and Plentigus (2). Oëta, Commander of the Saxons in the North, having been frequently defeated by Arthur, and perceiving himself too weak to guard all his Conquests, had divided them into two Parts, of which the Southern was called Deira, and the Northern, Bernicia. He had committed the Care of the First to Baldulphus and Colgrin, reserving Bernicia to himself to defend it against the continual Attacks of the Northern Nations. Colgrin, after the last Defeat of the Northumbrians by Arthur, had shut himself up in York, where Arthur immediately went and besieg'd him. Nevertheless Baldulphus having been inform'd of Cerdic's Design of coming to Britain, was gone into Norfolk to expect his Arrival, and favour his Landing. But Cerdic's Arrival being delay'd by some Accident, Baldulphus march'd back towards York, with intent to relieve it. He was met upon the Way by Cador, Nephew to Arthur who defeated him, and dispers'd his Army in such a manner, that he was forced to make his Escape all alone, disguis'd like a Peasant (3). In that Dress he safely reach'd the Walls of York, and making himself known, was drawn up with a Rope. The News he brought of Cerdic's being about to arrive from Germany with powerful Supplies, infilling new Life into the Besieg'd, they continued to make a vigorous Defence. Arthur push'd the Siege briskly, in Expectation of taking the Town before the Arrival of the Saxon Prince. All this while Cador was in Norfolk, ready to oppose the Landing of the Saxons. But before Arthur had made any considerable Progress in the Siege, he receiv'd the ill News of Cerdic's landing at Yarmouth (4), and beating the Forces sent against him. Upon which he raises the Siege, and retires to a Place of Security, till he could learn the exact Number of the Saxons, which Fame had exceedingly multiplied. Baldulph and Colgrin marching out of York, committed great Devastations in Lancashire, whilst the Britons were dismay'd and terrify'd at the Arrival of Cerdic. So great was their Terror, that Arthur thought fit to keep at a Distance from the Saxons for some Time, for fear of not being able to inspire his Troops with Resolution enough to look these formidable Enemies in the Face. But this was not All that followed upon the Arrival of Cerdic.

Pascentius, Son of Vortigern, having long concealed his secret Disgust at not having any of his Father's Dominions assign'd him, laid hold of this Juncture to obtain what he thought his Due. With the Assistance of those that, like Nennius, him, were displeased with the Advancement of Ambrosius, he drew some Forces together, and being joined by Baldulph and Colgrin, was reinforced by many of his Friends in Wales. Ambrosius being grown sick and old, Arthur took upon him to chastise the Rebel, and marching against him, gave him Battle, and entirely routed him near the little River Dugles (5).

The next Year, Arthur in the same Place gained another Victory, and so warmly pursued the British Prince, that he forced him to submit and sue for Pardon. Pascentius got more by his Submission, than by his Arms. For besides his Pardon, it procured him the possession of Brecknock and Radnor (6) in Wales, which being erected into a Kingdom, his Posterity enjoy'd it for many Years. I imagine that his Father Vortigern's private Demerits lay in those Parts, and that Ambrosius did but give him the Lands belonging to his Family before Vortigern was King. If he invest'd him with Sovereignty, it was only to give him some Satisfaction concerning his Pretensions to the Crown of Britain.

About this Time the Saxons in the North conquered the little Kingdom of Galway (7) from Galvan Nephew of Arthur. This Country, now part of Scotland, had remained in the Hands of the Britons and withstood the continual Attacks, as well of the Saxons as Picts. Galvan having lost his Dominions, retired to his Uncle Arthur, to whom he was very serviceable in his Wars.

Shortly after, Porta lands at Portland (8), so call'd from him with fresh supplies of Saxons from Germany. This at a Time the Saxons began to be superior, oblig'd Arthur to quit the Field and retire to London. Tho' he had generally the better of the Saxons in all their Encounters, yet his Troops were considerably diminished; whereas the Enemy's Forces were continually increasing by fresh Recruits from Germany. Nay whole Bodies, under the Conduct of famous Leaders, came over to Britain, in order to procure a Settlement, or for the sake of Plunder only. Arthur, who had not the same Supplies, would have been reduced to Extremity, without the Assistance of Hoel King of Armorica his Nephew. This young Prince, greedy of Glory and glad of an Occasion to signalize himself in the Service of his Uncle, put himself at the Head of 15000 Men, and landed at Southampton. With this Aid, Arthur went and attacked the Northumbrians, grown formidable by the Valour of Baldulph and Colgrin, their Leaders, and meeting them in Deira, obtained a compleat Victory over them. The two Saxon Brothers not being in condition to withstand him after their Defeat, had no other Course to take, but with the Remains of their Army to join Cerdic, then besieging Lincoln. But Arthur, fearing the Loss of that Place, followed them with Speed, and surprized Cerdic in so sudden a manner, that not being able to continue the Siege, or raise it, without Danger, he was constrained to hazard a Battle (9), which proved fatal to the Saxons. Cerdic being defeated, was forced to betake himself to the Forest of Celidon, where having suffered great Hardships, he at length found Means, tho' with great Difficulty, to retire towards the Western Coasts. Some Historians assure us, that seeing he must inevitably perish if he staid in a Place where he could neither have Provisions, nor hope for Assistance, oblig'd himself by a Treaty with Arthur to return into Germany with the Remains of his Troops. They add, that being embark'd with Intent to perform his Promise, he altered his Mind at Sea, and came and landed at Toston (10) in the West. However this be, Cerdic certainly remained in the Island, and lay quiet for some Time, having lost in the Battle above 6000 Men.

After Cerdic's Defeat, all the Saxons were equally concern'd to oppose the Progress of Arthur, who, like an able General, wisely improved his Victories to the utmost. The Dread he struck them with, made them resolve to unite all their Forces, and endeavour to retrieve their Affairs. They were sensible that by dispersing their Forces in several Parts, they endangered in one Place what they had got in another, which was never the Way to procure a lasting Settlement. Wherefore Efcus King of Kent, Ella King of Suffex, Cerdic, Porta, the Northern Saxons assembled all their Troops, and conferr'd the Command in Chief on Cerdic. The Infirmities and Old Age of Ella, who had been Monarch ever since 492, were probably the cause of his not heading the Army at this

(1) In Lancashire, near Wigan.

(2) So call'd by British Writers, but by the English ones, Cymen and Plating, from whom Cymenestere in Suffex. Rapin.

(3) Idem in History, says Conf. Mon. l. 9. c. 1.

(4) He landed at a Place call'd Cerdic's-Ora. Sax. Ann. which according to Canden, was near Tarmouth in Norfolk; but according to others, near Southampton. See Ep. Gild. Giff. at the end of Sax. Ann.

(5) Near Wigan in Lancashire, or by the River Dug or Due in Lancashire. Tyrr p. 135.

(6) In British Books, and Vortigern Maur.

(7) In Latin, Galliedia. G. Maim. calls it Walentia and Walentia.

(8) The Sax. Ann. and Itinerary, p. 312. and Max. Wilm. p. 182. say, he landed at Portsmouth with his two Sons, Bieda and Magla. It does not appear that any Writer says he landed at Portland. See Itiner.

(9) By the River Dugles, which is supposed to run by Bisfen. Tyrr p. 135.

(10) Itinerary, p. 312. Idem in Itiner. says Mat. Westm. p. 186.

time. Cerdic having divided his Troops into two Bodies, gave the Command of the least to Baldulph and Colgrin, and headed the other himself with his Son Cenric. While the Saxons were employed in making Preparations, the Britons were exerting their utmost to raise an Army capable of withstanding so powerful Enemies. In this pressing an Occasion, where they had need of all their Forces, those that could bear Arms came in Crouds, and lifted themselves under their Generals. So that it was thought on both Sides a decisive Battle would quickly ensue. Ambrosius called here by Historians Nazaleod, though very old, and almost past the Time of Action, could not see all these Preparations without having his Courage rous'd, which Age seem'd to have lain asleep. He put himself at the Head of his Army, and detaching Arthur to follow Baldulph and Colgrin, who were marching towards the West, resolv'd to go in quest of Cerdic. Arthur, every where victorious, coming to an Engagement with the Saxon Brothers in Cornwal, obtain'd a signal Victory over them (1).

580. While this great General was causing the Arms of the Britons to triumph in those Parts, Ambrosius advanced towards Cerdic, who had no thought of retiring. The two Armies being engag'd, Ambrosius broke through the right Wing of the Saxons, commanded by Cerdic, and put them to rout. But whilst he was eagerly pursuing his Victory against a Body that made but a faint Resistance, Cenric had the same Advantage over the right Wing of the Britons, which he more wisely improv'd. Instead of losing Time in pursuing the Run-aways, he flies to the Assistance of his Father, and falling upon Ambrosius in Flank, puts him in irreparable Disorder. By this prudent Conduct, he gave Cerdic Time to rally his Troops, and complete the Victory by an entire Defeat of the Britons.

Ambrosius, vex'd to see the Victory snatch'd out of his Hands, did all he could to renew the Fight. In spite of Age and Infirmities, he threw himself among his Enemies in order to animate his Troops by his Example. But all his Efforts serv'd only to crown his glorious Life with an honourable Death. The fall of Ambrosius caused an universal Rout among the Britons, who precipitately abandon'd the Field of Battle to their Enemies. The Success of that Day was, by the publick Acknowledgment of his Father, attributed to Cenric. This Battle was fought in 508, near a Place call'd by the Saxons, Cerdic's-Ford (2).

Before I proceed any farther, it will be proper to observe, that the Name of Nazaleod, given by Historians to the British Monarch slain in this Battle, has made some imagine it was not Ambrosius. But the Opinion of Camden and several other good Writers, who assert the contrary, is doubtless to be prefer'd. All the Historians agree that Ambrosius fell in Battle. Now after the beginning of this Prince's Reign, there was no other Battle except this, wherein a British Monarch was slain. Besides, Historians would not have omitted to mark the Time of the Death of so famous a Prince, had it happen'd in some other Action.

Arthur was elected Monarch in the Room of Ambrosius. He was doubtless the fittest Person to command the Army, his very Name being terrible to the Saxons (3). Between Ambrosius and Arthur, some Writers place Uther Pendragon, who, they affirm, was Arthur's eldest Brother, and both of them Sons of Ambrosius. Others will have it that Arthur was Son and Successor of Uther. But they that are most vers'd in the English History, maintain that Uther was only a Surname given to the great Arthur on account of his Victories, the Word being capable of that Sense in the old British Language.

Arthur, after his Coronation at Caerleon, which he had retaken from the Saxons, march'd against the Northumbrians, and defeated them on the Banks of the little River Ribroyt that runs through Lancashire. This is reckon'd his Tenth Victory over the Saxons. In the mean time Baldulph and Colgrin, invading the Western Parts, made such Devastations, that he was oblig'd to leave Northumberland, and march against the two Brothers. However, he left Hoel his Nephew in Bernicia, to oppose the Saxons there, who, though often beaten, were still formidable. His usual Success attended him. The Saxon Brothers being compell'd by him to come to an Engagement, were routed near Cadbury in Somersetshire (4).

511. Mean while, Cerdic having receiv'd fresh Supplies from the Saxon Princes in Britain, as well as from Germany, laid Siege to Bath. Baldulph and Colgrin having joined him also, with what Troops they could draw together, his Army was so strong, that he wish'd the Britons would attempt to raise the Siege. His Wishes were accomplish'd. Arthur, resolving to hazard All to save that Place, came and gave him Battle, which proved the bloodiest that had ever been fought between the two Nations. It lasted from Noon till Night, without any visible Advantage to either Side. Both Armies kept the Field, waiting for the Day, to renew the Fight. The Saxons, during the Night, posted themselves on a little Hill, call'd Bannesdown, which was of great Importance, tho' it had been neglected by both Sides the Day before. As soon as it was light, Arthur, perceiving the Advantage the Saxons had gain'd by seizing that Post, was resolv'd to dislodge them, which he effected after a long and obstinate Fight. The Britons, animated by the Presence and Valour of their King, perceiving, the Saxons in retreating down the Hill had put themselves in some Disorder, press'd them still more vigorously, and at last entirely routed them (5). They gained, on this Occasion, a most complete Victory. Baldulph and Colgrin were both slain, and Cerdic, with the Remains of his Army, retired to an inaccessible Post.

An unexpected Event gave the Saxons time to breathe, and prevented Arthur from improving his Victory. The Picts, who were in Alliance with the Saxons, knowing Arthur to be at a Distance, and his Nephew Hoel sick at Argente, resolv'd to besiege that Town, in Expectation of taking it before it could be reliev'd. But Arthur was too quick for them. Instead of pursuing his Advantage upon Cerdic, he flew to the Assistance of the King of Armorica, and compell'd the Picts to raise the Siege. The British Monarch was so provok'd with the Picts for this Diversion, which came so opportunely for the Saxons, that he ravaged their Country from one End to the other, and would have entirely destroy'd it, had not the Bishops by their Intercession diverted him from his Purpose.

During this Expedition, died Gueniver Wife of Arthur who was buried in the County of Angus (6). As she had no Children, the Women of the Country fancied, All that walk'd over her Grave, would, like her, be barren. For which Reason great Care was taken to hinder the young Damsels from approaching it. Hoel, after this Expedition, return'd to his own Country, the Victory of Badon having secur'd Arthur, for some time, from any Attempts of the Saxons. Arthur, in his Return from the Country of the Picts, made some Stay at York, which the Saxons had just abandon'd since the Battle of Badon. His chief Intent was to regulate the Affairs of the Church, which were, from the time the Saxons had been Masters of that City, in great Confusion.

Efus King of Kent died in 512, memorable only for leaving his Name to all his Successors, Kings of Kent, who from him were call'd Efcingsians. He was succeeded by his Son Oda.

Two Years after died Ella King of Suffex, and Monarch of the Saxons, having enlarg'd his narrow Territories at the Expence of the Britons, during a Reign of twenty three Years. His two eldest Sons having been slain at Badon, Cissa the youngest succeeded him in the Kingdom of Suffex; but the Monarchy of the Saxons was conferr'd on Cerdic.

Cerdic, ever since the Battle of Badon, had lain quiet in his own Country, expecting a Supply from Germany, which arrived in 514, under the Conduct of Stuff and Withgar his Nephews (7). Upon this he took the Field again, and committed great Devastations in the Country of the Britons (8). Arthur, tho' weaken'd by his own Victories, not having the same Recruits as the Saxons, made however powerful Struggles to oppose the Progress of this formidable Enemy. The many and bloody Battles between the two Nations did not decide the Quarrel, since Victory inclin'd sometimes on one Side, and sometimes on the other. But at length in 519, Cerdic defeated the Britons in such a manner, as made them despair of ever driving out the Saxons (9). Wherefore, Arthur saw himself under a necessity of taking other Measures. As he found his Army irreparably destroy'd, he thought it more prudent to conclude a Peace with Cerdic, and grant him a Part, rather than hazard the Whole of his Dominions, by endeavouring to deprive him of All. This Consideration moved him to surrender by Treaty a certain Tract of Land, containing the present Counties of Hampshire and Somersetshire. The Saxon Prince was pleas'd with these Terms, being desirous after so long a War, of enjoying some Repose in his declining Age. As soon as he was in Possession of his new Territories, he founded the Kingdom of Wessex, or of the West-Saxons, so call'd because it lay West of Kent and Suffex.

(1) Near Gainsford, says Dr. Gale in his Notes upon Nennius, p. 131.

(2) Occur'd in Hampshire. There were 5000 Britons slain with him. Sax. Ann.

(3) Arthur signifies a horrible Bear, or an Iron Hammer, from the British Word Arth a Bear. Still. Orig. Brit.

(4) Rightly Mistake, says in Cornwall.

(5) Mainfray says, Arthur slew 400 with his own Hand, p. 7. Uther places the Battle of Badon in 520; but Langbeine's Opinion, who places it in 511.

(6) In Wessex.

(7) They landed at Cerdic's Ora with three Ships. Sax. Ann. In occidentali parte Britanniæ with two Ships, says M. Weslm. p. 184. So that Cerdic's Ora was probably Cupet, or near it, in Hampshire. Gibson's Origines at the End of the Annals.

(8) Fortitudo Cerdici pacta et terribilis, poterat Britannos, et insuetudine magna. H. Huntingd.

(9) At Chandford in Hampshire. Sax. Ann. Hunt. p. 213.

He was crown'd at Winchester, twenty three Years after his Arrival in Britain (1). Thus by his Valour and Perseverance, he procur'd himself a Settlement in the Island, as well as his Countrymen Hengist and Ella.

Arthur took this Opportunity to rebuild some of the Churches destroy'd by the preceding Wars, and to repair, as far as lay in his Power, the Damages Religion had hitherto sustain'd.

From the time Hengist had peopled Essex and Middlesex with Saxons and Jutes, they had been govern'd by a Deputy under the King of Kent. But in 527 Erchenwin, descended from Hoden, assum'd the Title of King of Essex, or of the East-Saxons. This Kingdom lying Eastward of the other three, contain'd the two Counties of Essex and Middlesex, of which London was the Capital. Who Erchenwin was, how long he had been in Britain, and what Right he had to this new Kingdom, Historians inform us not. I suppose he was Governor under Ossa King of Kent, and taking advantage of his Weakness, engag'd the People to acknowledge him for King.

About this time Multitudes of Angles under the Conduct of twelve Chiefs, all of equal Authority, but whose Names, except Uffa, (of whom I shall have occasion to speak hereafter,) are unknown; landed at some Port on the Eastern Coast of Britain, where, without much difficulty, they possess'd themselves of some Port; those Parts being ill guarded by the Britons. In time, as they were continually enlarging their Conquests towards the West, they compell'd the Britons at length to abandon the Country along the Eastern Shore. The Angles, thus situated, had an Opportunity of sending from time to time for fresh Colonies from Germany, with which they founded a fifth Kingdom, by the Name of the Kingdom of East-Anglia, or of the East-Angles. But as their first Chiefs assum'd not the Title of King, the Beginning of this Kingdom is generally brought down to the Year 571.

During the eight Years Peace between Arthur and Cerdic, the King of Armorica being disturb'd by the Rebellion of Frollon, one of his Subjects, sent to his Uncle Arthur for Aid. As Britain was then in a State of Tranquillity, Arthur would go in Person, and assist the King his Nephew. To that end he pass'd into Armorica, where he revenges Hoel, by slaying Frollon with his own Hand in the first Battle they fought.

Arthur was still with Hoel when the Angles arriv'd in Britain. His Absence very probably gave them an Opportunity of making greater Progress than they would have done, had he been in the Country. Cerdic also taking Advantage of Arthur's Absence, and of the Angles, broke the Peace, and made some farther Conquests. He was constantly attended by his Son Cenric, who bravely seconded him in all his Undertakings, and by his Valour and Conduct caus'd him to gain a signal Victory in Buckinghamshire, at a Place call'd Cerdic's Lega, now Cherdsley (2).

Arthur at his Return found his Affairs in extreme Disorder, by reason of Cerdic's new Conquests, and the Arrival of the Angles. However, perceiving himself unable to renew the War with his Enemies, whose Number was continually encreasing, he chose to make a new Treaty with Cerdic. Immediately after this Treaty, Arthur is said to assume the Title of Emperor, of which his Seal found at Westminster is pretended to be a Proof. Leland says, he saw the Impression of it on red Wax, with these Words round it: Patr. Arthurius. Britann. Gall. Germ. Dac. Imper. that is, Patricius Arthurius; Britannicus. Gallicus. Germanicus. Dacicus. Imperator. These proud Titles perhaps were the Occasion of ascribing to him so many pretended Victories in foreign Countries, and of styling him Conqueror of the Gauls, Germans, and Dacians. But whether this Seal be genuine or not (3), there is Foundation enough for these Titles from the Exploits now related of this Prince. He might be call'd Britannicus from his being Monarch of the Britons. The Title of Gallicus might be owing to his Expedition into Gaul. The Surname of Germanicus was no less proper, since he frequently defeated the Saxons, who came from Germany. Lastly, his being styled Dacicus might be founded on his Victory over the Jutes, who were mix'd with the Saxons, and by some have been confounded with the Danes and Dacians. Be this as it will, if he assum'd the Title of Emperor, as it is very likely, since Ambrosius did the same, the four different Times of his attaining to the four several Dignities, must be carefully distinguish'd. 1. He mounted the Throne of Danmonium in 467, at fifteen Years of Age. 2. In 476, he was created Patrician by Ambrosius. 3. In 508, he was elected Monarch of Britain. 4. In 528, he assumed the Imperial Purple. These Epocha's thus distinguish'd, remove, in great measure, the Confusion in the History of this great Prince, with respect to Chronology.

Hoel, King of Armorica, was enjoying the Repose procur'd him by Arthur, when he heard that the Wigath, then in Possession of Part of Gaul, were preparing to invade his Dominions: Wherefore he desired Arthur to come, once more, in Person to assist him against so formidable Enemies, that were already Masters of Part of Gaul. How necessary soever Arthur's Presence might be in his own Kingdom, he readily gave Hoel this full Proof of his Affection and Gratitude. As he was like to be detain'd abroad some time by the Affairs of Armorica, he left Modred his Nephew, whom he design'd for his Successor Regent in his Absence, at the same time entrusting him with the Care of the Queen his Wife.

Arthur was no sooner gone, but Cerdic, taking advantage of his Absence, attacks and subdues the Ile of Wight, destroying almost all the Inhabitants in a cruel Manner. But this Loss was nothing to Arthur, in comparison of what shortly after follow'd by the Treachery of Modred, to whose Care he had committed what he held most dear. This Traitor, finding the Wife and Kingdom of Arthur in his Power, falls in Love with both, and not satisfied with debauching the Queen in private, publicly marries her. In order to avoid by a second Crime, the Punishment of the first, he resolves moreover to seize the Crown of his Uncle, his King, and Benefactor. The more easily to accomplish his Design, he judges it necessary to make Cerdic his Friend, and by his Means to gain all the rest of the Saxon Princes to his Interest. He was very sensible, it would be very difficult to support himself in his Usurpation, if he were immediately forc'd to engage in a War with the Foreigners. Besides, he could not find a readier or more powerful Protection. But the Saxon Prince not being of a Humour to neglect his own, for the sake of another's Affairs, Modred could not possibly obtain this Protection, without paying dear for it. However, as he had no other way to support himself, he resigns to Cerdic one part of the Dominions, usurp'd upon his Uncle, and enters into a League offensive and defensive with him. What the Saxon Prince got by this Treaty, lay extremely convenient for him, and vastly exceeded what was before given him by Arthur. It contain'd, besides Part of Danmonium, or Cornwall, the present Counties of Berkshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, and Dorsetshire. This, with Hampshire and Somersetshire, which he was before possess'd of, render'd his Kingdom much larger and more considerable, than the three other Saxon Kingdoms already establish'd. The Treaty being executed, Modred was crown'd at London; those who privately abhor'd his treacherous Doings not daring to oppose it, for fear of being oppress'd, before the Return of their lawful Prince.

In the mean time, Cerdic, after having much enlarg'd his Dominions, was incumber'd with his Greatness. As most of his Subjects were Britons, on whose Loyalty he could not wholly rely, he believ'd it necessary, in order to preserve his new Dominions, to people them with Saxon Colonies. To that end he sent Word into Germany, that All who were willing to come and settle in his Kingdom, should meet with great Encouragement. This Invitation induces a great many of the Saxons and Jutes to embrace the present Opportunity. Soon after, above eight hundred Vessels are seen to arrive, freighted with Families in quest of Settlements, in Cerdic's new Kingdom. These Colonies were joyfully receiv'd and planted in Habitations, from whence Cerdic took care to drive such Britons as he most suspected, especially upon the Frontiers. Thus Britain was fill'd by degrees, with new Inhabitants, and began to lose the Superiority in Number she had hitherto had above the Foreigners.

Cerdic having settled these New-Comers, was crown'd a second time at Winchester, the Metropolis of his Dominions, by the same Title of King of Wessex, or of the West-Saxons, that he had before assum'd. This Ceremony was thought necessary, by reason of the great Number of his new Subjects, Saxons and Jutes, that were lately added to the old. This Kingdom was very advantageously situated, being bounded on the North, by the Thames; on the West, by the Severn; on the South, by the Sea; and on the East, by the Kingdom of Sussex. As for the Britons that were still in possession of the greatest Part of Danmonium, they could not be very formidable to Cerdic, being divided from the rest of their Nation by this new Kingdom and the Severn.

Cerdic was but too well acquainted with the Valour and Activity of Arthur, to imagine he would sit still at his Retreat; and therefore us'd all his Endeavours to put himself in a Posture of Defence. To that end, he repairs all his strong Holds, adds new Works, and takes all other Precautions his Prudence suggests to him, not to be surpriz'd when he comes to defend his Dominions. Every thing being put in order, he rewarded his Nephews Stuff and Witgar, who

(1) Some place this Fact sooner, some later. Rapin.

(2) M confound this with the Battle of Badon-Hill. Rapin.

(3) There is great Reason to suspect its Genuineness; very probably it was the Impression of some Mark of Gold. See Nichols's Hist. Library p. 31.

who had faithfully served him ever since their Arrival, with the Isle of Wight. As in all likelihood they were Jutes, Cerdic, in the Distribution of his new Colonies, had taken care beforehand to people that little Island with their own Countrymen (1).

534. Thus Cerdic was prepared against the Attacks of Arthur, The Death of when Death took him out of the World in the Year 534, Cerdic, sixteen Years after his first Coronation, and thirty-nine after his Arrival in Britain. He must have been of a great Age when he died, for thirty-nine Years before, Cenric his Son was able to assist him in his Wars. The Time this Prince passed in Britain was a continued Scene of good and bad Success, which serv'd equally to shew his Ability to improve his Advantages, and to repair, with a wonderful Readiness, the Disorder his Affairs were frequently thrown into by the Fortune of War. Cenric, his Son, the faithful Companion of all his Labours, succeeded him, both in the Kingdom of Wessex, and also in the Monarchy or Generalship of the Saxons and Angles. Cerdic's Successors were surnamed Gewisians, from Gewis, one of their Ancestors, famous no doubt in his Generation.

The same Year died Oëta King of Kent, after a Reign of twenty two Years, wherein nothing remarkable occurs but the dismembring of the Kingdom of Essex, which he, for some unknown Reason, did not think fit to oppose. He was succeeded by his Son Hermenrick.

535. Arthur, after a four Years Absence, at length quitted Armorica. We are ignorant of the Cause of his long Stay there, so very prejudicial to his Affairs, which at his Arrival were in a desperate Condition. Modred was in possession of his Throne, and moreover in strict Alliance with the Saxons. On the other hand, these last being now Masters of good part of the Island, were led by their own Interest to support the Usurper, and maintain him on the Throne. However, Arthur, tho' broken with Age, and almost destitute of Friends, resolv'd to undertake the Recovery of his Kingdom, and to punish the treacherous Modred. This bold Resolution rous'd the Courage of those that dar'd not at first to declare for him. A great Number of Officers and Soldiers, who could not bear the Thoughts of fighting against him that had taught them to conquer, deserted the Usurper, and came and lifted themselves under the Banner of their lawful Prince. Thus Arthur saw himself on a sudden at the Head of an Army capable of making Modred uneasy, if not by the Number, at least by the Bravery of the Troops, and the Valour and Experience of the Leader. Modred, on his part, omitted nothing for his Defence. As he was not ignorant of the People's Inclination to his Uncle, he had reason to apprehend a general Defection; and therefore had strengthen'd himself with the Assistance of the Saxons; and upon the same Account made an Alliance with the Picts (2). He easily engag'd the Picts to his Interest, since they passionately desir'd to be reveng'd of Arthur, who had formerly carried Fire and Sword into their Country. Thus Arthur, with a handful of Friends, was forc'd to stand against the Saxons and Picts, in conjunction with the Britons that sided with Modred. But the want of Numbers was supplied by his Courage and Experience. Tho' his Troops were much inferior to those of his Enemy, he found Means however to engage him in a very disadvantageous Post, and obtain a signal Victory. In this Action he lost Galvan and Angusel, two Princes of his Blood, who had faithfully serv'd him both in Prosperity and Adversity.

and defeats
Modred.

537. Arthur gains a second Victory over Modred. nothing material, it will suffice, I believe, to relate the Issue. Modred, tho' constantly worsted, found means to prolong the War seven Years, without Arthur's being able to destroy the Usurper, much less wrest out of the Hands of the Saxons, what had been surrender'd to them. During this War, there happen'd two Eclipses of the Sun, which credulous Historians have expressly remark'd, fancying they were Presages of the utter Ruin of the Britons, which fell out soon after.

542. The Superiority of Modred's Forces being balance'd by the Valour and Experience of Arthur, the War had now lasted seven Years without any thing decisive. Modred, tho' several times vanquish'd, was still at the Head of a very numerous Army. On the other hand, Arthur, tho' extreme old, and with an Army weaken'd by the several Battles he had given his Enemy, supported himself by his great Experience in the Art of War. At last the fatal Blow was given in the Year 542. Arthur pursuing his Enemy from place to place, drove him to the Extremity of Dannonium, where he could not avoid fighting. This last Battle was fought by the River Cambalon (3), near Camelford. It prov'd fatal to the two Leaders, as well as to all the Britons, who having lost their best Troops, were never after able to stand against the Saxons. During this bloody Battle, the Uncle and Nephew happening to meet, rushed upon one another so furiously, that nothing but Death could part them. Modred was slain upon the Spot, and Arthur, mortally wounded, was carried to Glassenbury, where he died, aged 90 Years, 76 of which he had spent in the continual Exercise of Arms. Tho' he had reigned but 34 Years, yet before he mounted the Throne, he had long commanded the British Armies under Ambrosius. Some have put an Interval of several Years between Ambrosius and Arthur, because they were at a loss where to place their Uther Pendragon, whom they will have, at any rate, to be a King different from Arthur. But the best Authors are of Opinion, that the Name Uther, signifying in British a Club, was given to the great Arthur, for the same reason that Charlemain's Grandfather was call'd Martel, or Hammer. As to the Surname of Pendragon, it owes its Origin, as 'tis pretended, to Arthur's wearing a Dragon on the Crest of his Helmet.

Arthur was undoubtedly a great General. It is pity his Actions have serv'd for Foundation to numberless Fables, that have been publish'd concerning him: whereas his Life was worthy of being recorded by the gravest and most able Pen. He is said to have instituted the Order of the Knights of the Round Table, so famous in Romances. Tho' this Institution has given occasion for many fabulous Relations, it is not therefore to be deem'd altogether chimerical. For where is the Improbability that Arthur should institute an Order of Knighthood in Britain, when we learn from the Letters of Cassiodorus, that Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, instituted one in Italy in the same Century?

Such was the Love and Esteem of the Britons for this Hero, that many would never believe he was dead. Nay, there were some for several Ages after, that imagining he was travell'd into foreign Parts, expected his Return (4). This would seem incredible, had there not been, in the 10th Century, an Instance of the like Folly with regard to Don Sebastian King of Portugal. It is this perhaps that gave occasion to some Writers, desirous of pleasing the Britons, to invent Arthur's Travels and numberless Victories in foreign Countries. The Titles of Germanicus, Gallicus, Dacicus, assum'd by that Prince, might serve for Foundation to such Fictions. These pretended Voyages and imaginary Victories, have prov'd an inexhaustible Fountain of absurd and ridiculous Things, ascrib'd to him by the Writers of Romances. Hence it is, that his History has been so disfigur'd, as to cause many to doubt, whether there was ever such a Man as Arthur in the World; and no wonder, for it is impossible to reconcile all the Contradictions that occur in his fabulous History. But if we distinguish Truth from Falshood, and reject what favours too much of the Romance, we meet with nothing in the Life of this Hero, unbecoming the Character of a great Prince. The Times of his Life and Reign are so confounded by these fabulous Writers, that they are very difficult to be clear'd, and therefore Recourse must be had to the four several Epochs before-mention'd. He was born at Tindagol in Cornwall in 452, or 453, and died in 542. He was buried in the Monastery at Glassenbury, by Gueniver his second Wife. He had two others of the same Name, the first died in the Country of the Picts, and the third prov'd false to him. By this last he had a Son call'd Noem, who died an Infant. Arthur when he was about to expire, sent his Crown to Constantine his Cousin, Son of Cador, and Grandson of Ambrosius, declaring him his Successor; which must be understood only of Dannonium, for the Monarchy of Britain was extinct by his Death. It is pretended, that his Body was found whole and entire in Glassenbury Monastery in the Reign of Henry II, with the visible Marks of ten Wounds, one whereof only seem'd mortal. But what is said of his Stature is unquestionably fabulous, namely, that the Distance between his Eye-brows was a Span, and the rest of his Body in Proportion. We have the particular Names of his Arms in the antient Romances. His Shield was call'd Pridwin, his Lance Ron, and his Sword Caliburn. This last was presented in 1191 to Tancred King of Sicily, by Richard I. King of England.

Uther de
Prim. &c.
Giral.
Camb. in
Spec. Eccl.
12. c. 11.

Reg. de Hovden.

After Arthur's Death, by whose Valour and Experience the Affairs of the Britons had been supported, they were no longer able to resist the Saxons. Indeed, the Saxons had been great Sufferers too in the frequent Battles between the two Nations: but the Circumstances of the two Parties were unlike. Whatever Loss the Saxons sustained, it was soon retrieved by means of their continual Supplies from Germany. But it is easy to perceive, the Britons, being destitute of foreign Aid, must have been drained by the incessant Wars they had main-

(1) There were a number of Jutes also in Kent, Essex, and Suffex. Rapin, who was buried there. Sax. Ant.

(2) He engag'd in his Party, the Saxs, Picts, and Irish; so that there was an Army of 80,000 Men to oppose Arthur's Landing, according to Geoffrey of Monmouth, 1. 11. c. 1.

(3) Cam signifies according to Saxon. It is call'd also Camel.

(4) Historians assure us, this Nation was not entirely rooted out till his Tomb was found in the Reign of Henry II. 600 Years after his Death. Rapin, Occultavit se Rex meretriciosus etiam tanto insultant inimici, amicum meliorantur. Unde quoniam de morte Arthur vel ejus sepultura nihil reterunt, h. e. tunc, Gens Britonum quoniam adhuc vivit pre magnitudine dilectionis contendit. M. Wefm. p. 192.

tained since the Departure of the Romans. Nay, they could not make use of all the Soldiers Britain might have supply'd them with; for many of their Countrymen, seeing no End to their Miseries, were fled for Refuge to the Picts, or into Armorica. Such Numbers retired to Armorica, that by their Junction with the British Families long before settled there, they became more numerous at last than the Natives. Hence 'tis pretended, that this Province of Gaul, called Armorica, that is, Maritime, by reason of its Situation, took the Name of Bretagne from the great Number of Britons that fled thither. Argentre, who wrote the History of that Country, pretends, Armorica was antiently called Bretagne, and that the Inhabitants sending Colonies into Albion, gave that Island the Name of their own Country (1). It is probable indeed, the Armoricans peopled some part of Great-Britain; but in all that this Author alleges in proof of his Assertion, there is no sufficient Reason to shew, that, before these Colonies, Armorica was called Bretagne, much less, that the Armoricans altered the old Name of the Island of Albion.

As soon as it was rumoured in Germany that Arthur was dead, and the dismay'd Britons had neither Power nor Courage to defend themselves, great Numbers of People resolv'd to go over and settle in Britain. Ida, by Nation an Angle, and descended from Woden, having embark'd on board forty Vessels, abundance of Families of his own Countrymen landed at Flamborough in Yorkshire, then in Possession of the Northumberland Saxons, who received them as Friends. The Northumbrians, so called from inhabiting North of the Humber, had maintained themselves in that Country ever since the time of Hengist, and had all along been in some Dependence on the Kings of Kent. They had often favour'd the Enterprizes of their Countrymen in the Southern Parts, by frequent Diversions, which had several times drawn into the North the Arms of Ambrosius and Arthur: but tho' frequently defeated, they had however kept Possession of these Northern Countries, without its appearing how they were governed from the Death of Oeta and Ebussa to the Year 547. Ida, when he first arrived in their Country, (whether he had made an Agreement with them before he left Germany, or they were tired with being in Subjection to the Kings of Kent, from whom, by reason of their Distance, they could expect no Assistance) found them ready and willing to obey him. It may be, they were not in condition to oppose Ida, who had brought with him a strong Army. However this be, Ida was acknowledged for Sovereign of the Northumbrians, as well as of the Angles his Followers, under the Title of King of Northumberland (2). The Readiness of the Saxons to mix with the Angles, and obey a King of that Nation, confirms what I have elsewhere observed, That the Saxons and Angles were in Germany but one and the same People. The Name of the Saxons still remains in Germany, whilst that of the Angles is entirely lost; and on the contrary, this latter is perpetuated in Britain where the former is almost forgotten. Northumberland was the fifth Kingdom founded by the Anglo-Saxons. Ida, the first King, was a Prince of great Fame; and yet as he established himself without any Obstacle, there is but one particular recorded of him in History, and that is, his building the City of Bebbanburgh, so called from his Queen Bebba. This City, after many Years, was destroy'd: however there still remains the Castle of Bamborough.

The Memoirs concerning the Settlement of the Anglo-Saxons in Britain, are so short and imperfect, that it is impossible to frame a regular History of them. We must therefore be satisfied with a certain Number of Facts transmitted to us; by the Help whereof, the Thread of the History may, in some measure, be pursued.

In the Year 552, notwithstanding their weak Estate, the Britons made an Effort to recover part of their Lands from Cenric King of the West Saxons, but were repuls'd with great Loss near Salisbury.

We find also in the Saxon Annals, (3) that three Years after two Sons of Medred, by the Assistance of the Saxons, attempted to dethrone Constantine, to whom Arthur had bequeath'd the Kingdom of Danmonium. But Constantine, being better prepared than they expected, not only put them to rout, but pursuing them to Glaffenbury, stabb'd them himself in the Arms of the Abbot, who interceded for them in vain (4).

Ida King of Northumberland died in 559, having reigned twelve Years. Tho' the profound Peace he enjoyed during his whole Reign, gave him no Opportunity of shewing his Valour, yet all the Historians agree, he was a most accomplished Prince (5). 'Tis pity we have not a fuller Account of his Life. After his Death, Northumberland, for some unknown Reason, was divided into two Kingdoms. Adda, Son of Ida, was King of Bernicia, or the Northern Part, and Alla, descended from Woden, of Deira or the Southern Part. Ida left twelve Sons, half by Wives and half by Concubines, who formed several Branches, as may be seen in the Genealogy of the Kings of Northumberland, which the Reader should now and then take a View of, if he desires to understand fully the History of these Saxon Kingdoms.

The next Year Cenric King of Wessex, and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, died, after a Reign of twenty-six Years. The Reputation he had gain'd during his Father's Life, made it believ'd he would push his Conquests farther. But when he was on the Throne, he shew'd no Signs of Ambition, and employed himself wholly in promoting Peace and good Order in his Dominions. He took up Arms but once to repel the Britons, who came and attack'd him. Of the four Sons he left, Ceaulin, the eldest, succeeded him both in the Kingdom of Wessex, and the Dignity of Monarch of the Saxons.

Ceaulin was no sooner on the Throne, but he formed vast Projects to enlarge his Dominions by new Conquests. He was an ambitious Prince, who, not content with the Privileges he was vested with as Monarch, considered the other Saxon Kings as his Vassals, pretending to keep them in a rigorous Dependence. As he was sensible it would be very difficult to obtain the Submission he expected from them, he made extraordinary Preparations, which alarmed both the Saxon and British Princes. The last especially could not but be in extreme Consternation, by reason of their deplorable State. After the Death of Arthur, they lived in a sort of Anarchy. What remained of their Country, was cantled out into little independent States, which weaken'd one another by the Discord that reigned among their respective Princes. The British Historians give such a Character of these petty Sovereigns, that the Nation in general could have but small Hopes of Assistance from any one, or all of them together. Constantine King of Cornwall was a cruel and bloody Prince, polluted also with abominable Lusts. Aurelius Conan, whose Kingdom lay eastward of the Severn, was guilty of Parricide, and reigned with unheard of Tyranny. Vortipore King of Demetia [or South-Wales] was overgrown with Pride; he gloried also in having no Religion, and persecuting the Clergy. Cuneglas, whose Dominions were North of Cambria (so the Country was called between the Severn and the Western Sea) was grown old in Vice, and famous for his wicked Deeds. Maglocun or Malgo (6) King of Mona or Anglesey, thought of nothing but pillaging his Neighbours and Subjects, and heaping up Riches by Rapine and Violence. In a word, Britain was in a terrible Confusion. After Arthur's Decease, every one liv'd as he pleas'd, and the Authority of the Tyrants was in Proportion to the License their Subjects were suffered to take. These Sovereigns were divided among themselves, and, as they had no Confidence in one another, could not agree upon proper Means to free themselves from the impending Calamities. Each therefore pursuing only his own Interest, the Saxons were left at liberty to establish themselves upon their Ruins.

Ceaulin's Preparations, however, rous'd them a little out of their Lethargy, and obliged them to think of their Disaise. To that end they chose Malgo to command them, purely for the Sake of his Giant-like Stature. But what could this unexperienced General have done, if the Saxons had united their Forces against him? He would have lost, perhaps, in a single Battle, what the Great Arthur had taken so much Pains to preserve. But happily for him and the Britons, the Saxon Monarch was possess'd with the Project of subduing his Countrymen first, so turned against the Saxons the Arms that should have been employed against the common Enemy. He could not discover his Designs, without incurring the Enmity and Jealousy of the neighbouring Princes. But as no one of them in particular was able to withstand him, his Kingdom being much stronger than any of the rest, each dreaded being oppress'd, should he declare against him singly. They were therefore by degrees forced to submit to a much greater Dependence on their Monarch or General, than their Laws and Customs required. Mean while, they grieved in private to be thus kept under, fearing withal that Ceaulin's Designs would extend farther.

At length, Hermenric King of Kent, dying in 564, Ethelbert, his Son and Successor, could not bear the proud and haughty Proceedings of the West-Saxons, which were the more grievous to Ethelbert, as being a Descendant of Hengist, he thought he had a better Right to the Dignity of Monarch than any other Prince. Prepossess'd with this Notion, he re-

(1) The first time we find the Name of Bretagne given to Armorica, is in the Subscription of Marjactus to the Council of Tours in 461, where he is now called Britannicus. After which time it was frequently call'd Britannia, Cornwallia, Almer, Celtica, &c. See Council. Gall. Tom. I. p. 126.

(2) The Ida was the first that took upon him the Title of King; yet there were Saxon Princes in that Country many Years before. Tyr. p. 142. Malm. p. 16.

(3) It is not in the Saxon Annals, but Geograph. Min. l. 1. c. 3. 4. and M. Westm. p. 192.

(4) Historia de Legatione l. 1. c. 1. on, or he fled to Winton, where taking Shelter in the Church of St. Amphibalus, he was slain before the Altar. The other took Refuge in a Monastery in London; but being found near the Altar was kill'd. M. Westm. p. 192. Geoff. Mon. l. 1. c. 4.

(5) Ida antea & nunc loci & gentis & divitiarum nobilitas, multum splendore generis contulit natalibus, adeo bello invictus, domi severitatem regiam gerens, omnia imperia sua, pacis, &c. M. Westm. l. 1. c. 3.

(6) Ida's Sister's Son, who fled with Medred against his Uncle. Gild.

7. Ida's first King of Northumberland. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. C. 1. M. Westm.

537. Ida's first King of Northumberland. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. C. 1. M. Westm.

Ida's first King of Northumberland. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. C. 1. M. Westm.

552. Cenric King of the West Saxons. Sax. Ann.

555. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 1.

559. Ida King of Northumberland. Sax. Ann.

564. Ethelbert King of Kent. G. Malm.

solves to revive the Pretensions of the Kings of Kent, neglected by his Predecessors, and declares War with Ceaulin, not considering the Disproportion between his Forces and those of his Enemy. Ceaulin, disdainful to be attacked by a young Prince of no Reputation, marched towards Kent with design to prevent him, and meeting him at Wibbandune (1), entirely routed him. Ethelbert being defeated a second time, was totally disabled, and forced to sue for Peace. His Vexation at so unexpected a Disappointment, was increased by the Jefts of the other Princes, who rallied him for his Presumption. He had occasion for his Lesson, to teach him that Courage alone is not sufficient for War, but must be accompanied with Prudence and Strength. He improved so much by it, that he afterwards became one of the wisest and most illustrious Princes of his Nation. This was the first Civil War among the Saxons, which was followed by many more, caused by the Restlessness and Ambition of their Princes. As soon as they were out of Danger from the Britons, they quarrell'd among themselves, with such Animosity, that if another Arthur had appeared, the Britons might have recovered all they had lost. But Divine Providence had otherwise decreed.

Uffa, the only Survivor of the Twelve Chiefs of the Angles before-mentioned, assumed in 571 the Title of King of the East-Angles, and his Kingdom was called East-Anglia. As this was forty Years after his Arrival in Britain, he must have been of a great Age when crown'd. This was the sixth Kingdom founded by the Anglo-Saxons (2).

Ceaulin was so elated with his Success against Ethelbert, that he look'd upon the neighbouring Saxon Princes as his Subjects and Vassals. Indeed the King of Northumberland and East-Anglia, being separated from him by a large Tract of Land possessed by the Britons, had not much to fear from his Ambition. But the Kings of Kent, Essex and Suffex were forced to submit to him, as superior to each of them in Extent of Dominions. After this he turned his Arms against the Britons with design to make new Conquests. I can't possibly relate the Particulars of this War, being very slightly pass'd over by the Historians. They only tell us, that Cutha, Brother of Ceaulin, frequently defeated the Britons, and would, in all probability, have very much enlarged his Brother's Dominions, had not Death snatched him away in the midst of his Victories (3).

Before this War was ended, Uffa, first King of the East-Angles died in 578, leaving his Crown to his Son Titilus.

Such was the deplorable Condition of the Britons, that the time of their utter Destruction seemed to approach. Pressed on the South by the Saxons of Wessex, Suffex and Kent; on the East, by those of Essex or East-Anglia; and on the North, by the Northumbrians; they were, in a manner, surrounded by their Enemies. There was, however, one Refuge left, which helpt to keep alive, for a while, their faint Expectation of being able to withstand so many Misfortunes. As the Necessity of their Affairs had formerly obliged them to send for the Saxons to defend them against the Scots, a no less pressing Occasion compelled them at this time, to implore the Assistance of the Scots against the Saxons. This Resolution being unanimously taken, Ambassadors were sent to Aidan King of Scotland, to engage him in their Quarrel. "They" represented to him, that their Ruin would infallibly draw "on his; for the Saxons had in view no less than the Conquest of the whole Island, great part whereof was now in their possession: That if these Foreigners should at length over-run what remained in the Hands of the Britons, the Scots were to expect no better Quarter than the Picts, who were already dispossessed of part of their Country." To this they added, "That the Saxon Monarch was an active and ambitious Prince, capable of forming Designs, the Consequences whereof were to be equally dreaded by all his Neighbours, if care were not taken in time to put a stop to his Progress." Aidan, prevailed upon by these Considerations, puts himself at the head of a powerful Army, and joins the Britons, in order to attack the common Enemy. Ceaulin having notice of his March, made all possible Speed to meet him, with what Troops he could assemble. But as the neighbouring Kings, his Countrymen, were not very forward to lend him Assistance, his Forces were far from being equal to those of the Britons and Scots. How great soever the Superiority of his Enemies might be, he courageously attacks them: But, after long disputing the Victory, his Army, overpowered by Numbers, is cut in pieces, his Son Cuthwin slain, and himself narrowly escapes. The Britons were so elevated with their Success, that they began now to form Projects to drive the Saxons entirely out of the Island; but they were far from being able to put them in practice. The Saxon Princes, though well enough pleased to see Ceaulin humbled, thought it not for their Interest to let the Britons and Scots enjoy the Advantage they had gain'd by their Victory; and therefore soon put their Monarch at the head of a much more numerous Army than the former. Upon which impatient to be revenged, he goes in quest of his Enemies, and meets them without delay. In a second Battle, he repaid, by a signal Victory, his former Disgrace, and convinced the Britons of the Vanity of their Projects. Aidan retiring into Scotland after his Defeat (4), the Britons, who saw all their measures broken, thought only of preserving what they had left, content with dividing their Country with the Saxons, since they were unable to expel them. But Divine Justice that had long pursued them, was not yet satisfied. They were still to be reduced to greater Distress, and behold the best and richest part of their Island taken from them by a Nation whom God had chosen for the Instrument of his Vengeance.

Scarce were the unfortunate Britons recovered from their late Consternation, when a great Fleet appearing on their Coasts, quite sunk their Courage. This Fleet, the most considerable of any that had come from Germany, brought great Numbers of Angles, conducted by Crida a Leader of the same Nation, of the Race of Woden. I have not been able to learn where they landed, but probably it was in East-Anglia, and having marched thro' that Kingdom, they advanced towards the middle of the Island, upon the Territories of the Britons, who were unable to oppose their Arms. As Crida advanced in their Country, Disorder and Consternation increased among the miserable Britons. Some vainly projected to defend themselves, whilst others sought only to save their Goods, their Wives and Children, abandoning their Lands to the Angles. Crida taking advantage of their Terror, spread himself far and wide, and becoming Master of the Field, drove his frightened Enemies before him. In vain did they fly to their wall'd Towns; the want of Provisions for such Multitudes, soon compelled them to surrender at Discretion.

The Britons being unable to defend themselves against these new Invaders, supported by their Countrymen already settled in the Island, took the only course left them, and retired into Cambria beyond the Severn. They had no other Retreat, being pressed on all other Sides by the Saxons and Angles.

Their Flight put Crida in possession of all the Country lying between the Humber, the Severn, and Thames, by which he was bounded on the North, West, and South. To the East of him lay the Kingdoms of Essex and East-Anglia.

Out of all these Conquests, Crida formed a Kingdom larger and more considerable than any of the other six, by the Name of the Kingdom of the middle-Angles. This Kingdom was afterwards more generally called Mercia. Crida the first King was crowned in 584.

Cambria not being sufficient to contain so many Families, Multitudes of miserable Britons fled into Armorica, where great Numbers of their Countrymen were already settled. Others submitted to the Saxons or Angles, content to become Hewers of Wood and Drawers of Water for a wretched Subsistence. Those that remained in Cambria, a Country defended by Nature, kept their ground against all the Power of the Conquerors, who could not, till long after, extend their Conquests beyond the Mountains. This little corner of the Island, where the Britons were cooped up, was afterward divided into several petty Kingdoms, which were one while separated, another while united, according to the Ambition or Power of their Kings (5). Here I shall leave the Britons for the future, as making a State by themselves, and having no relation to the History of England, but what is commonly found between two neighbouring Nations. It is true they made from time to time several Attempts to recover what they had lost: But their Efforts proved ineffectual, as did the Endeavours of the Anglo-Saxons to force them in these Retreats.

The Saxons gave the Britons the Name of Gwallish, or Wallish, that is, Gauls; taking them to be, as in all appearance they were, of Gaulish Extraction. For this reason Cambria was by them termed Wallish-Land; from whence came the Name of Wales, us'd by the English at this day, and chang'd by the French into Galles, upon account of their being derived from the Gauls. The Walloons also, and Wallachians, have still kept these Names, and in some Places in Germany, the Italian Tongue is called Welsh, because of Gallia Cisalpina

(1) Wimbleton in Surry.

(2) The Kings, his Successors were from him call'd Uffings. Hig. p. 224.

(3) Anno 571, Cutha defeated the Britons at Bidford (Bedford), and took from them the Towns of Lyceanburh (Layton Buzzard in Bedfordshire), Avilbury in Buckinghamshire, and Reipreyten and Fyrbam in Oxfordshire. Anno 587, Ceaulin and Cutha defeated the three British Kings, Conmell, Conidan, and Furimail at Deorham in Gloucestershire, and took from them Gloucester, Gloucester and Bath. Again, Anno 584, there was another Battle between the Britons and Saxons at Fethardugh (Fethard in Gloucestershire) wherein Cutha was slain; but however the Saxons got the Victory. Cimnd. p. 291, 293. Anno 591, there was another Battle between them, wherein the Saxons were beat; it was fought at Widnesbirne (Widnesbury or Wansdike in Wiltshire). Cimnd. p. 85, 100. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 315. Malmsh. p. 12. M. Wilm. p. 197, 198.

(4) Some say he was slain in the Battle. Scoti-Chron. Buchan. l. 5.

(5) The Angles possess'd the Kingdoms of Northumberland, Mercia, and East-Anglia; as the Saxons the other four Kingdoms on both Sides the Thames.

inhabited by the Gauls. As for the Name of Cambria given by the native Britons to Wales, I suppose, that before the Arrival of the Saxons, the Britons, who called themselves Cumri or Cumbri, named their Country Cambria; and that after their Retreat beyond the Severn, the same Name which before was common to all Britain, became peculiar to Wales.

About the same time, the Anglo-Saxons unanimously agreed to call the seven Kingdoms in general by the Name of England, that is, the Country of the Angles. Whether this was done because the Angles were more numerous than the Saxons and Jutes, and possessed the largest and most considerable of the seven Kingdoms, or for some other reason, is uncertain. Perhaps Engle-land is only a Contraction of Engle-Saxe-land, a name derived from the two principal Nations that were settled in Great-Britain. But the Picts, Scots, and Irish, were not fond of this change of Names. They continued to call the new Possessors of Britain, Saxenag or Saxons, and their Country Saxeneage. I suppose, as the Saxons were first known in Britain, the neighbouring Nations, accustomed to that Name, did not think fit to receive the Alteration introduced by the Conquerors.

I am very sensible that the Changing of the Name of Britain into that of England is generally ascribed to Egbert King of Wessex, about two hundred and fifty Years after the time I am speaking of. But this Opinion is founded on the Authority of an Historian that is far from being infallible (1). Others, who seem to go on much better Grounds, positively affirm, the Name of England was given to that Part of Britain conquered by the Saxons, a little after their Arrival in the Island; which may very well be understood of the Time immediately following the Arrival and Conquests of Cerdic. But how is it possible to extend this little after to the Reign of Egbert, which began not till the Year 800 (2)?

After the Death of Ida, and the Division of Northumberland before-mentioned, Alla reigned in Deira, and Adda, eldest Son of Ida, in Bernicia; who dying in 563, four Kings, all Sons or Brothers of Ida, successively filled the Throne of Bernicia till the Year 586, when Athelric, Ida's youngest Brother, was placed thereon. But as he was very old, Adelfrid his Son held the Reins of the Government by his Father's Authority.

In the Year 587, Ercenwin, first King of Essex, died, after a Reign of sixty Years, and was succeeded by his Son Sledda.

Thus we have run through, in this Second Book, the most remarkable Events that happened in Great-Britain, from the Arrival of the Saxons to their Establishment in the Island, during a War of 130 Years. We have seen the Efforts of the Britons, who, after a resolute Defence, were forced at last to give up their Country to the very People they had called to their Assistance. In the following Book, we shall see what passed in the Heptarchy, the Name given to the Seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, when considered as making but one Body under the same Government. The Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, that conquered the best part of Britain, looking upon themselves as one and the same People, as they had been in Germany, established a Form of Government, as like as possible to what they had lived under in their own Country. They formed their Wittena-

Gemot, or Assembly of Wise-men, to settle the common Affairs of the Seven Kingdoms, and conferred the Command of their Armies upon one chosen out of the Seven Kings, to whom, for that reason, no doubt, some have given the Title of Monarch, on pretence of his having the Precedence and some Superiority over the rest. But to me that Dignity seems rather to have been like that of Stadtholder of the United Provinces of the Low Countries. There was however some Difference between the Saxon Government in Britain, and that in Germany. For Instance, in Germany the Governor of each Province entirely depended on the General Assembly, where the supreme Power was lodged; whereas in Britain, each King was Sovereign in his own Dominions. But notwithstanding this, all the Kingdoms together were, in some respects, considered as the same State, and every one submitted to the Resolutions of the General Assembly of the Seven Kingdoms, to which he gave his Consent by himself or Representative. And therefore this Form of Government may be very justly compared to that of the United Provinces, each whereof is Sovereign and Independent, tho' they submit to the Determination of the States-General. A Free Election, and sometimes Force, gave the Heptarchy a Chief or Monarch, whose Authority was more or less, according to their Strength. For tho' the Person invested with this Office, had no Right to an unlimited Authority, there was scarce one of these Monarchs, as will be seen hereafter, but what aspired to an absolute Power.

If we enquire into the Causes of the Revolution that happened in Great-Britain by the Conquests of the Saxons, it must be own'd, in the first Place, that God was pleas'd by a just Judgment to punish the Britons for their enormous Crimes, from which, according to their own Historians, neither People, nor Kings, nor Clergy were free. Tho' the Divine Justice does not always punish, in a visible manner, every Nation guilty of the like Crimes, yet we must perceive the Hand of God, when it manifests itself upon a particular Nation, by such terrible Effects. But as the Divine Justice generally makes use of natural Means to execute its Designs, it is these chiefly we may and ought to look after. And first, it is plain, that the Dissention of the Britons was the principal Cause of their Destruction. Had they been more united, they would have better defended themselves against the first Saxons, and thereby, no doubt, discourag'd others from attempting to settle in their Island. In the next Place, their long Subjection to the Romans had enervated their Courage, and extinguish'd their natural Inclination for War. Lastly, they long wanted a General capable of conducting them and making them sensible they were no less Brave than other Nations. For how different a People did they seem to be under the Conduct of Ambrosius and the Great Arthur, from what they were when unable to defend themselves against the Picts and Scots? So great an Influence has the Good or Bad Qualities of Princes upon the Publick Affairs, and the very Manners of their Subjects, as is evident from the Histories of all Nations. We shall find in the Sequel, that the Civil Wars of the Anglo-Saxons were no less fatal to them, than Intestine Divisions had been to the Britons. They gave occasion to the Strong to oppress the Weak, and at length made way for One to subdue All the rest.

(1) Geoffrey of Monmouth.

(2) John Bishop of Chartres says, England was so call'd from the first coming of the Angles; others from the Name Hengist, (a Notion probable enough, says Selden) whose Reputation, Wars, and Government, being first invested by Vortigern in Kent, are above all the other Germans most notable in the British Stories, and Harding

—He call'd it Engestle's Land,
Which afterwards was shorted, and call'd England.

As for the Word Englismen, 'tis us'd long before Egbert's Time, as may be seen in the Saxon Laws. And Bede, l. 2, c. 4. and l. 4, c. 1.

THE STATE of the BRITISH-CHURCH, FROM

The Arrival of the SAXONS, to the Retreat of the BRITONS into Wales.

The History of the British Church, little known.

AFTER having seen what Calamities Britain was expos'd to by the Saxon Wars of 130 Years, a regular Account of the British Church is not to be expected during that Space. It is easy to perceive, that the Ecclesiastics, who were then the only Writers, were otherwise employ'd than in penning Histories. And tho' some might have found Leisure, it would have been difficult for their Writings to descend to us. We must therefore be satisfied with a few traditional Events, without Order or Connexion, since there is no exact History of the Affairs of the British Church, whilst she was thus grievously afflicted.

*Several Schools erected.
Bede, l. 1.
c. 17-21.*

Before the Arrival of the Saxons, Germanus Bishop of Auxerre came twice into Britain, as we have said, to extirpate the Pelagian Heresy, that had taken deep Root. This Prelate perceiv'd, in these his two Voyages, that the Clergy were no less ignorant than corrupted, and that their Corruption was chiefly owing to their Ignorance. To apply some Remedy to this Evil, he believ'd the most beneficial Thing he could do for Britain would be to erect Schools for the Instruction of Youth, and particularly for those that were design'd for the Service of the Church. Pursuant to this pious Resolution, he founded several, among which, those of Dubricius and Illutus were the most famous. Dubricius, Bishop of Llandaff, was made Archbishop of Caerleon, and Metropolitan of all Cambria. He had two Schools, where he taught himself, one at Henland, and another at Mockroft. Illutus taught at Llan-twit, that is, The Church of Illutus. There was also at Bangor in Cambria a famous Monastery where Youth were educated. It is not to be doubted that these Schools of Germanus were of great Benefit to Britain since they afterwards produc'd many illustrious Men, that govern'd the British Churches in the most perillous Times. Amongst the Advantages the Britons receiv'd from the Presence of Germanus, some reckon also the Change he made in the Publick Service of the Church, by introducing the Gaulish Rites and Ceremonies. This is almost all we know concerning the British Church, during the Time the Saxons were employ'd in their Conquests. I can only add a few Particulars relating to some Ecclesiastics famous for their Sanctity who flourish'd then in the Island; with which I shall close my Account of the Church of Britain, till the Conversion of the Saxons give me occasion to speak of the Church of England.

*Schools of Dubricius
and Illutus.
Bede, l. 1.
c. 24.*

St. Patrick.

Patrick was one of the most remarkable for the Conversion of the Irish, which is generally ascrib'd to him, tho' Anatolius and Palladius preach'd in Ireland before him. In all Probability Patrick made the greatest Progress, and therefore the Irish did, and still do, reverence him as their Apostle and Protector. It is proper to observe, that there were three noted Men of this Name: Patrick the Elder, who died in 449, and is mention'd in the Chronicle of Glasfenbury Church: Patrick the Great, the Converter of the Irish, who died in 493, having govern'd the Church of Ireland 60 Years: Patrick the Younger, his Nephew, who surviv'd his Uncle some Years.

Dubricius.

Dubricius, Bishop, or rather Archbishop of Caerleon, was illustrious for his Piety, Learning, and the abovemention'd Schools; and lastly for his Synod at Brévi in Cardiganshire, against the Pelagians (1).

St. David.

David, Son of a British Prince, and Successor of Dubricius, remov'd the Archbishopial Seat from Caerleon to Menevia, from him call'd St. Davids. He was noted for his austere Life, and his Synod at Vittoria, where the Canons of Brévi were confirm'd. Several Miracles are attributed to him, particularly his giving to the Bath-Waters the Virtues they still retain. He is said to have lived 146 Years.

Sampson the Elder and Sampson the Younger. The first Sampson being Bishop of Dol in Armorica, was sent for into Britain by Ambrosius, and made Archbishop of York. The second, of Royal Race, was made an Archbishop, without any particular See assigned him, with power to perform the Archbishopial Functions where-ever he came. The Saxon Wars forc'd him to return Home, where he was made Archbishop of Dol. He is said, when he left Great-Britain, to carry with him several Memoirs, that would have given us a more perfect Knowledge of the Affairs of the British Church, had they been carefully preserv'd.

Cadoc, Abbot of Llan-carnan, spent his whole Income, Cadoc which was very considerable, in maintaining 300 Priests. He lived to the Year 570.

Patern, of a noble Family in Armorica, having studied 20 Years in Ireland, came and settled in Cambria, where he usefully employ'd his Time in promoting Peace among the several Princes. He generally resided at Cardigan, where is still to be seen Llan-Badarn-vatur, that is, The Church of great St. Patern, which for some time was a Bishop's Seat. Patern died in his native Country, where he was so distinguish'd for Holiness of Life, that no less than three Festival-days were dedicated to his Memory.

Petroc, a Native of Cornwall, was famous for his Piety, Petroc and gave Name to Petroc-stow or Padstow in the same County (2).

Kentigern, Son to a Princess of the Picts, was Abbot of Kentigern, Glasgow, from whence he went into Cambria, and founding a Religious Society, return'd to his Monastery (3). His Austerities are mightily extoll'd, and particularly his strict Abstinence from Flesh.

Asaph, the Disciple of Kentigern, wrote his Master's Asaph Life, by whom he was made Abbot of the Monastery, founded in Cambria; he liv'd to the Year 590, and left his Name to the City of St. Asaph.

Columba, nobly descend'd in Ireland, founded there a Columba Monastery, call'd Dearmach, that is, The Field of Oaks, because situated in a Forest, some time after he came into Britain, to preach the Gospel in the Highland-Picts, of which they were yet ignorant. God was pleas'd so to bless his Labours, that he had the Satisfaction to see those Savages converted to the Christian Religion, with their King Bridiud, who gave him the little Island of Jona or Hy, call'd since Colchil, where he founded another Monastery that afterwards became very famous (4). These two Monasteries for a long Time supplied the Scotch Churches both in Ireland and Great-Britain, with Bishops and Priests. It is observable, that according to the Institution of Columba, the Abbot of Jona retain'd a Jurisdiction not only over several Monasteries which branch'd forth from that, but also over the Monks that went from thence to be Priests or Bishops. Bede's reason for this, is, because Columba the Founder was himself but a Priest. It might be added, that the Monks who had vow'd Obedience to the Abbot of Jona, when they came to be Bishops, did not think the Episcopal Character freed them from their Vow. This Instance somewhat perplexes the Sticklers for the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, who endeavour to get off, by alledging it was an ill Custom crept into that Country, against the general Practice of the Church throughout Christendom (5).

Gildas of Badon, or Bath, was Scholar to Illutus, and a Gildas Monk of Bangor Monastery. He was born in the Year of the Battle of Badon according to Usher in 520, but accord-

(1) Dubricius died in the Isle of Bardsey, in 522.

(2) He was buried at Bodmin.

(3) And there died in 560. Harps. c. 28.

(4) Jona Ha, Illi, or Columba-cyille, one of the Hebrides, two Miles in Length, and one in Breadth. Camden. "This Island was given by the Picts to the Scotch Monks, because they had received Christianity through their Preaching, about A. D. 565. The Monastery here, was for a long time the Chief of almost all those of the Northern Sects, and all those of the Picts, and had the Direction of their People." (Bede, l. 3. c. 3, 4.) There were in it two Monasteries, one of Monks, dedicated to St. Columba the Apostle of the Picts, (from whom this Island was called Columba-cyille: that was the See of the Bishop of the Isles; and the other of Nuns. (Camd. p. 1071. Buchan l. 1.) This Island is famous for the Burial of the ancient Kings of Scotland, forty-four of whom are said to have been buried there (Buchan. ibid.) This Account seems more authentick than that given by Bede. Bede. According to him this Monastery was founded, A. D. 379. when Maximus, or Maximian, having banished the Scots out of Britain, — Exulabant Christi sacerdotibus ac Monachis, quicunque Scotis erant nominis, quorum magna pars in Hebrides delata, in Jona insula sacrum constituitur Locum, &c.

(5) Bede says, speaking of Jona or Hy "This Island is always went to have for its Governor the Abbot or Presbyter, to whose Authority all the Princes, and even the Bishops themselves, after an unusual Order, ought to be subject, according to the Example of their first Teacher, who was never a Bishop, but a Monk." Bede, l. 3. c. 4. The Saxon Chronicle is more express, and says, "There must be always in Hy an Abbot, and ing to my Calculation built upon Reasons, too long to be inserted, in 511. Gildas wrote a Treatise entitled, De Excidio Britannie, Of the Destruction of Britain, wherein he boldly censures the British Princes of his Time, that is, those who after the Death of Arthur, divided the Country into several petty States. From him chiefly it is, that we know what passed among the Britons about the Time he wrote, in 504. There is another History, or rather Romance, under the Name of Gildas, who is by some call'd Albanian, and suppos'd to be different from him I am speaking of. But the learned Stillingfleet asserts, they are Both the Works of one Author, and that there was no other Gildas but he of Badon.

Columbanus an Irishman, Disciple of Congal Abbot of Bangor in Ireland, pass'd great Part of his Life in Britain (1). From thence going into Burgundy, he founded the Abbey of Luxeuil, of which he was the first Abbot. Twenty Years after, Thierry King of Austrasia, and also of Burgundy, banish'd him his Dominions, for too freely censuring his Conduct, and forc'd him to fly to Agilulph King of the Lombards. At length he founded near Naples the Monastery of Cobio, where he died (2).

These were the most noted Ecclesiastics in the British Church, from the Arrival of the Saxons to the Retreat of the Britons into Cambria. It is obvious we have the Names only of those that flourish'd in Cambria, Ireland, or Scotland. As for the other Parts of Britain, we know nothing of what pass'd, with respect to Church-Affairs. We have not so much as the Names of the Bishops, except Theon and Thadock, Archbishops of London and York, who were forc'd also in the end to fly into Cambria. It is very likely, all the Monuments of the British Churches were destroy'd, where-ever the Saxons became Masters; and that it was not possible to preserve any but those of the Churches of Wales, where the Saxons could never penetrate. It is easy to imagine, that the Church was in a very mournful State, whilst the Saxons were exercising their Fury. These merciless Idolaters, as well out of Duty as Wantonness, not only trampled upon every thing relating to the Christian Religion, but let loose their Rage against the Christians themselves. Gildas and Bede have painted out their inhuman Proceedings in such a manner, as shows, their Barbarities were carried to the highest Degree imaginable. From the East to the West, says Gildas, nothing was to be seen but Churches burnt and destroy'd to their very Foundations. The Inhabitants were extirpated by the Sword, and buried under the Ruins of their own Houses. The Altars were daily profan'd by the Blood of those slain thereon. Bede who was a Saxon, and therefore not to be suppos'd to aggravate the Cruelties of his Countrymen, expresses himself thus: By the Hands of the Saxons a Fire was lighted up in Britain, that serv'd to execute the just Vengeance of God upon the wicked Britons, as he had formerly burnt Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. The Island was so ravag'd by the Conquerors or rather by the Hand of God, making use of them as Instruments, that there seem'd to be a continued Flame from Sea to Sea, which burnt up the Cities, and cover'd the Surface of the whole Isle. Publick and private Buildings fell in one common Ruin. The Priests were murder'd on the Altars; the Bishop with his Flock perish'd by Fire and Sword, without any Distinction, no one daring to give their scatter'd Bodies an honorable Burial.

To these mournful Descriptions may be added, that the Britons, who escap'd the Fury of their Enemies, not finding wherewithal to subsist in the Woods and Mountains, were forc'd at length to surrender to the Conquerors, deeming themselves happy in being able to purchase their Lives with the Loss of their Liberty. Some fled into foreign Parts, and those whom the Love of their native Country kept at home, and the Dread of Slavery prevented from submitting to the Saxons, dragg'd on a wretched Life, in miserable Want and perpetual Fear. It is therefore no wonder that the Accounts of the British Church are so imperfect, since the Saxons used their utmost Endeavours to destroy all the Monuments, that might have been preserv'd.

"and not a Bishop, and that all the Bishops of Scotland ought to be subject to him." Hence some have infer'd, that Bishops were not then thought so necessary, since the Abbot of Hy, without being ordain'd Bishop, exercis'd Episcopal Authority over those that were Bishops. To this Usher answers, "That this Authority of the Abbots of Hy, their exercising Jurisdiction over the Bishops of Scotland, was a Superiority of mere Jurisdiction, and not of Order; and cites the Annals of Usher to prove that a Bishop always resided in Hy." De Brit. Ecclef. Ant. c. 16. Lloyd proves, that Columba was ordain'd by Finnian, Bishop of Meath c. 5.

(1) He came into Britain in the Year 589.

(2) To these may be added, Tahassin the famous British Poet, whose Verses are preserv'd to this Day. Tyr. p. 144.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK III.

Concerning the most remarkable Events during the HEPTARCHY of the ANGLO-SAXONS, to its Dissolution, and the Union of the Seven Kingdoms. Containing the Space of Two Hundred and Forty Three Years.

THE Revolution caus'd by the Conquest of the Anglo-Saxons, introduc'd a new Face of Things in Great-Britain. The Country formerly inhabited by the Britons was now possess'd by Strangers. The very Names of the Towns and Provinces were chang'd, and the Country divided in a very different Manner from what it was by the Romans. It will therefore be requisite, before we proceed to the Affairs of the Anglo-Saxons (which are to be the Subject of this third Book) briefly to show the State of Great-Britain after this Revolution.

Great-Britain, canted out into several Kingdoms, was shar'd among four different Nations, namely, the Britons or Welsh, the Scots, the Picts, and the Anglo-Saxons. Under the Britons were compriz'd all those Foreigners, Romans or others, settled in the Island ever since the Reign of Claudius, who being incorporated with the Natives, became one People with them. The Descendents of these Foreigners were undoubtedly very numerous, it being the constant Policy of the Romans to diminish, as far as lay in their Power, the Natives of a conquer'd Country, and to send thither large Colonies either of Veterans, or of People taken from their other Conquests. As Britain had been in their possession four hundred Years, very probably they had not neglected, with Regard to that Island, a Custom they practis'd every where else. Before they left Britain, their Colonies were distinct from the Natives. But the War, carried by the Picts and Scots into the Roman Province, after Honorius had renounc'd his Right, and that of the Britons and Romans settled in the Island, with the Anglo-Saxons, so confounded them, that we don't find from thenceforward in any History the least Signs of Distinction between the Roman Colonies and British Natives. The Britons therefore, now retir'd beyond the Severn, are to be consider'd as a People compos'd of the ancient Inhabitants of Great-Britain and the Roman Colonies. The Vandals settled about Cambridge, were also reckon'd as Britons, and involv'd in the same Ruin with them. After the Establishment of the Seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, the Britons had nothing left but Cambria, and the Western Part of Danmonium. Cambria (the Name formerly of all Britain) was chang'd by the Saxons into Wales. As for Danmonium, it was, in all appearance, a Roman Name. The Britons call'd that Country Kernaw, from Kern, that is, in their Language, Horns, because of the many Promontories that shoot out into the Sea like Horns. Hence doubtless the Saxons gave it the Name of Cornwall, that is to say, the Country of Kernaw, inhabited by Gauls or Britons. They seem'd to study to leave neither to the Inhabitants nor Countries, any Sign of the Roman Names, since they even stil'd Welsh, a People the Romans had call'd Britons above four hundred Years. The Natives kept their Ground a good while in that Corner of the Island, as well as in Wales, till at length they were entirely subdu'd, as we shall see hereafter.

The North Part of Great Britain was in Possession of the Picts and Scots, separated from the English by the Esk and Tweed, and the Mountains between these two Rivers. The Picts were on the East, and the Scots on the West Side. The Grampian Mountains serv'd them for a common Boundary, from the Mouth of the Nid to the Lake of Lomond. Abernethy, now a small Town in the Country of Strathern, was the Capital of the Picts, from whence the Bishop's Seat was removed to St. Andrews. Edinburgh belong'd also to the Picts, and whatever the English possess'd beyond Severus's Wall was taken from the same Nation. The Territories of the Scots extended towards the North and West, as far as the Sea that bounds the Island on these two Sides.

The Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, who are all to be consider'd as one People, and comprehended under the Name of English, had conquer'd all the Southern Part of the Island, from the Channel to the Wall of Severus, and a little beyond, towards the East. This Part of Great-Britain, possess'd by these three Nations, was divided into Seven Kingdoms, whereof the Saxons and Jutes had four, namely, Kent, Essex, Sussex, and Wessex; the Angles alone had two, Mercia and East Anglia; but in Northumberland were mix'd with the Descendents of the Saxons that first took possession of the Country beyond the Humber, under Oeta and Ebusa.

The History of these seven Kingdoms is what I am now to give a general Knowledge of. I say general, because it is impossible to be very particular, by Reason of the Barrenness of the Authors that have writ on this Subject. As the greatest Part intended only to write bare Annals, they have omitted what might contribute most to the composing a regular and coherent History of each Kingdom, or of all together. Some, particularly intent upon the History of one of the seven Kingdoms, scarce make any mention of what pass'd in the rest. Hence it is that hardly any thing is known of the Affairs of some of these Kingdoms, the Histories whereof have been neglected, or, it may be, lost by some Accident.

Another greater Difficulty occurs, in the Choice of a Method. If the History of the seven Kingdoms be given at once, by placing the Events, that happened in each, according to the Order of Time, the Thread of the Narration must be continually broken, and Confusion introduc'd, which will be farther increas'd by the Difficulty of remembering Names now grown barbarous. On the other hand, if the History of each Kingdom be given apart by itself, it will be hardly possible to avoid a tedious Repetition of Facts common to two, and sometimes three of the Kingdoms, by Reason of their Wars with one another. Besides, in this Method, the Reader will lose the Benefit of seeing a perpetual Synchronism of the Affairs of the seven Kingdoms, which is no little Help to the giving a distinct Idea of the State of England, during the Heptarchy.

After weighing the Conveniencies with the Inconveniencies of these two Methods, I am resolv'd in some measure to follow both. To that End, I shall first make some Remarks on the Anglo-Saxons in general. In the next place, I shall give a brief Summary of the History of each of the seven Kingdoms in particular. Lastly, I shall represent, in Synchronical Tables, the principal Events which happen'd in each Kingdom, that the History of all the Kingdoms together may be seen at one View. I hope by this Means to give a compleat Idea, if not of all the Affairs of the Heptarchy, at least of what is most material.

Of the HEPTARCHY in General.

BY the Heptarchy is meant the Government of the seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, consider'd as making but one Body and one State. The Anglo-Saxons, as I said before, establish'd in England a Form of Government not unlike what they had lived under in Germany; that is, considering themselves as Brethren and Countrymen, and being equally concern'd to support themselves in their Conquests, they conceiv'd it necessary to assist one another, and act in common for the good of All. To that end they judg'd it proper to appoint a General in Chief, or, if you please, a Monarch, invest'd with certain Prerogatives; the Nature and Number of which we are not fully inform'd of. Upon the Death of this General or Monarch, another was chosen by the unanimous Consent of the seven Kingdoms: But there were sometimes pretty long Interregnums, caus'd by the Wars or Divisions between the Sovereigns, who could not meet or agree upon a Choice.

Besides this Monarch, they had also, as the Center of the Heptarchical Government, an Assembly-General, consisting of the principal Members of the seven Kingdoms, or their Deputies. This is what was call'd the Wittenagemot, or general Parliament; where the Concerns of the whole Nation only were consider'd. But each Kingdom had a particular Parliament, much after the manner practis'd in the United Provinces of the Low Countries. Each Kingdom was Sovereign, and yet they consulted in common, upon the Affairs that concern'd the Heptarchy; and the Acts and Resolutions of the Assembly-General were to be punctually observ'd since every King and Kingdom had assented thereto. Such was the Form of the Heptarchical Government, on which I shall no further insist, designing to speak more fully of it in another Place.

But as Time and Circumstances often cause Alteration in the best Constitutions, it happen'd that the Ambition or Restlessness of their Kings did not suffer the Anglo-Saxons to remain long in that Union the Form of their Government suppos'd. The most Powerful often took Advantage of the Weakness of the rest to aggrandize themselves at their Cost. Hence their frequent Wars with one another, which ended in the Destruction of some of the seven Kingdoms that were annex'd to others, and at last in the Union of All under the Government of a single Prince. Herein chiefly consists what is transmitted to us of the History of the seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, I mean their continual Wars from the Beginning to the End of the Heptarchy.

Another Cause of their Wars, was the Ambition of their Monarchs, who, not content with the Prerogatives annex'd to their Dignity, were for stretching their Rights. Had the Historians that writ of the Heptarchy been pleas'd to have given us an exact Account of the Prerogatives of the Monarch, we should have been able to judge, in some measure, of the Causes of the Wars, so frequently occasion'd by the Disputes on that Head. But as they have only mark'd the Time and Success of these Wars, without letting us know the Reasons and Motives of them, the History is render'd very imperfect, and incapable of being so coherent as one would wish, since the Annals give us only a bare Relation of Facts, without any manner of Connexion. All we can gather from them is, that the Anglo-Saxon Kings were naturally very restless, and Enemies to Peace. But this Character is not peculiar to them, since in the following Ages there has been no greater Union among the Princes of Europe.

Besides these Wars, to which the Historians and Annalists have chiefly confin'd themselves, there were, no doubt, many more agreeable and affecting Events, that would have embellish'd and enliven'd their Histories. But unhappily these Writers being all Monks, had not Judgment enough to make Choice of such Matters as would have render'd their Works entertaining. The Affairs of Religion, and especially the Founding of the Monasteries, and the Privileges of the Monks and Clergy, were the only things they enlarg'd upon. As their sole View was to show the Origin of these Foundations, and the Endowments of Monasteries; in doing this, they could not help informing Posterity that there were in England seven different Kingdoms; whose Kings founded such and such Monasteries, and granted them such Revenues and Immunities. By this they were led to write a kind of History of the Heptarchy, otherwise the Ground of their Rights would not have appear'd. But on the other hand, as their Design requir'd nothing more, they were satisfied with relating the Succession of the Kings in the several Kingdoms, with some of their principal Actions. This is properly all the Assistance we have for the History of the Heptarchy, the chief Subject whereof consists of Religious Affairs. Of which therefore it will be necessary to say a few Words.

When the Saxons arriv'd in England, they were all Pagans and Idolaters. It was one Hundred and Fifty Years after their Arrival, before they were instructed in the Christian Religion. Their Conversion began in 597, with the Kingdom of Kent, by Austin a Benedictine Monk, sent by Pope Gregory I. and ended in 653 with the Kingdom of Mercia, by the Ministry of certain Missionaries from Northumberland. During these 55 Years spent in propagating the Gospel, Revolutions happen'd in some of the seven Kingdoms, whereby Christianity was so rooted out, that it was again to be planted, as if it had never been heard of. This was the Case of the Kingdom of Essex, Northumberland, and East-Anglia. So from the Beginning of these Conversions to the end, there was in England a mixture of Christians and Idolaters; some of the Kingdoms being converted, whilst others remain'd in Paganism; neither were all of the same Kingdom converted at once.

Austin preach'd to the Saxons of Kent, Martin to the East-Saxons, Paulinus to the Northumbrians, Birinus to the West-Saxons, Wilfrid to the South-Saxons, Felix to the East-Angles, and the Northern Monks to the Mercians. But all these preach'd not with the same Success, because the Conjunctions were not every where alike favourable. However, in the Space of about 60 Years after the coming of Austin, all England was converted. But no more of this at present, as I intend to speak more largely of the Church of each Kingdom.

GENEALOGY OF THE KINGS OF MERCA

GENEALOGY OF Y KINGS OF NORTHUMBERLAND

I have another, and no inconsiderable Remark to make, and that is, the Monks, in converting the Anglo-Saxons, took care to inspire them with Reverence for Monasteries and the Monastick Life. They wrought so upon the Minds of the Kings and Great Men, that it is astonishing what Number of Monasteries from the Conversion of the English to the Dissolution of the Heptarchy, that is, in 200 Years, were founded in England, and what immense Riches the Monks had acquired in that Time. Religion seem'd to consist in enriching the Monks, and the highest Perfection in embracing a Monastick Life. For this Cause Kings, and Queens, Princes and Princesses, stript themselves of all their worldly Grandeur, to pass the Residue of their Days in a Monastery; some to expiate their enormous Crimes, others as believing it the readiest Way to Heaven. The Monks did not neglect to cherish the Fervour of this Sort of Devotion, extolling to the Skies those that resolv'd to offer such Sacrifices to God, and Sainting all that died in these pious Dispositions. Hence the great Number of Saints of both Sexes, recorded in the Ecclesiastical History of England, among whom are several Kings, as being of all the others the best able to purchase a Sainthood this Way.

After these general Remarks, I proceed now to the particular History of each of the seven Kingdoms, of which I shall relate only what is material, to avoid as much as possible, the Dryness which usually attends such kind of Summaries.

SUMMARY of the HISTORY

OF

NORTHUMBERLAND.

Northumberland, its Bounds.

THE Kingdom of Northumberland was situated on the North of the Humber, as its Name imports. It was bounded on the South and parted from Mercia by that River, on the West by the Irish Sea, on the North by the Country of the Picts and Scots, and on the East by the German Ocean. It contained the present Counties of Lancashire, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Northumberland, York and Durham. The principal Cities were York, Dunelm, (since called Durham), Carlisle, (named by the Romans, Luguballia) Hexham or Hagustadt, Lancaster, and some others of less Note. This Country was divided into two Parts, Deira and Bernicia, each, for some time, a distinct Kingdom of itself. Bernicia was partly situated on the North of Severus's Wall, and ended in a Point at the Mouth of the Tweed. Deira contained the Southern Part of Northumberland, as far as the Humber. The greatest Length of the whole Kingdom, including both Parts, was 160 Miles, and its greatest Breadth 100.

I D A.

547.
Sax. Ann.

Ida, the first King, began his Reign in 547, and died in 559. After his Death Northumberland was divided into two Kingdoms, namely Bernicia and Deira. Adda, Son of Ida, was King of Bernicia, and Alla of Deira, but the Occasion of this Division is unknown.

In Bernicia.

559. ADDA.

566. GLAPPA.

572. FRIDULPH.

579. THEODORIC.

586. ATHELRIC.

In Deira,

559. ALLA, died in 588.

Of all these Kings there is nothing known but the Time of their Death.

Athelric being very old when he came to the Crown, his Son Adelfrid governed the Kingdom in his Name, without the Title of King; and having espoused Acca, Daughter of Alla King of Deira, who died in 588, got possession of that Kingdom, tho' Alla left a Son of three Years old, named Edwin.

ADELFRID.

Adelfrid (1), succeeding his Father in 590, became very powerful and formidable to his Neighbours, particularly to the Welsh, as well as to the Scots and Picts. But of his Wars, Historians have related only this remarkable Particular: Adelfrid preparing to lay Siege to Chester, then in the Hands of the Welsh, these last were bent to give him Battle; and to procure the Blessing of God on their Arms, twelve hundred and fifty Monks from the Monastery of Bangor were ordered to pray near the Field of Battle, during the Fight. The Monks making too much haste to the Place appointed, were met by Adelfrid, who being told the Reason of their leaving their Monastery, put them all to the Sword. This Massacre was followed with a signal Victory over the Welsh; after which Adelfrid entered Wales, and entirely demolished the Monastery of Bangor (2), where was still above 1000 Monks, since Bede assures us they were divided into seven Classes, the least of which consisted of above 300. Two of the Gates of this immense Edifice were above a Mile asunder. As this was a very antient and famous Monastery, in all probability the Monks driven out of Britain the Saxons had taken refuge there.

Whilst Adelfrid was aggrandizing himself by his Conquests, and growing formidable to all his Neighbours, Edwin, Son of Alla King of Deira, wandered from Place to Place, destitute of the necessary Assistance to recover his Father's Dominions. Nay, it was even difficult for him to find where to remain in Safety. Adelfrid his Enemy was so powerful and so dreaded, that not one of the English Princes cared to hazard his Dominions in Defence of a distressed Orphan. At length Redowald King of the East-Angles, pitying his Condition, afforded him a Retreat at his Court. He was then about 30 Years old, of a noble Presence, and withal possessed of such good Qualities, as gained him the Love and Esteem of Redowald and his Queen. Scarce had he begun to enjoy the Sweets of his Retreat, when he saw himself on the brink of Destruction by Adelfrid's Enmity and Redowald's timorous Conduct. Adelfrid fearing the King of East-Anglia was forming some Project for the Restoration of Edwin to the Throne of Deira, sent Ambassadors to him, to desire him to deliver up Edwin, or put him to Death; and in case of Refusal, to proclaim War against him. Redowald, surpris'd at this Demand, was some time

(1) Adel, Athel, Ethel, signify Famous or Noble: Fred, Frid, Frith, Fritb, signify Peace: Adelfrid or Ethelfrid (i. e.) famous for Peace: Athelric, Nobly Strong; Ric signify Power, strong or Powerful.

(2) This Monastery was in Flintshire, near the River Dee. Camden, p. 556. Tyr. p. 164. One may judge of the Magnificence of this Monastery, by Margflus, Bishop of it, Quoniam inceditulum nostrum detate numerum fuisse, indicio sunt in eodem canebat tot gemelli Partes Ecclesiarum, tot angustias portuum, tanta turba viderem, quantum vix alibi cernat.

before he could resolve what to do. As his Forces were not equal to the King of Northumberland's, he dreaded the exposing his Dominions to the Ravages of that incensed Prince, should he afford him a Pretence for a War. On the other hand, Honour, Honesty, the Laws of Hospitality, Edwin's Innocence pleaded against his being deliver'd to an Enemy that demanded him only to take away his Life. Redwald consider'd likewise what a Disparagement it would be to submit to the Orders of one that had no Right to command him. These various Reflections made him extremely uneasy, and caus'd him to incline sometimes to the Side of Generosity, and sometimes to that of political Interest.

Whilst Redwald was thus in suspense, Edwin, inform'd by the Queen of the King's Irresolution, was in great perplexity. For twenty-seven Years he had wander'd thro' divers Kingdoms, without meeting with other Sanctuary than what the King of East-Anglia had generously granted him, but which now, by reason of the Neighbourhood of Northumberland, was like to prove fatal to him. He saw his Ruin unavoidable, if Redwald deliver'd him to his Enemy; but on the other hand, that Prince's Irresolution made him hope for some advantageous Change in his Fortune. He consider'd if Redwald resolv'd to protect him, the War that wou'd infallibly attend his Refusal, might prove a means to raise him to his Father's Throne. Besides, he was not sure of avoiding by flight the Danger that threatned him, or of finding another Retreat. He determin'd therefore to wait the Event, and trust to the Generosity of Redwald, who as yet, seem'd unresolv'd. Redwald was naturally generous: but the fear of engaging in so dangerous a War, made him at last resolve to sacrifice Edwin to the Interest of the State. Edwin inform'd of this by the Queen, gave himself over for lost; and the more, because the very moment Redwald resolv'd to make this Sacrifice to the King of Northumberland, he took all possible care to prevent the Victim's Escape.

Hitherto nothing but what is natural has been related of Edwin. But in the Days of Bede, who hath given us a large Account of this Prince's Adventures, Miracles were so much in vogue, that there was scarce any remarkable Event, in History, but what was season'd with some Prodigy or Apparition. Accordingly, that Writer, who seems a little too credulous in this Point, wou'd not neglect to embellish his Ecclesiastical History with a miraculous Event told him, as he says, by some old Men of his time. Besides, being himself a Saxon, And born in Northumberland, a Miracle wrought in favour of the first Christian King of that Kingdom, cou'd not but redound to the Honour of his Country. He has related many more, which he was not so much concern'd in, and are no better supported than this on the present Occasion. I would willingly have pass'd it over in silence, as I have many others that occur in his History, if I had not observ'd that later Historians have affected to copy it, so leaving the Reader to believe as he pleases, I shall continue the History of Edwin, as related by Bede.

Edwin, after his melancholy News from the Queen, went and walk'd in the Palace-Garden during the Night, to consider of his Affairs. Whilst he was deeply buried in Thought, he saw a Man, in a very strange Dress, coming towards him, who ask'd him, What kept him thus awake, when all the World was asleep? The Prince answer'd, he was surpris'd to see a stranger so inquisitive about the Affairs of one that was unknown to him. Think not, replied the Stranger, that I am ignorant of what employs your Thoughts: I know all that has befallen you to this Hour, and am come to bring you Consolation in your Misfortunes. What now will you give to him that shall assure you of, one Day, mounting the Throne, and becoming the most powerful and glorious King that has hitherto reign'd in England? If ever that happens, answer'd Edwin, I will liberally reward all that shall have done me any service, as well as the Person that foretells my good Fortune. He who is able and willing to raise you to this height of Grandeur, continued the Stranger, requires nothing of you but to embrace his Doctrine and obey his Precepts. I shou'd be a Wretch indeed, reply'd Edwin, should I refuse to be rul'd by so true a Friend. Then the Stranger laying his Hand on the Prince's Head, told him, Remember what I am now doing, and when the like shall happen to you, think then of performing your Promise without delay. Upon these Words, the Stranger disappear'd in an extraordinary manner, to convince Edwin there was something supernatural in this Adventure (1).

Edwin's Surprise was farther increas'd by the coming of a Messenger from the Queen, to let him know Redwald had alter'd his Mind. She had so lively represented to him the Horror of the Action he was about to commit, that he resolv'd to hazard all, rather than be instrumental in destroying the Innocent. Redwald having taking this generous Resolution, sent back the Ambassadors, declaring he cou'd not think of delivering up Edwin, much less of putting an innocent Prince to death, that had fled for Refuge to his Palace. He did not question but this Refusal would kindle a bloody War. Adelfrid was fierce and powerful, and as he could not but be provok'd, the King of East-Anglia rightly judg'd he wou'd do his utmost to be reveng'd. But as usually the Party that thinks himself injur'd, is apt to imagine the Injurer stands only upon the defensive, Redwald believ'd Adelfrid, not expecting to be attack'd, might be easily surpriz'd before he cou'd draw his Forces together. For this reason, he resolves to prevent him, and carry the War into Northumberland.

This Resolution being taken, an Army was levied with all Expedition, and divided into three Bodies, that were to march at some distance from each other. The Command of the first was given to Reyner his eldest Son, with Orders to march before and secure a certain Pass. He follow'd himself at the Head of the second, leaving Edwin in the Rear with the third. Reyner, desirous to signalize himself by some brave Action, before the Arrival of the other two Bodies, advanc'd with more speed than his Orders requir'd. He hop'd to surprize the King of Northumberland, who did not expect to be attack'd. And indeed, Adelfrid had not yet assembled all his Forces; but finding Reyner too far advanc'd to be supported, took advantage of his Rashness, and attack'd him before it was in the power of Redwald to join him. As Reyner's Conduct was entirely owing to his Excess of Ambition and Courage, he sustain'd the Efforts of Adelfrid with great Bravery; but having too much expos'd himself to Danger, was slain, and his Army put to rout.

Redwald, extremely concern'd for the loss of his Son, thought of nothing but Revenge. Having join'd Edwin he march'd with all Expedition to attack his Enemy, who, being now too far advanc'd, had not time to retreat. Nay, he could not think of retiring, after all his proud Threats, had it been in his power: and therefore, instead of retreating, he fiercely march'd towards the East-Angles. The two Armies soon coming to an Engagement (2) Adelfrid perform'd Wonders to preserve his Reputation; but finding he was over-power'd by Numbers, chose rather to die than out-live the Shame of his Defeat. With this Resolution he threw himself among the thickest of his Enemies, and fell in the midst of their Ranks, cover'd with Wounds. The Northumbrians immediately threw down their Arms, and betaking themselves to flight, left their Enemies Masters of the Field.

After this great Victory, to which Edwin had not a little contributed, Redwald march'd into Northumberland without Opposition. Adelfrid had left three Sons, Anfrid, Ofwald, and Ofuy, who finding themselves unable to resist the Conqueror, fled into Scotland. The Northumbrians, thus abandon'd, without General or Army, and in the usual Confusion on such Occasions, chose to submit to Redwald. This generous Prince would neither punish them for the Insolence of their King, nor make the best for himself of the advantage acquir'd by his Victory. From an uncommon greatness of Soul, he not only gave Edwin the Kingdom of Deira, for which he had some Pretensions, but likewise that of Ber-nicia, reserving to himself only the Glory of so heroic an Action; for which and upon account of his late Victory, he obtain'd the Dignity of Monarch then vacant.

EDWIN.

Edwin (3), who a little before was an Object of Pity, by one of those surprising Revolutions that are beyond the reach and foresight of Man, but are ever subservient to the Designs of Providence, saw himself on a sudden at the Head of a powerful Kingdom. One can't help seeing in the Advancement of this Prince, the hand of God, disposing all things, by degrees, for the Execution of his Purposes. It appear'd in the Sequel, that God was pleas'd to make use of Edwin to lead the Northumbrians to the Knowledge of the Gospel, as he had already made use of Ethelbert for the Conversion of the Saxons of Kent. This is what we shall see more fully in the History of the Church.

Upon the Death of Redwald, in 624, Edwin openly aspir'd to the Monarchy; and indeed there was then no Saxon or English Prince able to dispute that Honour with him, except Cinigisil, and Quicelm, joint Kings of the West-Saxons. Quicelm especially oppos'd him to the utmost of his Power, and thereby drew upon himself from that Prince, then in league with the King of Mercia, a War that put him in danger of losing his Dominions, and oblig'd him humbly to sue for Peace. The War being thus ended, Edwin met with no farther Opposition, and saw himself at length invest'd with the so much desir'd Dignity of Monarch. The very Welsh, to prevent an Invasion, threatned by Edwin, consented to pay him Tribute,

(1) Ut servavit, repente disparuit. Bede.

(2) Near the River Idon in Northumbria.

(3) Edwin had a. c. happy, Blisful. Win or Wine, War, or Beloved.

624.

Bede, l. 2.
c. 9.

This Prince carried the Prerogatives of the Monarchy higher than any of his Predecessors. He claimed an absolute Power over the other Kings, and treated them with little or no respect. He showed the most regard for Ebald King of Kent, whose Sister Ethelburga, a Princess of great worth, he designed to espouse. He imagined, his being Monarch would cause his proposal to be gladly received; but he met with more difficulty in his Courtship than he expected. Ethelburga, being a zealous Christian, would not hear of marrying an idolatrous Prince, tho' otherwise never so much to her advantage. Her Brother was no less averse to the match, and when proposed to him, refused to give his Consent, unless his Sister had free Liberty publicly to profess her Religion. Tho' this Condition was by no means pleasing to the Monarch, yet the desire of possessing a Princess, whose Worth was universally known, induc'd him to agree to whatever was required. On the other hand, Ethelburga was prevailed with to consent, in expectation that after the Example of Bertha of France, her Mother, who had procured the Conversion of the Saxons of Kent, she should be able likewise to lead her Spouse, and his Subjects, to the knowledge of the Truth. Every thing being settled to the King of Kent's satisfaction, Ethelburga set out for Northumberland accompanied with some Ecclesiasticks, and particularly Paulinus, consecrated Bishop by Justus Archbishop of York. This was the same Paulinus that converted Edwin and the Northumbrians to the Christian Religion, as will be more fully related in the History of the Church.

625.

Bede.
Malmsh.
Huntingd.

Edwin lived several years in profound Peace, both feared and esteemed by all the Kings of the Heptarchy. He improved these favourable Junctures, not only in maintaining his Dominion over the other Kings, but also in establishing good Order in the State, and enacting wholesome Laws, which he caused to be strictly observed. Historians remark, that in his reign Justice was administered with that impartiality and rigour, that a Child might have gone over the whole Kingdom of Northumberland with a Purse of Gold in his hand, without danger of robbing. But Edwin's chief care, after his Conversion, was to spread the Christian Religion where it was yet unknown, and replant it, where it had been abolished. By his Instigation, perhaps by his absolute order, it was, that Erpwald King of East-Anglia, permitted the Gospel to be preached again in his Dominions, and at length turned Christian himself. Edwin, who could but ill brook the least Opposition to his Will, pretended to have an Authority over the rest of the Kings, of which he was extremely jealous. By an Ensign carried before him in the form of a Globe (1), as a symbol of the Union of the Heptarchical Government in his Person, he gave them to understand, he would be considered, not only as their Head, but their Master.

633.

Bede, l. 2.
c. 2.

Malmsh.

Of all the Anglo-Saxon Princes, Penda King of Mercia was the most uneasy at Edwin's Greatness. This Prince being naturally restless and proud, and looking upon his dependence on the King of Northumberland as dishonourable, was extremely desirous to cast off that Badge of Slavery. But as he did not dare to undertake alone so great an Enterprize, he impatiently waited for a favourable opportunity to act. At that very time, there was another Prince in the Island, who, being in the same case, no less ardently desired to throw off the English Monarch's Yoke. This was Cadwalla King of Wales, who deemed it a dishonour to him and his Country, to pay tribute to a foreign Prince. These two Princes knowing at length each other's thoughts (2), enter into a League against Edwin, and make preparations, which as they could not be concealed, caused Edwin to resolve to prevent them if possible. Accordingly he advances as far as Heathfield (3), where meeting the confederate Kings, the two Armies came to an Engagement. The Battle was fought on both sides with desperate fury. The Mercians and Welsh confided in their numbers, and the Northumbrians in the valour and prudence of their King. Edwin, tho' inferior in number of Troops, supplied that defect by his courage and conduct, and kept the balance even, which made him hope Victory would at last incline to his side. But a fatal Accident robb'd him of that presence of Mind he had all along preserved, and which was then more than ever necessary. Offrid, his eldest Son, bravely seconding him, was slain at his feet with an arrow, which threw him into such a rage, that he rushed among the thickest of his Enemies, without minding, whether he was followed by his Soldiers. He was immediately run thro' in many places, and with his Life lost the Victory. Upon Edwin's disappearing, the dismayed Northum-

Sax. Ann.

brians begin to fall into disorder, and at last relinquish the Field of Battle, and take to flight.

Thus fell Edwin, in the forty eighth year of his Age, the sixteenth of his Reign, and the ninth of his Monarchy. By his first Wife, Daughter of Cearlus King of Mercia, he had two Sons, Offrid and Edfrid. By his second, Ethelburga of Kent, he had two other Sons, and two Daughters, who all died in their Infancy, except Anfleda, Wife of Osfric King of Northumberland. Edwin resided at Derwentio, now Auldby (4) in Yorkshire.

INTERREGNUM.

The two conquering Kings behaved upon their Victory with all imaginable Cruelty. As the Northumbrians, after the Loss of their King and Army were unable to resist them, they entered Northumberland and ravaged the Country in a terrible manner. Cadwalla, tho' a Christian, carried his Barbarity to that height, that Edfrid, Son of Edwin, dreading to fall into his Hands, surrendered himself to Penda, from whom he expected more favour. He was received at first with some Civility, but was afterwards, by Penda's Command, murder'd in his Presence. Queen Ethelburga and Paulinus fled to the King of Kent, who gave his Sister some Lands to found a Manastery, where she passed the residue of her Days. As for Paulinus, he was by the same King's means made Bishop of Rechester.

Bede, l. 4.
c. 20.
Bede.
Thorn.
Hist. Abb.
Contest.
C. man
Kent.

The Northumbrians were so weakened by their defeat; and the cruelty, or rather fury, of the two victorious Kings, that they remained a long time before they recovered themselves. At length, seeing no end to their Misfortunes, they judged it more honourable to die with their swords in their Hands, than perish by the barbarity of the two Tyrants, who breathed nothing but blood and slaughter. Accordingly, being resolved to sell their lives dear, they considered of choosing a Leader. But when they came to the Election, the old jealousies between the Bernicians and Deirians reviving, they could not agree upon choosing a King in common. The Men of Deira chose Osric, a relation of Edwin; and the Bernicians set Anfrid on the Throne. This last, after the defeat and death of his Father, retired into Scotland with Osfrid and Osfric's Brothers, where they were all three Baptized.

OSRIC
in Deira.ANFRID
in Bernicia.

These two Kings were no sooner on the Throne, but they abjur'd the Christian Religion, which they had before profess'd. But if their Rebellion against God was sudden, their Punishment was no less so, being both slain in the first year of their reign. Osric rashly besieging Cadwalla in York, with an Army of undisciplin'd Troops, the Welsh King, disdainingly to be thus brav'd, sallies out and attacks him so briskly, that his Army is routed, and himself slain on the spot. After which he marched against the King of Bernicia, who was at the head of twelve thousand Men, and amusing him some time with propositions of Peace, till he was within distance, fell upon him unexpectedly, and made a terrible slaughter of the Northumbrians, Anfrid himself being killed in the Battle.

633.
Bede, l. 1.
c. 1.
634.
G. Malm.
l. 1. c. 3.

INTERREGNUM.

It is easy to conceive the wretched condition of Northumberland, after so many successive Losses. Cadwalla's rage being inflam'd by the efforts of the Northumbrians, seem'd incapable of being glutted with less than the entire destruction of the miserable Nation. His barbarities at length oblig'd Osfrid, Brother of Anfrid, to resolve to hazard all, in order to relieve a People so cruelly oppress'd. In this generous resolution, he assembles a small body of Forces, with which he boldly opposes the Usurper. Tho' the King of Mercia was now return'd to his Kingdom, Cadwalla looking upon Osfrid's Army with the utmost contempt, march'd against him, not doubting of Success (5). Osfrid being inform'd of his approach, intrench'd himself in an advantageous Post, where he resolutely expected him. But as he relied more on the assistance of Heaven than his own strength, he erected a Cross before the Camp, and falling down on his knees with the whole Army, humbly implor'd a Blessing on his Arms. In the mean time, Cadwalla advanc'd full of Confidence, not questioning in the least but the Superiority of his Forces

Malmsh.
Sax. Ann.
Bede, l. 2.
c. 3.
Polychron.
l. 5. c. 12.(1) In Latin, Tuffa; Lipsius on Vegetius speaks of it.(2) Cadwalla (says Geoffrey of Monmouth) being forc'd by King Edwin to fly into Ireland, soon after return'd with a great Army of Irish, and overcame Penda King of the Mercians, oblig'd him to join his Forces against Edwin.(3) Now call'd Hatfield, in the West-Riding of Yorkshire. Camden.(4) Six Miles from York.(5) Matthew of Westminster says, Penda was then General of Cadwalla's Forces; though Bede seems to affirm, the Battle was fought against Cadwalla.

would procure him the Victory. In this belief, to encourage his Men by his Example, he attempts in person to force the Enemy's Intrenchments, wholly intent upon satisfying his furious Rage. But whilst he is endeavouring to open a passage to join his Enemies, he is shot thro' the Body with an arrow, which puts an end to his Projects and Life. His Death causes a great disorder among his Troops, who begin by degrees to retreat. Then the Northumbrians rushing out of their Reintrenchments, fall upon their Enemies so vigorously, that they are entirely routed. The Victory was so complete, and the protection of Heaven appeared so visibly in favour of the English, that the Field of Battle was named Heofen or Heaven-Field, the same that is now called Haledon (1).

O S W A L D.

614.
Flor. Wig.
M. Wulf.

After this great Victory, Oswald took possession of the two Kingdoms of Northumberland, to which he was Heir, namely, to Bernicia by Adelfrid his Father, and to Deira by Acca his Mother, Sister of Edwin. He was the most knowing, as well as most pious Prince of his Age, having been instructed in the Christian Religion whilst in Scotland. His strict Virtue, great Humility, and Zeal for the advancement of the true Religion, gained him, to such a degree, the love and esteem of his Subjects, that they revered him as a Saint after his death. He had the happiness and satisfaction to free his Country from the Tyranny of Cadwalla, to unite the two Kingdoms of Northumberland under his dominion, and moreover to be elected Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons. It is even pretended that the Welsh, Scots, and Picts were tributary to him. He took particular care to restore the Christian Religion in his Dominions, from whence the late Troubles after Edwin's Death had entirely banished it.

Bede, l. 3.
c. 1, 2.

This Prince spent several Years in this so pious and necessary a work: but at length was obliged to leave off, in order to oppose the designs of the King of Mercia, who was preparing to attack him. Penda, ever restless and haughty, could not bear to see Oswald his superior, as Monarch; and therefore, to free himself from so uneasy a dependence, without any Declaration of War, he suddenly takes up arms to surprize him. Oswald being sensible, that it was of the utmost consequence speedily to oppose the King of Mercia's Designs, made haste to meet him, before he had assembled all his Forces. Penda taking advantage of this Precipitation, which rendered him superior to his Enemy in number of Troops, gave him Battle, and obtained a signal Victory; which would have redounded more to his glory, had he not sullied it by his cruelty. The body of Oswald, who was slain in the fight, being found among the dead, the inhuman Conqueror cut it in several Pieces, and fixing them on Stakes, erected them in the field of Battle like so many Trophies. This Battle was fought at Osweestree (2). Oswald left a Son called Adelwalt, some time after King of Deira.

Bede, l. 3.
c. 9.

Penda, after his Victory, behaved with his usual barbarity. Having ravaged Northumberland, he laid siege to Bamborough, a strong Town built by Ida, where meeting with more resistance than he expected, he resolved to reduce it to ashes. To that end, having laid under the walls a great quantity of Wood, he set fire to it as soon as the wind favoured his design. But hardly was the fire lighted, when the wind came about and blew the flame directly into his Camp, by which the besiegers were great Sufferers. This Stratagem failing, he raised the Siege, and quitting Northumberland carried the War into East-Anglia. Penda's retreat affording the Northumbrians a little respite, the Bernicians place Oswy, Brother of Oswald, upon the Throne; and the next year Oswin, Son of Oswic slain by Cadwalla, was crowned King of Deira.

Bede, l. 3.
c. 16.

642.
644.
Sax. Ann.

643. O S W Y 644. O S W I N
in Bernicia. in Deira.

Oswy thought he was very unjustly dealt with, in being deprived of part of his Brother's Dominions; but as he dreaded another Invasion from Penda, it was no proper Season to do himself justice. As long therefore as he was under that apprehension, he lived in a good understanding with the King of Deira. But the moment he sees Penda engaged in other wars, he asserts his claim to Deira, and picks a quarrel with Oswin; who, after trying several ways to satisfy his Enemy, is forced at last to take up arms in his own defence. Oswin was a mild and peaceable Prince, more devout than brave, and tho' drawn into the war purely by necessity, yet for all that he could not conquer his Scruples. He verily believed, the shedding his Subjects blood in his quarrel, was the greatest of Sins, and therefore withdrawing privately from his army, he retired to a certain Earl's House (3), whom he supposed to be his best Friend, with design to betake himself from thence to some Monastery. But before he could put his project in execution, his treacherous Friend betrayed him to Oswy, who ordered him to be inhumanly murdered, in expectation of seizing his Kingdom with the greater ease. This barbarous Action did not however procure him the Advantage he hoped for. The People of Deira exasperated against him, and dreading to fall under the dominion of so cruel a Prince, immediately set Adelwalt, Son of Oswald his Brother, upon the Throne, who was better able to defend himself than his Predecessor. Some time after, Oswy touched with remorse, founded a Monastery in the very place where Oswin was murdered (4), flattering himself he should atone for his crime by this slight Penance.

O S W Y 652. A D E L W A L T
still in Bernicia. in Deira.

It was hardly possible for Oswy and Adelwalt, tho' very near relations, to live in a good understanding. Oswy still preserved his claim to the Kingdom of Deira, and Adelwalt could not be ignorant of it. Consequently it was his interest, not only to suspect his Uncle's Designs, but even to put it out of his power, if possible, from giving him any disturbance. For this reason, he readily listened to the proposal of a League with the Kings of Mercia and East-Anglia, against Oswy. Penda, tho' seventy eight years old, was the Author of this League. Oswy being informed of it, did all that lay in his Power to divert the impending Storm, even to the offering Money to Penda, to bribe him to desist from his Enterprize. But nothing could appease that Prince, the irreconcilable Enemy of the Northumbrians, who seeing himself supported by the Armies of East-Anglia and Deira, believed, he had now a favourable opportunity to gratify his Passion. Oswy therefore found, he was obliged to stand alone against these three Enemies, whose united Forces could not but inspire him with some dread. In this pressing necessity, he made a vow to found a dozen Monasteries, and make his Daughter a Nun, if God would give him the Victory. To this vow it is that Historians ascribe the Success, God was pleased to vouchsafe him in this War.

655.
G. Malm.

Whilst the two armies were advancing towards one another, Adelwalt formed new Projects. He considered, to which side soever the Victory inclined, it would prove equally dangerous to him, since he had the same reason to fear his being deprived of his Dominions by Penda as by Oswy: And therefore he resolved to save his own Troops, and stand neuter during the Battle, that he might be in condition to defend himself against the Conqueror. When the two Armies came in fight, Penda, who had not dived into Adelwalt's design, boldly attacked the King of Bernicia, not doubting of being seconded by the Deirians and East-Anglians. But when the Mercians saw Adelwalt draw off his Troops, their ardor abated, and thinking they were betrayed, began to give ground. Mean while, the Kings of Mercia and East-Anglia did their utmost to revive the Courage of the frightened Troops. But being both slain in endeavouring to renew the fight, their Army was put to rout. This Battle was fought in Yorkshire on the banks of the Aire, and the place was afterwards called Winwidfield (5).

Bede, l. 3.
c. 24.

After this Victory, Oswy, without loss of time, marched into Mercia, and became master of that Kingdom, which he enjoyed but three years. In that Interval, the Monarchy, vacant ever since the death of Oswald his Brother, was conferred upon him. Penda was properly the only Prince that could justly pretend to it, but withal the most dangerous to be intrusted with it.

Oswy held Mercia by right of Conquest, whilst the Sons of Penda were forced to seek for refuge among their Friends. Their misfortune would doubtless have been of longer continuance, had not the rigorous proceeding of Oswy's Officers compelled the Mercians to take up Arms. They concerted their measures so well, that when Oswy least expected it, the Northumbrians were on a sudden driven out

(1) Bede says, the Battle was fought at Denishburna, (suppos'd to be Difon) and relates many very incredible and superstitious Miracles concerning this Place and the Cross erected by Oswald, whose chief merit with the Monks, was his introducing Monkery with the Christian Religion, which makes the Story of the Cross to be consider'd as a monkish Fiction, as well as the Name of Heaven-field.

(2) In Scoppling, then call'd Moselfield. 'Tis incredible to think how many miracles were ascribed to him after his death by his Friends the Monks; particularly the Wonders perform'd by his Right-hand, which Bede says, was preserv'd uncorrupt in the Church of Peterborough in his time. It seems he sent one day a large Silver Dish, full of meat to some poor People to his Gate, ordering the Dish to be broken in pieces, and distributed among them. Whereupon Adrian taking him by the Right-hand, said, Let this hand never corrupt. Which (say the Monks) accordingly happen'd.

(3) He is call'd by Bede, Earl Hunwald. Brompton says, he was betray'd by one Cendebera, a Soldier, p. 787.

(4) Insutburgham, according to Bede, l. 13. c. 14, 24; afterwards Yiding Priory in Yorkshire. Lamb. Top. Dic.

(5) That is, The Field of Victory, now Leeds. Camden.

of Mercia, and Wulpher, Son of Penda, plac'd on the Throne.

A few Years after, Ofwy, in some measure repair'd this Loss, by the acquisition of Deira, upon the Death of Adelwald, who died without Heirs. Thus Northumberland was once more united into one Kingdom.

OSWY alone.

This Re-union however did not hold long. Ofwy's tender affection for his natural Son Alfred, induc'd him to divide Northumberland again, and make him King of Deira, tho' contrary to the People's Inclination.

OSWY
in Bernicia.

ALFRED
in Deira.

Ofwy, after he had reigned twenty-eight years, died in 670 (1). The beginning of his Reign was disturb'd with Wars, but his good Fortune prevail'd at last, and procur'd him some Quiet. Bede, for reasons taken Notice of in the History of the Church, ranks him among the most illustrious Kings of the Heptarchy, and loads him with praises, tho' his Reputation was very much sullied by the Murder of Ofwin. By Ansfleda, Daughter of Edwin, he had two Sons and three Daughters. Egfrid his Son succeeded him both in his Kingdom, and in the Monarchy of the Anglo-Saxons. The Deirians, upon Ofwy's death, revolted against Alfred, and put themselves under the Dominion of Egfrid, who thereby became King of all Northumberland. Alfred retir'd into Ireland, where he applied himself chiefly to his Studies, in expectation of a favourable Opportunity to recover his Dominions.

EGFRID alone.

Egfrid, tho' he came to the Crown young, soon made himself both esteem'd and fear'd. The Picts invading his Territories, were defeated several times, and forc'd in the end to purchase a Peace with part of their Country. Wulpher, King of Mercia, thought likewise to make some Conquests in Northumberland; but before the end of the War, was very glad to preserve his own Dominions. Egfrid's good Success in the beginning of his Reign, procur'd him the dignity of Monarch, which his Father enjoy'd before him.

In the Year 684. he sends an Army into Ireland for the Conquest of that Island, under the Conduct of Bertfrid, whose Cruelties to the Irish, especially in not sparing their very Churches and Monasteries, cause the Enterprize to miscarry. The Irish recovering out of their first Surprize, defend themselves so well, that Bertfrid is forc'd to return home with his almost ruin'd Army.

Egfrid not being able to gain any thing from that Quarter, resolves to enlarge his bounds towards the North, and to that end carries his Arms into the Country of the Picts, who little expected an Invasion. For which reason, they betake themselves to their Morasses and Fens, to avoid the first Attacks of their Enemies. Egfrid was so unwise as to follow them, and lead his Men into unknown Defiles, which he could not get clear of. Whereupon, the Picts, who were perfectly acquainted with the Country, harass'd his hunger-starv'd Troops in such a manner, that he lost above half his Army. And at last, to open a Passage, he was forc'd to come to a very unequal Engagement, wherein he lost his Life, in the fortieth year of his Age, and fifteenth of his Reign.

Egfrid was twice married; Adelfrida his first Wife; Daughter of Annas King of the East-Angles, and Widow of Thombert an English Lord, is said to remain a Virgin, tho' she had two Husbands, and at last to be entirely parted from Egfrid. She founded a Monastery at Ely, and was the first Abbess herself. She was reverenc'd in England by the Name of St. Aldry.

The Death of Egfrid, and loss of his Army, were extremely prejudicial to the Kingdom of Northumberland, which from that time never recovered its former Lustre. The Picts improv'd their Victory by the Conquest of part of Bernicia, which lay convenient for them. The Welsh, on the other hand, possess'd themselves of the two Provinces, that formerly compos'd the Kingdom of Archeute, and out of them erected the Kingdoms of Lenox and Cumberland; the first of which was taken from them some years after.

Egfrid leaving no Issue, the Northumbrians recall'd Alfred from Ireland, and crown'd him King of both Kingdoms, which from thenceforward remain'd always united.

ALFRED.

The Picts and Welsh having had time to secure their Conquests before Alfred was settled in his Throne, it was not possible for him, after Egfrid's death, to recover them out of their Hands. All he could do, was to defend, and that with great difficulty, the rest of his Dominions from the frequent attacks of his Neighbours. The Monarchy of the Anglo-Saxons went to the Kings of Wessex.

Alfred ended his days in 705, having reigned twenty years after his Restoration. He left his Son Ofred to succeed him at eight years of Age, under the Guardianship of a Lord nam'd Brithric.

OSRED.

The Minorities of Princes being generally attended with G. Malm. Troubles, it happen'd in the beginning of This, that Edulph, a certain Lord of the Country, taking advantage of Ofred's youth, made an attempt upon the Crown. A powerful Party having own'd him for King, Ofred and his Guardian were obliged to retire to Bamborough-Castle, where they were immediately besieged by Edulph. The length of the Siege giving Brithric time to look about him, and his Friends an opportunity of rising in favour of their lawful King, Edulph found himself deserted on a sudden, and forc'd to raise the Siege in confusion and hurry. Whereupon, Brithric improving this happy Turn, sallied out in pursuit of the Usurper, and taking him Prisoner, ordered him to be beheaded, about two Months after his Revolt.

When Ofred came of age, and was master of himself, he fell into a wicked and lewd Course of Life; but especially he had little or no regard for the Monks, which was look'd upon Then as the height of Impiety. He made no scruple, as 'tis pretended, to debauch the Nuns, and even to force them, when fair means would not prevail. Tho' this Imputation cannot be said to be certainly true, yet the Effects of it were great. After Alfred, Ofwy's natural Son, came to the Crown, all the Bastards of the Kings, or their Descendants, imagin'd they had the same right to aspire to the Throne. This prov'd the occasion of many Troubles in the Kingdom. Cenred and Ofric, descendants of Ogga, natural Son of Ida, seeing Ofred was neither esteem'd nor belov'd, form'd a Party against him, which was abetted to the utmost of their Power by the Regular and Secular Clergy, whose interest it was to have a new Sovereign. This Party became at length so strong, as to be able to give Ofred Battle, wherein he was slain, in the nineteenth year of his Age, and eleventh of his Reign. Cenred, the principal Author of the Revolt, was his Successor.

CENRED.

This Prince died in the second year of his Reign, and Ofric that assist'd him in obtaining the Crown, mounted the Throne after him.

OSRIC.

He reign'd eleven years, without doing any thing remarkable, and left his Crown to his Cousin Ceolulph.

CEOLULPH.

This Prince turning Monk, in the seventh or eighth year of his Reign, pass'd the residue of his days in the Monastery of Lindisfarn. Edbert ascended the Throne after him.

EDBERT.

The Coronation of Edbert was immediately follow'd by an Invasion of the Picts in the northern Frontiers. This War obliging him to march all his Forces towards the North, the King of Mercia, taking advantage of their distance, fell upon the southern parts of Northumberland, and carried off a great Booty.

Edbert, towards the end of his Reign, having made a League with Oengussa King of the Picts, recover'd the City of Archeute (2), Capital of the Kingdom of Lenox, taken by the Welsh in the Reign of Alfred. Deovama, General or Prince of the Welsh, endeavouring to relieve Archeute, was defeated by the confederate Kings. Shortly after, Edbert retir'd into a Monastery leaving his Crown to his Son Ofulph.

(1) And was buried in Whitby Monastery in Yorkshire, call'd in Saxon Streangheal, founded by his Daughter Elfsda. Malm. p. 20. Bede, l. 3. c. 24.

(2) Or Alcuith, the same with Dunbritton.

O S U L P II.

73. Osfulph was assassinated in the first year of his Reign; and Mollon-Adelwald, though not of the Blood-royal, was rais'd to the Throne.

MOLLON-ADELWALD.

759. Mollon-Adelwald's Election was a fresh occasion ofundry Calamities that afflicted Northumberland, and prov'd in the end the destruction of the Kingdom. The Northumbrians having been guilty of the error of placing on the Throne a King not of the Royal Family, all the Great Men thought themselves entitled to the Crown, as well as the Princes of the Blood. Hence those many Factions, that ended at last in the entire loss of the publick Liberty. Some of the Nobles finding Mollon had rais'd himself to the Throne by help of a powerful Party, believ'd it allowable for them to do the same. Osfuy, one of these Lords, led the way, but death freed the King from this Competitor. Afterwards, Alcred, descended from Ida by Alaric, one of his natural Sons, following the example of Osfuy, and secretly conspiring against Mollon, found means to insnare him and put him to death; after which he was crown'd in his stead.

A L C R E D.

765. Mollon's Faction, that was very much humbled by his death, having in time recover'd the superiority they had lost, Alcred was forc'd to fly to the King of the Picts, for fear of falling into the hands of his Enemies. As soon as he was gone, Ethelred, Son of Mollon, was plac'd on the Throne by his Father's Party.

E T H E L R E D.

774. As Ethelred had been rais'd to the Crown by the interest of his Faction, he judg'd the best way to fix himself in the Throne, would be by the death or banishment of the Heads of the contrary Party. Accordingly, three of the principal opposers of his Election were put to death, for forg'd or slight Crimes. But this method, instead of having the expected Effect, serv'd only to hasten the plots of his Enemies, whom the death of the three innocent Lords furnish'd with a plausible pretence to take up Arms. In a short time, they were able to bring into the Field an Army, that gave the King some Uneasiness. The King however sending his best Troops against them under the Command of a General entirely devoted to his Service, was in hopes of speedily reducing them to obedience. But his Army was overthrown by the Rebels. This Defeat, which was soon follow'd by a second, threw himself into such an ill Situation, that he was oblig'd to fly for refuge to some of the neighbouring Kingdoms. Upon his retiring, Alfwald, Son of Osfulph, and Grandson of Egbert, was plac'd on the Throne by the victorious Party.

A L F W A L D I.

779. Alfwald I. reigned eleven years with great Justice and Moderation. But however, it did not prevent his being assassinated by one of the contrary Faction. He was honoured by his Followers as a Saint after his death.

O S R E D II.

806. Osfred, Son of King Alcred, was chosen in his room, who, very unlike his Predecessor, became so contemptible, that he was confin'd to a Monastery the first year of his Reign. Ethelred's Party was deeply concern'd in deposing Osfred, and had interest enough to recall and place him again on the Throne, after fifteen years exile.

E T H E L R E D restored.

Ethelred began his new Reign with two acts of Cruelty,

(1) Simson of Durham, and Howeden say, that Osfred went from his Monastery into exile. From whence being invited over by some of his Party, but afterwards deserted by them, he was taken by Ethelred and put to death. S. Dunelm. p. 112. Howeden. p. 405. So that he was no Monk, as Rapin supposes.

that very much exasperated his Enemies against him. He put Osfred his Predecessor to death, who, tho' a Monk, made him uneasy (1): And then dispatch'd out of the way Alphus and Alfwald, Sons of the good King Alfwald.

During this Reign, the Danes made a descent into Northumberland, and burnt Lindisfarn Monastery. Allur'd by the booty, taken in this first Expedition, they came again next year, and pillaged Tinmouth Monastery, founded by King Egfrid. Ethelred, by the assistance of his Father-in-law, Uffa King of Mercia, prevented them from carrying their Ravages any farther, and drove them back to their Ships, where almost all of them perish'd in a sudden and violent storm on the English Coast.

After Ethelred was recall'd, his cruel and revengeful temper very much inflam'd the enmity of the opposite Faction towards him. Mean while, regardless of the murmurs of his Enemies, he thought only of glutting his Revenge, and establishing himself in his Throne, by the death or banishment of those he most fear'd. At length, attempting to send Ardulph, one of the principal Lords of the Country, into exile, he gave the contrary Party an occasion to rebel. After the civil War had lasted two years, the Malecontents, finding they had taken a tedious, and uncertain way to get rid of their King, caus'd him to be assassinated. However his Faction was still powerful enough to place Osbald, one of their own Party, on the Throne.

Charles the Great, Ethelred's Friend, was so incens'd with the Northumbrians, that he was going to proclaim war against them, as appears in Alcuin's Letter, on this occasion, to Offa King of Mercia.

O S B A L D or O S R E D.

Whilst people were intent upon the publick rejoicings at the election of the new King, the opposite Party laid their measures so well, that Osbald was dethron'd, twenty-seven days after his Election, and Ardulph chosen in his room.

A R D U L P H.

The Divisions that prevail'd in Northumberland, still continued to rend that unfortunate Kingdom. Ardulph was supported in the Throne only by one of the Factions that was then the most powerful. But this did not hinder the other Party from frequently attempting to get uppermost. Alcred, formerly King of Northumberland, left a Son nam'd Almund, who was head of this Party. This Prince beginning to grow formidable, Ardulph put him to death, judging it necessary to sacrifice him to his Safety. His death being look'd upon by his Friends as a Martyrdom, Almund was rank'd in the Number of the Saints. But this was not all that follow'd upon his death. It afforded the King's enemies a pretence to rise in arms, and set Alaric, a Lord, at their head. But this General being vanquish'd, and slain in battle, the Malecontents remain'd quiet for some time, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity. And indeed, the face of Affairs was quickly chang'd. For the opposite party became at length so powerful, that the King was glad to escape out of his Enemies hands, by flying to the Court of Charles the Great, where the English were always welcome.

A L F W A L D II.

After the Retreat of Ardulph, Alfwald II. who had chac'd him away, was plac'd on the Throne, and reigning about two years, by his Death left the Crown to Andred.

A N D R E D.

In Andred's Reign it was that Northumberland submitted to the dominion of Ecbert, King of Wessex, who put an end to the Heptarchy.

THE

History of the Kingdom of MERCIA.

Kingdom of Mercia.

THE Kingdom of Mercia was bounded on the North by the Humber, by which it was separated from Northumberland; on the West by the Severn, beyond which were the Britons or Welsh; on the South by the Thames, by which it was parted from the Kingdoms of Kent, Sussex and Wessex; on the East by the Kingdoms of Essex and East-Anglia. Thus Mercia was guarded on three Sides by three large Rivers that ran into the Sea, and served for Boundaries to all the other Kingdoms. Hence the Name, Mercia, from the Saxon Word, Merc, signifying a Bound, and not, as some fancy, from an imaginary River called Mercia. The Inhabitants of this Kingdom are sometimes termed by Historians, Mediterranei Angli, or the Mid-land English, and sometimes South-Humbrians, as being South of the Humber; but the most common Name is that of Mercians. The principal Cities of Mercia were Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwick, Leicester, Coventry, Lichfield, Northampton, Worcester, Glocester, Derby, Chester, Shrewsbury, Stafford, Oxford, Bristol. Of all the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy this was the finest and most considerable. Its greatest length was a hundred and sixty Miles, and its greatest breadth about one hundred.

CRIDA, first King of Mercia, arrived in England in 584. He was crown'd the same or the following Year, and died in 594 (1).

INTERREGNUM.

After Crida's Death, Ethelbert, King of Kent, and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, made himself Master of Mercia, and kept it some time, as will be related in the History of the Kingdom of Kent. But afterwards he restored it to Wibba, Son of Crida, reserving however some right of Sovereignty, the nature of which Historians have neglected to explain.

WIBBA.

This Prince reigned nineteen Years, and died in 615. He left a Son called Penda, who should have succeeded him, but Ethelbert being still alive, and dreading his restless and turbulent Spirit, left Mercia about a Year without a King. After that he placed Cearlus, Cousin-german of Wibba, on the Throne.

CEARLUS.

After the Death of Ethelbert in 616, Cearlus freed Mercia from the Dominion of the Kings of Kent, he reigned nine Years, and died in 624. As he left no Children, Penda Son of Wibba possessed the Throne after him.

PENDA.

This Prince was fifty Years old when he came to the Crown. Ethelbert had not without reason passed him by after his Father's Death, he being the most restless and stirring Prince that ever reigned before or since in England. He hated Peace worse than Death. I have already, in the History of Northumberland, spoken of his Wars with Edwin, Oswald and Oswy. His war with the Kings of Wessex and East-Anglia, to avoid Repetition, shall be related in the History of these two Kingdoms.

In 653, Penda caused Peda his eldest Son to be crown'd King of Leicester, and then sent him into Northumberland to espouse the Daughter of King Oswy, where he was converted to Christianity. He brought back with him some Missionaries, who preached the Gospel in Mercia with good Success. But Penda liv'd and dyed a Pagan.

At length Penda was slain in Battle in the eightieth Year of his Age, as was related in the History of Northumberland. He left five Sons, Peda, Wulfer, Ethelred, Merwald, and Mercelm, and two Daughters, Ciniburga, and Cinifwintba.

INTERREGNUM.

After the Defeat and Death of Penda, Oswy became Master of Mercia, and kept it three Years. However he left Peda his Son-in-law the little Kingdom of Leicester. But Peda being soon after poisoned by his Wife, Oswy seized that too, and held it with the rest of Mercia, till he was driven thence by Wulfer, as we have seen in the History of Northumberland.

WULFER.

Wulfer was almost as much a Stranger to Peace as his Father Penda. He waged War at several times, with all the neighbouring Princes, with various Success, one while Conqueror, another while vanquished. As the Particulars of these Wars are not very material, and besides are but lamely related by the Historians, it is needless to insist upon them. I shall only observe, that he took Adelwalch King of Sussex Prisoner, and brought him to Mercia, after having conquered his Kingdom (2). Some time after, Adelwalch turning Christian during his Imprisonment, Wulfer gave him the Isle of Wight, which he had likewise subdued. There is room to conjecture, that Wulfer had also conquered the Kingdom of Essex, since it is well known he disposed of the Bishoprick of London in favour of one Wina.

Wulfer was still an Idolater when he came to the Crown; but shortly after was converted, and his Children were brought up in the Christian Religion (3). Vereburga, one of his Daughters, was honoured as a saint. He died in 675, thinking to leave his Crown to his Son Cenrid; but his Brother Ethelred found means to supplant his Nephew and obtain the Kingdom.

ETHELRED.

Ethelred, as soon as he was seated on the Throne, erected Herefordshire into a Kingdom, and gave it to Merwald his Brother (4), who dying without Heirs, left it to his younger Brother Mercelm. But he dying also without Children, this little Kingdom was reunited to Mercia.

In 679, Ethelred invaded Kent, and made great Devastations (5). After that he turned his Arms against Northumberland (6), and compelled Egfrid to restore certain Mercian Towns, taken during the Reign of Wulfer. Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, greatly contributed to the Peace concluded between these two Kings.

In 697, Ostrib, Wife of Ethelred, was assassinated (7), and the little care taken to discover the Murderers, gives room to suspect the King himself was not innocent. However that be, Ethelred growing weary of the World, resigned his Crown to Cenred his Nephew, Son of Wulfer, and turned Monk in Bardney Monastery, of which shortly after he was made Abbot.

CENRED.

Nothing remarkable was done by this Prince, during his four Years Reign, but the exchanging his Crown for the Monkish Habit, after the Example of Offa King of Essex, who was come to his Court to demand Cinifwintba his Aunt, Daughter of Penda in Marriage. By the Persuasions of this Princess, both Kings were prevailed upon to turn Monks, and go to Rome, and receive the Tonsure at the Pope's Hands. Cenred, Son of Ethelred, succeeded his Cousin Cenrid.

CEOLRED.

Cenred had a terrible War to sustain against Ina King of the West-Saxons. Historians, according to Custom, without relating the Motives or Particulars of this War, only say, the two Kings, at Wodenburg in Wessex fought a

(1) The Saxon Annals say in 593.(2) He also defeated Cenwald, King of Wessex, at Aston, near Wallingford, Sax. Ann. Malm. Tyrol, p. 133.(3) He married Ermenilda, the Daughter of Ercombert King of Kent. Hyd. Polychron. p. 230.(4) He married the Daughter of Ermenred King of Kent. Hyd. Polychron. p. 240.(5) Particularly, he destroy'd Worcester. Huntingd. p. 318. p. 134.(6) In this battle was slain Elfwine, King Elfrid's Brother near the River Trent. Sax. Ann. Malm. Huntingd. p. 124.(7) By the South-Humbrians, i. e. the Mercians, South of the Trent. Sax. Ann. Tyrol, p. 210.

bloody Battle with such equal Success, that neither could boast of the Victory.

715. Ceolred was far from being of his Predecessor's Mind to prefer the Monks Habit before a Crown. He not only disregarded the Monks and the rest of the Clergy, but, if the Historians are to be credited, violated their Privileges without any scruple. This Behaviour, so contrary to that of all the other English Princes, raised great Clamors against him. The Monks in particular took all occasions to paint him in the blackest Colours. Their Animosity follow'd him even into the other World. After his Death, which happen'd in 716, they gave out that he resign'd his last Breath, blaspheming and talking with the Devil. Such kind of Reports against those that were not in the Interest of the Monks, were not spread without Design. The Histories of those days are full of the like Tales. Ethelbald, Grandson of Eoppa, Brother of Penda, mounted the Throne after Ceolred.

ETHEL BALD.

716. This Prince was one of the most illustrious Kings that had hitherto worn the Crown of Mercia, to which he added the Dignity of Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, resigned by Ina King of Wessex, when he turned Monk. This Dignity seems to have consisted originally only in presiding at the general Assemblies, and commanding the Armies of the seven Kingdoms, and some other Prerogatives, which conferr'd no Right of Sovereignty over the other Kings. At least, the Electors look'd upon it in this Light. But the Monarchs generally consider'd it after a very different manner. They were no sooner invest'd with it, but their first care was to grasp at an unlimited Power, to which they thought themselves intitled by the Examples of the preceding Monarchs. Ethelbald, improving some favorable Junctures in his Reign, carried the Prerogatives of the Monarchy to the highest degree, and thereby grew very troublesome and formidable to the other Kings (1). For which reason the Kings of Wessex and Northumberland agreed to attack him from two different Quarters at once. As Mercia was situated between these two Kingdoms, Ethelbald was oblig'd to send half his Army towards the North, whilst with the other half he march'd himself against the West-Saxons commanded by Ethelun. The Particulars of this War are unknown, except that Ethelbald was vanquish'd and his Army put to rout (2).

Bede, l. 5.
c. 24.
H. Hunt.

752.
Ann. Sax.
H. Hunt.

757.
M. Weft.

Four Years after, this Prince was slain (3) in a Mutiny of the Army rais'd by a Lord named Beornred, who was proclaim'd King by the Soldiers.

BEORNRED, the Usurper.

757.
C. Malm.
l. 1. c. 2.
Bede, l. 5. p. 1.

Beornred's Election by the Army, who had no right to assume such an Authority, was very displeasing to the Mercian Lords, especially as the King elect was no ways related to the Royal Family. And therefore, before Beornred had time to establish himself in his Usurpation, they forthwith plac'd on the Throne Offa Nephew of the late King. Presently after, Offa drawing an Army together, gave the Usurper Battle, and obtained a complete Victory. Some say, Beornred was slain, and others, that he maintain'd his Ground for a while in some part of Mercia.

O F F A.

757.
C. Malm.
l. 1. c. 2.
H. Wig.
Huntingd.
M. Paris.

Offa was one of the most famous Kings that reigned in England during the Heptarchy, not only for his being invest'd with the Dignity of Monarch, but for his Victories over the Welsh and the neighbouring Saxon Princes (4), and for several other things which I shall briefly relate. One of his greatest Victories was that over Aldric King of Kent, in 774.

Nothing was more common than to see those who were invest'd with the Monarchy, aspiring to a sovereign Authority over the other Kings. Offa, treading in the Steps of his Predecessors, never ceased to disturb his Neighbours on that occasion, and was engag'd by his Ambition in continual Wars with such Princes as disput'd his pretended Rights.

(1) Anno 715. He took Somerset: In 742 defeated the Welsh, and made all the Kings and Provinces of England, South of the Humber, acknowledge him for their Sovereign. Huntingd. Brompt. Sax. Ann.

(2) At Bugford, or Burford, in Oxfordshire. Byrd, p. 226. Huntingd. p. 341, says it was at Hersford. See Sax. Ann. Malm. Brompt.

(3) At Seaxdane, now call'd Seckington, in Warwickshire, Camden, p. 507, 515; and was buried at Respardane, or Repton, in Derbyshire, Camden, p. 591. See Sax. Ann. Huntingd. Ingulph. Brompt.

(4) He conquer'd the Kings of Kent, Wessex and Northumbria. Hunting. Sax. Ann. M. Paris. Malm. Anno 778, he defeated the West-Saxons at Wootton Bassett, in Oxfordshire. Huntingd. p. 343. Byrd, p. 230.

The Dike may be seen on Brady Hill, and near Flyd at Hely and Lantern in Hesfordshire: and is continued northwards from Knighen a part of Shropshire into Montgomeryshire, and goes over the long Mountain of Keen Dyke, to Harden-Castle, crosses the Severn and Lean-Drain (from whence it passes the Wynny again into Shropshire, not far from Oswardby). In Denbighshire it is visible along the Road between Kewston and Wrexham, and being continued thro' Flinth, ends a little below Holywell, a place formerly the site of the Castle of Bajungwerk. See Camden, p. 698.

(5) Matt. Paris says, that he shut her up, and would never let her come nigh him again, p. 981.

(6) He was murder'd at Mordon, about three Miles from Hersford. Leavis's Hist. of Gr. Brit. Introd. p. 43.

(7) It was in all upon twenty-three of our present Counties, but far his Dominions extended.

(8) Adrian.

(9) Arch. Bæon in his historical and political Discourses, c. 9. makes it appear it was far from being a Tribute. Rupin.

But these Wars are so confusedly and tamely related by the Historians, that all I could say would not suffice to give a clear Notion of them. We must therefore be contented with what has been said of him in general, which may serve to discover the Character of King Offa.

Whilst Offa was employ'd in subduing the Saxon Kings, the Welsh, always upon the Watch to improve the Advantages afforded them by the frequent Dissentions of the English, thought they had now a fair Opportunity to attack him. This unexpected War, wherein the Welsh at first were successful, caus'd Offa to conclude a Peace with the English, in order to turn his Arms against the Welsh. He quickly reduc'd them to such a Condition that they were forced to abandon not only their late Conquests in Mercia, but also part of their own Country beyond the Severn, which Offa seiz'd and peopled with English Colonies. But to prevent the Welsh from ever retaking it, he threw up a Rampart, defended by a large Ditch, by means of which he parted his Conquests from the rest of Wales. This Rampart, in length twenty four Miles, reaching from the Mouth of the Dee, to the place where the Wye runs into the Severn, was call'd Clawdh Offa, or Offa's Dyke (5).

In 786, Offa made his Son Egfrid Partner with him in the Government, and gave his Daughter Edburg in Marriage to Britric King of Wessex.

What cast the greatest Blemish on Offa's Reputation was his Treachery to Ethelbert King of the East-Angles. This young Prince desirous to marry, came to the Court of Offa and demanded his Daughter Adelfrida in Marriage. He was receiv'd at first with great Marks of Affection and Esteem. But soon after the Scene was changed, Offa, by the pressing and repeated Intigations of Quendrida his Wife (6), who represent'd to him that he ought by all means to embrace so fair an Opportunity of becoming Master of East-Anglia, was perswaded to break the most sacred Laws of Honor and Hospitality, by the Murder of Ethelbert (7). Which done he marches into East-Anglia with a numerous Army, before the East-Angles had time to prepare for their Defence, and meeting with no Opposition, seizes the Kingdom, and unites it to Mercia.

He had no sooner committed this Horrid Fact, but he was tormented with cruel Remorse. His Crime was continually before his Eyes, and tortured him to such a Degree, that he could not enjoy a Moment's Ease. To appease his raging Conscience, he resolv'd upon a Journey to Rome, (which he perform'd in 794) to obtain a Pardon from the Pope, and secure himself from the Punishment due to his Crime. The Pope (8) granted his Request, on condition he would be liberal to the Churches and Monasteries: for that was the only way then of atoning for Sins. It were to be wish'd that Restitution had also been enjoined as a necessary and previous Condition.

Among the Liberalities of Offa to the Churches of Rome, we must not omit one of great Consequence for England. Ina King of the West-Saxons, had now founded at Rome a College for the Education of English Youth; for the Maintenance whereof the Founder order'd a Penny to be collected yearly of every Family in his Dominions (9). This kind of Charity was term'd Romefcot, that is, Tribute of Rome, or sent to Rome. Offa extended this Tax throughout Mercia and East-Anglia, the Lands belonging to the Monastery of St. Albans only excepted: And because this Money was paid at Rome on a Holy-day, call'd St. Peter's ad vincula (10), this Tax was nam'd Peter-Pence, instead of Romefcot. By this Means the Directors of the College were abundantly supplied wherewithal to defray the Expence they were at from the great Concourse of the English, who came to study at Rome. In process of Time, the Popes pretending it was a Tribute paid by the English to St. Peter and his Successors, convert'd it to their own use, 'till it was entirely abolish'd by Henry VIII (11).

Before Offa left Rome, he obtain'd of the Pope the Canonization of St. Alban, the first British Martyr, whose Relicks were pretended to be found at Verulam. At his return, he built there a fine Church and a stately Monastery, to which he granted great Privileges and a large Revenue. From that time Verulam was call'd St. Albans. Offa was also very munificent to the Church of Hereford, where the Body of the King of East-Anglia lay buried, that Prayers might be incessantly made for the Murdered and Murderer.

795.

Bede, l. 1.

7.

William of Malmsbury, speaking of King Offa, doubts whether he should rank him among the good or bad Princes (1). The Canonization of St. Alban, procured by his means, and the founding a noble Monastery in Honour of that Saint, being put in the Balance against the Murder of Ethelbert, is the Ground of that Historian's Uncertainty.

The Reign of Offa is memorable upon several Accounts: His Dike: The Union of East-Anglia to Mercia: The erecting of Lichfield into an Archbishoprick (2), of which I shall speak elsewhere: Peter-Pence: A Body of Laws publish'd under the Title of Mercens Leaga, (i. e.) Laws of the Mercians (3), which serv'd for Pattern to his Successors, and the greatest part whereof were insert'd in King Alfred's Laws, published about the end of the next Century (4).

Offa had contracted a close Friendship with Charles the Great. We meet with some of their Letters in the Life of Offa at the end of Matthew Paris's History: A Life wherein are almost as many Fables as Truths.

This Prince died in 796, after a Reign of thirty nine Years. Egfrid who had already been crowned as his Partner succeeded him both in the Kingdom of Mercia, and Dignity of Monarch.

E G F R I D.

Egfrid, who survived his Father but four or five Months, employed that time in enriching the Monks, and particularly those of St. Albans. Cenulph, descended from Wibba by another Branch, succeeded him in both his Dignities.

C E N U L P H.

Cenulph was no sooner on the Throne, but he declared

War against Edbert-Pren King of Kent, the motive whereof is unknown (5). We are only told, it proved fatal to the King of Kent, who being taken Prisoner, was carried to Mercia, where Cenulph ordered his Eyes to be put out (6), after he had placed another King (7) on the Throne of Kent (8).

Cenulph died in 819, after a glorious Reign of twenty G. Malm. four Years. He left a Son very young, named Cenelm, P. 4. and two Daughters, Quendrida and Burganilda.

C E N E L M.

Quendrida, eldest Sister of Cenelm, hoping to mount the Throne, if her brother was out of the way, caused him to be assassinated by one Ascobert, who threw his Body into a Well, where it was found as it is pretended by a Miracle. Quendrida did not reap that Benefit from her Crime, she expected; for the Mercians placed on the Throne Cenulph Uncle of the late King.

C E O L U P H.

This Prince after a Year's Reign was deposed by Bernulph, one of the principal Lords of the Country. 819. An. Sax.

BERNULPH, 821. LUDICAN, 823.

WITGLAPH, 825.

I shall say nothing here of these three last Kings of Mercia, because I shall have occasion to mention them in the History of the Kings of Wessex.

THE

History of EAST-ANGLIA.

THE Kingdom of the East-Angles was bounded on the North by the Humber and the German Ocean: On the East by the same Ocean, which surrounded it almost on two sides: On the South by the Kingdom of Essex; and on the West by Mercia. Its greatest length was eighty, and its greatest breadth fifty five miles. It contained the two Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, with part of Cambridgeshire. The chief Towns were Norwich, Thetford, Ely, and Cambridge. I have already related, how this Kingdom was founded by the Angles that landed on the eastern Coasts of Britain, under twelve Chiefs, the Survivor of whom, Uffa, assumed the Title of King of the East-Angles.

U F F A.

571. We don't find this Prince acted any thing remarkable after his being King. He died in 578, leaving his Son Titilus to succeed him.

T I T I L U S.

578. All we know of this King is, that he died in 599, and had for Successor his Son Redowald.

R E D O W A L D.

599. This Prince was the most illustrious of all the Kings of East-Anglia, if not of the whole Heptarchy. As I have had occasion to speak of him largely in the History of Northumberland, I shall only observe here that he died in 624, leaving his Crown to his Son Erpwald.

E R P W A L D.

624. Erpwald made but a very indifferent Figure in the Heptarchy, being all along in Subjection to Edwin King of Northumberland, who might have depriv'd him of his Kingdom, with the Consent of the East-Angles, if the Obligations he had received from Redowald his Father would have suffered him to have been guilty of so black an Ingratitude. However he was in reality the Sovereign of East-Anglia, tho' he left Erpwald the Title of King. Erpwald was assassinated in 633, after he had reign'd about nine Years. Bede, l. 2. c. 15.

I N T E R R E G N U M.

After his Death, East-Anglia had no King for three Years, the Reason whereof is unknown. In 636 the East-Angles placed on the Throne Sigebert, half Brother of their last King. 633.

S I G E B E R T.

This Prince who was banished by Erpwald his Brother by the Mother's Side, on suspicion of aspiring to the Crown, had retired into France, where he became a Christian. As soon as he was King of East-Anglia, he made it his chief Business to bring his Subjects to the Knowledge of the true God; which indeed was planted among them in the Reign of Redowald, but having made no great Progress, was now almost extinguished. After he had effected this Work by the Assistance of Felix a Burgundian Priest, he retired into a Monastery, resigning his Crown to Egric his Cousin. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 5. FL. Wig. Bede, l. 3. c. 18. H. Hunt. l. 3.

E G R I C.

Egric soon after his Coronation, being attacked by Penda King of Mercia, the East-Angles having no great Confidence in their new King, petition Sigebert to quit his Monastery, and put himself at the Head of their Army. He stood out a good while against their Intreaties: But possess'd with a Notion that Heaven must crown so pious a Prince 644. Bede.

(1) Probably the true Reason why W. Malmsbury gives him an indifferent Character, is, because he seized the Lands of several Monasteries, particularly that at Malmsbury. See W. Malmsb. p. 30.

(2) Upon his conquering Kent he remov'd the Archbishopric from Canterbury to Lichfield. See M. Paris, p. 978, 979. Malmsb. de Pontif. p. 199.

(3) Concerning this Matter, see Nicholson's Hist. Libr. p. 45. and his Preface to Dr Wilkins's Saxon-Laws.

(4) Gosfrid of Monmouth, l. 1. c. 20; and Ranulph of Chester, l. 1. c. 50. confound these Mercian Laws with the Laws of one Marcia, Wife of Guthred a British King. Alfred the Great says in his Preface to his Laws, That he had taken them from the Laws of Ethelbert King of Kent, Ina King of Wessex and Offa King of Mercia. Rapin.

(5) Malmsbury assigns no other Reason for it, but that he was push'd on by an inveterate Animosity against them, which he inherited from Offa, p. 33.

(6) W. Malmsbury says, that he ordered him to be set at Liberty soon after, p. 33.

(7) Guthred. Malmsbury.

(8) He restored Adelard, Archbishop of Canterbury, to the Dignity of Metropolitan. Malmsb. ibid.

with Victory, they press him so earnestly, that at length he yields to their request, and heads the Army with Egric, carrying nothing but a Switch in his Hand. God, who is not directed by the Imaginations of Men, gave the Victory to the Mercians, both the East-Anglian Kings being slain on the spot. They were succeeded by Annas, Son of Ennius, Nephew of Redwald.

A N N A S.

644. Annas was one of the most illustrious Kings of East-Anglia. By his Aid it was, that Cenwalch King of Wessex, who fled to him for Refuge, was restored to his Kingdom, of which he had been depriv'd by Penda in 645.

654. This Action drew upon him the Hatred of Penda, who, out of Revenge, resolv'd to carry Fire and Sword into East-Anglia. Annas died whilst he was preparing for his Defence, leaving the Management of this dangerous War to Ethelric, his Brother and Successor (1).

E T H E L R I C.

654. Ethelric dreading the Valour and Power of Penda, bribes him with a Sum of Money to desist from his War with the East-Anglians, and to induce him to invade Northumberland, offers to accompany him with all his Forces. I have already related how they were both slain in an Engagement with Osfric. Adekwald, Brother of Ethelric, mounted the Throne after him.

A D E L W A L D.

655. We know nothing more of this Prince, but that he died in 664, leaving his Crown to Aldulph his Nephew, Son of Ethelric.

A L D U L P H.

Of this Prince all we can learn is, that he was alive in 680, and assisted at the Council of Hatfield. His Successor was Alfwald.

A L F W A L D.

Alfwald died in 749, and was succeeded by Beorna and Ethelbert, who divided the Kingdom. ^{Flor. M. West.}

B E O R N A and E T H E L B E R T.

Ethelbert dying before the Year 758, Beorna reign'd alone. But we know nothing more of him, but that he was succeeded by Ethelred. 749.

E T H E L R E D.

Ethelred dying about the Year 790, left the Crown to Ethelbert.

E T H E L B E R T.

This is the Prince that Offa King of Mercia put to death in order to seize his Kingdom in 792 (3). From that time East-Anglia and Mercia made but one Kingdom.

T H E .

History of the Kingdom E S S E X.

Kingdom of Essex.

TH E Kingdom of Essex or the East-Saxons was bounded on the North by East-Anglia, on the East by the German Ocean, on the South by the Thames, and on the West by Mercia. Its greatest length was seventy five Miles, and its breadth thirty eight. It contain'd the Counties of Essex and Middlesex, and part of Hertfordshire. The principal Cities were London and Colechester; the first of which became afterwards the Metropolis of all England. It had formerly been very considerable, by reason of its Situation, in the time of the Romans, who made it a Colony. But in all Probability it was reduc'd very low after the Arrival of the Saxons.

This Country having been extorted from Vortigern by Hengist, after the Massacre of the British Lords, was erected into a Kingdom by Erchenwin the first King. Historians have neglected to inform us of the occasion and manner of founding this Kingdom, by which the Successors of Hengist were depriv'd of almost as large a Tract of Land as the Kingdom of Kent. Had a Monastery been in the case, we should have had all the Particulars.

E R C H E N W I N.

527. Erchenwin began his Reign in 527, and died in 587, after he had reign'd sixty Years. He was succeeded by his Son Sledda. ^{G. Malmsh. l. 1. c. 6.}

S L E D D A.

587. It is not known in what Year this Prince died, but only that his Son Sabert or Saba reign'd in 599.

S A B E R T.

604. Sabert was the first Christian King of Essex, being converted by the preaching of Mellitus, and Solicitation of Ethelbert King of Kent, his Uncle by his Mother's Side (4). He was noted for his Piety and Zeal for the true Religion. He died in 616, and was succeeded by his three Sons (5). ^{Bede, l. 2. c. 3.}

S A X R E D, S E W A R D, and S I G E B E R T.

616. These three Princes reigning together, forsook with one Consent the Christian Religion, which they had profess'd ^{Br. mpt. M. West.}

during their Father's Life. After they had reign'd seven Years, they rashly came to an unequal Engagement with Cinigisil and Quicelm Kings of Wessex, and were all three cut off, with their whole Army. Their Successor was Sigebert the Little. ^{Bede, l. 2. c. 15. M. West.}

S I G E B E R T the Little.

Sigebert the Little. Nothing particular is known concerning this Prince, not so much as the time of his Death, but only that he was succeeded by Sigebert the Good, Grandson of a Brother of pious King Sabert, and was on the Throne in the Year 653. 623.

S I G E B E R T the Good.

Sigebert restor'd the Christian Religion in his Dominions, from whence it had been expell'd ever since the Death of Sabert. He was assisted therein by Cedd, a Northumbrian Priest, consecrated Bishop of the East-Saxons. This Prince was assassinated in 655, by two Counts his Relations, who, having been excommunicated by Cedd, complain'd that the King, instead of avenging their Quarrel, had cast himself at the Feet of the Bishop, begging pardon for conversing with them after their Excommunication. His Successor was Swithelm his Brother. ^{Fl. Wig. G. Malmsh. l. 1. c. 6. Bede, l. 3. c. 22.}

S W I T H E L M.

There is nothing particular concerning this Prince except that Sebba and Siger succeeded him. 655. ^{Fl. Wig. G. Malmsh.}

S E B B A and S I G E R.

Sebba was Son of Seward, and Siger of Sigebert the Little, Son of the same Seward. Siger return'd to Idolatry; but Sebba stedfastly adhered to the Christian Religion. They were Vassals to the King of Mercia, as was before observ'd in the Reign of Wulfher. Siger dying in 683, Sebba remain'd sole King of Essex.

S E B B A alone.

Sebba reign'd about eleven Years longer, and then, 683.

(1) The Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 317. and Malmsh. say, that he was slain in a Battle with Penda.
(2) Byssop says, he saw in a Chronicle of Maurice, a King nam'd Switbeard, who reign'd in 749. He might have succeeded Alfwald, Rafin.
(3) He was buried after his Death. Malmsh. Exempt.
(4) Rædla, Sister to Ethelbert, was Sabert's Mother. Rafin.
(5) He was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, which, according to some, he built. Higd. Pely. l. p. 228.

GENEALOGY OF THE KINGS OF ESSEX.

9		¹ ENCHENMENT ¹⁹ K. of Exeter d. 1087.
10		² STEPH ¹ Widow of Kent. d. 1100.
11		³ SAREPT d. 1110.	Saxbald
12	⁴ SAREPT d. 1110.	⁴ SAREPT d. 1110.	⁴ SAREPT d. 1110.
13	⁵ SAREPT d. 1110.	⁵ SAREPT d. 1110.	⁵ SAREPT d. 1110.
14	⁶ SAREPT d. 1110.	⁶ SAREPT d. 1110.	⁶ SAREPT d. 1110.
15	⁷ SAREPT d. 1110.	⁷ SAREPT d. 1110.	⁷ SAREPT d. 1110.

GENEALOGY OF THE KINGS OF SUSSEX.

Abbreviations
12	d. died K. King ———— Efa ————
13	1 ENLA 101 K. of Sigow ———— d. 514. ———— Eoppa ———— From whom spring the K. of North.
14	Batalph ———— 2 Colotim ———— 1584 d. 590 ————
15	or Cifeneus ———— 3 Planigus ———— 5th. 4th. ANONYMUS d. 648. ————
16	4 ADENIACHI 101 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35 36 37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 46 47 48 49 50 51 52 53 54 55 56 57 58 59 60 61 62 63 64 65 66 67 68 69 70 71 72 73 74 75 76 77 78 79 80 81 82 83 84 85 86 87 88 89 90 91 92 93 94 95 96 97 98 99 100 101 102 103 104 105 106 107 108 109 110 111 112 113 114 115 116 117 118 119 120 121 122 123 124 125 126 127 128 129 130 131 132 133 134 135 136 137 138 139 140 141 142 143 144 145 146 147 148 149 150 151 152 153 154 155 156 157 158 159 160 161 162 163 164 165 166 167 168 169 170 171 172 173 174 175 176 177 178 179 180 181 182 183 184 185 186 187 188 189 190 191 192 193 194 195 196 197 198 199 200 201 202 203 204 205 206 207 208 209 210 211 212 213 214 215 216 217 218 219 220 221 222 223 224 225 226 227 228 229 230 231 232 233 234 235 236 237 238 239 240 241 242 243 244 245 246 247 248 249 250 251 252 253 254 255 256 257 258 259 260 261 262 263 264 265 266 267 268 269 270 271 272 273 274 275 276 277 278 279 280 281 282 283 284 285 286 287 288 289 290 291 292 293 294 295 296 297 298 299 300 301 302 303 304 305 306 307 308 309 310 311 312 313 314 315 316 317 318 319 320 321 322 323 324 325 326 327 328 329 330 331 332 333 334 335 336 337 338 339 340 341 342 343 344 345 346 347 348 349 350 351 352 353 354 355 356 357 358 359 360 361 362 363 364 365 366 367 368 369 370 371 372 373 374 375 376 377 378 379 380 381 382 383 384 385 386 387 388 389 390 391 392 393 394 395 396 397 398 399 400 401 402 403 404 405 406 407 408 409 410 411 412 413 414 415 416 417 418 419 420 421 422 423 424 425 426 427 428 429 430 431 432 433 434 435 436 being very old, turn'd Monk in 694. He left his Crown to Sighard and Senofrid his Sons.

Pope's Hands. Offa is said by some to be succeeded by Seolred or Selred, Son of Sigebert the Good.

SIGHARD and SENOFRID.

SEOLRED.

694. These two Brothers reigned, and very probably died, together about the Year 705. Offa, Son of Siger, mounted the Throne after them.

Seolred reigned thirty eight Years, and was killed at last, 707. but by whom, or in what manner, is unknown. Swi- G. Malm. H. Hunt. thred his Son succeeded him, as some say.

OFFA.

SWITHRED.

705. This Prince desiring to marry, and casting his Eyes on Cinifwintha, Daughter of Penda King of Mercia, goes to the Court of Cenred to demand this Princess his Aunt in Marriage. But Cinifwintha, being very religious and not young, persuades her Lover to turn Monk, as she does likewise her Nephew King of Mercia. These two Princes went to Rome together, and received the Tonsure at the

This is the last King of Essex, whose Name occurs in History or the Saxon Annals. He began his Reign in 746, and in case he was alive at the time of the Dissolution of the Heptarchy, must have reigned seventy eight Years.

Of all the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, there is none whose History is so imperfect as that of the Kingdom of Essex.

THE

History of the Kingdom of KENT.

Kingdom of Kent.

THE Kingdom of Kent, the first that was founded by the Saxons, being neither large nor very considerable, made no Figure in the Heptarchy, only during the Reigns of Hengist and Ethelbert. It was very advantageously situated, having the Sea on the South and East; the Thames on the North; and the little Kingdom of Sussex on the West. As long as this last subsisted, it served as a Bulwark to the Kings of Kent, against the Ambition of the Kings of Wessex. But after it was subdued by the West-Saxons, the Kingdom of Kent was in continual Danger of falling under the Domination of these powerful Neighbours. The Truth is, the Jealousy between the Kings of Wessex and Mercia, and the Equality of their Forces, were the only things that long prevented this little Kingdom from becoming a Prey to one or other of them. It was not above sixty Miles in length, and thirty in breadth. The chief Towns were Dorobern or Canterbury the Capital, Dover, Rocheſter, and some others not so large indeed, but considerable however for their Situation and Harbours, as Sandwich, Deal, Folkstone, Reculver, &c.

HENGIST, first King.

455. Hengist arrived in Great Britain in 449. He assumed the Title of King of Kent in 455, and died in 488. He was succeeded by his Son Efcus.

ESCUS.

488. As the Saxons, after the Death of Hengist, conferred the Command of their Armies on Ella King of Sussex, Efcus very likely was not in so great Esteem as his Father. I know of nothing remarkable concerning his Reign (1), which lasted to the Year 512. His Successor was Oeta his Son.

OCTA.

512. This Prince suffered, or at least could not prevent the dismembring of Essex and Middlesex from the Kingdom of Kent, to form the Kingdom of the East-Saxons. This is the only Particular we meet with during this twenty two Years Reign. After Oeta, his Father Hermenric ascended the Throne of Kent.

HERMENRIC.

534. There is nothing particular concerning this Prince, who reigned however thirty Years. Before his Death he associated Ethelbert his Son and Successor.

ETHELBERT.

568. Ethelbert was one of the most celebrated Kings, not only of Kent, but of the whole Heptarchy. He was famous upon many Accounts, particularly for his being the first Christian King of his Nation. But as I intend to speak elsewhere of the Conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, I shall relate here only such of Ethelbert's Actions as respect not Religion.

This Prince, who had a great and an aspiring Genius, beheld with regret, that his Predecessors had lost the Dignity of Monarch and the Superiority Hengist had over all the Saxons, settled in his time in Great-Britain. At his coming to the Crown, he finds Ceaulin King of Wessex in possession of this Superiority as Monarch. He resolves to dispute it with him, but is twice worsted. For this cause he remains quiet till the Year 593, when he takes up Arms again, not singly as before, but in conjunction with all the other Kings, who are displeased with Ceaulin's seizing the Kingdom of Sussex. Ethelbert being declared General, defeated Ceaulin, who died soon after.

After Ceaulin's Death, Ethelbert being elected Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, and forgetting the Fall of Ceaulin, of which he himself was the cause, exercised an almost absolute Power over all the Kingdoms lying South of the Humber, the Northumbrians alone having found means to keep themselves independent. All the rest chose rather to submit than contend with him (2).

Besides his being formidable to his Neighbours for his great Accomplishments, he had moreover the Advantage of being allied to France by means of his Marriage with Bertha, Daughter of Cherebert King of Paris. This Alliance procured him great Respect, the Kings his Neighbours having reason to dread the introducing the French into England, as he might easily have done. But though the Haughtiness wherewith Ethelbert treated them, after several Victories, made them exceeding uneasy, they had still a much greater Occasion to be alarmed.

Upon the Death of Crida King of Mercia, Ethelbert seized that Kingdom, though the deceased King had left a Son of fit Age to succeed him. In this Ethelbert trod exactly in the Steps of Ceaulin, though he had himself stirred up the other Kings against that Monarch, on account of his Ambition. Thus Men, for the most part, condemn in others what they approve in themselves. Ethelbert it seems pretended that he had a Right as Monarch, or as Descendent of Hengist, to succeed to all the vacant Thrones in the Heptarchy. For when Fortune smiles on a Man, he easily finds Reasons, good or bad, to support the most exorbitant Pretensions. However this be, the Anglo-Saxon Princes, alarmed at this open Usurpation, began to stir and take Measures to put a stop to this formidable Power, before it grew to a greater Height. The Monarch dreading they would all join in a league against him, and serve him as they did Ceaulin, thought it not Prudence to expose himself to the same Danger. Accordingly, to make them easy, he restored the Kingdom of Mercia to Wibba, Son of Crida, reserving however such an Authority over him, that he durst not undertake any thing without his Order or Leave. Satisfied with this kind of Moderation, the Englisch Princes laid aside all thoughts of a War, which Necessity alone had driven them to.

Nothing very remarkable happened in the rest of Ethelbert's Reign, except what relates to Religion, of which I shall speak in the History of the Church. This Prince had two Wives, the first was Bertha of France

(1) H. Huntingd. says, that he enlarged his Dominions, by conquering the Kingdoms of the Britons, p. 312.

(2) Malmſbury observes, that King Ethelbert, in the beginning of his Reign, was a Scorn to the neighbouring Princes; for being beaten in one or two Battles, he could scarce defend his own Territories: but when in his riper Years he had learned more Experience in War, he soon brought under his Subjection all the Nations of the Anglo-Saxons, except the Northumbrians. Rapin.

by whom he had Edbald his Successor, and Ethelburga, married to Edwin King of Northumberland. The Name of his second Wife is unknown. He died in 616 (1), after he had reigned fifty two Years.

EDBALD.

916. Edbald was very unlike his Father. As soon as he became his own Master, he forsook the Christian Religion and turned Heathen. He is even said to have married the Queen his Mother-in-law. His Vices rendering him slothful and unactive, all the English Sovereigns cast off the Yoke they had worn during the Life of Ethelbert. The King of Mercia in particular having freed himself from the Servitude Ethelbert had kept him in, Edbald had neither the Power nor Courage to maintain what the King his Father thought he had so firmly established. I don't know whether Historians are not agreed in giving this Prince an exceeding bad Character, in order to set off his Conversion the more. However this be, they assure us, that by the Pains of Laurentius, Archbishop of Canterbury, he was brought to a sense of his Errors, and returning to the Profession of the Gospel, spent the remainder of his Days in the Practice of its Precepts. He left two Sons (2), Ermenfred and Ercombert, which last succeeded him, and a Daughter named Enfwith, Foundress of the Abby of Folkstone.

ERCOMBERT.

640. Ercombert, though the youngest of Edbald's Sons, found means to ascend the Throne, in prejudice of his elder Brother (3). This Prince ordered the Temples of the false Gods to be razed to the Ground, and the Idols broken in Pieces, lest they should prove a Snare to the People. Ermenfred his Brother being seized with a Distemper that brought him to his Grave, he promis'd to leave the Crown, which of right belonged to him, to his Children. But he was not so good as his Word: Perhaps it was too late when he came to think of it just before his Death, in the Year 664 (4). He left two Sons, Egbert and Lothair, and two Daughters; Ermenilda the eldest was Wife of Wulpher King of Mercia: The other was a Nun.

EGBERT.

664. Egbert was no sooner on the Throne, but he put two Sons of his Uncle Ermenfred to Death; for fear they should disturb him in the Possession of the Crown. He presented their Sister Domnena with some Lands in the Isle of Thanet, where she founded a Monastery. This Prince died in 673; leaving two Sons, Edric and Widred, who were not his immediate Successors, the Crown being seized by their Uncle Lothair.

LOTHAIR.

673. After Lothair had reigned ten Years unmolested (5), to secure the Succession in his Family, he made his Son Richard Partner with him in the Government. This Proceeding obliges his Nephew Edric, Son of his Brother Egbert, to withdraw from Court, and apply to Edelwalch King of Sussex for Aid, who puts him at the Head of an Army; with which entering Kent, he vanquished Lothair, who died of the Wounds he received in Battle. After this Victory, Edric was crowned without Opposition. Richard Son of Lothair fled into Germany, where Boniface, Archbishop of Mentz, an Englishman, gave him his Sister in Marriage, and caused him to be elected King of Suabia, if we may believe some Historians. I don't know how he came to die at Lucca in Tuscany, where his Tomb is still to be seen. They stile him King of England, though at most he was but King of Kent.

EDRIC.

This Prince reigned but two Years (6), and as he had no Children, left the Crown to his Brother Widred, who was forced to make Swabert his Partner, whose Extraction is unknown.

WIDRED and SWABERT.

686. After Edric's Death, Troubles and Commotions arose in the Kingdom of Kent, occasioned by the Ambition of some Nobles who fortified themselves, and refused to acknowledge Widred for King. In all probability Swabert was one of the principal of the Rebels, since he was associated into the Government. It is not known whether he was any way related to the Royal Family.

In the Reign of these two Kings, Cadwalla King of the West-Saxons imagining the intestine Divisions of Kent would render the Kingdom an easy Conquest, sent an Army thither under the Command of his Brother Mollon, who overran great part of the Country. But at length, the two Kings joining Forces, vanquish him in Battle. Mollon perceiving he was closely pursued, took shelter with twelve others in a House which they valiantly defended: But the Kentish Soldiers setting fire to it, they all miserably perished in the Flames. Cadwalla soon revenged the Death of his Brother, whom he tenderly loved. He entered Kent with a formidable Army, and never left till he had destroyed the whole Country with Fire and Sword. After this Invasion, Kent was reduced so low, that it never more made any Figure in the Heptarchy.

The two Kings enjoyed no Repose till the Year 691. This perhaps is the reason of Bede's placing the beginning of Widred's Reign in this Year, tho' he was crowned five Years before. Swabert died in 695, and Widred remained sole King of Kent.

WIDRED alone.

He reigned twelve Years alone, and died in 725 (7), leaving three Sons, Ethelbert, Edbert and Aldric: The two eldest jointly succeeded him.

ETHELBERT and EDBERT.

These two Brothers reigned together till the Year 748, when Edbert died.

ETHELBERT alone.

This Prince reigned ten or twelve Years alone, and after a Reign of thirty six Years, left his Crown to his Brother Aldric. He had associated his Son Arduolph, who died before him (8).

ALDRIC.

Aldric was frequently attacked by his Neighbours, who seeing the weak Estate of the Kingdom of Kent, improv'd the Opportunity to subdue it. Offa King of Mercia was one of the most forward. He gained a Battle upon Aldric, which sunk the Affairs of Kent very low, but however the Jealousy of the other Kings would not suffer Offa to become Master of the Kingdom. Beside, he was diverted from the War by a Welsh Invasion in Mercia, as hath been related in the History of that Prince. Had it not been for this, he would in all likelihood have united Kent to Mercia. Aldric had associated his Son Almund, but that Prince dying before him, he left no Heirs, and with him ended the Race of Hengist. After his Death, Edbert, surnamed Pren, was placed on the Throne.

EDBERT-PREN.

The Kingdom of Kent being extremely weakned, Cenulph King of Mercia, making use of so fair an Opportunity, ravaged it from one end to the other; and at last having defeated and taken Edbert Prisoner, carried him into Mercia, where he ordered his Eyes to be put out. After that he placed on the Throne Cudred, who was in absolute Dependence upon him, and paid him Tribute.

CUDRED.

This tributary King reigned eight Years as Vassal of the King of Mercia, who permitted, after his Death in 803, his Son Baldred to succeed him.

BALDRED.

In the Reign of Baldred it was that the Heptarchy was dissolv'd. The Dissolution began with the Conquest of Kent by Ecbert King of Wessex; as will be seen hereafter.

(1) Bede places his Death in 613. Feb. 24.
(2) By Emma Daughter of the King of the Franks. Malmsh. He reigned twenty-three Years: Humingd. p. 317.
(3) Through the Assistance and Appointment of his Father. S. Dunelm. p. 36.
(4) Malmsh. p. 10. gives this Character of him, "That he was famous both for his Piety towards God, and his Love to his Country."
(5) This could not be, if Malmsh.'s Account be true, viz. That he was molested for eleven Years by Edric the Son of Egbert, and that they had several Engagements, with various Success, p. 11.
(6) For he was deprived both of his Kingdom and Life, says Malmsh. p. 11. but how, he does not mention.
(7) According to this Computation, he must have reigned forty Years, whereas Malmsh. says he reigned but thirty three, p. 11.
(8) In this Reign Canterbury was burnt. Malmsh. p. 11.

THE

History of the Kingdom of S U S S E X.

The Kingdom of Susssex.

THE Kingdom of Sussex was one of the most inconsiderable of the Heptarchy. It contained only the two Counties of Sussex and Surry, the greatest part of which consisted of the large Forest of Andredswald, so called by the Saxons from Anderida, the Name it had in the time of the Romans. As this Forest stood untouched when Ella conquered Sussex, we may suppose it was cleared by degrees. This Kingdom was not above fifty Miles long and forty broad. It was bounded on the North by the Thames, on the South by the Sea, on the East by the Kingdom of Kent, and on the West by Wessex. The capital City was Chichester, built by Cissa the second King of this Kingdom. He built also Cisbury, whose Ruins are still to be seen.

E L L A first King.

491. Ella arrived in Britain in 476, and was crowned King of Sussex in 491. He was a Prince of so great Reputation among the Saxons, that they judged him worthy to succeed Hengist in the Command of their Armies. He met with some ill Success, having to deal with so experienced a General as Arthur. But however it did not hinder him from settling in the Country where he first landed, and founding there the Kingdom of Sussex or of the South-Saxons. I have largely spoken of Baldulph and Colgrin his Sons, slain in the Battle of Badon. This Prince dying in 514, left the Crown to his only surviving Son Cissa.

B. II.

C I S S A.

514. Cissa was memorable only for his long Reign of seventy six Years, and, I may add, his great Age. For supposing him but a Year or two old when his Father brought him over in 476, he must have been at least one hundred and fifteen, or one hundred and sixteen Years of Age when he died in 590. But it is not very likely Ella should bring with him a Child of a Year old.

M. West.

590. Cissa leaving no Issue, Ceaulin King of Wessex and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons seized the Kingdom of Sussex. This occasioned the League against him. But notwithstanding his being vanquished, Ceolric his Nephew and Successor remained in Possession of Sussex.

Flor. Wig. H. Hunt. l. 2.

From that time the South-Saxons made several Attempts to shake off the Yoke of the Kings of Wessex. And herein properly consists the History of Sussex, till the Kingdom was entirely subdued.

In 607 they revolted against Ceolric King of Wessex, but were reduced to Obedience.

In 648 they made another Struggle with better Success. Cenowalch King of Wessex continuing still in East-Anglia, and Penda King of Mercia being Master of Wessex the South-Saxons took that Opportunity to place on their Throne a King named Adelwalch.

A D E L W A L C H.

684. The Kingdom of Wessex having suffered much by Pen- da's Invasion, who seized and kept it three Years, Cenowalch was little able, after his Restoration, to dethrone the new King of Sussex. But Adelwalch however was not left in quiet. Wulpher King of Mercia, having attacked Cenowalch and worsted him in several Encounters, penetrated as far as Sussex, where vanquishing Adelwalch in Battle, he took him Prisoner, and after that, became Master of his Kingdom, and the Isle of Wight. Adelwalch having embraced the Christian Religion in Mercia, where he was Prisoner, Wulpher set him at Liberty, and made him a Present of the Isle of Wight (1).

It is very probable Adelwalch, after the Death of Wulpher, recovered the Kingdom of Sussex, since we find in the Saxon Annals, that he was on the Throne in 686.

The same Year Cedwalla, a West-Saxon fugitive Prince, entered Sussex with an Army, and Adelwalch endeavouring to drive him thence was slain in Battle.

After the Death of Adelwalch, Cedwalla would have made himself Master of Sussex, but was opposed by Authun and Berthun, who were returned with an Army from an Expedition in the Kingdom of Kent. At the same time, Cedwalla, hearing of the Death of the King of Wessex, who had expell'd him his Dominions, returned thither, where he was placed on the Throne. Mean while Authun and Berthun were crowned Kings of Sussex. They are said by some to be Sons of Adelwalch, and by others, his Generals only.

A U T H U N and B E R T H U N.

These two Kings did not live long undisturbed. Cedwalla now become King of Wessex, made war upon them, and gained a Battle, wherein Berthun was slain.

A U T H U N alone.

Authun very probably preserved the Crown of Sussex, by an entire Dependence on the King of Wessex, who, after the Death of Authun, would not even suffer the vacant Throne to be filled.

The South-Saxons made several Attempts to recover their Liberty. They took up Arms in 722: But having taken wrong Measures, Ina King of Wessex reduced them to Obedience.

Three Years after, taking Advantage of some Troubles that broke out in Wessex, they placed on the Throne a King named Albert. But Ina having defeated and slain the new King, united their Kingdom to his own.

However, this prevented them not in 754, in the Reign of Sigebert King of Wessex, afterwards depos'd, from revolting once more, and chusing one Osmond for their King. In all likelihood Cenulph, Successor of Sigebert, found means to reduce them again to a state of Dependence. From that time the South-Saxons, as far as appears, never attempted to recover their Liberty, their Country being considered ever after as a Province of Wessex.

The Kingdom of Wessex or West-Saxons.

THERE were in the Heptarchy three Kingdoms, two of Angles, and one of Saxons, that greatly surpassed the rest in Grandeur and Power. The two Kingdoms of Angles were Northumberland situated beyond the Humber, and Mercia containing all that lay between the Humber, the Thames and the Severn, with the two Kingdoms of Essex and East-Anglia. Wessex the third great Kingdom, inhabited by Saxons and Jutes, was situated South of the Thames, in breadth about Seventy Miles, from the Thames to the Bri- tish Channel; and in length one hundred and Fifty, from the Frontiers of Sussex, to the River Tamar, which parted it from Cornwal. The principal Cities were Winchester, the Capital, Southampton, Portsmouth, Salisbury, Dorchester, Sherborn, Exeter, where a great many Britons were mixt with the Saxons. The Isle of Wight, inhabited by Jutes, was also dependent on this Kingdom.

As each Kingdom of the Heptarchy derived its Name from the Inhabitants and Situation, the Kingdom of Wessex or of the West-Saxons was so called, because it lay

(1) And of the Country of the Meanevori in Wessex. Bede, l. 4. c. 13. which is suppos'd to be that part of Hampshire, that is now divided into the Hundreds of Meaneborow, East-mean, and West-mean. Camden in Hampshire.
(2) And after a Reign of eighteen Years. Huntingd. p. 314.

West of Suffex, Kent, and Effex. Besides the Extent, the Situation of this Kingdom made it also very considerable, since it was guarded on the North by the Thames, and on the South by the Sea; on the East it was bounded by the little Kingdom of Suffex, not at all formidable to its Neighbours, and on the West by the Britons of Cornwall, divided so from the rest of their Countrymen the Welsh, by the Mouth of the Severn, that it was almost impossible for them to assist one another.

C E R D I C.

519. This Prince, of whom I have largely spoken in the second Book, arrived in Britain in the Year 495, and was crowned the first time King of the West-Saxons in 519, after Arthur had surrendered to him the two Counties of Hampshire and Somersetshire, the whole then of this Kingdom. He was crowned a second time at Winchester in 532 or 533, by the same Title, upon the Delivery of Berkshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, and Dorsetshire by Mordred. He died in 534 leaving his Crown to his Son Cenric.

C E N R I C.

534. Cenric, who during his Father's Life was renowned for his Valour and Conduct, after he was King, preferred a quiet Life to the Noise and Hurry of Arms. We don't find he acted any thing memorable during his Reign, except defeating the Britons, who ventured to attack him in 552. He died in 560, and was succeeded by Ceaulin his eldest Son.

C E A U L I N.

560. Ceaulin, being elected Monarch after his Father's Death, carried the Prerogatives of that Dignity to a very great Height. Having brought the neighbouring Princes into subjection, he made them apprehensive, by seizing the Kingdom of Suffex after Cissa's Death, that he intended to reduce all England into one Kingdom. The better to secure Suffex, he went and kept his Court at Chichester, leaving the Government of Wessex to Ceolric his Nephew, whom he designed for his Successor. His Ambition caused all the other Kings, Ceolric himself not excepted, to enter into a League against him. He was vanquished by the King of Kent, who commanded the confederate Army (1), and forced to fly to some unknown Corner, where he ended his Days soon after. His Wars with the Britons and Aidan King of Scotland, were related in the second Book.

C E O L R I C.

594. Nothing particular occurs concerning this Prince after his Accession to the Throne upon the Death of his Uncle Ceaulin. He died in 598 and was succeeded by his Brother Ceolulph.

C E O L U L P H.

598. All we know of this Prince is, that in 607 he reduced to Obedience the South-Saxons, who had revolted (2). He died in 611, and had for his Successor Cinigisil his Nephew, Son of Ceolric.

C I N I G I S I L.

611. A Year after his Coronation Cinigisil associated Quicelm his Brother, or rather divided with him the Kingdom of Wessex.

C I N I G I S I L and Q U I C E L M.

612. These two Brothers obtained in 614 a signal Victory over the Britons (3).
614. I have already given an Account of Quicelm's Wars with Edwin King of Northumberland, and shall have further Occasion to mention him in the History of the Church; and therefore shall say no more of him here.

(1) This Battle was fought at Wodenstike. Malmsb. p. 12 now call'd Wansdike in Wiltshire. See Camden in Wiltshire.
(2) Huntingd. says, that during his whole Reign, he was engaged in Wars either with the English, the Scots, or the Picts, p. 315. And Malmsb. that he spent his whole Life in Wars, and was never idle, being always employed, either in defending or enlarging his Dominions, p. 12.
(3) At Beamdune, Sax. Ann. which Mr. Camden takes to be Bampton in Devonshire, or Bindon in Dorsetshire, p. 54, 56. They had also a Battle with Penda King of Mercia, who attempted to take Cenestor from them. Malmsb. p. 12.
(4) At Witgeornesbrugg, says Malmsb. p. 13. The Saxon Annals say at Bradenford, now Bradford in Wiltshire. See Camden.
(5) Near the Hill call'd Pene, in Somersetshire; the Welsh were driven back as far as the River Parret. Huntingd. p. 317. Malmsb.
(6) Malmsbury says, that Cenowalch depriv'd Wulpher of the greatest part of his Kingdom, p. 13. But Huntingd. affirms, that Cenowalch was defeated p. 317.
(7) M. Westminster says, she was expell'd the Kingdom by the Nobles, who despis'd female Government. But what Authority he had for This does not appear. Malmsbury gives her a great Character.
(8) For about the Space of ten Years. Bede, l. 4. c. 12.
(9) At a Place call'd in the Sax. Ann. Bedanbeafde, now Bedwin in Wiltshire. Camden.
(10) He ravag'd that County, and pursued them as far as the Sea, or St. George's Channel. Huntingd. p. 318. Malmsb. p. 14.
(11) According to Malmsbury, he carried away all that were able to bear Arms, that he might leave the Country defenceless, p. 14.

Quicelm turned Christian a little before his Death, which happened in 635.

C I N I G I S I L alone.

This Prince who had embraced the Christian Religion sometime before his Brother, in 636, reigned alone till his Death. He left his Crown to his Son Cenowalch.

C E N O W A L C H.

The Reign of Cenowalch was much troubled with his Wars with the Kings of Mercia. Penda, whose Sister he had married and divorced, attacked him when he least expected it, and compelled him to abandon his Kingdom, and fly for Refuge to Anna King of the East-Angles, where he remained the three Years Penda kept possession of Wessex. Cenowalch was converted in East-Anglia, and at length restored to his Kingdom by the Assistance of Anna.

In 652 he obtained a signal Victory over the Britons (4), which was followed by another in 658 (5).

Some Years after, he was engaged in war with Wulpher, Successor of Penda: but which was the Aggressor, or what was the Success of the War is unknown. Wulpher was defeated and taken Prisoner. Others affirm he had entirely the Advantage, which to me seems most likely (6). It is certain Wulpher conquered Suffex and the Isle of Wight, which he could not have done, if Cenowalch had been in condition to oppose him. However this be, Cenowalch died in 672, and left his Crown to his Queen Sexburga.

S E X B U R G A.

She was a Princess of great Courage, of a very sublime and extensive Genius, and possessed all the Qualifications necessary for well-governing a Kingdom. She reigned but one Year, and then died, as some say; but according to others, was deposed by the West-Saxons, who thought it a Dishonour to obey a Woman (7).

After the Death or Expulsion of Sexburga, the Kingdom was divided among several of the Great Men (8), of whom Cenfus, a Prince of the Royal Blood, descended from Cerdic, was the chief. Nothing more particular is known concerning this dismembering of the Kingdom, which however was united again into one Body, after these petty Tyrants were either Dead or expelled.

C E N F U S, E S C W I N, and C E N T W I N.

In 674, Cenfus associated his Son Escwin, and probably was forced to let Centwin Brother to the late King Cenowalch reign also over some part of the Kingdom.

The next Year Wulpher attacked the Kings of Wessex, whose Army was commanded by Escwin. A bloody Battle was fought, in which Wulpher had the Advantage; though the Loss on both sides was very great (9).

Cenfus died two Years after, and Escwin his Son did not long survive him. Thus Centwin remained sole King of Wessex.

C E N T W I N alone.

History inform us, that in 682 Centwin obtained a signal Victory over the Welsh (10), upon which Cadwallader their King was forced to go and sue for Assistance from the King of Armorica: The Welsh Prince afterwards took a Journey to Rome, where he died.

About the end of Centwin's Reign, Cedwalla a Prince of the Blood-Royal of Wessex had so gained the People's Affection, that the King being jealous of him ordered him to depart the Kingdom. As Cedwalla could not dispute the King's Command, he retired into Suffex, and being well beloved, a great many young People chose to accompany him, and follow his Fortune, inasmuch that he entered Suffex with a sort of Army (11). Adelwalch, then King of Suffex, angry at Cedwalla's presuming to enter his Dominions in a warlike Manner, and without his Permission, would have driven him thence, but was slain in the fight. After this Victory, Cedwalla would have seized the Kingdom, but was prevented by Authun and Berthun, as before related in the history of Suffex. Mean while, Centwin happening to die, Cedwalla returned to Wessex, and was plac'd on the Throne.

C E D W A L L A.

686. Cedwalla was not only King of Wessex but likewise Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons. His first war was with Authun and Berthun Kings of Suffex, spoken of before.

Having ended this war to his advantage, he turn'd his Arms against Kent (1), from whence he carried off a great Booty. Then he attack'd the Isle of Wight, which belonged to the King of Suffex ever since Wulpher's Grant to Adelwalch. Arwald, Brother to Authun, being then Governor of the Isle, undertook its defence; but as Cedwalla's Forces were much superior to his, he was forc'd at last to abandon the Isle to the Mercy of the Conqueror. The Inhabitants being yet Idolaters, Cedwalla thro' a false Zeal for Religion, resolv'd to root them out, and people the Island with Christians. He would have executed this barbarous Resolution, had not Wilfrid, formerly Bishop of York, and then Bishop of Selsey in Suffex, represented to him that it would be much better to endeavour to convert them. Upon the Bishop's Remonstrances, Cedwalla relented, but on condition the Inhabitants would be instantly baptiz'd. The poor Wretches, who had no time to deliberate, embraced the Christian Religion at the first preaching of Birwin a Priest, Nephew of Wilfrid, who was entrusted with their Conversion, if the bare Declaration of People threatned with death in case of refusal, may be called by that Name.

687. Some time after Cedwalla sent his Brother Mollon with an Army into Kent. The miserable death of Mollon there, and the terrible manner Cedwalla reveng'd it, have already been related in the history of that Kingdom.

At length, Cedwalla resolv'd to take a Journey to Rome to receive Baptism at the hands of the Pope; for altho' he was a Christian and a great zealot, he had never been baptized. He performed this Journey in 688. As he travel'd thro' France and Lombardy, he was every where very honourably received. Cunibert King of the Lombards was particularly remarkable for the noble Entertainment he gave him. When he came to Rome, he was baptiz'd by Pope Sergius II, who gave him the name of Peter. He had all along wish'd to die soon after his Baptism, and he had his desire, for he died a few weeks after at Rome. He was buried in St. Peter's Church, where a stately Tomb was erected to his Memory, with an Epitaph showing his name, quality, age, and time of his death (2). He left, by Cendriht his Queen, two Sons, who did not succeed him by reason of their tender age. Ina his Cousin mounted the Throne after him.

I N A.

688. Of all the Kings that reign'd in England during the Hep-tarchy, Ina was one of the most famous and illustrious: He must needs have been of great repute, since the same year he was crowned he was declared Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons in a General Assembly, where Sebba King of Essex, his Friend, served him effectually.

Ina's Wars with the Britons in Cornwal, the Kings of Kent, the South-Saxons, and King of Mercia, rendred his valour, merit, and abilities, more and more conspicuous. But as Historians have only told us the Success, without mentioning the motives and circumstances of these Wars, it is impossible to give a particular account of them. They only inform us that he carried his Arms into Kent, from whence nothing could drive him but the bribing him with a large Sum of Money (3); that in 710, he conquered part of Cornwal: That in 715, Ina and Ceolred fought a bloody Battle at Wodensburgh in Wiltshire, with equal loss on both sides. That lastly, he reduced to obedience the South-Saxons, who had revolted, and plac'd one Albert on their Throne (4).

These are the military Exploits that gained Ina his Reputation for War. But the Panegyrics bestowed on him by Historians, were not owing to these so much as to four other particulars, which to them seem'd of greater importance, and which they have chiefly dwelt on. First, he rebuilt Glassenbury Monastery, and augmented the Revenues and Privileges in such a manner, that it became one of the most considerable in all England (5). In the second place, he published a Body of Laws, entitled, West-Saxon Leaga (6), that is, Laws of the West-Saxons, which served for foundation to that published in the next Century by Alfred the Great his Successor. Thirdly, Ina signalized his Piety by quitting his Crown and turning Monk, which was then looked upon as an undoubted mark of Religion. This resolution was taken by the persuasions of his Queen Ethelburga, who had prepared him for it, by frequently representing to him the Examples of so many Kings his Predecessors, that had run the same Race before, and were honoured as Saints. But lastly what contributed most to Ina's Fame, was this: before he shut himself up in a Monastery, he went to Rome, where after conferring with Pope Gregory II, he built a large College, for the Instruction and Reception of the English Ecclesiastics that should come to study at Rome, and for the Entertainment and Lodging of the Kings and Princes of the same Nation, that should visit the Tombs of the Apostles. Adjoining to the College, he built also a stately Church, and appointed a certain number of Priests to officiate. Besides the charge of the buildings, of the ornaments of the Church, and of the necessities of the College, there was an absolute necessity of settling a standing Fund for their maintenance, according to the intent of the Founder. Now Ina had taken care of this, by laying a Tax of a Penny on every Family in the Kingdom of Wessex and Suffex, which was to be sent yearly to Rome, under the name of Romescot. Some time after Offa King of Mercia impos'd the same Tax on the Kingdom of Mercia and East-Anglia, and term'd it Peter-Pence. Some say, Ina returned into England to have this Tax settled by the General Assembly, or Parliament of Wessex, and to get the Charter signed by all the Nobility of the Kingdom (7). After which he return'd to Rome, where he took upon him the Monkish Habit (8). Ethelburga, who advis'd him to it only because she had a mind to become a Nun herself, put on the Veil in the Monastery of Barking.

Malmsbury is mistaken in saying Ina was sixty two years on the Throne of Wessex, since it is certain he had reigned but thirty seven, or at most but thirty nine years when he resign'd his Crown to his Cousin Adelard.

A D E L A R D.

Though Adelard was placed on the Throne with the consent of the Assembly-General, Oswald, one of the Royal Family (9), disputed the possession of it with him. Their quarrel was decided by a Battle, wherein the King was victorious over his Rival, whose Death, which happened shortly after, restor'd peace and tranquillity to the Kingdom. Adelard died in 740, and was succeeded by Cudred his Brother or Cousin.

C U D R E D.

We have only the following particulars of the Reign of Cudred: for we must not expect to find any connexion between the Facts related by the Historians, or Annalists.

In 743, this Prince obtained a signal Victory over the Cornish Men. Two years after, Ethelun a West-Saxon Lord, dissatisfied with the King, rais'd a sedition among the Soldiers, in which Cenric Son of Cudred was slain. This action was followed by a Civil War, which lasted some time. Ethelun being at the Head of the Rebels, dared to give his sovereign Battle, wherein the King, though not without great danger of being vanquished, gained the victory. During the Fight, Ethelun gave such notable proofs of an undaunted Courage, and extraordinary Conduct, that the King chose rather to receive him into favour, than destroy a Subject that might be serviceable to him. And indeed, it was the same Ethelun, that in 752 vanquished Ethelbald King of Mercia, in a Battle mentioned in the History of that Kingdom (10).

Bede, l. 4. c. 15.
Sax. An. Fl. Wig.
686. Fl. Wig.
687. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 1.
Brompt. Polychr.
688. Bede, l. 5. c. 7.
Id. 688.

An. Men.

694. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 2.
Polychr. l. 5. c. 20.
An. Sax. H. Hunt. l. 4.
An. Sax. Fl. Wig. H. Hunt. l. 4.

G. Malm. l. 1. c. 2.
727. M. Well.
727. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 2.
740.
743. An. Sax. H. Hunt. l. 4.
750. Bed. Ep. contin.

(1) For which no other Reason is assign'd but his inveterate Hatred against the Inhabitants of that Kingdom. Malm. p. 11.
(2) Hic depositus est Cedwalla, qui & Petrus, Rex Saxonum. Sub. xii. Cal. Maii Indictione Secunda qui vixit annos plus minus triginta, imperante Domino Justiniano Pissimo Augusto, Anno ejus consulatus quarto, Pontificante Apostolico viro Sergio Papa Secundo. Rapin.
(3) Thirty thousand Pounds, says the Sax. Ann. And according to Malm. thirty thousand Marks of Gold, p. 14.
(4) He also drove all the Nobility of East-Anglia out of their Possessions, and afterwards defeated them in Battle. Malm. p. 14.
(5) By Malmsbury's Account one would be inclin'd to think that he was the first Founder of it. See Malm. p. 14. The Charter, confirm'd by a great Council of the whole West-Saxon Kingdom, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Baldred King of Kent, with other Bishops and Great Men, is in Manuscript in the Library of Trinity College in Cambridge, and also published by Sir H. Spelman, in his first Volume of British Councils. But after all this Charter seems to be the Forgery of the Benedictine Monks.
(6) See Bishop Nicholson's Historical Library, p. 45.
(7) There is no History for this. Polidore Virgil (who was the Pope's Collector of the Tax) allows it indeed, but it is not confirm'd by any ancient Author or Council.
(8) Placuit cultu amictus inter mendicos convenerit. Hiden. Polychron. p. 248.
(9) He was the Son of Ethelbald, of Cuthwin, of Ceaulid. Malm. p. 15. Huntingd. p. 338.
(10) This Battle was fought at Bergford, now Burford in Oxfordshire. Camden.

753.
Ann. Sax.

Cudred turned his victorious Troops against the Britons of Cornwall (1), and conquer'd Part of their Country, which he united to Wessex. He died shortly after, and left his Crown to his Nephew Sigebert.

SIGEBERT.

754.
H. Hunt.
l. 4.
Fl. Wig.

Sigebert, very unlike his Predecessor, by his Vices and Cruelties (2), drew on himself the hatred and contempt of his Subjects. A certain Count (3) having expostulated with him concerning his Conduct, he ordered him to be put to Death in his Presence. This Action made the West-Saxons lose all Patience; they publicly depose him, and place on the Throne Cenulph, Son of Adelard. Sigebert finding he could have no Redress, was forced to submit to the sentence of the States, and betake himself to a Forest (4), where he was killed by a Swineherd (5).

CENULPH.

754.
Ann. Sax.
G. Malm.
l. 1. c. 2.
H. Hunt.
l. 4.
R. de Hav.

Cenulph became very famous for his frequent victories over the Britons (6).

After he had reigned thirty Years, he grew jealous of Cunehard, Brother of Sigebert, and perhaps not without Reason. Cunehard having notice of the King's suspicions, and knowing he intended to dispatch him out of the way, resolv'd to prevent him. To this End, discovering him one Day, as he went alone (7) to visit a certain Lady whom he admired, he followed him, with some of his Friends (8), into the House and attacked him. Cenulph defended himself furiously, and even wounded his Enemy, but at last, overpowered with Numbers, sunk down with his Wounds. The King's officers and domesticks running in at the Noise, and finding him dead, fell upon Cunehard and slew him, not regarding the large offers he made them, to spare his Life, and place him on the Throne (9). Brithric, Son of Cenulph, succeeded his Father.

BRITHRIC.

784.
787.
Fl. Wig.

Brithric, three years after he was on the Throne, married Edburga, Daughter of Offa King of Mercia, and about the same time banished Egbert the Kingdom. Egbert, a Prince of the Royal Family (10), by his noble Qualities had gained the Affection of the West-Saxons to such a degree, that the King could not help being jealous. This was a sufficient inducement to Brithric to free himself from the Uneasiness occasioned by that Prince, by removing him from his Presence (11). Egbert retired at first to the Court of Offa King of Mercia: but did not meet there with the Reception he expected, Offa being unwilling to disoblige his Son-in-law Brithric by harbouring a Prince that was hateful to him. Whereupon Egbert resolv'd to retire into France, where he was very civilly received by Charles the Great, who shew'd him, on several Occasions, marks of his Esteem. During Egbert's twelve years abode at this Prince's Court, he very much improved his natural Abilities (12), and rendered himself capable of executing the grand Design of uniting the seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons into one Monarchy, as will be seen presently.

During the Reign of Brithric, the Danes made their first descent in the Kingdom of Wessex (13). They began then to be formidable, not only at Sea, but on the Coasts of several European Kingdoms. As in process of time, they did the English incredible Damage, it is not without reason that Historians have been very exact in marking the time of their first Descent.

799,
800.
G. Malm.
l. 2. c. 1.
Ant. Men.

Brithric in 799 was poisoned by Edburga his Wife (14). The West-Saxons were so provoked at this Action, that before they proceeded to the Election of a new King, they made a Law prohibiting the Wives of their future Kings from taking the Title of Queen, and sitting on the Throne with their Husbands. And left the complaisance of the Kings to their Wives might occasion the breaking of this Law, it was further enacted, that hereafter, if any King of Wessex should dispence with the Observance of it, he should, ipso facto, be deprived of his Royal Rights, and his Subjects absolved from their Oath of Allegiance.

This affair being ended, an honourable Ambassy was sent by the West-Saxons to Egbert, to offer him the Crown. Egbert was then at Rome with Charles the Great, who received there, soon after, the Imperial Crown. Here he took his leave of that great Prince, who had been a Father to him, and at his departure gave him fresh marks of his Affection.

Queen Edburga having left Wessex upon poisoning her Husband, fled also to Charles the Great, who, in consideration of the Friendship between him and her Father Offa, gave her a rich Abbey, where she might have spent the remainder of her Days in Peace (15). But that way of Life not being agreeable to her Constitution, she behaved so ill in it, that being surpris'd in an intrigue with a young English Gentleman, the Emperor was forced to send her away. She wandred about from place to place for some time, and at last went and ended her Days at Pavia in great want.

EGBERT.

Egbert, besides the Valour natural to all the Saxon Princes, had one qualification that gave him a superiority above the other Kings his Contemporaries, which was, his great Knowledge in Politics, acquired during his abode at the Court of Charles the Great, whose Example and Instructions, no doubt, had greatly contributed towards it. He was no sooner on the Throne of Wessex, but he perceived himself superior to the other Kings, and resolv'd to make the best Use of it (16). But like an able Politician, he judg'd it necessary to proceed by degrees in the execution of his Projects. Accordingly, he spent the first seven years of his Reign in settling the affairs of his Kingdom, and in gaining the love and esteem of his own Subjects, in which he succeeded to his Wish.

The Kingdom of Wessex being bounded on the South by the Sea, and on the North by the Thames, Egbert must of course begin the extending his borders either Eastwards or Westwards. To the East lay the Kingdom of Kent, which would have been very convenient for him; but as this Kingdom was then in subjection to Cenulph King of Mercia, a Prince of distinguished worth, and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, to begin with Kent would have been the ready way to ruin his Designs. And therefore, in expectation of a more favourable juncture, Egbert thought it proper to carry his Arms first towards the West, against the Britons of Cornwall. His success was so great in a war undertaken in 809, that in one Campaign he reduced all Cornwall to his Obedience (17).

The Welsh intending to assist their Brethren in Cornwall, gave Egbert a pretence to attack them the next Year. He defeated them several times, and at last subdued the Kingdom of Venedocia (18), one of the three, Wales was then divided into (19). The struggles of the Welsh afterwards to shake off their Yoke, serv'd only to make it the heavier. Egbert re-entering their Country, destroy'd all with Fire and Sword, which made them take care how they provoked him a third time to come among them.

At length the death of Cenulph in the year 819, gave Egbert room seriously to consider of executing his designs. He was immediately invest'd with the dignity of Monarch, to which none had a better claim than himself. His Kingdom was in a flourishing condition, whilst the rest, weakened by intestine divisions, daily lost somewhat of their lustre and power. The Heptarchy was reduced to five Kingdoms,

(1) He and Ethelbald being reconcil'd, join'd their Forces against the Britons. Sax. Ann. Huntingd.

(2) Put up with his Predecessor's Victories, he became intolerant to his Subjects. Particularly he altered the Laws according to his own Pleasure. Huntingd. p. 341. Sax. Ann.

(3) Cunbra--- pree totius populi quærimonias eorum [i.e. subditorum] Regi fero intimavit. Hunting. p. 341. Tjr. p. 226.

(4) The Forest of Andredswald. Hunting. p. 342.

(5) Belonging to the late Count Cunbra. Hunting. p. 342.

(6) Anno 758, Cenulph fought a Battle with Offa King of Mercia, at Bensington in Oxfordshire; in which Offa got the Victory. Brimf. p. 770. Malmsh. p. 15.

(7) To Merton in Surrey. Huntingd. p. 343.

(8) With twenty, says Higden, p. 251.

(9) Cenulph was buried at Winchester, and Cunehard at Axminster. Huntingd. p. 343; or at Repton, according to Malmsh. p. 16.

(10) He was the Son of Almund, Ella, Egppa, Ingeþil, Cenred, who was the fourth from Cenulph. See the Geneal. Table of the Kings of Wessex.

(11) Brithric had form'd a Design of removing him out of the way; which Egbert being aware of, he fled to Offa; where Messengers soon came from Brithric to demand him; but he escap'd into France. Malmsh.

(12) Higden says that there---Sociam militarem exercuit, p. 251, 252.

(13) At Portland. Aff. Ann. Malmsh.

(14) He was buried at Warham in Dorsetshire. Malmsh. p. 16.

(15) At her Arrival she made the Emperor many great Presents, and he bidding her chuse whom she would have for a Husband, Winefrid, or his Son, she toothily chose his Son; whereupon the Emperor laughing, said, If thou hadst chosen me, thou shouldst have had my son, but now thou shalt have neither. Aff. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 118.

(16) He took a particular Care to train up his Subjects, in the first place, into that Skill in military Affairs, which he had learnt at the Court of France. Higden, p. 252. Malmsh. p. 36.

(17) One of the Battles was fought at Camelford in Cornwall; several thousands fell on both sides. Huntingd. p. 345.

(18) In British, Guymdb. The three Principalities Wales was divided into, were Deheubarth or South Wales, Gwynedd or North Wales, and Powys or Powysland. Venedotia was so named from the Venti in Angeraco, as some imagine. Camden, Vol. II. p. 770.

(19) He also took Chester from them. Higden, p. 252.

of which he possessed one of the most considerable. In the other four, the race of their antient Kings being extinct, nothing ensued but quarrels and dissensions among the principal Lords, who all thought they had a right to aspire to the Crown. And therefore so far were they from consulting in common the publick good, that they regarded only their own Interests, and the forming of Parties to support them in their ambitious Pretensions. On the contrary, the Kingdom of Wessex became every day more powerful by the weakness of the rest, and the prudent administration of the Person that governed it, whose valour was equal to his Judgment and Ability, to set in motion the Springs of the most refined Politicks. Wherefore Egbert resolved to hasten the execution of his Project of reducing England into one Kingdom. Almost all the preceding Monarchs had form'd the same design, and their not succeeding was entirely owing to unseasonable junctures. But soon after Egbert's being declared Monarch, every thing conspired to favour him. Northumberland had been long rent by two Factions, who, little attentive to what passed abroad, were only watching opportunities to supplant one another. Mercia was in no better condition. Bernulph, who had depos'd Ceolwulph, reigned only by the support of a powerful Party, who indeed had Interest enough to raise him to the Throne, but found it difficult to uphold him, by reason of the envy of the nobles at his advancement. For which cause, tho' that Kingdom was considerably enlarged by the Acquisition of East-Anglia, and tho' the King of Kent was become its tributary, it was far from being so powerful as Wessex. The East-Angles, not yet thoroughly settled in the state of subjection Offa had reduced them to, were waiting for a favourable opportunity to throw off the Mercian Yoke, which to them was intolerable. The wars of the Kings of Kent with the West-Saxons and Mercians, had brought them so low, that they could not avoid being tributary to the King of Mercia, and consequently were not in condition to stand against Egbert. As for the Kingdom of Essex, besides the probability of its being in Subjection to Mercia, it had long made but a very inconsiderable figure, and if it was still governed by Switbred, which is uncertain, that Prince must have been of an extreme old Age.

These considerations inflaming Egbert's Ambition, he began his Preparations, which raising suspicions in the King of Mercia, he thought betimes of providing for his safety. Tho' he was ignorant that Egbert intended the Conquest of all England, he could hardly doubt but he design'd to enlarge his dominions at the expence of his Neighbours. And therefore, dreading the Storm might suddenly fall on him, he believed that by attacking him before he was ready, he should break his measures and compel him to be quiet. To this end, he advanc'd with his Army as far as Ellandunum near Salisbury (1), where contrary to his expectation he met his Enemy, whom he thought to have surpriz'd unawares. The two Armies coming to an Engagement, the Mercians were routed with so great Loss, that it was not possible for Bernulph ever to retrieve it.

This Victory procur'd Egbert two great Advantages. First, As it very much weakened the King of Mercia, who alone was able to withstand him. Secondly, As it opened the way to the Conquest of Kent, for which Bernulph himself had given a pretence, by attacking him first. This Conquest was absolutely necessary to his becoming master of all the Country between the Thames and the Sea. Besides, by beginning the execution of his Designs with the Kingdom of Kent, he was the less apprehensive of alarming the Northumbrians, who were too remote to concern themselves with what was transacting beyond the Thames.

Pursuant to this Resolution, Egbert sent his Son Ethelwulph with a powerful army into Kent. Baldred, unprepared against an Invasion, pressed in vain the King of Mercia to come and assist him. Bernulph was disabled, by his late defeat, from bringing an army so soon into the field. Besides, Egbert had so posted himself, that it was not possible to relieve Kent without overcoming his Army, which as Bernulph could not pretend to attempt, the burden of the war, notwithstanding his weakness, was to be sustained by Baldred alone. However he hazarded a Battle; but being vanquished, retired into Mercia, leaving his Kingdom to the young West-Saxon Prince, who became master of it without any difficulty. Thus the Kingdom of Kent was united to those of Wessex and Sussex, and by that means Egbert saw himself in possession of the whole Country lying South of the Thames.

This first step being taken, Egbert rendred himself also master of the Kingdom of Essex, which is all Historians say of it, without mentioning any one Circumstance: So imperfect is the History of that Kingdom.

Tho' the Conquest of these two Kingdoms was a great step towards subduing the rest, yet the most difficult Task was still behind; namely, the Conquest of Northumberland, Mercia, and East-Anglia. Had these three Kingdoms been in their former splendor, each of them in particular would have kept Egbert fully employed. Nay, had they but entered into a strict Alliance for their common defence, when they were going to be attacked, they would perhaps have caused that ambitious Prince to despair of subduing them. But their divisions prevented them from making so necessary an Alliance. The East-Angles were waiting for an opportunity to revolt against the King of Mercia. The Northumbrians for some time had lived in a sort of Anarchy, which disabled them from taking any measures with regard to foreign Affairs. So far were they from any thoughts of assisting their neighbours, that they were wholly intent upon destroying one another, in which they were but too successful. Mercia indeed seemed still very powerful, but the Mercians were in no greater Union among themselves than the Northumbrians, and besides, the battle of Ellandunum had considerably weakened them; whereas Wessex was grown stronger by the Conquest of two Kingdoms.

Egbert beholding with pleasure how all things conspired to favour his designs, resolved to invade Mercia in the first place, plainly foreseeing, could he conquer that Kingdom, the rest would make no long resistance. Mercia and East-Anglia made but one body ever since their union by Offa. But as this union was not cemented by the mutual Affections of the two Nations, it was rather destructive than advantageous to the State. The East-Angles looked upon the Mercians as their hateful masters; whilst the Mercians on their part, treated the East-Angles with haughtiness, as a conquered Nation. This being the Case, it was much more easy for Egbert to foment their mutual Enmity, than for them to reap the benefit of their Union. For this reason Egbert, to accomplish his ends with the more ease, increased their animosity to the utmost of his power, not doubting but, could he once bring them to an open rupture, they would so weaken one another, as never more to be able to resist him. It is strange, since this maxim is universally known, We must divide those whom we would destroy, it should so frequently happen that they against whom it is practised, should attend so little to it. That the East-Angles, blinded by their extreme desire of freeing themselves from the Mercian Yoke, without a moment's consideration followed the advice secretly given them by Egbert, of taking up Arms for the recovery of their Liberty. Their attention to their present Interest, prevented them from reflecting, that after they had been subservient to Egbert's design, they would be still less able to withstand him than the Mercians. It is true, Egbert, pretending to have no other view but their Interest, caused whatever was most capable to excite them to a revolt, to be laid before them. His emissaries told them, there never was so favourable an opportunity of recovering their Liberty: That the Mercians were so extremely weakened since the battle of Ellandunum, that they were hardly able to maintain their tyranny over the East-Angles: That besides, Egbert was so incensed against Bernulph that he would readily assist them, having publicly declared as much. This was sufficient to induce the East-Angles to revolt. The pleasure of thinking they should be freed from their dependance on the Mercians, banished from their thoughts the fear of becoming subject to the West-Saxons. Thus resolved, they took up Arms, and chose a General, whose name Historians have neglected to relate. Bernulph informed of their motions, thought he could not be too speedy in putting a stop to an evil that seemed of so dangerous a consequence. With the first Troops he could draw together, he marched against the East-Angles, but instead of chastising them, as he vainly hoped, was defeated and slain.

The East-Angles were mightily encouraged by this Success, without disheartning however the Mercians, who made fresh attempts to reduce the Rebels. They forthwith elect a King, named Ludican, who endeavours to continue the War, whilst the East-Angles are preparing to receive him, in expectation the King of Wessex would not fail them upon occasion according to his Promise. Ludican actually entered East-Anglia with a numerous Army; but Death prevented him from making any Progress, and rendered his preparations for that Campaign of no Effect. Some say, he was slain in a Battle: Others affirm, the East-Angles found means to free themselves from the dread of this Prince, by causing him to be assassinated.

Whether the Mercians discovered that Egbert privately assisted the East-Angles, or the Conquests already made by that Prince, opened their Eyes, they were sensible at length, the maintaining their dominion over East-Anglia, was not so much the business of the present War, as the preservation of their own Liberties. In this belief, they resolved to exert their utmost, and chuse a King of known valour, without regarding the Interests of the several Factions, which till then had kept them divided. Their choice

Malmsh.

Ant. Ann.

(1) Higden says, that Elinden (as he calls it) was in Hamptunenshire, p. 257. The Annotator upon Camden thinks it was Elindon, near Highbury See Camden in Wiltshire. Mr. Lambard's Supposition is most probable. That it was Ell' field near Wimbor'. Diction. Topograph.

fell upon Witglaph, a Lord of great Merit, whose Son had married a Daughter of King Cenulph. If the new King had been to deal with the East-Angles, probably he would have ended the war to his advantage. But instead of aiming at the reduction of East-Anglia, he was very much embarrassed to defend his own dominions. Egbert fearing the state of affairs might be changed under a new Prince, whose valour he was no stranger to, no longer delayed to declare openly for the East-Angles. Hitherto he had only assisted them privately, at least he had not appeared as a party in the war, raised by him between them and the Mercians, with the sole aim that they might weaken one another. But as soon as the preparations of the Mercians gave him room to fear the balance would incline too much on their side, he thought himself obliged to take other measures, by publicly assisting the East-Angles, and declaring war with the Mercians. Witglaph used his utmost endeavours to withstand the united Forces of the East-Angles and West-Saxons. He even frequently tried the fortune of his Arms in skirmishes and conflicts, but always with ill success. At length, having lost a great battle, and finding his case desperate, he fled to the Abby of Croyland, where he lay concealed three Months. In the mean time, Egbert pursuing his victory, became master of Mercia, without any opposition. He designed to unite it to the rest of his dominions, but by the mediation of Siward Abbot of Croyland, Witglaph was restored to his Kingdom, on condition of paying homage, and becoming tributary to the Conqueror.

Ingulph.
Sax. Ann.

After the East-Angles had been subservient to Egbert's Designs, they were glad to be received into his Protection, on almost the same Terms with the Mercians, so that all the advantages procured them by the War, was the change of one Master for another.

Northumberland alone remained as yet free from the dominion of Egbert. But that Kingdom was little able to preserve her Liberty, considering the ill situation of her Affairs. Andred, who then reigned, was a King in name only. His Faction had placed him on the Throne, not that he, but themselves might reign in his Name. Besides, the Kingdom was all along rent by Parties, and frequently invaded by the Scots, who had over-run great part of its Territories. It was not possible therefore for the Northumbrians to withstand the victorious Arms of the King of Wessex, or rather, of all the rest of England, which was in that Prince's Power. Accordingly, when Egbert approached with an Army that had already conquered four Kingdoms, Andred and the Northumbrians in great Consternation, and unable to make head against him, submitted, and accepted of the same Terms granted the Mercians and East-Anglians.

Malmsh.

Thus ended the Heptarchy of the Anglo-Saxons, by the reduction of the seven Kingdoms, under the Dominion of the King of Wessex. Indeed Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumberland, still preserved a Shadow of Liberty; but very probably Egbert would not have suffered other Kings to be chosen, after the Death of those who were then on the Throne, if the Danes, who shortly after began their Invasions, had given him time to take other Measures.

The Government of the Heptarchy, reckoning from the founding of the Kingdom of Mercia, the last of the seven Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms, held two hundred and forty three Years. But if the time spent by the Saxons in their Conquests, be added, from the Arrival of Hengist to that of Crida, the Heptarchy will be found to have lasted three hundred and seventy eight, from its beginning to its Dissolution.

If we enquire into the Causes of the Dissolution of the Heptarchy, they will very readily occur. It is easy to perceive one of the principal was, the great Inequality amongst the seven Kingdoms, three whereof vastly surpassed the rest in Extent and Power. Hardly was the Heptarchy founded, when the Kings of Wessex looked upon Sussex and Kent as extremely convenient for them, and accordingly both the one and the other were subdued by them at different times. The Kings of Mercia had all along an Eye on the Kingdom of Essex. Nay, it appears they were Masters of it for some time, and in all likelihood it was not entirely free, when conquered and united to his other Dominions by Egbert. East-Anglia was an Object that continually inflamed the Desires of the Mercians and Northumbrians, the first of whom carried it at length.

Another Cause of the Dissolution of the Heptarchy, was the default of the Male-Heirs in the Royal Families of all the Kingdoms, Wessex excepted. Hence arose those Dissentions among the Great Men, which exceedingly weakened their respective States. We may assign moreover as another Cause, the Concurrence of various Circumstances, which never met but in the time of Egbert. But chiefly this Dissolution was owing to the Direction of the Providence of God, whose good Pleasure it was to raise England by degrees, and after several Revolutions, to her present height of Grandeur and Power.

The Conquests of Great-Britain, and the relinquishing of the same by the Romans, is the Subject of the first Book of this History. In the second the largest and noblest Part of the Island is represented struggling with the Anglo-Saxons, and at last obliged to submit to their Yoke. In the third, I have related, though in a very general Manner, the Affairs of the Heptarchy of the Anglo-Saxons, their Wars, the Succession of their Kings in each of the seven Kingdoms, and have concluded with showing this same Heptarchy turned into a real Monarchy.

It remains now that I speak of the Conversion of the Anglo-Saxons to the Christian Religion, and give a Representation of the Church of England in her Primitive State, wherein consists the principal part of the English History during the Heptarchy.

THE

STATE of the Church of ENGLAND,

FROM THE

Conversion of the English, to the Dissolution of the Heptarchy.

WE have seen, in the second Book, the horrid Defolation of the British Church, whilst expos'd to the Barbarity of the Saxons, who thought it their Duty to persecute the Christians. We shall now behold these very Saxons from Persecutors grown Christians, by the Direction of divine Providence, which incessantly watches for the Welfare of Mankind, forming a flourishing Church in the same Places where they had exercis'd their Cruelties. 'Tis not our Business to dive into the Reasons of God's assigning different Periods to the several Nations of the World, for leading them into the way of Salvation. It is sufficient for us to know and admire, that when the happy time is come, not only no Obstacle can obstruct the Execution of his Designs, but on the contrary, every thing helps to accomplish them: Nay, the weakest Instruments, in the hands of the Almighty acquire an irresistible Force.

In order to have a clear and distinct Knowledge of the manner of the Conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, and of the most remarkable Occurrences from the Foundation of their Churches, to the Dissolution of the Heptarchy, England must be consider'd not, as it is at present, one Realm, but as divided into seven distinct Kingdoms. These Kingdoms being converted at different times, it will be necessary to treat of each of them by itself. And therefore, I am now about to relate how the Gospel was received by every one of them in particular, with the most memorable transactions in respect to Religion, from their Conversion to their being reduced under the Dominion of Egbert, the first real Monarch of England.

The CHURCH of KENT.

AS Kent was first converted, I shall begin with that Kingdom. But because several Accidents conspir'd to this Event, it will be proper, in order to have a just Notion of the Thing, to set them all in one View before the Reader.

I have spoken in the History of Kent, of Ethelbert's Power over the rest of the Kings of the Heptarchy, and intimated, that his Neighbourhood to, and Alliance with France, did not a little contribute towards it. For this Reason he omitted nothing to cultivate a strict Friendship with the French, well knowing how much it might turn to his Advantage. The Means he judg'd most proper to this End, was the demanding a French Princess in Marriage; accordingly he cast his Eyes on Bertha, Daughter of Cherebert King of Paris. He at first met with some Obstacle. Chilperic, who, after his Brother Cherebert's Death, had been as a Father to this Princess, would not hear a word of the Match, on account of Ethelbert's being an Idolater; and this for some time put a stop to the Matter. But Ethelbert found Means to remove this Difficulty, by promising to let Bertha have the free Exercise of her Religion, and bring over with her a certain Number of Ecclesiasticks. Upon these Terms the Princess was given him in Marriage. Chilperic her Uncle, was in hopes that as she was thoroughly grounded in her Religion, she would be so far from turning Heathen herself, that she would contribute to the Conversion of the English Monarch. And in this his Expectations were answered. As soon as they came together, she spared no pains to gain his Love and Esteem by her affable and condescending Behaviour. Ethelbert, charm'd with the good Qualities of his Spouse, had all the Value and Affection for her she could desire. In this agreeable Situation Bertha justly hoped to bring the King at length to have favourable Thoughts of the Christian Religion, and therefore took all Occasions to display the Gospel Truths in the most affecting Manner. Besides, the Conversations Ethelbert had from time to time with Luidhard Bishop of Soissons, who came over with the Queen, contributed very much to her Design. In a short time, Ethelbert was so wrought upon, that if he had not yet Respect enough for the Christian Religion to embrace it, at least he had no Aversion to the Gospel or those that profess'd it.

In this favourable Juncture it was that Pope Gregory I. sent Missionaries into England to instruct the English in the Knowledge of the Gospel. Gildas and Bede reproach the Britons bitterly for suffering their Neighbours to live so long in Paganism without offering them their Assistance to free them from their Errors. But they blame them without Cause. It is easy to see, that whilst the Saxons oppress'd the Natives with all imaginable Cruelties, these last were very unfit Instruments to instruct their Persecutors. Besides their continual Wars gave the Saxons no time to turn their Thoughts to religious Affairs. But when they came to be settled, Assistance was not wanting, and though it came from far, it was no less effectual than if it had flow'd from their Neighbours. As this here is a very remarkable Epocha in the English History, it will be proper to show the secret Ways made use of by Providence in the Execution of its Designs in favour of this Nation. In order to this, it will be necessary to look back a little to what happened before.

About eighteen or twenty Years before the Arrival of the Roman Missionaries, in the Reign of Alla King of Deira, some young Children were sent from thence to Rome to be sold. That sort of Trade was then commonly drove by the English, who made no scruple of selling their Children, when over-stocked. These young Slaves, being expos'd to sale in the publick Market, drew the Eyes of vast Numbers of People upon them, who could not admire them enough. Among the rest, Gregory, Archdeacon of Rome, beheld them very attentively. He enquir'd particularly after the place of their Birth, and the Religion there profess'd. As soon as he knew they were English (1), and born of idolatrous Parents, he resolv'd to go and preach the Gospel to that Nation; and having obtained the Pope's License, prepared for his Journey. But the Romans, who had a great Veneration for him, petitioned the Pope not to deprive them of so useful a Pastor; and the Pope complied with their Request. Thus Gregory's Design remained unexecuted. The time appointed by God for the Conversion of the English was not yet come; and probably, such were then the Circumstances of the Nation, Gregory's Undertaking would have met with great Difficulties. All England was troubled with Wars and Commotions, which broke out afresh continually. Ethelbert had not yet espous'd Bertha; his Mind as yet was unprepared for the Reception of the Gospel, and being Vassal to Ceaulin, he had but little Power to encourage Gregory's Design. But afterwards, all Circumstances were equally favourable, and helped to promote it. Gregory, now become Bishop of Rome, call'd to mind his former Project of converting the English; and though by reason of his Dignity, which oblig'd him to reside at Rome, he could not go in Person, he sent those whom he thought capable of inspiring the People with a Relish for the Gospel. He chose for this Purpose forty Benedictine Monks, with Austin at their Head, in quality of Abbot (2). In all appearance, Bertha had acquainted the Pope how well affected the King her Husband stood

The State of the Church of Kent.

Thorn. Bede, l. 1. c. 25.

Thorn.

(1) Bede has rather invented or else heard that Pope Gregory made divers Latin Allusions upon the Answers to his Questions concerning those Boys. Particularly being told they were English, he replied, Bene, nam Angli amabant fidem. Hence I may have imagin'd (particularly Verhegar) that the Name of Angli came from Angelen. Whereas it is plain, their being call'd Angli is owing to their being of the Angles Race.

(2) He was then Abbot of St. Gregory's at Rome. Spelman's Conc. Vol. I. p. 92. Rapin.

596.

Bede, l. 1. c. 22.

Bede, l. 2. c. 1.

Brompton. Malmfb.

Thorn.

with regard to Religion, since they were ordered to land in Kent. Austin and his Companions (1) having passed through France, where they were supplied with Interpreters, arrived at the Isle of Thanet (2), in the year of our Lord 597. As soon as they were landed, he sent the King word, that he was come into his Dominions with a Company of very honest Men, to bring him a message of the greatest Importance, and instruct him in what would procure him everlasting Happiness. Upon this Information, Ethelbert ordered them to stay where they were, desiring to go himself and hear from their own Mouths the occasion of their Journey. Some few Days after, he went to the Isle of Thanet, in company with the Queen, who, in all likelihood, was not ignorant of the Reason of Austin's coming. As soon as the King arrived, he seated himself in the open Air, being apprehensive, as Bede says, of Charms or Spells, which in the open Field, he thought, could have no Power over him. Then ordering the Strangers to be called before him, he asked them what they had to propose. Austin, who was the Spokesman, made a long Harangue, preaching the Gospel in a forcible and zealous manner, says the same Historian, though he relates not one word of his Sermon. Ethelbert, inform'd by the Interpreters what Austin had said, return'd him this Answer: "Your Proposals are noble, and your Promises inviting. But I cannot resolve upon quitting the Religion of my Ancestors, for one that appears to me supported only by the Testimony of Persons that are entire Strangers to me. However, since, as I perceive, you have undertaken so long a Journey on purpose to impart to us what you deem most important and valuable, you shall not be sent away without some Satisfaction. I will take care you are treated civilly in my Dominions, and supplied with all Things necessary and convenient. And if any of my Subjects, convinced by what you shall say to them, desire to embrace your Religion, I shall not be against it."

This first Step being taken, the Queen got leave for the Missionaries to settle at Canterbury, the Capital of Kent, where she took care to provide them with convenient Lodgings, and procure them the liberty of preaching to as many as had the Curiosity to hear them. They made so good use of this favourable Juncture, that in a short time several of the principal Saxons embraced the Christian Faith. The swift Progress of the Gospel at Canterbury, raised the King's Curiosity to be more particularly instructed in the nature of the Religion those Strangers preached. At length by the Persuasions of the Queen, and frequent Conferences with Austin, he received Baptism, about a year after the arrival of the Missionaries. The Conversion of the King being followed by that of Multitudes of his Subjects, the Queen's Chapel, which stood without the City (3), soon became too little to hold them. And therefore they were obliged to turn one of the Heathen Temples into a Church, which was dedicated to St. Pancrace. Shortly after several other Temples were served in the same manner by Ethelbert's Order, and the Foundations of Canterbury Cathedral were laid; which was dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, and was afterwards called St. Thomas. Austin began also a Monastery which he had not the Satisfaction to see finish'd. Peter one of his Companions, was the first Abbot. It was called the Monastery of St. Augustin, from its Founder. Ethelbert at length leaving Canterbury to the Italian Monks, went and kept his Court at Reculver.

Thus began the Conversion of the Saxons in England. Austin and his Fellow-labourers were the Instruments made use of by Divine Providence to turn them from their idolatrous Superstitions to the Light of the Gospel; a Blessing their Brethren in Germany enjoyed not till Two hundred years after, in the reign of Charles the Great. Ethelbert promoted to his utmost the Conversion of his Subjects, but without using the least Violence or Compulsion, having learnt of his Instructors, as Bede expressly observes, that God requires none to serve him, but those who do it with a willing Mind. It were to be wish'd, all Christian Princes would follow his Example! The Saxons were so eager to embrace the Gospel, that, if Historians may be credited, Austin in one day baptized Ten thousand in the River Swale, which runs into the Thames.

This swift Progress of the Gospel in Kent making Austin believe he should meet with the same Success every where, he looked upon all England as already converted. Possess'd with this Notion, he hasten'd to Arles, to get himself consecrated Archbishop of the Saxons, by Etherius [or Vigilius,] then Archbishop of that Place. Had he been contented with the bare Title of Bishop, one should not have wonder'd at it (4). But it is really surprizing, that he should aspire to the Archiepiscopal Dignity, at a time when he had no Bishop under his Jurisdiction. It is true the Pope had promised to make him an Archbishop, in case his Mission met with Success. But in all appearance, Gregory, by Success, meant the Conversion of the English Nation in general, and not of a part only of one of the least Kingdoms in the Heptarchy. How great Progress soever Austin had made for the time he had been in England, yet was it nothing in comparison of what remained to be done. His haste therefore to be made Archbishop and Primate of England, when there was but one single Church there, does not redound much to his Credit. All that can be said in his Justification, is, that the Progress of Christianity at Canterbury, made him imagine the Conversion of all England was at hand. And indeed, not long after his return from Arles, he erected an Episcopal See at Rocheſter, of which Justus, one of his Companions, was the first Bishop. Hence it is plain, the Gospel had also been preached in that City, and made some Progress there.

Austin must needs have entertained great Hopes of his Mission, since fearing he should want Labourers in the approaching Harvest, he sends Peter and Laurence, with two others of his Companions, before-hand to Rome, to acquaint the Pope with his Wants, and inform him how Matters stood. He took this Opportunity also to desire the Pope's Resolution of certain Questions, which appeared to him difficult, and might, he foresaw, puzzle him in the Government of the new Church.

The Letters of Austin, and the Accounts of those he had sent, inspir'd Gregory with so high a Conceit of this Mission, that looking upon the Conversion of the English as accomplished, though it was but just begun, he sent the Pall (5) to Austin, as a Mark of Distinction and Honour to this new Apostle. He ordered him also to erect Bishops Sees in several Places, particularly at York, where was to be a Metropolitan with twelve Suffragans, and that after the Death of one of the two Archbishops, the Survivor should consecrate another in his Place, and have the Precedence of him (6). The reason of this Preference with regard to York, was, because it had formerly, under the Romans, been an Archbishoprick as well as London and Caerleon. As for this last, it being then in the Hands of the Britons, and already an Archbishop's See, though not under the Pope's Jurisdiction, there was no occasion to mention it. Gregory's Intent therefore in making London an Archbishoprick, was to restore Things to their former State. But however, he afterwards alter'd his Measures at the instance of Austin, who was desirous of procuring that Honour for Canterbury, the Metropolis of Kent, where he had begun to exercise his Ministerial Functions. The Pope's View then, was only to put Things upon an antient foot, when in his Answer to Austin, he told him he meant, that the two Archbishops of London and York should be independent of one another, however, that Austin during Life, should have Jurisdiction, as well over them, as all the rest of the Bishops of Great-Britain.

But all the Pains Gregory was at, came to nothing for the present, since the Christian Religion was far enough from extending to Northumberland. However, the great Hopes he had conceived from the Letters and Messengers of Austin, induced him to give Directions concerning the English Churches, just as if they had been really formed. Besides these general Orders, he exhorted Austin, in the same Letter (7), not to be elated at his having received from Heaven the Gift of Miracles, which makes it probable, word had been sent him, that several Miracles had been wrought by Austin. He charged him also, not to pull down such Idol Temples as were fit to be converted into Churches, but to consecrate them by sprinkling Holy-Water, and placing Relicks under the Altars. And since the Saxons had been accustomed to offer Sacrifices to their

(1) After they were got some way on their Journey, reflecting upon the Difficulties and Dangers of their Undertaking, they unanimously resolved to return home. And accordingly sent Austin to the Pope, to desire him to excuse them from so fatiguing and dangerous a Journey. But Gregory sent them a Letter, wherein he exhorted them to go on, which they accordingly did. Bede, l. i. c. 25.

(2) And landed in a Place called Receſborough. Thorn, p. 1759. X. Script.

(3) It was dedicated to St. Martin, and had formerly been a Church in the time of the Romans. Bede, l. i. c. 26.

(4) Bede says, that he was appointed by Gregory to be only Bishop, l. i. c. 23; but afterwards he informs us, that he was consecrated Archbishop, c. 27. Collier says, he was consecrated Bishop by the German Prelates, before he came over to England. This he grounds on Gregory's Epist. l. vi. Ep. 30. Which see in Speiman Concil. Vol. I. p. 80.

(5) The Pall is a white piece of Wollen Cloth, about the breadth of a Border, made round, and thrown over the Shoulders. Upon this are two others of the same Matter and Form, one of which falls down on the Breast, and the other on the Back, with each of them a red Crest, several Crosses, and the Colour being likewise upon the upper part of it about the Shoulders. This Pall is laid upon St. Peter's Tomb by the Pope, and then sent away to the respective Metropolitans, which till they have received from the See of Rome, they can't call a Canvass, but the Chrym, consecrate Chrymes, or a Byscop, consecrate Byscops. At the delivery of it they are to swear Fealty to the Pope. The antient Pall, from the Latin Pallium, was an antient and magnificent Habit, which the Bishop in mind that his Life should answer up to the Dignity of his Appointment. Pet. de Marca.

(6) How was it that the Bishop in mind that his Life should answer up to the Dignity of his Appointment. Pet. de Marca.

(7) In another. See Bede, l. i. c. 21. Speiman Concil. p. 83, 90. Brompton, p. 230.

Gods on their festival Days, he advises that [upon the Anniversary of the Saints, whose Relicks were lodged there, or upon the return of the Day of the Church's Consecration] they should kill some Cattle, and provide an Entertainment, to which they were to invite the Poor. At the same time he writ to Ethelbert and Bertha, exhorting them to persevere in the true Religion, and promote the great Work undertaken by Austin. Peter and Laurence, accompanied with Mellitus, Paulinus, Ruffinianus, and some other new Missionaries, brought back these Letters, together with Sacred Vessels, and Ornaments for the Altars, Vestments for the Priests, Relicks, Books, and other Things necessary for celebrating Divine Service. Austin received also the Resolution of the Questions he had sent to the Pope, which, with their Answers, were to this Effect.

Greg. Ep.
1. 9. Ep. 59, 60.

601.
Bede.

I. Question. How are Bishops to behave with respect to their Clergy? Into how many Portions are the Offerings at the Altar to be divided? And how ought a Bishop to act in the Church?

For Satisfaction in the first Point, the Pope refers him to St. Paul's Epistle to Timothy. To the second, he answers, That it was the Custom of the Church to divide the Offerings into four Parts, one for the Bishop; another for the Clergy; a third for the Poor; and a fourth for the Repairs of the Churches. As to the last Article, which would have been very obscure, had not the Pope cleared it in his Answer, he replies, That Austin being a Monk, ought not to live apart from the rest of the Clergy, but according to the Practice of the Primitive Christians, should have all things in common (1). He adds, if there were any Clerks not admitted into Holy Orders, who could not live continently, they were to marry, and receive the Stipends at their own Houses, according to the words of Scripture, Distribution was made to each of them according to every one's Wants. As for other Christians, he says, there was no need to prescribe any Rules in relation to their Alms-giving, since our Saviour himself says, Give Alms of such things as you have, and behold all things are clean unto you.

Act. iv. 32.

II. Question. Since there is but one Faith, how comes it that there are different Customs in Churches, one manner of saying Mass in the Roman, and another in the Gallican Church?

The Pope advises him to select from each Church, what he thought most convenient for the Church of England.

III. Question. What Punishment ought to be inflicted on him that has stole any thing from the Church?

Gregory replies, The Motives of the Theft must be consider'd, whether it was done out of Necessity or Covetousness, and the Punishment to be proportion'd accordingly, with Charity and Temper. As for Restitution, God forbid the Church should receive more than she lost.

IV. Question. Whether two Brothers may marry two Sisters, that are no way related to them?

Gregory answers, This may be done very lawfully.

V. Question. To what Degree of Consanguinity are Marriages forbid?

The Pope answers, To the second Degree inclusively and no farther. He would not however have those separated who have married within the prohibited Degrees before their Conversion, because they did it out of Ignorance. But he would have all the new Converts charged not to presume to do any such thing, and in case they did, to be debarred the Communion.

VI. Question. Whether a single Bishop may ordain another, without the Assistance of other Bishops, when the Length of the Journey makes it inconvenient for them to meet?

Gregory replies, That since Austin was now the only Bishop in England, he might consecrate others without any Assistance. But in order to avoid the like Inconvenience for the future, he would have him place Bishops so, as that they might not be at too great a Distance from one another.

VII. Question. How ought I to manage with the Bishops of Gaul?

The Pope tells him, That he allows him no manner of Jurisdiction over them, because he had no design to deprive the Archbishop of Arles of the Authority he was in possession of.

VIII. Question. Whether a Woman with Child ought to be baptized?

The Pope answers, He saw no Inconvenience attending it.

IX. Question. How long after her lying in, ought a Woman to come into the Church?

Answer. If she comes into the Church the minute after her Delivery, she sins not.

X. Question. How long after the Birth, ought the baptizing of an Infant to be deferr'd?

Answer. A Child may be baptiz'd the Moment he is born.

XI. Question. How long, after a lying-in, must it be before a Man and his Wife come together again?

Gregory is very large in his Answer, and takes occasion to blame Mothers for not suckling their own Children, attributing the Rise of so ill a Custom to their Incontinency. And therefore he decides, that the Husband ought not to have to do with his Wife till the Child is wean'd (2).

XII. Question. May a Woman, during some certain times, come into the Church?

The Pope says a great deal on this head, and concludes, Womens Infirmities ought to be no Obstacle to their going to Church and praying to God.

XIII. Question. May a Man that has lain with his Wife, come into the Church or receive the Sacrament, before he has wash'd himself?

The Pope here, as usual, makes a great many Distinctions, and concludes, such a Man had better abstain from both for some time.

XIV. Question. May a Man after an Impure Dream, receive the Communion, or if he be a Priest, administer it?

The Pope's Answer is full of Distinctions about what is, and what is not Sin: And concludes at last, a Man in the Case mention'd ought not to communicate. He gives leave however, for a Priest in the same Case, to administer the Sacrament, if there is no other in the way to officiate for him.

These are the Difficulties Austin wanted the Pope to resolve, which don't serve to give us any great Idea of the Abilities of this famous Apostle. However, Gregory thought fit to answer them fully and distinctly, as if they had been of the utmost Importance. He had the Conversion of the English so much at heart, that instead of giving Austin the least Discouragement, he extoll'd him mightily.

Austin's Care was not confin'd to the Conversion of the Saxons only. He undertook also, what seem'd to him no less worthy of his Zeal, the bringing the British Bishops to a conformity with the Roman Church (3), and the making them acknowledge the Pope's Jurisdiction. As this is a remarkable Circumstance of Austin's Life, it will be necessary to enlarge upon it a little. This Design of his was not easy to be executed. The Britons thought they could justify their adhering to the same Rites and Customs they had practis'd ever since the Conversion of Britain. Besides, they could not conceive, upon what grounds they were oblig'd to conform to a Church so remote, or what Advantage the owning the Pope's Authority would be to them. These Difficulties did not discourage Austin. He had, besides his Zeal for the See of Rome, another, and perhaps no less powerful Motive, to induce him to this Undertaking, which was his Claim to the Primacy of all Britain, by virtue of the Pope's Grant. Now, this he could never hope to attain, whilst the British Churches were independent of the Pope. He applied therefore all his Endeavours to accomplish this Enterprize, which cost him more Pains and Trouble than the Conversion of the Saxons, without having after all the Satisfaction of reaping the Fruits of his Labour.

The Gospel, as I before observ'd, was preach'd in Britain, either by the Apostles themselves, or by some of their Disciples. From those early Days, the Britons had constantly adher'd to the Customs and Rules prescrib'd to them by their first Teachers. But the Church of Rome had made several Innovations in the Divine Service, to which they pretended all other Churches ought to conform. The opposition the Bishops of Rome every where met with, was not capable to make them drop their Pretensions. Altho' this Difference was of no great consequence, it caus'd however, towards the end of the second Century, a most scandalous Quarrel between Pope Victor I. and the Churches of Asia; which rose to that Height, that the Pope for no other reason excommunicated them All. This Affair had never been judicially decided: yet for all that the Bishops of Rome stuck to their Claims, and did all that lay in their power to compass their Ends. The Western Churches, as nearest Rome, were least difficult to be prevailed with. Almost All, except the Churches of Gaul and Milan, conform'd at length to the Roman Ritual.

(1) Here in some Books is the second Question inserted, which runs thus: I desire to know, whether Clergymen that cannot contain, may marry; and if they marry, whether they must return to a secular Life? See Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 96.

(2) However, he allows those that do not suckle their Children, to come together after the usual time of Purgation.

(3) Viz. about the Celebration of Easter, Bede, l. 2. c. 2. Huntingd. p. 325. The Britons used, for finding Easter, the Cycle of eighty-four years, which was called the Roman Account. But about eighty years after the renting of the Roman Empire, the Romans left off the use of that Cycle, and took up another of nineteen years; and when they had used this about eighteen years, coming then to have to do with these northern Nations, they would needs have imposed the use of it upon them, as a Condition of their Communion; and this was what Austin attempted to do. See Bp Lloyd's Histor. Account, p. 67, &c.

But Britain, being still as it were out of the World, had, since the Embassy of Lucius to Pope Eleutherius, held very little Communication with the Bishops of Rome. The Britons consider'd them only as Bishops of a particular Diocese, or at most but as Patriarchs, on whom the British Church had not the least Dependence. So far were they from owning the Pope's Authority, that they did not so much as know, he pretended to have any over them. But Austin, out of the abundance of his Zeal for the See of Rome, took upon him to bring them to acknowledge the Pope as Head of the Church in general. It is a difficult matter to know how far Austin's Designs reach'd, since it does not appear he had any Instructions from Gregory I. who aspir'd not to that exorbitant Power attributed afterwards to his Successors. It must however be own'd, that Gregory laid claim to a Superiority over the British Churches, since in his Letter to Austin, he put the whole Island entirely under the Jurisdiction of the new Archbishop. Indeed it is not to be suppos'd Austin would have insisted so much upon that Point, had he not been sure of being supported in it. However this be, he left no Stone unturn'd to attain his Ends.

The best way, as he thought, of proceeding in this Affair, was to get the British Bishops to meet him in a Synod, in order to debate upon what he had to propose to them. This being agreed to, he omitted nothing that might win them to do as he desired. But neither Promises nor Threats could prevail with the British Prelates, to admit of the least Change in their antient Customs. Bede tells us that Austin, finding no good was to be done by Arguments, caus'd a Saxon blind Man to be brought into the Assembly, and when the Britons had tried in vain to cure him, he restor'd him to his Sight by his Prayers. But, whether the Miracle admitted of some Dispute, because the blind Man was a Saxon; or Bede, who lived long after the Fact, was wrong inform'd; the Britons stood out against this Evidence. All Austin could obtain, was, that they would meet again and determine the Matter in a more numerous Synod (1). At this second Council were present seven British Bishops (2), accompanied with Dinoth Abbot of Bangor, who brought several of his Monks along with him. Before they came to the Synod, they advis'd with a Hermit of great Repute among them, how they should behave in this Affair. The good old Man told them, he saw no reason to admit of any Alterations in their Divine Service upon the bare Request of a Man to them entirely unknown: But however, as the Essence of Religion consisted in Union and Charity, it would not be amiss to comply in some measure with Austin, provided he was a Holy Man, and one sent from God. Whereupon the Bishops desired to be inform'd, how they should know whether he was such a Person or not. He replied, they should know it by his Humility, the most unquestionable Mark of a true Christian: and they would see whether he was endued with this Virtue, by his respectful rising up to salute them at their coming into the Council-Room; for if he paid them not that Civility, it was a sure Token of his Pride. Pursuant to this Advice, they took care to come last upon the Place. And upon Austin's not stirring from his Seat to salute them, they conceived an invincible Prejudice against him. Thus for a Default in point of Civility, his whole Scheme that had cost him so much Pains and Trouble, fell to the Ground.

As Austin in the Synod was earnestly pressing the Britons to submit to the Pope, and carrying the Papal Prerogatives to a great height, Dinoth, Abbot of Bangor, made him this Answer: "You propose to us Obedience to the Church of Rome; are you ignorant that we already owe a Deference to the Church of God, to the Bishop of Rome, and to all Christians, of Love and Charity, which obliges us to endeavour by all possible means to assist and do them all the good we can? Other Obedience than this to him you call Pope, we know not of, and this we are always ready to pay. But for a Superior, what need have we to go so far as Rome, when we are governed, under God, by the Bishop of Caerleon, who hath Authority to take care of our Churches and Spiritual Affairs? (3)." It is said, Au- stin despairing to overcome their Obstinacy, after a long Dispute, cried out, full of Indignation, Since you refuse Peace from your Brethren, you shall have War from your Enemies; and since you will not join with us in preaching the Word of eternal Life to your Neighbours, you shall receive Death at their Hands. Hence it appears, that Austin had not only press'd the Britons to a Conformity with the Church of Rome, and Obedience to the Papal Authority, but also had reproach'd them for their Negligence and want of Zeal, in not promoting the Conversion of the Saxons. Perhaps he design'd to intimate to them, that the Conversion of all England stuck only at the Union he propos'd to them. However this be, these Words of Austin were looked upon as a Prediction of the Massacre of the Monks of Bangor, mentioned in the History of Northumberland. I leave the Reader to judge whether the Non-compliance of the Abbot of Bangor to Austin's Proposal, was a Crime of such a Nature as to deserve so severe a Punishment.

Austin not having the Success he expected in this Affair, confin'd himself within the true Bounds of his Mission, and caus'd the Gospel to be preached to the East-Saxons by Mellitus, one of the Missionaries sent him by the Pope, of whom I shall speak more fully, when I come to the Conversion of that Nation.

These, in short, are the Transactions of Austin, commonly called the Apostle of the English, during the eight Years he lived in England. He arrived in 597, and died in 605, according to the generally-received Opinion. Some affirm he died sooner, and others, though without grounds, bring his Death down to 613 (4). He was buried at Canterbury near the Cathedral, which was not then finished, with this Inscription on his Tomb (5):

Here lies Augustin, the first Archbishop of Dorobern, who having been sent hither by Gregory Pontiff of Rome, and supported by the Co-operation of God with Miracles, converted King Ethelbert and his Nation to the Faith; and having accomplished the Days of his Ministry, departed this Life the 7th of the Calends of June, in the Reign of the said King.

Austin was succeeded by Laurentius (6), who was as Malmsh. solicitous to reduce the Britons to the Obedience of the Pope, and a Conformity to the Roman Church in the Celebration of Easter. He wrote very pressing Letters to them, wherein he upbraided them for their Obstinacy, bitterly complaining, that a Scotch Bishop, Dagham by name, passing through Canterbury, had refused to eat with him, on account of their difference of Opinion concerning Easter-Day. But his Letters proved of no Effect.

Gregory I. pretended not to a Jurisdiction over the British Churches, as Universal Bishop; a Title he was so far from assuming, that he had declaim'd against it with great Dislike. However, in all appearance, he believed he might as Patriarch of the West, claim the Obedience of the British as well as English Bishops, to his spiritual Jurisdiction. But Boniface IV., who not long after Gregory I. was promoted to the See of Rome, being supported by the Emperor Phocas, took upon him the Title of Universal Bishop. This was a fresh Motive for the Missionaries in England to renew their Endeavours to bring the Britons to own his Authority; but they could not prevail with them. And therefore Mellitus was sent to Rome for Instructions from the Pope upon this Head. But the Death of Ethelbert (7), which happened in the mean time, caus'd them to lay aside all Thoughts of this Matter, and reduced the Christians to a deplorable Condition. Eadwald Son and Successor of Ethelbert, being turn'd Pagan again, the Missionaries lost that powerful Protection they had till then so prosperously enjoyed. To compleat their Misfortunes, Sebert King of Essex, who had been converted by Mellitus, dying also a little after (8), his three Sons who jointly succeeded him, apostatiz'd from Christianity, and forbad Mellitus, who was come back from Rome, to remain in their Dominions. He fled to Laurentius Archbishop of Canterbury, as did also Justus Bishop of Ro-

Inclutus Anglorum præful, piur, & decus altum,
Hic Augustinus requiescit corpore sanctus.

His Body was after the finishing of the Cathedral, remov'd by his Successor Laurentius, into the North Porch of it; and the other Inscription put upon his Monument. Bede, l. 2. c. 3. Spelman Conc. Vol. 1. p. 93.

(6) Whom he had consecrated Archbishop before his Death. Bede, l. 2. c. 3.

(7) Rapin places Ethelbert's Death several Years sooner here than he did before in the History of Kert. He died in 613, says Bede, l. 2. c. 5. Rapin places it above in 616. See Joeth Brompton, p. 737, 738.

(8) Brompton says, that he died about the same time as King Ethelbert; which, according to him, was Anno Dom. 616. p. 737, 738.

ance abandoned the Faith. These three Prelates, having consulted together, resolved upon going into France, and leaving the reprobate Saxons to themselves. This shows either that the people of Kent and Essex went all back to Paganism, or that there were not so many converts as Gregory was made to believe. Mellitus and Justus went off, according to their Resolution; but Laurentius staid behind, though with intent to follow them in a short time. When he was ready to depart, it is affirm'd, that lying one night in his Church, St. Peter appeared to him, and scourged him severely, as a punishment for offering to abandon his Mission. The day after he went to Edbald, and having shewn him the marks of the scourge, he converted him, and persuaded him to disengage himself from his unlawful marriage; he having taken his Father's widow to wife. So far is certain, Edbald was converted: All Historians are unanimous in That: but I cannot warrant the truth of St. Peter's apparition. Edbald being thus returned to the Faith, recalled Justus and Mellitus, and restored them to their respective Dioceses of Rocheſter and London. But the East-Saxons at London refusing to admit Mellitus, he returned to Kent, where he soon after succeeded Laurentius in the Archbishoprick of Canterbury (1). He is said by his prayers to have put a stop to a great fire, that in all probability would have reduced the City to ashes, and to have wrought several other miracles, with which I intend not to swell this abridgment.

Mellitus was succeeded by Justus Bishop of Rocheſter (2), to whom the Pope sent the Pall. After him came Honorius, whose successor was Deusdedit. After his death, there was a vacancy for four years (3). Egbert and Offa, Kings of Kent and Northumberland, having held a conference together about the affairs of the Church, resolved to send Wighard a Kentish Priest to be consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury at Rome. Wighard dying there, Vitalian the Pope cast his eyes upon Adrian and Andrew, two Monks, who both refused the Archbishoprick, as too great a burden for them. Theodorus a Greek, Native of Tarsus in Cilicia, to whom it was also offered, not having the same scruples, was consecrated at Rome, and departed for England. The Pope ordered Adrian to go with him, left, says a Historian, Theodorus, being a Greek, might introduce customs in Britain contrary to those of the Church of Rome. As this Prelate was the most famous that in those early times filled the See of Canterbury, it will not be amiss to take a fuller view of him.

Theodorus was a Prelate of distinguished worth, as well for learning, as greatness of mind, and solidity of Judgment. But he was of a warm and imperious temper, a lover of power, and could ill brook any opposition to his Will. Whilst he was Archbishop of Canterbury, he had frequent opportunities of extending his jurisdiction over all England, which he never neglected, as we shall see hereafter in the account of the ecclesiastical affairs of the other kingdoms, particularly of Northumberland. I shall only observe here, that during his Life, he alone exercised the archiepiscopal functions, which gave him an opportunity of incroaching upon the rights of the See of York; though Gregory I. had ordered, that after the death of Austin, the two Archbishopricks should be independent of each other. As soon as he came into England, he made a Visitation of all the Churches in his jurisdiction, and brought the People to a thorough conformity in the divine Service, to the usage of the Church of Rome.

As the English were yet very ignorant, Theodorus endeavoured to the utmost of his power to instruct them, by erecting a School or Seminary at Crecklade (4), where he and Adrian, besides Divinity, taught Arithmetick, Musick, Astronomy, Greek and Latin. Bede assures us, he knew several of their Scholars, that could express themselves as readily in Greek and Latin as in their own Language. Theodorus was not satisfied with promoting the love of learning among the English, by Exhortations and Instructions only, but also by the Books he brought, and sent for, into England; some of which are still extant in Manuscript, as David's Psalms, St. Chrysostom's Homilies, and Homer, all written in a beautiful Hand. He composed himself a large work called Pœnitentiale, which remained not long since entire at Cambridge (5), but is not to be found there now. In 1677, extracts of it, with some other of his treatises, were published at Paris, with notes by Jacobus Petitus (6).

Theodorus died in 690; but the See was not filled till two years after, by Berthwald Abbot of Reculver (7), who, having been Archbishop thirty eight years (8), gave place by his death to Tatwine a person of great Learning and probity. He exercised his archiepiscopal functions near two years before he received the Pall; which is a clear evidence it was not yet thought an absolutely necessary qualification for an Archbishop. Tatwine dying in 735, Nothelm, a priest of the Diocese of London, succeeded him, and went and received the Pall at Rome, where he was consecrated by Gregory III. He died in 741, and the year following, Cuthbert Bishop of Hereford, was chosen in his room. To him succeeded Bregwin of a noble family in Germany. This Prelate was exemplary for his religious and holy life, during the two years he held the See. Jambert [or Lambert] Abbot of St. Austin's, was his successor. He had the mortification to see the Churches of Mercia and East-Anglia wrested from his jurisdiction, by the erecting Lichfield into an Archbishop's See, in the reign of Offa. Notwithstanding all his endeavours, he could neither prevent it, nor recover his rights. Athelard his successor was more fortunate, for he obtained what his predecessor had sued for in vain. So the Churches of Mercia and East-Anglia were again subject to the jurisdiction of the See of Canterbury. Wulfrid who succeeded him in 804, was living at the time the Heptarchy was reduced to a Monarchy.

Before we leave the Church of Kent, it will be proper to observe, that Gregory's scheme, who had ordered Canterbury and York should be both Archbishop's Sees, and independent of one another, remained unexecuted, upon several accounts. In the first place, the Northumbrians did not receive the Gospel so soon as that Pope expected. Again, They all deserted the Faith, after the retreat of Paulinus, who had received the Pall. Lastly, the troubles Northumberland was continually disturbed with, prevented the first Bishops of York, from taking advantage of the Pope's regulation, which besides they did not much regard. This was the reason Theodorus became possessed of all the Authority, as well over the northern, as southern Churches, and that his successors making him their precedent, laid claim to the Primacy of all England, exclusive of the Archbishop of York. This proved, in process of time, the ground of great disputes between the two Archbishops.

The Church of NORTHUMBERLAND.

HAVING already given an account of Edwin's marriage with Ethelburga of Kent, I shall only add, that Paulinus, who accompanied her into Northumberland as Bishop of the Northumbrians, spent a whole year at Edwin's court, without making any great progress among people not yet disposed to receive his Instructions. But at length several accidents concurred to encourage his zeal and promote his designs, of which I shall give a particular relation.

Quicelm, one of the Kings of Wessex, bore the yoke of Edwin with that impatience, that he resolved to free himself from it, by means of an Assassin, whom he sent to him on some pretence, privately armed with a poisoned dagger. The Russian being introduced into the presence-chamber, took his opportunity, and made so furious a Pass at the King, that he was wounded through the body of Lilla his Favourite, who interposed himself, and received the Blow. Paulinus being informed of this accident, hastily ran into the room, and finding Edwin in a great rage with the King of Wessex, told him, God, to whom such wretches were an abomination, would not fail to punish so horrid a villany. It is said that Edwin, whom the Queen had hitherto solicited in vain, promised at the same time to renounce Idolatry, if the God of the Christians would revenge him of his enemy. At the same instant, news was brought him, that the Queen, after a hard labour, was brought to bed of a Princess, for which he returned thanks to his Gods. Paulinus for his part, having been in great fears for the Queen, fell upon his knees, and thanked God for her deliverance. The Prelate's zeal was so pleasing to the King, that immediately conceiving a favourable opinion of the Christian Religion, he consented Paulinus should baptize the newborn infant. The young Princess, who was named

(1) According to Malmſb. Laurentius was Archbishop five years, p. 196. So Gervafius also says. But Brompton makes him to have been Archbishop sixteen Years, p. 739.

(2) Mellitus was Archbishop five years; Justus three, and, according to others ten; Honorius twenty-six; and Deusdedit ten. Malmſb. p. 196. Brompt. Gervafius.

(3) Ercombert King of Kent, who reigned from 642 to 664, ordered Lent to be kept throughout his Kingdom; which, as far as appears, was the first Institution of it in England. Malmſb. p. 11. Brompt. p. 740.

(4) About twenty Miles from Oxford, in Wiltshire, from whence that University might be afterwards supplied.

(5) In Bennet College Library, in Sir Henry Spelman's time. Conc. Vol. I. p. 154.

(6) Theodore is said to have been the first that divided the Province of Canterbury into Parishes. See Bede, Edit. Whelock, p. 399. Spelman's Conc. Vol. I. p. 152.

(7) Berthwald was the first Saxon Archbishop, all the rest having been sent from Rome. Brompt. p. 742.

(8) Malmſb. says, thirty-seven, (p. 196) and Gervafius, thirty-seven years and six months, (p. 1640.)

Anfleda was the first that received baptism in Northumberland (1).

Edwin however, not forgetting the perfidiousness of the King of Wessex, marched with an army into his dominions, and, after defeating him several times, compell'd him humbly to sue for peace, and make him ample satisfaction. But tho' he return'd with victory according to his wish, he deferr'd the performance of his Promises (2). When the Queen and Paulinus press'd him upon that head, he told them, the quitting his religion seem'd to him to be of that importance, that he could not resolve upon it without a thorough examination of matters. And indeed he heartily set about it, and frequently conferr'd with Coifi the Pagan high-priest, upon the reasons alledg'd by Paulinus in favour of Christianity. Coifi, perceiving the King was very near turning Christian, resolv'd with himself to make his court to him betimes, by conforming to his will. It would not perhaps be impossible in the like case, to find some of this character among the Christian Clergy.

Bede, l. 2.
c. 10.
626.

l. 2. c. 12.

Mean time, the Queen and Paulinus continued to solicit the King to perform his promise; and to give the greater weight to what they said to him, they got the Pope to write him a Letter. But all would not do; Edwin still demurr'd, and could not come to a resolution. At last the circumstances of the Vision he had formerly seen in the Garden of Redowald, being, as it is pretended, revealed to Paulinus, the work was accomplish'd in an extraordinary way. Bede relates, how that one day as the King was surrounded with a croud of Courtiers (3), Paulinus came in suddenly, and laying his hand on Edwin's head, ask'd him whether he understood the meaning of that Taken? At these words, Edwin recollecting what had pass'd between him and the Stranger in Redowald's garden, threw himself at Paulinus's feet, who, with an air of authority, said to him thus: My Lord, you have escaped the hands of your Enemies, and are become a great King. All that was foretold you is come to pass; it is your duty now to make good your promise. Upon hearing this, Edwin is said to reply, He was fully satisfied, and ready to receive the Christian Faith. From that moment he strove not only to be better inform'd himself, but also to prevail with his subjects to follow his example, and embrace the Gospel. To that end, he believed the best way would be, before he publickly declar'd his intent, to gain some of his principal courtiers, whose example he did not question, would have a great influence on the rest of the nation.

Bede, l. 2.
c. 13.

The greatest opposition was most likely to come from Coifi, because it was his interest to keep the people attach'd to the worship of Idols. But the King was agreeably surpriz'd to find, that instead of opposing, he was ready to comply with his desire. One day as the King was discoursing with him (4) upon this subject, the High-Priest, like a good Courtier, said to him: "I have for a good while been seriously reflecting on our religion, and on the nature of our Gods, and must own I am not at all satisfied in these points, neither can I forbear calling in question their goodness, justice, or power. Never perhaps did any person serve them with greater zeal, respect and assiduity than myself. You, Sir, are a witness with what devotion and care I have all along perform'd the functions of my office; and yet I never got any thing by it: Neither is there a Man in your court but what is better prefer'd than I am. Now, can I help concluding, that since our Gods take so little care of their most sincere worshippers, they must be either unjust, or weak, or rather no Gods at all?"

Bede, l. 2.
c. 13.

Edwin, extremely well pleas'd with this answer of the High-Priest, had a mind likewise to know the sentiments of another Priest (5) that was next in dignity to Coifi; who, encourag'd by the example of his Superior, told the King: "Sir, the more we reflect on the nature of our Soul, the less we know of it; it is with our Soul, as with the little Bird that came in the other day at one of the windows in the room where you sat at dinner, and flew out immediately at the other. Whilst it was "in the room, we knew something about it; but as soon as it was gone, we could not say whence it came, or whither it was flown. Thus our Soul whilst it animates our Body, we may know some of its properties, but when once separated, we know not whither it goes, or from whence it came. Since then Paulinus pretends to give us clearer notions of these matters, it is my opinion that we give him the hearing, and laying aside all passion and prejudice, follow that which shall appear most conformable to right reason."

This advice, that agreed so well with the King's intentions, being approv'd of, it was resolv'd Paulinus should explain himself upon the subject of Religion, in the presence of the Pontiff and other Priests, which was accordingly done. As soon as Coifi had heard the Bishop out, he declar'd aloud, He could see no manner of reason to doubt of the truth of the Christian Religion. Edwin being thus sure of the concurrence of the High-Priest and some of his principal courtiers, call'd a Wittenagemot or parliament, to debate, whether the Christian Religion should be receiv'd or not. But the majority being determin'd already for the affirmative, it pass'd without any opposition. Coifi was one of the most forward to attack the Pagan worship; and being desirous to show some marks of the sincerity of his conversion, put himself at the head of his Priests, and marching toward the Heathen temple, darted his Javelin against the Idol: After which it was broke in pieces by the King's order, and the temple burnt to the ground (6). The same day Edwin was baptized (7), with his niece Hilda (8) afterwards abbess of Whitby.

627.

Bede, l. 2.
c. 14.

The Northumbrians following the example of their King, Paulinus, who till then had lain idle, on a sudden found himself fully employed, by the prodigious crowds that daily came to be taught and baptiz'd (9). But if it be true, as some affirm, that he baptized in one day ten thousand, his instructions must needs have been very concise (10). A Church of timber was hastily run up at York for the new converts, who were very numerous. Shortly after, Edwin laid the foundation of a Church of free-stone round the former, which stood till the other of stone was built. He had not the satisfaction to finish it, which was done by Oswald his successor. Paulinus is said to have preached also at Lincoln, where he converted Blecca the Saxon Governor.

628.

Bede, l. 2.
c. 16.

Thus was Northumberland converted to the Faith of Christ. But some time after, Edwin being slain in battle, such desolation ensued, that Paulinus being compell'd to leave the kingdom, the Northumbrians fell back again to idolatry. Anfrid and Osfic, Kings of Deira and Bernicia, followed the example of their subjects, though they had been instructed in the Christian Religion in Scotland, where they had lived in exile. The apostatizing of these two princes, and the barbarity of Cadwalla after their death, almost quite rooted out Christianity in Northumberland. During these calamities, neither Priest nor Monk had the courage to attempt the restoring the Northumbrians to the Faith. James the deacon, whom Paulinus left at York, was not able alone to put a stop to the general revolt (11). Things remained in this sad state, till Oswald ascended the throne, who, as soon as he had restor'd peace and tranquillity, laboured with all his power to make religion flourish again. To that end, he desired the King of Scotland to send some Persons of learning to instruct his subjects. Accordingly Corman, a Monk of Jona, of whom I have elsewhere spoken, was sent with some others; but he being a Man of a rugged temper, and disliked by the English, returned to his monastery; and making his report of his Mission in a full Chapter, Aidan, one of the Brotherhood, found by what he said, that he had not used that condescension to the English their circumstances required, and therefore told him, "It is my opinion, Brother, that you have dealt a little too roughly with those you designed to convert; not remembering that the Christian Religion ought to be infused in the Mind, not by violent, but mild and gentle methods." Upon these words, the Monks unanimously declared Aidan was the fittest person 633.

Id. c. 20.

634.
Bede, l. 3.
c. 1, 3.
S. Dunelm.

Bede, l. 3.
c. 5.

(1) She was baptized on Whituesday, with twelve other persons belonging to the Court. Bede, l. 2. c. 9.

(2) Bede says, the reason of it was, because he would not embrace Christianity without due and mature deliberation, and without being sufficiently instructed in the grounds of his Faith. Ibid.

(3) Bede says, he was sitting alone seriously pondering with himself. Rapin.

(4) In a General Assembly. Habito enim cum Sapientibus Consilio, tractabatur sigillatim ab omnibus, qualis sibi doctrina hæc catenus inaudita, & novus divinitatis qui prædicabatur cultus videretur. Bede, l. 2. c. 13.

(5) Bede says, it was one of the King's Grandees:—alii Optimatum Regis. Bede, l. 2. c. 13.

(6) The Temple was a very famous one, it stood at Gedmanlam, i. e. a receptacle for Gods, in Wiltshire: Near it is Wigton, that is, a place of Idols. Camden, p. 738.

(7) Which was on Easter-Day, April 12. Shortly after his two Sons Offid and Eadfrid, and several of the nobility, were baptized. Paulinus preached six years together in Northumbria. Bede, l. 2. c. 14.

(8) She was daughter to Hereric, Edwin's nephew. Bede.

(9) Bede says, that Paulinus coming one time with the King and Queen to a place called Adregin, spent there thirty-six days from morning till night, in instructing and baptizing (in the River Glen) the people that flock'd to him from all quarters, l. 2. c. 14. This Adregin, as Bede observes, it is destroyed in his time: but Camden affirms, that it was where Teverin in Northumberland now stands.

(10) The same is said of Austin; and both the rivers are call'd Swale. Rapin. It may seem incredible, that Paulinus should baptize so many in one day. But this Difficulty is remov'd in an antient Fragment quoted by Mr. Camden. "The Archbishop, after he had consecrated the River Swale, commanded, by the Cryers and principal Men, that they should with Faith go in two by two, and in the Name of the Holy Trinity, baptize each other." Introduç. p. clxvi. 2d Edit.

(11) And yet Ped. lxx, that—magnas antiquo hosti prædas docendo & baptizando eripuit. l. 2. c. 20.

635. to be sent to the Northumbrians. He undertook the affair, and being consecrated Bishop, set out for Northumberland. Bede gives Aidan the character of a pious and religious person, but adds, his zeal was without knowledge, because he kept Easter after the manner of the Eastern Christians, and not according to the custom of the Church of Rome. However, as much a Schismatick as he was in Bede's opinion, nothing can be added to his commendation of him for holiness of life. He not only, l. 3. c. 5. says he, instructed Christians in their duty, but also gave them an example of a good life, and fervent charity, which charmed the very Heathens, and allured them to the Faith. His success was so great among the Northumbrians, that they returned in crowds to the profession of Christ. Oswald, who was extremely desirous of the conversion of his Subjects, did all he could to promote the Work, even to the becoming Aidan's Interpreter, in explaining his discourses to the people. It may perhaps seem strange, that Oswald should not recall Paulinus, who was then Bishop of Rocheſter, or make use of the ministry of James, who was left by Paulinus in Northumberland. But it must be remembered, that Oswald, having been instructed in the Christian Religion in Scotland, had an aversion for the Roman Missionaries, on account of the difference between the Romanists and Scots about Easter, and the Ecclesiastical Tonsure. Aidan dying after he had governed the Church of Northumberland seventeen years; Finan, another Monk of Iona was sent to supply his place. He fixt the Episcopal See in the little Island of Lindisfarn (1), contrary to Gregory's regulation, who ordered that the principal See for the northern parts should be settled at York.

652. This was not the only thing wherein Finan and the other Scotch Ecclesiasticks showed their independance on the Church of Rome. Their obstinate refusal to conform to the Roman custom of keeping Easter, was an article of much more importance, at least in the opinion of the Italian Priests, by whom it was considered as a principal point. England was then divided into two Parties or Seſts, who firmly adhered to their respective opinions. All the Scotch Priests and Monks, who were very numerous in Northumberland, and all their converts, followed the Eastern Churches; but the French and Italian Ecclesiasticks, in that and all other points, stuck to the Church of Rome, branding with the name of Schismaticks those who refused to do the like. And therefore they used their utmost endeavours to bring the English Churches to a conformity with them, which they thought might easily be done, could they but once gain over Finan to their side. To this end they sent to him a Scotch Priest, that had been educated in France, to lay before him the reasons alledged by the Church of Rome upon that head. But so far was Finan from being prevailed upon, that he became a more professed and open opposer of the Roman customs.

This dispute was then carried on with great vehemence, not only among the Clergy, but even among the most ignorant of the Laity, as it usually happens in Religious Differences. As long as Aidan and Finan lived, the Romanists, says Bede, on account of the veneration all Men had for these two holy Bishops, bore with patience this diversity of opinion. But when Colman, another Scotch Monk, succeeded Finan in the reign of Oswy, the dispute was renewed with more warmth than ever. The Romanists, desirous of bringing over their adversaries to their opinion at any rate, never left till they had got Oswy to call a Synod [in the Nunnery of Hilda] at Streanes-halh or Whitby, in order to decide this affair. The Synod being met, each party endeavoured to procure as many votes as they could; but, as it appears from the accounts of Historians, the Romanists were much more active and zealous than the others; and managed so, that Agilbert Bishop of Paris, formerly Bishop of the West-Saxons, came to the Synod on some pretence, with Agathon one of his Priests. At the head of the Scotch Party were King Oswy, Colman Bishop of the Northumbrians, and the rest of the Scotch Priests and Monks (2), with all that had received their ordination from them. On the other side appeared Anſteda, Oswy's Queen, Alfred King of Deira, Oswy's natural Son, Wilfrid a Priest his preceptor, who had studied at Rome, Agilbert Bishop of Paris, and Agathon a Priest of the same Church, Roman a Scotch Priest, James the Deacon, and all who had been disciples of the Italian Priests and Monks.

To see with what eagerness this dispute was managed, one would have thought the very Essence of Religion had been at stake. And indeed the Romanists were of that opinion, as appears from the words of Bede, it was not without reason, says he, that this question disturbed the minds of a great number of Christians, who were apprehensive, lest after they had begun the race of Salvation, they should be found to have run in vain. However, this Historian, tho' he thought all did run in vain who conformed not to the Church of Rome, gives Aidan and Finan who were of that number, the highest praises for holiness of life. He attributes to them the gift of miracles, which leaves no room to doubt, but that he looked upon them as Saints; notwithstanding they were, according to his notion, actually involved in Schism. Baronius treads in the steps of Bede. When he mentions the Scots and Britons of those days, he calls them Schismaticks, for refusing to obey the Pope: But when he speaks of Aidan and Finan, he makes no scruple of joining them, though they strenuously asserted the independency of their Churches. Hence it follows, either these two Bishops were not really Schismaticks, or if they were so, their Schism hindered them not from being great Saints, from being assisted by God in working miracles, and converting nations. But to return to the Synod of Whitby; since the dispute about Easter was the occasion of their meeting, and the cause of great commotions in England, it will not be amiss briefly to relate the first rise of it.

Towards the end of the second Century, a controversy arose in the Church, concerning the day on which the Easter Festival was to be celebrated. The Churches of Asia were of opinion, it was to be kept on the fourteenth day of the Moon, according to the custom of the Jews, on what day of the week soever it should chance to fall. The Western Churches on the contrary, put it off till the Sunday after the fourteenth day, because our Saviour's resurrection was on that day. Several councils were held about this matter, as well in the East as in the West; but neither party would recede from their opinion, each pleading apostolical tradition in their behalf, the Eastern Bishops from St. John, and the Western from St. Peter and St. Paul. Supposing the truth of both these traditions, the inference was plain, that either of them might indifferently be followed, and that it was no material point, since the Apostles had not settled it among themselves. And in fact, this diversity of custom, prevented not the two parties from holding communion with each other, till Victor I. Bishop of Rome made a rupture, by excommunicating the Quartodecimans, or those that keep Easter on the fourteenth day of the Moon. This Proceeding of Victor gave so great offence, that Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons, tho' of the same opinion with Victor, severely reprimanded him for breach of charity, on account of a thing of so little moment. He alledged the example of Anicetus, Pius, Hyginus, Telephorus, Xistus, predecessors of Victor, who notwithstanding this difference, brake not communion with the Churches of Asia. Adding, he would have acted much better in imitating Anicetus, who gave the Eucharist with his own hand to Polycarp Bishop of Smyrna, though of a different opinion from him in this very point.

Victor's haughty treatment of the Churches of Asia, instead of bringing them to his opinion, only made them adhere still more firmly to their own. They believed, they were so much the less obliged to conform to the practice of Rome, as the Pope, after all, could produce no authentick proof of his tradition from St. Peter and St. Paul; as the Asiaticks, on their part, would have been as hard put to it to make out Theirs from St. John. What Socrates the Historian says upon this subject is very remarkable: Neither Christ nor his Apostles have ordered any thing concerning the Paschal Feast, as Moses did to the Jews, their design being not to determine circumstances about Holy-Days, but to instruct Christians in the precepts of piety and a good life. It is my opinion therefore, that as certain customs have been introduced in each country, this of the paschal Solemnity was one of them, and not built upon the authority of the Apostles. The Quartodecimans tell us, the keeping the fourteenth day was instituted by St. John. The Romanists maintain, they had their practice from St. Peter and St. Paul: But neither of them have proved by any authentick record their assertion: Whence it is clear, the Easter Festival may be kept in every place according to the custom first introduced there.

From this passage it is evident, that they who were no lovers of wrangling, looked upon this controversy as of little importance to religion. However, to avoid a diversity even in the smallest matters, the council of Arles in 314, ordered that Easter should every where be kept on the Sunday after the fourteenth day of the Moon, which happened next after the Vernal Equinox or 21st of March. This Canon was confirmed by the council of Nice in 325, and the Emperor sent orders throughout all the Roman Empire to have it put in practice. His letter upon this occasion to the Governors and other Magistrates, showed that

(1) Or Holy-Island, on the Coast of Northumberland. It was not Finan that fixed the Episcopal See there, but his predecessor Aidan. What Finan did, was to erect there a Cathedral Church; which was built after the Scotch fashion, not of Stone, but of Timber, and thatched. Edbert, one of Finan's Successors, covered the Walls and Roof with Lead. Bede, l. 3. c. 3, and 25. S. Dunelm. Hist. p. 333.

(2) Particularly Credada, or Cedd, Bishop of the East-Saxons. Bayly, p. 778. Bede, l. 3. c. 25.

the reasons the Council went upon, were, that the Quartodecimans were fewest in number, and stood too near the Jewish custom. Upon the same account it was, that the Council ordered, Easter should be the Sunday after the full Moon in March. But it is uncertain whether it was meant, people should reckon from the beginning of the fourteenth of the Moon, or from the evening and beginning of the fifteenth (1). Pursuant to this determination, all the Churches kept Easter-Day on a Sunday. One thing however, namely, what was to be done when the full Moon fell out on a Sunday, not being settled, caused some diversity. In this case, some Churches, among which was that of Scotland, began their Easter that very day, and consequently at the same time with the Jews. But the Church of Rome deferred it till the Sunday following. Since that time, there have been some alterations which produced different customs in the Churches. Whereas for a long while a Cycle of eighty-four years was every where made use of to find the precise time of Easter, the Church of Rome invented a Cycle of nineteen years, much more proper for that purpose, and obliged all the Churches under her jurisdiction to conform to the same. Altho' without doubt this was the best method, and calculated nearest the truth; yet as it was unknown to the Britons and Scots, who held but little correspondence with Rome, they stuck to their old way.

Bede, l. 3.
c. 25.

By these various manners of finding Easter-Day, it sometimes happened in Oswy's court, that whilst the King was celebrating the Paschal Feast, the Queen, who followed the custom of the Church of Rome, was still keeping Lent. This confusion made Oswy desirous of fixing Easter-Day so, as all should keep it at the same time. At the opening of the Council, having made a short speech upon that head, he ordered Coleman to alledge what he had to say in defence of the custom of the Scotch Church. Colman said, it had been all along the practice of his predecessors, and of those by whom he was ordained in Scotland: That Columba, Aidan, and Finan had always kept to the old way; but if their Authority was not sufficient, he could alledge that of St. John the beloved Apostle. After he had enlarged upon this Argument, Agilbert, Bishop of Paris, was desired to set forth what was to be said against Colman's assertion. But the Bishop having excused himself on account of his unskilfulness in the English tongue, requested that Wilfrid might be allowed to speak the sense of the Church of Rome. Wilfrid, having the King's permission, answered Colman with great warmth. He explained the manner of fixing Easter practised by the Church of Rome, and affirmed that all the Churches in the World conformed to it, except only the Scots, Picts, and Britons, who still persisted in their foolish obstinacy. Colman replied, Talking in that manner very much reflected on the memory of St. John, who would never have established a custom that was chargeable with folly. Wilfrid, being sensible he had spoke a little too freely, endeavoured to justify St. John, by saying he was obliged to retain something of Judaism, for fear of giving offence to the Asiatick Jews, as St. Paul upon the like account had circumcised Timothy. He concluded with asserting, that the Church of Rome exactly followed what was prescribed by St. Peter and St. Paul in this matter.

It appears from the fore-cited passage of Socrates, that it was as difficult for Wilfrid to prove that the custom of the Church of Rome had its rise from St. Peter, as for Colman to make out, that the practice of the Church of Scotland came from St. John. Besides, the Cycle of nineteen years then made use of by the Romanists, was most assuredly invented after the time of St. Peter. But as Colman and the rest of the Scotch party knew little of what passed abroad, and as their aim was not so much to bring the Romanists to their customs, as to persuade them to let them go on peaceably in their own way, they persisted in appealing to the authority of St. John and Columba. But Wilfrid, after justifying St. John in the manner above-mentioned, demanded of Colman, with an air of triumph, whether he pretended to compare Columba with St. Peter the prince of the Apostles, to whom our Saviour said, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock will I build my Church? History informs us not what answer Colman made; for it must be remembered, we know nothing of this Council, but what we have from the Partisans of Rome. However this be, Oswy seemed to be convinced St. Peter had some prerogative above the other Apostles, since he declared at last for the custom established by St. Peter at Rome, before that of St. John. Bede says, he was brought to it by being told, that as St. Peter had the Keys of heaven, he would refuse him entrance if he obstinately held out against the Apostle's own institution. Oswy's declaration immediately gained a majority of Voices for the Romanists. Thus Colman and his party lost their cause in this Point.

In the same Synod was debated also the controversy about the Ecclesiastical Tonsure. The Romanists maintained, that the head ought to be shaved round just in the place where our Saviour wore the Crown of Thorns, of which it was the Emblem. But the Scotch Priests shaved the fore-part of the head from ear to ear. Bede does not tell us how this matter was decided; but very probably it was determined in favour of the Romanists.

The dispute about Easter being thus ended to the disadvantage of the Scots, Colman and all his adherents retired into Scotland, not being able to prevail with themselves to submit to a decision that appeared to them so unjust. Thus is it in matters of religion, things that seem at first perfectly indifferent, become at last of the greatest consequence by the pride and uncharitableness of the Clergy. Cedd Bishop of the East-Saxons, who had been interpreter to both parties in the Synod, was the only one of the Scotch party, that thought it his duty not to leave his flock for a thing of so little moment, though he was of a contrary opinion to the Romanists. Tuda succeeded to Colman's See, and Eatta was made Abbot of Lindisfarn in the room of him that went off with Colman.

Thus was the storm raised by this controversy appeased at last, to the great satisfaction of the Pope and his party, who were very sensible, that their success in this affair would greatly contribute to the establishing the Papal authority over the northern Churches, as it really did. The Church of Northumberland had been governed for thirty years by Aidan, Finan, and Colman, whom their adversaries could charge with nothing, but their firm adherence to the customs of their ancestors in relation to Easter. After Colman's retiring into Scotland, the government of the Church of Northumberland was always put into the hands either of Saxons or foreigners bred up in the principles of the Church of Rome, the Scots being entirely excluded.

Tuda dying soon after, Alfred King of Deira was desirous of having Wilfrid his preceptor made Bishop of York, the See whereof was then at Lindisfarn. To that end he ordered him to go into France to be consecrated by Agilbert Bishop of Paris. But Wilfrid making a long stay in France, Chad then Abbot of Lestingham was made Bishop of the Northumbrians (2). Chad being gone into Kent to be consecrated by Deusdedit Archbishop of Canterbury, and finding he was lately dead, applied to Wina, Bishop of Winchester for consecration, and then returned into Northumberland. Bede tells us, he was a very religious person, without pride or ambition, and one that accepted of the episcopal dignity purely in obedience to the King's order.

Eddius.
Bede.
S. Dunelm.
Malmst.

In the mean while, Wilfrid being returned into England, remained some time at Canterbury, to take care of that Diocese till the arrival of Theodorus, whom the Pope had made Archbishop. After a few months stay at Canterbury, he went on to Northumberland; where finding Chad was made Bishop of Lindisfarn, and not daring to complain of the inconstancy of the King of Deira, he retired to his monastery at Rippon (3). Some time after, Theodorus in his visitation of all the Churches in England coming to York, severely reprimanded Chad for being consecrated by the Bishop of Winchester. Chad humbly submitted to his censure, and without endeavouring to justify himself, did all the Archbishop required of him. Theodorus, charmed with his modest Behaviour, consecrated him anew; but ordered him to return to his Monastery (4), and make room for Wilfrid whom the two Kings of Northumberland had designed for the Bishoprick of York or Lindisfarn. Though Bede does not say for what reason Chad was sent back to his Monastery after his second consecration, yet it is plain Theodorus was gained by the two Kings, who were for Wilfrid. And indeed there seems to be no reason for deposing of Chad, since all the defects of his former ordination, supposing there were any, were removed by the latter.

Wilfrid was a Man of a very proud and haughty temper, one of those that are for domineering where-ever they come, and cannot bring themselves to use towards others that condescension they expect from all the world. His pride for some time was supported by his interest with the two Kings of Northumberland. But at length Oswy being dead, Alfred his Son deposed, and Egfrid who had no opinion of this prelate, in possession of the throne, Wilfrid found he had not that respect shown him, as in the reign of Oswy. This gave him great uneasiness, and not being able to forbear showing it, perhaps in too in-

(1) An Ecclesiastical Day begins at six a-clock the Evening before.

(2) Eddius says, he was made Bishop at the request of the Quartodecimans, c. 14. Malmst. p. 250.

(3) Where he remained three years. Eddius, p. 58.

(4) Malmst. 135, that he retired to Lichfield. De Pontif. p. 261.

folent a manner, he incurred the King's displeasure. Some time after, Theodorus coming again into Northumberland, Egfrid complained to him of Wilfrid (1), and let him know, that instead of edifying the People, he brought a great scandal on religion by his pride and arrogance. The King did not accuse him without ground. Historians are all agreed, that Wilfrid was excessive proud; that he affected to live in a royal manner; that he never went abroad without a numerous retinue; and that he was serv'd in Gold. Theodorus, finding this a fit opportunity to improve the rights of his See, and lessen those of York, which had been dignified with the title of an Archbishoprick in the time of Paulinus, was resolv'd not to let it slip. Accordingly, without hearing what Wilfrid had to say for himself, he deposed him, and obtained the King's leave to divide Northumberland into two Dioceses. Bofa, who resided at York, was Bishop of the first, containing the Churches of Deira. Over the other See, which continued fixed at Lindisfarn, and consisted of the Kingdom of Bernicia, was placed Eatta. As Egfrid had for some time conquered Lincolnshire from the King of Mercia, he made a third Bishoprick of it, of which Ethelred was the first Bishop.

Wilfrid enraged at his disgrace, set out immediately for Rome, to lay his case before the Pope. Theodorus not liking his going thither, sent a Monk to inform the Pope of the reasons of his deposing him. However, fearing Wilfrid might gain the Pope to his side, on account of the service he had done the Church of Rome at the council of Whitby, he wrote to Ebroine, Mayor of the Palace to the King of France, to stop him in his journey. Wilfrid, informed of this, resolv'd to go by the way of Friesland (2), where Adalgisus the King hospitably received him, and discovered to him that Ebroine had desired him to detain or murder him. He is said, whilst he staid in Friesland, to make a great many converts. At length, taking his leave, he went on to Strasbourg, from whence he was safely conducted to Rome by the King of Austrasia.

Agatho, who was then Pope, having heard Wilfrid's complaints, held a Synod upon them, who unanimously declared that Wilfrid should be restored to his Bishoprick. Wilfrid having thus succeeded in his Suit, returned home, and presented to the King the decree of the Synod at Rome, with a letter from the Pope. But Egfrid had so little regard to this decree, that after he had upbraided the Bishop for procuring it by bribery, he put him in prison, where he kept him a whole year, and would not then have releas'd him, had it not been for the pressing instances of his Aunt Ebba, and upon condition he would never more set foot in Northumberland.

Wilfrid, meeting with all these discouraging circumstances, withdrew to the Monastery of Glassenbury, where Berthwald the Abbot gave him a safe retreat; but it lasted not long, for Ethelred King of Mercia, and Uncle to Berthwald, desired him to dismiss him, on account of the King of Northumberland. In this perplexity Wilfrid fled for refuge to Adelwalch King of Suffex, who was converted during his imprisonment in Mercia, but his subjects were still idolaters. This Prince having granted him his protection, desired him to endeavour the conversion of the people, in which he happily succeeded. In a little time the South-Saxons, as well as the inhabitants of the Isle of Wight, embraced the Christian Faith, by the pains and instructions of Wilfrid. At least this is what the writer of his Life relates, though to speak the truth, it is very difficult to clear up the Chronology of these facts. Wilfrid remained some years in Suffex, where he was made Bishop of Selsey, as will be seen hereafter.

During his absence, Theodorus having taken a third journey to Northumberland, erected a new Bishoprick at Hagulfstad [or Hexham], of which Thumbert was the first Bishop. This he did to make amends for Lincoln now in the hands of the Mercians. Some time after Theodorus went thither once more, and called a council, wherein he got Thumbert to be deposed, for daring to take it ill that the Archbishop of Canterbury should exercise his jurisdiction over the Churches of the North. It was indeed contrary to the regulations of Gregory I; who the Pall sent to Paulinus first Bishop of the Northumbrians, plainly shewed, it was not the intent of the court of Rome that the Churches of the North should have any dependance on Canterbury. But Aidan, Finan, and Colman, not having vouchsafed to demand the Pall of the Pope, York or Lindisfarn had only the bare title of a Bishoprick, which these three Scotch Prelates never minded, the lording it over the Church being what was far from their thoughts. And therefore Theodorus finding he was the sole Archbishop in England, embraced the opportunity to extend his jurisdiction over the North. For that purpose probably it was that he deposed Wilfrid, from whose temper and character he expected opposition, that he divided York into three Bishopricks, on pretence it would be more convenient for the people; and lastly, that he deposed Thumbert, who had openly censured his usurpations.

The same Council that deposed Thumbert, chose in his room Cuthbert a Monk of Lindisfarn, who was the only person that opposed his own election, out of an excess of modesty and humility. The Bishops, who all judged him worthy of the Episcopal character, found it a very difficult matter to bring him to a compliance; and at last were forced to consent he should remain at Lindisfarn, where he had liv'd a long time; for which reason Eatta was translated to Hagulfstad.

Some time after, Theodorus being grown very old, and finding he had not long to live, was touched with remorse for what he had done to Wilfrid, and wanted to be reconciled to him. To this purpose he interceded for him so earnestly with Alfred, successor to Egfrid, that he was recalled. The Bishoprick of Lindisfarn being then vacant by the voluntary resignation of Cuthbert, Bofa was translated thither, and Wilfrid restored to York.

Cuthbert being return'd to his Monastery at Lindisfarn, died soon after. In process of time, his body being removed to Durham, became so famous for miracles, that among all the English Saints he had the greatest veneration paid him.

Wilfrid was no sooner settled in his See, but he undertook the annulling all that had been done during his disgrace. He attempted the uniting again to York the Bishoprick of Hagulfstad, and claimed the revenues that had been taken from his Church, and appropriated to that Bishoprick. In fine, he pretended that all the regulations of Theodorus were null and void; and perhaps he was in the right; but his haughty way of proceeding made him meet with opposition from all quarters. Even Alfred his Pupil and Sovereign, not being able to bear any longer his imperious temper, drove him once more from his Church. Thus this restless Prelate was reduced to seek for shelter from Ethelred King of Mercia, formerly his enemy, but now his friend. Mercia being then divided into four Bishopricks, and Leicester, one of them, happening to be vacant, Ethelred promoted Wilfrid to that See, which however he enjoyed but a very little while. His haughty temper was so displeasing to the King of Mercia, that he dispossessed him of it in a few months. Not content with incurring the displeasure of the Kings of Mercia and Northumberland, he took occasion also to fall out with Berthwald, Archbishop of Canterbury, and by that means forfeited his protection, which he then stood in great need of. The two Kings his enemies laid hold of this opportunity to humble him. They requested Berthwald to call a council, in order to examine into the life and actions of Wilfrid. The Archbishop, as matters stood between him and Wilfrid, readily complied with their desire. Accordingly a council was held at Onsfild in Northumberland, where Wilfrid was obliged to appear, and was charged with crimes that deserved degradation. However, the Bishops unwilling to carry matters to that extremity, endeavoured by intreaties and threats to induce him to resign his Bishoprick of his own accord. But nothing could bring him to that; he told them, it was a great piece of ingratitude in the English to use him in that manner, after all the services he had done the Church. The Services he boasted of were, his contributing the most of any towards fixing Easter-Day, according to the usage of Rome, his introducing the Roman Ritual into the Churches of the North, and his bringing the Scotch Monks to conform to the Rules of the Order of St. Benedict. Upon these accounts, said he, you ought to reward me, instead of threatening to depose me unjustly for imaginary crimes. But if you will dare to go on, know I'll appeal to the Pope against your proceedings. None other has power to condemn me, and he it is alone I acknowledge for my Judge. The Council not regarding his appeal, unanimously depos'd him. However, this did not in the least humble him. Tho' he was seventy years of age, he resolv'd to go to Rome for redress. The Pope, always favourable to those that appealed to him, convened a Synod of the neighbouring Bishops, wherein Wilfrid, upon his single representation of matters, was fully acquitted. After which, the Pope gave him commendatory letters to Berthwald, and the Kings of Mercia and Northumberland, requiring them to restore Wilfrid in pursuance to the decree of the Synod.

As soon as Wilfrid was returned to England, he waited on the Archbishop, who finding he came with the Pope's recommendation, began to relent, and promise his friendship. On the other hand, Ethelred King of Mercia, who was now turned Monk, promised Wilfrid his intercession: But Alfred at first seem'd inflexible. He said he could see no manner of reason for restoring, upon the Pope's letter; and the sentence of a foreign Council that knew but little of the matter, a man that had caused so many disturbances, and after having been banished several times, had at length been lawfully deposed by a Synod. But he was not long of this mind. Soon after taking sick, it was put into his head, that his distemper was a punishment from God, for his disobedience to the Pope's orders; and this made so deep an impression upon him, that he vowed to restore Wilfrid, in case he recovered. Death prevented him from performing his vow; however, he ordered Brithric, whom he left Guardian to his Son Osfred, to see it put in execution out of hand.

(1) By the instigation of his Queen Ermenburga, says Eddius, p. 63.

(2) Eddius, in Vit. Wilf. says he went first to France, where he was way-laid, and his company and equipage plunder'd.

Altho' Alfred had been positively promised, the affair of Wilfrid should be soon ended, it was not possible to think of it immediately, by reason of a civil war raised by Eadulph, who had usurped the crown. Wilfrid behaved upon this occasion in such a manner, as seemed to deprive him of all hopes of ever being restored. As he did not doubt but Eadulph, who was then besieging the King and Brithric in Bamborough Castle, would succeed in his designs, he went in all haste to him, in order to make him his friend betimes, and secure his protection. This proceeding had like to have proved his ruin. Eadulph, knowing he was hated by the Northumbrians, to do them a pleasure, gave him a very ill reception, forbidding him ever to appear in his presence. On the other side, Brithric informed of Wilfrid's conduct, lost all kindness for him. However, after the war was ended by the death of the Usurper, Brithric was prevailed upon, tho' with some difficulty, to consent Wilfrid should be restored. To this end a council was held near the river Nydd, where it was agreed Wilfrid should be Bishop of Hagulfstad, with which he was obliged to be satisfied. John, then Bishop of that See, was removed to York, vacant by the death of Bosa.

Edm. 1.
c. 58.
708.

Bede, l. 5.
c. 6.

l. 5. c. 21.

Thus Wilfrid's affair, after many difficulties, was at length determined. John in 721 resigned his Bishoprick, and retired to the monastery of Beverly, of which he was Abbot. He was canonized after his death, and became very famous, by the name of St. John of Beverly. He was succeeded in the See of York by Wilfrid the Younger, his chaplain. To Wilfrid the Elder, succeeded in his See of Hagulfstad, Acca one of the Priests that had attended him in his journey to Rome, where he became a great proficient in Church-Musick, which, says Bede, 'twas impracticable for him to learn in his own country. Wilfrid the Younger was succeeded in the See of York by Egbert, Brother to Edbert King of Northumberland.

It was necessary to be thus particular about the establishment of the northern Bishopricks, the succession of the first Bishops, and the alterations occasioned by Wilfrid; without all which, it would be difficult to give a distinct notion of the Churches of these parts. Hence also may be seen, how the Archbishop of Canterbury had opportunity of exercising his jurisdiction over all England, contrary to the regulation of Gregory I. To which, the enterprising genius of Theodorus, and the deposing of Wilfrid, likewise contributed. Had this last continued in the See of York, he would doubtless have obtained the Pall, and by that means put a stop to Theodorus's proceedings.

The dignity of Archbishop of York, and Metropolitan of the North, vanished with Paulinus. After that Prelate left Northumberland, and the Northumbrians deserted the Faith, the Monks sent for from Scotland by Oswald to instruct the people, were contented with the bare title of Bishop, without applying to the Pope for the Pall, whose jurisdiction they did not acknowledge. Afterwards Wilfrid, successor to Colman, having been deposed, the Bishoprick of the Northumbrians was divided into four, namely, York, Whithern, Lindisfarn, and Hagulfstad. This division was a fresh obstacle to the Bishop of York's desiring the Pall, his See being so considerably lessened by it. Besides, Bosa, John and Wilfrid the Younger, who were successively Bishops of York, were pious and good Men, who thought of nothing less than aspiring to more honourable titles. But Egbert, who was Bishop of York, whilst his Brother sat on the throne of Northumberland, having more ambition than his predecessors, improved the respect they had for him at Rome on account of his birth, and procured the Pall with the Archiepiscopal dignity: By which means he acquired a jurisdiction over the three other northern Bishops, who became his Suffragans. From that time the Archbishops of York began to be upon a Level with those of Canterbury, and to insist on Gregory's regulation, whereby it was ordered, there should be an entire equality and independency between the two Archbishops. On the other hand, the Archbishops of Canterbury pleaded the jurisdiction exercised by Theodorus over

Malmib.
l. 1. c. 3.
744.

the North, and all the rest of England. Hence arose a contest between the two Metropolitans, which was not decided 'till many ages after. Alcuinus gives Egbert, whom he calls his master, the character of an able and learned Prelate, and takes notice of his building a library at York, and furnishing it with a noble collection of Books. Eanbald, who succeeded Egbert, was living at the time of the dissolution of the Heptarchy.

The CHURCH of WESSEX.

IT does not appear, that Austin sent any of his companions to preach the Gospel in the kingdom of Wessex. It was not 'till forty years after his arrival in Britain that the West-Saxons were converted by the ministry of Birinus. This Priest, zealous for the advancement of the kingdom of Christ, being informed there were still in England nations to whom the Gospel was unpreached, desired Pope Honorius to send him thither (1). His request being granted, he received the episcopal character, and set out for England, not knowing for certain on what nation providence would throw him, or on whom in particular he designed to lay out his charitable care. He accidentally arrived in the kingdom of Wessex; and finding the inhabitants Idolaters, resolved to stay among them and endeavour their conversion. After some time he had the satisfaction to baptize Cinigisil the King, and Quicelm his Brother (2). Soon after Birinus found his Audience very numerous, multitudes following the example of their Kings. He continued for fourteen years to edify his converts by his discourses and example, and at length, after a considerable progress, died at Dorchester, where he had built a Church and fixed his episcopal See.

634.
Bede, l. 3.
c. 7.

635.
Atter. Ann.
636.
Bede, l. 3.
c. 7.

After Birinus's death, Wessex was involved in fresh troubles. Cenowalch, who succeeded his father Cinigisil, being as yet a Pagan, was no favourer of the Christians. But what was still worse, Penda King of Mercia became master of the kingdom and kept it three years, Cenowalch being forced to fly into East-Anglia. It may be easily judged Christianity, during these three years, made no great progress. Besides Penda's being an Idolater, it is unlikely religion should flourish in the midst of wars and commotions. Cenowalch had the good fortune to be converted during his retreat in East-Anglia, and afterwards to be restored to his dominions. The peaceable times that ensued afforded him means to promote religion again in Wessex, where, after Birinus's death, none had been very forward to go and strengthen the new Christians. Whilst the King was looking out for some fit person to preach to his subjects, Agilbert a French Man, who was just come from his studies in Ireland, passed through Winchester in his way home. Cenowalch having seen him, invited him to stay with him, and instruct the people. Agilbert complied with his request; and being consecrated Bishop, went and resided at Dorchester. But as he had not the gift of languages, he made but little progress. Cenowalch perceiving he could not learn the English tongue, and that it was impossible his subjects should edify by the instructions of one who spoke to them in a foreign dialect, began to grow weary of him. At length he divided his kingdom into two Dioceses, and leaving Agilbert at Dorchester, made one Wina a Saxon that had been bred and consecrated in France, Bishop of Winchester (3). Agilbert could not bear the King should make this partition without consulting him, much less that he should give the preference to the new Bishop by placing him in his capital. His complaints upon this occasion not being much regarded, he took his leave and retired into France, where he was made Bishop of Paris. He returned afterwards into England, to assist at the council of Whitby. In the mean time, Cenowalch not agreeing with Wina, dismissed him also.

635.

Atter. Ann.

636.

Bede, l. 3.

c. 7.

630.

660.

666.

Wessex remaining thus without a Bishop (4), and Ecclesiasticks fit for such an employment not being very common in England, Cenowalch would have recalled Agilbert, who did not think proper to quit Paris for Winchester. However, he made an offer to the King of his Nephew Eleutherius, a Priest, whom he recommended, as well qualified for the episcopal function. Eleutherius being accepted of, and consecrated by Theodorus, became sole Bishop of the West-Saxons.

670.

After the death of Cenowalch, Wessex was troubled with civil wars for ten years. Eleutherius dying during the troubles, was succeeded by Heda; after whose death, the number of Christians being very much increased in Wessex, it was found necessary to divide the kingdom

Bede, l. 5.
c. 19.

(1) Bede says, he undertook their Conversion by the Advice of Pope Honorius, l. 3. c. 7.
(2) Hgeden relates from some ancient Chronicles, that King Cinigisil gave all the Lands seven Miles round Winchester for the erecting an Episcopal See in that City, and for the Maintenance of the Persons that were to officiate in the Cathedral, l. 237.
(3) Where Cenowalch built a fine Cathedral. W. Malmib. p. 13.
(4) And that for a considerable time. Bede, l. 3. c. 7.

again into two Dioceses, the Sees whereof were fixed at Winchester and Sherborn. Daniel was made Bishop of the first, and Aldhelm of the last, who was nephew to King Ina, and the first Englishman that wrote in Latin, a language he was better skilled in than any of his countrymen before him. When he was promoted to his Bishoprick, he was abbot of the Monastery of Malmesbury, so named from Maidulph a Scotch-man the first abbot, and Aldhelm, his successor (1). Forthere, who, according to Bede, was well versed in the Holy Scriptures, was Bishop of Sherborn after Aldhelm, and to Daniel succeeded Almund in the Bishoprick of Winchester. From that time to the dissolution of the Heptarchy, I meet with nothing in the Ecclesiastical History of Wessex worth notice.

The CHURCH of MERCIA.

IT was above fifty years after the conversion of Kent, that the Mercians embraced the Christian Faith. Penda, who sat on the throne of Mercia above thirty years, was of a too haughty and turbulent spirit to embrace a religion so contrary to his temper and character. However, divine providence so ordered matters, that this Prince was induced, though not to profess, yet at least to tolerate the Christian Religion in his dominions. Penda his eldest Son, whom he had made King of Leicester, being gone to Northumberland to demand Alfreda King Oswy's daughter in marriage, could obtain her upon no other terms but his turning Christian (2). Whether the young Prince was apprehensive of the same obstruction to his marriage in all the other kingdoms, which were already converted, or had a favourable opinion of Christianity, he received baptism before he left Northumberland (3). At his return, he brought with him four Priests, Cedda, Adda, Beti and Diurna, to preach the Gospel to the Mercians: Which the King his father opposed not, either out of complaisance to his Son, or because all religions were indifferent to him (4). Diurna, who was a Scotch-man, and the only Bishop of the four, governed the Mercian Church prosperously for some years; he and his companions having met with a plentiful harvest in Mercia, the largest of the seven kingdoms, and the last that was converted. Cellach succeeded Diurna.

After the death of Penda, Mercia was subject three years to Oswy King of Northumberland: but he being a Christian, religion received no detriment from that revolution. But when Wulpher ascended the throne, being yet an idolater, he was carried by a false zeal to persecute his Christian Subjects, even to the putting to death two of his own Sons, who refused to renounce their Faith, if they may be credited who relate this fact, which does not seem to be well supported. Happily for the Christians this storm was soon blown over, Wulpher being converted presently after.

During the persecution, Cellach retired into Scotland: So that Mercia being without a Bishop when Wulpher embraced the Gospel, he sent for an English Priest, named Trumbere, who had been educated in Scotland, and caused him to be consecrated Bishop of Mercia. To him succeeded Jaruman, who had the honour of replanting the Christian Religion in the kingdom of Essex, as will be related hereafter. Upon Jaruman's death Wulpher desired Theodorus to send him a Bishop. Theodorus gladly complied with his request, as giving him a good opportunity of promoting Chad (5), whom he had deprived of the See of York, in the manner before related in the history of the Church of Northumberland. Chad being come to Mercia, fixed his See at Lichfield (6), where he died, after he had governed the Church prudently and happily for many years. I am persuaded it will not be taken amiss, that I refer those to Bede's Ecclesiastical History, who are desirous of seeing a list of St. Chad's miracles, and the hymns the Angels sung in the air over his house when he lay a dying.

Upon the death of Chad, Theodorus promoted to the See of Lichfield Winfred a Priest, whom he deposed soon after for daring to exultate with him for attaining too great authority over the other Bishops. He had served another in the same manner in Northumberland upon the like account. Saxulph, Abbot of Mildes-hampten (7), was made Bishop in Winfred's room. But as the Christians daily increased in Mercia, Ethelred, successor to Wulfer, finding, one Bishop was not sufficient for so large a flock, divided his kingdom into four Dioceses, the Sees whereof were established at Lichfield, Worcester, Hereford, and Leicester (8). Saxulph continued at Lichfield. Faddric was sent to Worcester, but dying before he was consecrated, Boselus was put in his place. Cuthwin was Bishop of Leicester, and Putta of Hereford. After Cuthwin's death Leicester was united to Lichfield; but some time after they were separated again upon Winfred's account, who was dispossessed of the See of York, and held not this long. Hedda succeeded Saxulph in the Bishoprick of Lichfield (9).

I pass over in silence the particulars of no moment relating to the Mercian Churches, with the succession of their Bishops (10), to come at the change that happened in the reign of Offa, by the erecting of Lichfield into an Archbishoprick. Offa, jealous of the authority exercised by the Archbishop of Canterbury over the Churches of Mercia, and having besides a particular quarrel to Lambert who then filled the Archiepiscopal See, resolved to withdraw the Churches of Mercia from his jurisdiction. To this end, he privately solicited Pope Adrian I. to make the Bishop of Lichfield an Archbishop, and the Bishops of Mercia and East-Anglia his Suffragans. The Pope willingly consented to his request, as glad of the opportunity, by obliging this Prince, to extend over the Church of England his jurisdiction, which was not yet thoroughly submitted to, or at least not to that degree he desired. With this view he sent Gregory Bishop of Osia, and Theophylact Bishop of Todi, with the character of Legates to transact this affair. To prevent Lambert from taking measures to avoid the blow that was aiming at him, the sending of these Legates was pretended to be on account of calling Synods in England for confirming the Churches in the Faith. Upon the arrival of the Legates, Theophylact stayed some time with Offa to concert measures how to accomplish their designs, whilst Gregory went on to Northumberland, where he convened a Synod, of which I shall speak in another place. At his return to Mercia, the two Legates summoned a national council of the seven kingdoms at Calcuith, where King Offa was present. After ratifying the Canons of the Northumberland-Synod, the erecting of Lichfield into an Archiepiscopal See was proposed. Lambert opposed it to the utmost of his power, but all in vain. The matter having been settled before-hand, the authority of Offa and the Legates bore down all opposition. Higbert, then Bishop of Lichfield was declared an Archbishop, and the Bishops of Mercia and East-Anglia were made his Suffragans (11). He was prevented by death from receiving the Pall, but Adulph his successor, had that honour from the Pope, who ratified what the council had done. Some are of opinion Offa purchased this favour with the tax of the Peter-Pence levied on Mercia and East-Anglia: but this is only a groundless conjecture. Lichfield enjoyed the title of an Archbishoprick not above fourteen years. After the death of Offa and Egfrid his Son, Cenulph was so far prevailed upon by the pressing instances of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, who represented to him, that according to the regulation of Gregory I. there ought to be but two Archbishops in England, that he wrote to the Pope with his own hand, to desire him to put things upon the ancient foot again. Adelard, Archbishop of Canterbury, took upon him the management of this affair at Rome, where (after a nine years solicitation) he obtained of Pope Leo III. that Mercia and East-Anglia should again be under the jurisdiction of the See of Canterbury. From that time to the reign of Egbert nothing remarkable relating to the Church happened in Mercia, except the Councils, of which I intend to speak elsewhere.

(1) Maidulph-Aldhelm-bury, by contraction Malmesbury, i. e. the tomb of Maidulph and Aldhelm. Rapin. Aldhelm was alive in Bede's time. l. 5. c. 19.
(2) Bede says, that upon his having preach'd to him the doctrines of a heavenly Kingdom, of a Resurrection, and future Immortality, he declared he would embrace the Christian Religion, even though he were not to have the young Princess in marriage. Bede, l. 5. c. 21.
(3) With all his Attendants. Bede, ibid.
(4) He seems to have acted upon another principle, if what Bede relates be true, that he hated and despised those, who, after they had embraced Christianity, lived in a manner unbecoming their pretension; saying, They were despicable wretches, who would not obey their God in whom they believed. l. 3. c. 21.
(5) Or Ceadda. Bede.
(6) This was a very large Diocese, comprehending the country of the Mercians, Middle-Angles, and what was afterwards called Lincoln. For so far King Wulfer's dominions extended. Bede, l. 4. c. 3.
(7) Afterwards Peterborough.
(8) Or rather Chester.
(9) Ethelbald, King of Mercia, discharged all the Monasteries and Churches of his kingdom from all publick Taxes, Impositions, &c. except Pontage, and the Tax for building of Forts. Ingulph, p. 5. Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 257.
(10) See them in Malmesbury de Gestis Pontif. Gerwasi, &c.
(11) Viz. the Bishops of Worcester, Leicester, Lincoln, Hereford, Helmham, Dommuc, Vit. Offa apud Mat. Paris. See also Spelm. Conc. Vol. I. p. 302. and Camden.

The CHURCH of ESSEX.

MELLITUS one of the Missionaries sent over to Austin, was the first that preached the Gospel to the East-Saxons, particularly at London. As far as can be judg'd, he made no great progress among the people. Probably what success he met with was entirely owing to the authority of Sebert King of Essex, and Ethelbert King of Kent (1); since upon their deaths, all the East-Saxon Christians fell back to Paganism, and expelled Mellitus (2), without ever admitting him any more. The conversion therefore of the East-Saxons is not properly to be dated from this time, but rather from the reign of Sigebert the Good. This Prince living in strict friendship with Osuy King of Northumberland, and paying him frequent visits, had the good fortune to be instructed in the knowledge of the Gospel at his court, where he was baptized. He brought home with him Cedd, a Northumbrian Priest, of whom I have spoken before, and who being consecrated Bishop, heartily set about instructing the East-Saxons, among whom in a short time he made a very great progress (3). He was the only Scotch Man that after the council of Whitby was unwilling to leave his flock, tho' the controversy about Easter was decided contrary to his opinion. Nay, he went so far as to blame Colman and the rest of his countrymen, for deserting their flocks for a matter of so little moment. His strict adherence to ecclesiastical discipline was the occasion of Sigebert's death, or at least was pretended to be so, as was said in the history of the kingdom of Essex. As Cedd went often to Northumberland, where he had spent great part of his life, Adelwald King of Deira, made him a present of certain lands lying near Lejningham, where he founded a monastery. Thither he used to retire and practise the greatest Austerities. Here also it was that he died of the plague after he had governed the Church of Essex several years. Bede, who gives Cedd great encomiums, and mentions his austere way of living, takes occasion from thence to say, that Fasting was religiously practised by all who pretended to any thing of a regular life, and adds, that some fasted every Wednesday and Friday 'till three o'clock in the afternoon. The Saxon Homilies also most earnestly recommend Fasting; but withal take care to warn Christians against over-acting their part in this respect, as some did, and talk very rationally upon this article.

After the death of Sigebert the Good, and Swiðhelm his brother, it happened that in the reign of Sebba and Siger the plague raged terribly in the kingdom of Essex, particularly at London. Siger being persuaded that the plague was sent upon the East-Saxons, as a punishment from the Gods for abandoning the religion of their ancestors, returned to idolatry, and drew after him those of his subjects who had not been thoroughly converted. But Sebba steadfastly adhered to the Christian Religion. Wulpher King of Mercia, on whom these two Princes were then in dependance, having been informed of what passed in Essex, sent thither Jaruman his Bishop to endeavour to restore the East-Saxons to the way of truth. Jaruman's pains were crowned with so good success, that the people at length returned to the Faith. Shortly after Wulpher, who acted as he pleased in the Kingdom of Essex, gave the first instance of Simony in England, by selling the Bishoprick of London to Wina, who had been driven from Winchester. He governed the Church of Essex 'till his death in 675. His successor was Erkenwald, famous for his great affection to the city of London, as well as for the holiness of his life, on account of which he was enrolled in the catalogue of the Saints. After his death a great contest arose between the Canons of St. Paul's at London, and the Monks of Barking, who should bury him. The first carried their point, and interred him in their Cathedral, where it is affirmed he wrought several miracles (4). It will be needless to carry down the succession of the Bishops of London to the dissolution of the Heptarchy, since nothing remarkable happened concerning them (5).

The CHURCH of EAST-ANGLIA.

THE first conversion of the East-Angles is said to Bede, 1. 2. be in the reign of Redwald; but by whom is not known. There is reason to believe, that during this Prince's life the Christian Religion made no great progress in East-Anglia. All that can be probably conjectur'd is, that Redwald, out of respect for Ethelbert King of Kent (at whose court some say he was baptized) gave leave to some of Austin's companions to preach in his dominions, and persecuted not those who had a mind to embrace the Gospel. What is said of his suffering the true God and the Pagan deities to be worshipped in the same temple, seems to infer that he was not himself a Christian (6), and that the number of converts in East-Anglia was very inconsiderable. Thus much at least is certain, Christianity flourish'd not in that kingdom, in his or his Son Erpwald's reign (7). And therefore we can't be greatly mistaken in placing the conversion of the East-Angles in the reign of Sigebert, successor to Erpwald. Bede, ibid. c. 18.

Sigebert, who had spent great part of his time in France, where he had been baptized, was thoroughly instructed in the Christian Religion. When he returned to England to take possession of the crown, he brought along with him a Burgundian Priest, named Felix, whom he got to be consecrated Bishop of Canterbury. Felix, upon his arrival in East-Anglia, used his utmost endeavours to bring back to the right way such as were gone astray, and instruct those that had not yet any knowledge of the truth. His endeavours met with such success, that in a short time he had the pleasure to see the East-Angles come in crowds to be baptized. In the mean time, Sigebert knowing nothing would make more for the benefit of his subjects, than permanent and continual instructions to confirm them in the Faith, erected schools, after the manner of those he had seen in France (8). Some will have it (9) that the University of Cambridge owes its original to these schools; but this opinion seems not to be well grounded.

Whilst Sigebert was thus employed in works of piety, he received farther assistance from one Furseus an Irish Monk, who preached to the East-Angles with good success. Bede gives him an extraordinary commendation; 1. 3. c. 10. attributes several miracles to him, and assures us he was, like St. Paul, wrapt up into Heaven. This same Furseus built a monastery at Cnobersburgh (10), which was largely endowed at several times by the Kings of East-Anglia. The troubles that arose after Sigebert's resigning the crown, obliged Furseus to retire into France, where he founded the monastery of Lagny in the jurisdiction of Meaux.

Felix was Bishop of the East-Angles seventeen years; Malmsh. his See was fixed at Dummac, a little town by the Sea-side, G. Pontif. now called Dunwich (11). Here it was he had the satisfaction to convert and baptize Enowalch King of Wessex, who had fled for refuge into East-Anglia. Felix was succeeded by Thomas a deacon of his Church; after him came Berchtigisus, surnamed Boniface, whom Bisus succeeded. Bisus being grown old and infirm, Becca and Badwin were made his assistants, and East-Anglia divided into two Dioceses. Becca resided at Dummac, and Badwin at Elmham, a poor village now in Norfolk. These two Bishopricks continued in being, 'till the Danes becoming masters of East-Anglia, they both lay vacant for above one hundred years. After which the Diocese of Dummac was united to that of Elmham: From whence the Episcopal See was removed to Thetford (12), and afterwards to Norwich (13), where it remains to this day.

(1) This King Ethelbert founded the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's, about the year 610. See Stowe's Survey, 1. 3. p. 141. Bede, 1. 2. c. 5. Malmsh. p. 255. Tho' others say it was done by King Sebert. See Higdon's Pelicton, p. 227, 228.

(2) In the year 614, Mellitus, with the assistance of King Ethelbert, founded a Church and Monastery near London, in a place called Thorney; which he dedicated to St. Peter: As it lay West of London, it came afterwards to be called Westminster. Malmsh. p. 256. See Stowe's Survey, 1. 1.

(3) He built several Churches, Bede, 1. 3. c. 22. He taught and baptized chiefly at Itchenester, near the river Pent, supposed to be about St. Peter's, on the Wall in Dorset; and at Triburg, or Tisbury, near the Trames. One may infer from Bede's words, that he erected some kind of Monasteries, or rather Schools, there. See Bede, 1. 3. c. 22. Canden, in Essex. Huntingd. p. 353. Brompton, &c.

(4) In regard of the miracles wrought at his tomb, so was generally believed, the Corpse was enclosed in a very rich Shrine, and a great many offerings of value made at it. In the year 1586, Robert Braybrooke Bishop of London, made a Constitution for the revival of St. Erkenwald's holy-day, which at late had been neglected. The solemnity was kept upon the last day of April. Dugdale's Hist. of St. Paul's, p. 20, 181.

(5) De gestis vel sepulchris ne verbum quidem. Malmsh. p. 256.

(6) Some say he was baptized in the court of Ethelbert King of Kent. Rapin.

(7) Erpwald embraced Christianity at the persuasion of King Edwyn. Bede, 1. 2. c. 15.

(8) And put masters in them, as there was in those of Kent. Bede, 1. 3. c. 18.

(9) Polydore Virgil, Leland, Bayle, &c. are of this opinion: But their authority is much weaken'd by the silence of Bede, Flavence of Worcester, Malmsh. and Huntingdon, who make no mention of Cambridge.

(10) Now Burgh-Castle in Suffolk.

(11) It is in Suffolk, and is said to have had fifty Churches. Canden.

(12) Thetford, i. e. the Ford of the People, in Norfolk.

(13) Norwich, i. e. the North-Castle. Wic signifying among other things a Castle.

The CHURCH of SUSSEX.

Bede, l. 4.
c. 13.

Yddius.

Bede, l. 4.
c. 13.

686.

Malm'sb.
G. Pontif.
l. 2.

IT is no wonder the kingdom of Sussex continued so long after the rest in an idolatrous state, since it was in subjection to Wessex, where the Gospel was not preached till forty years after the arrival of Austin. If we may credit the author of the Life of Wilfrid Bishop of York, the conversion of the South Saxons about the year 686, was owing to the disgrace of that Prelate, who fled for refuge into their country. Adelwalch King of Sussex, who received him into his protection, had already attempted the conversion of his Subjects, by founding a Monastery in his little kingdom (1); but his endeavours answered not expectation. Perhaps Wilfrid himself would have found it a difficult matter to have made any impression upon them, had not a favourable juncture unexpectedly paved the way for him. Not long after his arrival, the country being miserably distressed for want of provisions, he taught the inhabitants the art of fishing in the Sea, their skill before going no farther than the catching of Eels. This improvement greatly relieving them, wrought so upon their minds, that they listened with the same attention to his instructions about their spiritual, as they had before to those about their bodily wants. But to compleat the matter, seasonable showers, after a three years drought, restoring to the earth its former fruitfulness, they were thoroughly convinced that Wilfrid was an extraordinary person, and highly favoured by Heaven. At least this is what the writer of his Life would fain make us believe. Wilfrid perceiving the Christians daily to encrease, established his episcopal See at Selfey (2), a small Peninsula given him by Adelwalch. He founded there a Monastery also, which he furnished with the Monks he had brought with him from Northumberland. Here he usually resided during the time of his banishment. At length being recalled into his own country, Selfey remained a long while without a Bishop, because the South-Saxons, after their becoming subject to the King of Wessex, were put under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of the West-Saxons. Some time after Wessex being divided into two Dioceses, Sussex was annexed to the See of Winchester; where it continued till a Synod held in Wessex, in the time of Daniel, decreed Sussex should be a distinct Diocese again, and the See fixed at Selfey as formerly. Edbert was the first Bishop. His successors resided at the same place, down to the year 1070, when the See was removed to Chichester (3), where it continues to this day.

As for the Isle of Wight, after it was converted by the furious zeal of Cedwalla, it remained all along under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Winchester.

After this account of the most remarkable particulars relating to the conversion of the Seven Kingdoms, it will be necessary to take a general view of the Councils held in England, during those early times of the Church.

COUNCILS.

l. 2. c. 2.

I Have already spoken of the two Synods convened upon Austin's request, in order to endeavour to bring the Britons to the obedience of the Pope. Though these were not properly English, but rather British Councils, I shall not however pass them over without making this one observation. Bede, in his Ecclesiastical History tells us, that Austin required of the British Bishops these four things (4): That they would celebrate the Paschal Feast the same day with the Romanists: That they would conform to the ceremonies practised by the Church of Rome in administering Baptism: That they would assist the Roman Missionaries in converting the Saxons: That they would submit to the Papal Authority. Had Austin equally insisted on these four Articles, Bede would naturally have related the sentiments of the British, concerning the three first, and yet we find he speaks only of the last. Hence we may conclude, that this was the main point, and what Austin chiefly dwelt upon. For the same reason also the Abbot of Bangor answered only to this point, being very sensible, that was the principal thing in dispute.

There is no occasion to add any thing to what has already been said of the Council of Whitby or Streanshalh, and the other Synods that were held upon Wilfrid's account.

In 673, Theodorus, Archbishop of Canterbury, convened a national Synod at Hertford, at which were present all the English Bishops, with a great number of other Ecclesiasticks. The Archbishop, who was president, put the question to the Bishops, whether they were willing, the Church of England should be governed by the Canons of the ancient Councils. To which they all having agreed, he produced a list of the Canons, and pitching upon ten of them, ordered them to be read before the Council, and asked their consent to each of them.

I. That the Festival of Easter might be uniformly kept in all the English Churches, on the first Sunday after the full Moon in March.

II. That no Bishop should encroach upon the jurisdiction of another.

III. That Bishops should not meddle with the temporal concerns of the Monasteries.

IV. That no Monk should have the liberty to quit his monastery, without leave from the Abbot.

V. That it should not be lawful for any of the Clergy to abandon their Diocese, without the Bishop's leave, and that they should not be received into another Diocese, without a recommendation under the Bishop's own hand.

VI. That Bishops and Clergy, who are out of their Diocese, ought not to execute any part of their function, but should be contented with an hospitable reception.

VII. That a Synod should be convened twice a year. This Canon was altered to once a year.

VIII. That the Bishops should take their places at Councils according to their seniority.

IX. That new Sees should be erected, as the number of Christians increased. This was thrown out.

X. That no marriage should be annulled but on account of adultery. That if a Man put off his wife, he ought not to marry another, but either be reconciled or live single.

Nine of these Canons being agreed to, the Council denounced Excommunication and Degradation upon all that should infringe them, and then broke up.

Baronius pretends, This Council was convened by the Pope's order, and that Theodorus presided as Legate of the Holy See. But when we examine the grounds of his assertion, we find he builds it only upon Theodorus's saying in his harangue, at the opening of the council, that he was consecrated by the Pope (5), as if that were equivalent to his being made Legate. Bede, Malm'sbury, Florence of Worcester, who speak of this council, say not a word to support the Cardinal's notion.

Theodorus summoned another Council or Synod at Hatfield (6) in 680, at the request of the Pope, who wanted to know the sentiments of the Church of England with reference to the Herefy of the Monothelites (7), which then made a great noise in the world. The Pope had all the satisfaction he desired, the English being entirely free from that error. This Synod received the five first general Councils (8), together with the Synod held just before at Rome, against the Monothelites.

The next council was convened at Becanceld in 694 (9), by Witred King of Kent, who presided himself, the council being composed of the Clergy and Nobility. The Constitutions were all drawn up in the form of a Charter, wherein the King granted several privileges to the Church, particularly an exemption from the payment of taxes and other Services and Incumbrances incident to a Lay-fee. He declares moreover that the Church has power to govern her own body, the Prerogative Royal not reaching to religious matters. This article has given occasion to some to call in question the genuineness of this council (10). They object, for instance, that the five Abbesses, who subscribed this charter, not only signed before all the Priests, but also before Botred a Bishop, contrary to all precedent. On the other hand, others (11) are as zealous in the defence of it, as making for the independency of the Church. It

(1) At Bosenham, where Bede says, one Dicul a Scotchman with five or six Monks liv'd, but could not prevail with the South Saxons to turn Christians.
(2) i. e. Seahs. The ruins of this City are still to be seen at Low-water. It contained, when it was given to Wilfrid, eighty-seven families. Bede, l. 4. c. 13.
(3) Cissan Cester, i. e. the City of Cissa, the Son of Ella, first King of Sussex.
(4) Bede mentions only the three first: But that there was another required of the British Bishops is evident from hence, that Bede relates only the Answer that was given to the fourth article, by these Bishops. See Bede, l. 2. c. 2.
(5) Ego quidem Theodorus, quatuor-indignus, ab Apostolica sede destinatus Dorovernenfis Ecclesie Episcopus,---are Bede's words, l. 4. c. 5.
(6) Now Bishop's-Hatfield in Hertfordshire.
(7) They held that Christ had but one Will.
(8) The Council of Nice in 325, of Constantinople in 381, of Ephesus in 431, of Chalcedon in 451, and of Constantinople in 553.
(9) Supposed to be Beckenham in Kent. See Jyn, Vol. I. p. 209.
(10) Dr. Wake, our present Archbishop, has wrote against it. State of the Church, &c. p. 149.
(11) Collier defends it, p. 114. Ecc. Hist.

would carry me too far from my present design to examine the reasons pro and con. It is sufficient to acquaint the Reader there is such a dispute.

The next year the Synod of Berghamsted (1) was held in the reign of the same King. It was composed, like the foregoing one, of Clergy and Laity. Its canons related chiefly to the sin of adultery, and the privileges of the Clergy. As for adultery, it was enacted, that the offender should be put under penance; and if he refused to submit to that discipline, he should be excommunicated. If he was a stranger, he was to forfeit one hundred shillings.

As for the Clergy, it was decreed, that the Church should be free and enjoy all her privileges.

That the breach of the Church's peace should be punished with a fine of fifty shillings (2).

That the bare affirmation of the King or a Bishop should be equivalent to their oath.

That if a Bishop, Abbot, or Deacon, is charged with any crime, and being brought to the altar he declares solemnly, he speaks the truth: This declaration shall be the same as his oath.

That if any Clergyman should be prosecuted, the cognisance of the cause belongs to the Church.

Thus by degrees the Clergy obtain'd their privileges, which they have but too often abused (3).

The two Councils that are pretended to be held at London and Aine (4) in 714, being looked upon by the best authorities as forged, it would be lost time to say any thing of them.

In 747 was held at Cloveshoe or Cliff (5) in the kingdom of Kent a national Synod, at which Ethelbald King of Mercia was present, with twelve Bishops, and a great number of Lords. Cuthbert Archbishop of Canterbury, who was present, read Pope Zachary's letter, wherein the Pope admonished the English to reform their lives, and threatened those with excommunication that continued in their wicked courses. They drew up a body of twenty-eight Canons, most of them relating to Ecclesiastical Discipline, the Government of Monasteries, the Duties of Bishops, and other Clergymen, the Publick Service, Singing Psalms, Keeping the Sabbath, and other Holidays. I shall mention the three following ones, as containing something particular.

The Xth orders the Priests to be thoroughly acquainted with the doctrines of Christianity, and to teach the people the Apostles Creed, and the Lord's Prayer in English. Agreeable to this was Bede's advice to Egbert Archbishop of York; that it was absolutely necessary Christians should know what they said when they prayed to God; and that they should be instructed in their own native tongue, and therefore that he himself had translated the Creed and the Lord's Prayer into English for the benefit of those that did not understand Latin.

The XXVth warns Christians from vainly imagining that by giving Alms they can compound for their sins, or dispense with the Discipline of the Church.

The XXVIIth was made upon the account of a rich Layman, who having been excommunicated, requested to be admitted again into the Church, upon his having procured several Persons to fast in his stead; alledging that the Penance they had undergone in his name, was more than he could have done himself in three hundred years. The Canon declares with great indignation against this intolerable presumption, since at that rate, the Rich might much more easily get to heaven than the Poor, contrary to the express declaration of our Saviour.

In this Canon we have the form of a Prayer for the Dead, which runs thus: O Lord, we beseech thee, grant that the Soul of such a Person may be secured in a state of repose, and admitted, with the rest of thy Saints, into the regions of Light and Bliss.

The Council of Calcuth or Calchite, held in 785, or according to others in 787, on account of erecting Lichfield into an Archbishoprick, ratified the Canons of a Synod that had been convened just before in Northumberland. Gregory and Theophylact, who presided as the Pope's Legates, acknowledged in their letter to the Pope, that they were the first that had been sent into England with that character.

These are some of the Canons of the Synod of Northumberland, ratified by the council of Calcuth.

I. That all in holy orders strictly adhere to the council of Nice.

II. That Baptism is only to be administered at Easter and Whitsontide, unless in case of necessity. That it is the duty of Godfathers to teach their God-children the Credo and the Lord's Prayer, both which all Christians are oblig'd to have by heart.

VIII. The antient privileges of the Church are carefully to be preserv'd.

This was a never-failing Canon in all the Councils.

IX. The Priests are not to eat in private, unless indisposed. By this one would think the Clergy were not dispersed in Parishes, but lived all in the Capital of the Diocese in common.

The Xth forbids the Clergy to perform the divine Service without Stockings, and to use a Chalice or Patten of Horn.

The XIth exhorts Princes to govern their kingdoms by the directions of the Bishops, to whom the power of binding and loosing is delivered.

The XIIth excludes Bastards from succeeding to the Crown.

The XVth condemns marriages within the prohibited degrees.

The XVIth makes Bastards, particularly the children of Nuns, incapable of inheriting.

The XVIIth urges the payment of tithes from the authority of the law of Moses.

The XVIIIth prescribes a strict performance of vows.

Some irregularities in the Subscription List in the several copies of the Canons of this council (6), have caused the council itself to be called in question. But I doubt whether these irregularities are sufficient to render the whole questionable (7).

In 798 a Synod was held at Finchale in Northumberland (8), by Eanbald Archbishop of York. The design of this meeting was to make some regulations with regard to discipline: but here occasionally the Archbishop ordered the canons of the first five General Councils to be read, which were unanimously received.

The council held at Cloveshoe or Cliff in 800, under Adelard Archbishop of Canterbury, was convened for the recovery of certain Church-Lands usurped by the Kings of Mercia.

Three years after, another council was held at the same place, wherein, according to Pope Leo's constitution, and with the consent of Cenulph King of Mercia, the Archbishoprick of Lichfield was reduced to a Bishoprick, as formerly.

In 816, Wilfrid Archbishop of Canterbury, summoned a council at Calcuth, at which Cenulph King of Mercia and Monarch, was present, with all the English Bishops except those of Northumberland. There are eleven canons drawn up by this Synod, whereof the II^d and Vth seem to be the most remarkable.

The II^d orders all Churches to be consecrated by the Bishop of the Diocese, with the following Formalities. The Bishop shall bless the Holy Water, and sprinkle the Church with it, according to the directions of the Ritual. Then having consecrated the Eucharist, he shall put it in a Box with some Relicks to be laid up in the Church. In case there are no Relicks, the consecrated Elements, being the Body and Blood of our Lord, shall be sufficient. Every Bishop shall be obliged to have drawn upon the Altar, or upon the Wall, the Figure of the Saint to whom the Church is dedicated.

The Vth declares against allowing all Scotchmen to baptize, or read the divine service in England.

There is mention of two Councils more convened in Mercia in the reign of Bernulph, one in 822, and the other in 824. Probably the first is a forgery; but they are both of so little consequence, as not to be worth taking notice of.

(1) This was not Berkhamsted in Hertfordshire, as some have imagined, but Berghamsted, a Place in Kent. See Tyrr. Vol. I. p. 210. and Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 194.

(2) The same as the King's. See Spelman.

(3) The Xth, XXVth, and XXVIIth Articles, having something particular in them, it will not be amiss to lay them before the Reader. The Xth runs thus: If, on Saturday Evening, after Sun-set; or Sunday Evening after the same time, a Servant or Slave (seruus) shall do any servile work, let his Master be fined eighty Shillings.

XXVth. If a Lay-man kill a Thief, let him lie without any Wergild, that is, without any satisfaction being made to the Thief's relations.

XXVIIth. If a Stranger wanders about, and does neither hollow nor found a Horn, he is to be accounted as a Thief, and to be either slain or banish'd.

Spelman Conc. Tom. I. p. 194.---197.

(4) Supposed to be Ashgater in Worcestershire. See Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 212.

(5) Cliff at Har, is a Town on a Rock near Rockester. But the presence of the King of Mercia at this, and some other Councils, held at Cloveshoe, makes it supposed that it is the same with Abington in Berkshire, about the middle of the Nation, antiently written Storogum by mistake for Clavogum or Cloveshoe.

(6) Dulbert Bishop Augustadensis (or Hagustadensis) Euchæria, signs before Eanbald his Metropolitan of York.

(7) About the year 757, the Monks of Lindisfarne, who, from the first time of their institution were allowed to drink nothing but Milk or Water, obtained (through the means of King Ceolwulf who was become a Monk of that House) permission to drink Wine or Beer. See Lindisf. p. 159. Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 289.

(8) Now called Finstley in the Bishoprick of Durham. Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 305.

REFLECTIONS

ON THE

Primitive State of the ENGLISH CHURCH.

I SHALL close my account of the Primitive State of the English Church, with a few remarks that may serve to give a just notion of the thing. It is a great mistake to imagine, the Primitive Church of the English corresponded in all points with the Church founded by the Apostles immediately after our Saviour's death. The Christian Church, in her infancy, was perfect, without spot or wrinkle; but in process of time, she lost by degrees something of her primitive purity. From the days of the Apostles to the VIIIth century, errors and abuses crept in, which strangely disfigured her, and which daily increased during the VIIIth and IXth centuries, so that true religion by little and little degenerated into superstition. Our idea therefore of the primitive Church of England must be conformable to the state of the Christian Church at that time. I shall not here undertake to show wherein those innovations in the doctrines and services of the Church consisted; but content my self with observing the Christian Church, at the time of the conversion of the English, was far gone from its original purity. It can't, for instance, be denied, that the Monks, who were grown exceeding numerous all over Christendom, had introduced several religious practices that were not of divine or apostolical institution, as if our Saviour and his Apostles had forgot or neglected to give mankind full instructions in these matters. These voluntary acts of devotion, tho' introduced with a good intent, were now carried to so great a height, that the generality of Christians looked upon them as the life and soul of religion. I shall not insist any farther on this subject, since I have no design to enter into the controversy, but only to make this observation, That the English converted in the VIIIth century, are to be considered as in the same State with the rest of the Christian World at that time, seeing it was not in their power to know more than their masters taught them.

Austin and his companions were the first that preached the Gospel to the Anglo-Saxons. However the honour of their conversion ought not to be ascribed to them alone. The Scotch Monks of St. Columba had at least as great a share in it as the Italians. For after these last had begun to make Converts, the new Christians being sunk again into idolatry, the Scotch Monks were the persons that set them right again, or rather that converted them anew. This was the case in the kingdoms of Essex, Northumberland, and East-Anglia, as hath been related. As for the conversion of the Mercians, the Italian Missionaries had no hand in it at all. And yet Austin had run away with the honour of converting the English, when in the main the progress he made was not very considerable. 'Tis true he preached to the Saxons of Kent, as Mellitus did to those of Essex, and that with good success. But then very probably this work was already begun, and even in great forwardness, when Austin arrived in England. It is hard to conceive how these Monks, who were forc'd to make use of interpreters, could possibly have converted such numbers of Pagans, even to the baptizing ten thousand in one day, in a few months after their arrival, if the Saxons had not been prepared before-hand. This conjecture is farther confirmed by the letters of Gregory I. to Theodoric King of Austrasia, to Theodbert his brother, and to Queen Brunichild, to desire them to assist Austin in his journey to England. The Pope tells them, he was informed for certain that the English earnestly desired to turn Christians. Now is it not evident, that, if they had a strong desire to embrace the gospel, they were as good as half converted? There is great reason to presume, King Ethelbert had already some liking to the Christian Religion infused into him by his Queen, and especially by Luidhard, Bishop of Soysons, who had attended her into England. This is what the author of The History of St. Au- stin's Monastery positively affirms; and Malmsbury says little less, when he tells us, that Ethelbert was very desirous to hear what Austin had to propose. Besides, if the person, character and conduct of Austin, are considered, it will be hard to believe, he made the progress ascribed to him. Bede, who does not seem willing to lessen his reputation, says nothing that is very apt to raise in us an esteem for his preaching. Instead of embellishing his history with the heads of Austin's first discourse before Ethelbert, he is contented with relating only the King's answer. This gives occasion to suspect, he was not over-satisfied with that harangue. Moreover, the questions which Austin wanted the Pope to solve, do not much redound to his honour. This, no doubt, was the reason why Bede abridged them as much as possible, even to the rendering them sometimes so obscure, that the meaning of the question must be learnt by the answer.

To these considerations may be added, that Austin in the height of his success, for which he is so greatly honoured, established but two Bishops only, Justus at Rocheſter, and Mellitus at London, though the Pope had expressly ordered him to settle Bishops where-ever there should be occasion. This is a clear evidence, that the progress ascribed to him was not so considerable as Gregory imagines. But what can one think of this same Austin, who the very first year deserts his mission, and goes to Arles to get himself consecrated Archbishop, when as yet there was but a handful of Christians in England, or rather in the alone kingdom of Kent? To what end the title of Archbishop and Primate, at a time when there was not so much as one Bishop in being? What can one think moreover of the Pope's answer to him concerning the Bishops of Gaul, That he allows him no manner of jurisdiction over them? May it not be presumed, that Austin, not content with the Primacy of Great-Britain wherewith the Pope had honoured him, wanted to extend his jurisdiction over Gaul too? In fine, what can one think of Gregory's letter to him, exhorting him not to be elated at the Gift of Miracles God had bestowed on him, unless Austin had sent him word he had wrought several? But what were these miracles? Would Bede, who has carefully related those of Aidan, Finan, Furseus, and the other Scotch Monks, whom he looked upon as Schismaticks, have omitted those of Austin? And yet he gives us only one, and that of a later date than Gregory's letter, and the most suspicious that ever was, since by the confession of the same historian, it was wrought in order to bring the Britons to the obedience of the Pope? What opinion can one have of Austin, when it is considered with what zeal he laboured to reduce the Britons under the jurisdiction of the See of Rome, whilst five Saxon kingdoms were suffered to grovel in darkness and idolatry? To what purpose did he complain to the Pope of the want of labourers in so plentiful an harvest, if he did not employ those he already had? And if he did employ them, where are the fruits of their labours? What were their names? Where did they preach the gospel? No historian says a word of these things; and except Justus and Mellitus, who preached at Rocheſter and London, it is not known where he sent his companions, who according to the general opinion, were forty in number.

Again, the Converts made by these Italian Monks were not, 'tis to be feared, well grounded in their religion. This is a natural inference from the apostacy of the people of Essex, East-Anglia, Northumberland, and Kent itself, at a time when, had they been true Christians, they would have given marks of the highest zeal. This makes one think, their conversion was without any previous instruction, and rather the effect of fear, or complaisance to their Kings, than of a thorough persuasion persuasion and knowledge of the truth. It is therefore surprizingly strange, that the Conversion of the English should be ascribed to Austin, rather than to Aidan, to Finnan, to Colman, to Cedd, to Diuna and the other Scotch Monks, who undoubtedly laboured much more abundantly than he. But here lies the case. These last had not their Orders from Rome, and therefore must not be allowed any share in the glory of this work.

Let us now reflect a little on the manner of the conversion of the English. In the beginning of Christianity, and even for the first three hundred years, the converts generally consisted of people of the lowest rank, and we hear of nothing but Persecution and Death from the Princes and Magistrates. Whereas in England, the Kings were the first that embraced the Faith, and by their authority and example induced their subjects to do the same. In the beginning of the Church of England, we meet with no Martyrs, except the two Sons of Wulpher King of Mercia, whose story is of very doubtful authority. Whence could proceed this difference between the Church founded by the Apostles themselves, in so many parts of the world, and That founded in England in the VIIth Century? What is the reason the Devil less vigorously obstructed the conversion of the English, than That of so many other nations, during the life and after the death of the Apostles? These things afford matter for many reflections, which I shall not here enter into, but leave to the consideration of the reader. I shall only remark, that the ease wherewith the conversion of the English was brought about, extremely weakens the force of the argument drawn in favour of the Christian Religion, from the persecutions of the Roman Emperors.

Penfolds de Patch.

Let a Man consider, says a famous writer, the establishment of Christianity, that a religion so contrary to nature (1), should make its way in the world, by such mild and gentle means, without any violence or constraint, and yet should be so firmly rooted withal, that it was not in the power of the most barbarous torments to compell the Martyrs to renounce their Faith; and that all this should be done not only without the assistance of any Prince, but in direct opposition to all the Kings of the Earth, &c. It is easy to see this argument loses much of its strength when applied to the conversion of the English.

What still affords further matter for our wonder is this: The Ecclesiastical History speaks of several Saints in different parts of the world; but withal tells us, that scarce one of them escaped being terribly persecuted, or even losing his life in the cause of Truth. Whereas in England alone, we find in the space of two hundred years an incredible number of Men and Women Saints, who never knew what Persecution meant. Moreover, if Historians may be credited, these Saints, for the most part, were endued with the gift of Miracles, though the swift progress of the Gospel seemed to render them of little use. But what is more; a considerable number of these same Saints were Kings, Queens, Princes, Princesses, or persons of the highest birth and stations. In the Period above-mentioned we have seven Kings and seven Queens, together with eight Princes, and sixteen Princesses, distinguished with the title of Saints: Besides ten Kings and eleven Queens, who resigned their Crowns to turn Monks, and who, according to the notions of those days, might well be ranked in the number of the Saints. If it be asked, whence is it that in the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries it was so easy for the Great to procure a Saintship, I can alledge no other reason, but that Sanctity consisted then in enriching the Churches and Monasteries, which the Rich were much better able to do than the Poor.

The English were no sooner converted, but innumerable miracles were wrought among them. They were so much in vogue during the two forementioned Centuries, that one or other happened (if I may so say) every day. Bede's Ecclesiastical History is full of them; for he was exceeding credulous in such matters, as well as Gregory I. whose Foible in that respect is visible in his works. It is no wonder therefore the Missionaries he sent into England should take after him, or that the English should be as easy of belief as their Teachers. The Benedictine Monks were the persons that set all these Miracles on foot: Some out of pure simplicity, others with design to attract to the Monasteries the liberalities both of High and Low. Before the Benedictines were spread over the Island, the Monks of St. Columba, less given to gain and worldly views, attended wholly to the service of God in the places where they lived in common. But the Benedictines never rested till they had procured great numbers of Monasteries with large revenues, and caused the Papal Authority to be recognized throughout the seven kingdoms.

It was not however without great difficulty that the Popes extended their jurisdiction over the Northumbrians, Picts and Scots, tho' the Roman Priests and Monks laboured at it incessantly. The northern nations could not conceive the necessity of owning the Bishop of Rome for universal Bishop; and it is certain, before the Synod of Whitby, the Britons, Picts, Scots, Irish and Northumbrians unanimously declared against the Pope's authority. Bede says as much, when he tells us, speaking of King Oswy; He was at length convinced, that the Church of Rome was the true catholic and apostolical Church, tho' he had been educated in Scotland. As soon as this Prince was prevailed with, he did all he could to establish the Papal Authority in his dominions; and Scotland at last was carried away with the torrent, after Egbert an English Priest had gained the Monks of Jona.

Upon the English submitting to the jurisdiction of the Pope, all imaginable care was taken to keep them from falling off. One of the most effectual means made use of for that purpose, was, the not admitting into the government of the Church any but Italian Priests or Monks, or English ones educated at Rome or in France. This is evident from the Vth Canon of the second Council of Calcuith, which forbids the allowing any Scotch Man to perform divine service in England. Bede plainly discovers the policy of Rome, when he says, the Pope ordered Abbot Adrian to attend Theodorus into England, that he might have an eye over him, for fear that Prelate, being a native of Cilicia, should introduce into the Church of England any thing contrary to the customs of Rome.

I have but one remark more to make relating to the doctrine of the Church of England in the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries, and the beginning of the IXth. It is a great mistake to think the Articles of Faith in the English Church were the same with those in the Roman at this day. For instance, it would be very wrong to imagine the English believed, at that time, the absolute necessity of Baptism as the Romans do at this present. If this doctrine had been received among them, the Council of Calcuith would not have ordered that sacrament to be administered only at Easter and Whitsontide. As far from the truth is it to believe the English worshipped Images. The contrary is evident from a letter the famous Alcuin an Englishman wrote to Charles the Great concerning the second Council of Nice, where Image-worship was carried to a monstrous height. The necessity of Priests living single, is also a doctrine unknown to the Church of England in those days, since it was not received there till at least five hundred years after their conversion. To these I might add several other instances; but as they are not peculiar to England, I shall only observe in general, that all the innovations in the doctrines of the Church of England, from the conversion of the English to the Reformation, owe their original to Rome.

I don't find the Church of England had any thing to do in the controversies that were on foot in the Church during the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries. Among all the Councils convened in England within that space, not one decreed any thing relating to the doctrines of Religion, except the Synod of Calcuith, where the condemning the Monothelites, was ratified. Their way was to read the Canons of the General Councils, and agree to them. Thus during these two centuries, it does not appear that the Church of England was troubled with Heresies or Disputes on the fundamental doctrines of religion. In those days, the Bishops, Priests and Monks were more intent upon the ways and means of augmenting their revenues, than upon the study of divinity. There were some also that were distinguished for holiness of life, or for zeal in propagating the Gospel. I have already mentioned some few; but as I had not an opportunity of making them all known, I shall here subjoin a brief account of three or four that make a considerable figure in the Ecclesiastical History of England.

Egbert, an English Priest, retiring into Ireland to follow his studies, passed some time after into Scotland, where he prevailed with the Monks of Jona to receive the rules of the Order of St. Benedict, and acknowledge the papal authority. Perhaps to this service done the See of Rome, a good part of the encomiums bestowed upon him are owing. However this be, it is said that having a design to go and preach the Gospel to the German Saxons, he was diverted from his purpose by an express order from heaven. But, as he had the conversion of that Nation very much at heart, he pitched upon Wilbrod to go in his place.

Wilbrod being arrived in Germany, Pipin, Mayor of the Palace of France, sent him into Friesland, which he had lately subdued, to preach the Gospel. After Wilbrod had made some stay there, he took a Journey to Rome, where he was consecrated by Pope Sergius I, Bishop of the Friesland. He fixed his See at Utrecht, of which he was the first Bishop.

(1) This by the By supposes the Christian Religion in its primitive State, to be clogg'd with all those Aburdities it now labours under, particularly among the Romans. For surely nothing worse can be said of Revel'd Religion, than that it is contrary to Nature, Sense or Reason.

Winfrid. Winfrid, an English Benedictine Monk, was sent into Germany, where he assumed the Name of Boniface. His preaching having met with great Success, he was made the first Archbishop of Mentz, and the Pope's Legate for all Germany. It is said he was the Son of a Cartwright, and that the Archbishops of Mentz for that reason bear Wheels in their Arms. Boniface was barbarously murdered by the Pagans in Friesland in 754 (1).

Guthlack (2) was the first Anchoret in England. He made choice, for his Retirement, of a Fenny Place in Mercia, called Croyland, where the famous Monastery of that name was afterwards built (3).

754.

Guthlack.

754.

Ingulph.

(1) Pitt says, he was of Royal Extraction. There is a Collection of his Letters extant, particularly his Letter to Ethelred King of Mercia, publish'd at Mentz by Serrarius. Du Pin. Cent. VIII.

(2) He had been a Soldier seven Years, and out of Humanity us'd to return the Enemy a third part of the Plunder taken from them.

(3) As the Translator designs to take notice of all the Historians omitted by Rapin, he begins with NENNIUS, Abbot of Bangor, suppos'd to be one of the fifty Monks that escap'd, when twelve hundred of their Brethren were slain by Adelfrid King of Northumberland. He flourish'd about the Year 620; tho' it is said in the best Copies of his Book, that he wrote in 850, in 24 Meruini Regis. There is nothing published of his but his Historia Britonum.

Next after him comes BEDE, who wrote an Ecclesiastical History of England, from Julius Cæsar's Invasion, to the year of our Lord 731, at the Request of Ceolulph King of Northumberland, to whom it was dedicated. He was born in 673, in the Precincts of the Monastery of Jarrow, near the Mouth of the Tine in Northumberland. He was bred up from his Childhood in the said Monastery, where he lived all his Life. He was ordained at nineteen a Deacon, and at thirty a Priest; from which time, till the fifty-ninth of his Age, he never ceas'd writing. His Works are printed in eight Tomes, besides his Opuscula. He died in 735, aged sixty-two. His Body was removed from Jarrow to Durham, and placed in the same Coffin with St. Cuthbert's.

Cotemporary with Bede liv'd Stephen EDDI, Heddi, or Eddius, in the Reign of Osric King of Northumberland, he died in 720. Bede says, he was the best singer in the North; on which account he was invited to York by Wilfrid the Bishop, whose Life he wrote in Latin, in somewhat a better Style than could be expected from that Age. This Treatise, which contains several material Passages relating to the Ecclesiastical as well as Civil State, having continued in Manuscript in the Library of Sir John Cotton, and also that of Salisbury, was published by Dr. Gale in his last Volume of English Writers.

In the VIIIth Century liv'd ALCUIN, or Albin, a famous Northumbrian. He was bred a Benedictine, and was made Abbot of St. Augustine's Canterbury. He was Disciple to Egbert Archbishop of York. Being sent Ambassador by Offa to Charles the Great, that Prince got leave for him to stay at his Court, and was taught by him Logick, Astronomy, and Mathematics. By his Persuasion the Emperor founded the University of Paris, and likewise of Pavia. He wrote a great many Books, as says Pitt. He died in 804.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK IV.

Origin of the Danes. Their continual Irruptions from the Reign of Egbert to Edward the Martyr, with whose Reign this Book concludes. A particular and curious Account of the Laws and Customs introduc'd by Alfred the Great, which are the Basis of the present Laws of England. The State of the Church and Religion, from Egbert to Edward the Martyr inclusive.

H. Hunt.
l. 5.

ENGLAND now grown more powerful by the Union of the seven Kingdoms, seemed to be better secured than ever from foreign Invasions. And yet, presently after this Union it was, that the Danes began their Descents with a Fury, equal to that wherewith the English themselves had formerly attacked the Britons. For above two hundred Years these new Enemies were so obstinately bent upon the ruin of the Island, that it can't be conceived, either how their Country could supply them with Troops sufficient for so long and bloody a War, or the English hold out against so many reiterated Attacks. This War is to be the chief subject of our fourth Book, and of great part of the fifth. But before I enter upon particulars, it will be necessary to premise some account of these Danes, who in the IXth Century became so formidable to all Europe, and especially to England.

Origin of the Danes.

Scandia or Scandinavia (1), situated in the North of Europe, contains a Tract of Land in length from North to South about four hundred Leagues, and in breadth from East to West about one hundred and fifty. If the northern Historians are to be credited in what they say of the Origin of their Ancestors, this Country was peopled soon after the Flood, by two Nations, or rather two branches of the same Nation, I mean, the Goths and Swedes, who founded two large Kingdoms in this part of the World. From these two Nations, who were sometimes united and sometimes divided, sprung, as they say, all those Colonies, which after the decline of the Roman Empire, over-ran the rest of Europe. But without staying to examine, whether all they advance concerning the Conquests of these Adventurers is built on good Authority, I shall take them for Guides in what they say of those that remained in the northern Countries.

In the reign of Eric the sixth King of the Goths (2) Gothland was become so exceeding populous, that the Country was unable to maintain its Inhabitants. To remedy this Inconvenience, which daily increased, Eric was compelled to send away part of his Subjects to seek their fortune in the neighbouring Isles (3). These Colonies at length not only peopled the Islands, but also Jutland on the Continent, formerly known by the name of Cimbrica Chersonesus. The People thus spread over the Isles and the Chersonese, acknowledged above seven hundred Years the Kings of Gothland for their Sovereigns. Humel the sixteenth King of the Goths, first made them independent, by letting them have for their King, Dan his Son, from whom Denmark received its name (4). Norway also very probably was peopled by Gothic Colonies, since it remained a long while under the Dominion of the Kings of Gothland. In process of time, and after many Revolutions, Norway was governed by Judges independent of Gothland, till about the end of the IXth Century, when it became subject to a King.

Janus Kelding.

Suaningius.
Chron. Dan.

The Danes and Norwegians, being thus separated from their Ancestors the Goths and Swedes, became so powerful as to be in condition to make head against them both in several Wars. The situation of their Country, and the great plenty of all things necessary for building and equipping a Fleet, soon made them superior at Sea to all their Neighbours. In time, they employed all their naval Forces in plundering of Ships, and ravaging the Coasts of Europe. France, England, and the Low-Countries, were most exposed to their Robberies. For above one hundred and fifty Years the Sea was covered with Danish Pyrates. They were grown so powerful, that Charles the Great could never subdue the Saxons, whilst assisted by the Danes. History observes, that this Emperor having sent his Son Peppin to make War upon the Saxons, this Prince was prevented in his designs by Gothic King of Denmark's sending a

Meursius
Hist. Dan.

(1) It contained Mexaria, with as much of Aranda as lay West of the Gulf of Botnia. It was also called Baltia, whence the Baltick Sea.

(2) They probably were contemporary with Isaac, Abraham's Father, Rapin.

(3) As in those days none had a permanent Interest in Land, which was canton'd out to the People to be possessed for one Year only, it was decided by Lot, who were to leave their Country to go in quest of new Habitations. Cas. de Bel. Gal. l. 6. c. 20. & P. Hænsingi. de Gotis Longobard. c. 2.

(4) Dan, according to northern Historians, was contemporary with Gideon, Rapin.

reinforcement of Danes on board three hundred Vessels. A northern Historian affirms, that Charles the Great was never better pleased than at the news of Gothric's death, having despaired of accomplishing his ends, as long as that Prince was alive.

As People encrease and multiply exceedingly in cold Countries, it often happened that Denmark and Norway were overstocked with Inhabitants, and therefore forced, in order to make room for the rest, to send away large Colonies. Their natural Inclination to a Sea-faring Life made these Colonies readily abandon their Country, as it procured them greater Liberty of roving and playing the Pirate, on pretence of looking out new Habitations. This was chiefly the rise of those Piracies committed by the Danes and Norwegians, in the IXth Century, in France, England, the Low-Countries and Germany. The great Booty the first Adventurers brought off, tempted the richest and most powerful of their Countrymen to try their Fortune in the same manner. They entered into Associations, and fitted out large Fleets to go and ravage foreign Countries. These Associations were much of the same nature with those entered into now a-days in time of war, by the inhabitants of the Sea-port Towns in France and Flanders, and always by the Corfairs of Barbary. In short, they were so used to this gainful way of trading, that very considerable Fleets were put to Sea. They had the Authority of their Kings for what they did, who, having always a share in the spoils, provided them with Admirals and Generals, and when a considerable Booty was in view, made no scruple even to command them in Person. These are the Fleets that made such devastations in several parts of Europe, and caused the Inhabitants of France, England, and the Low-Countries, to make sad Lamentation for the miseries brought upon them by the northern Nations (1). They were called in France, Normans, that is to say, Men of the North; but in England, they were generally stiled Danes or Goths. There is no doubt but the Suedes and Goths very often joined with the Danes in order to go shares in the Booty. Nay, it appears that the Frieslanders were concerned with the Danes in ravaging the Coasts of France and England. This doubtless is the reason the English Historians call them indifferently, Gotes, Goths, Futes, Norwegians, Dacians, Danes, Suedes, Vandals, Frieslanders, their Armies being composed of these several Nations.

Rog. de Hov. It is easy to see, from what has been said of the Danes, that their Intent, when first they invaded the Coasts of England, was only to plunder. And therefore they made War, not like regular Troops, with some fixed and settled Design, but like Pirates, sacking and destroying what they could not carry away. As they were divided into several independent bands, it frequently happened that no sooner was One gone, but Another came; by which means the Inhabitants had scarce any respite from their Incursions. This way of making War was very inconvenient for the English, it obliging them to be upon their guard at all Times and in all Places, since the Island was liable to be attacked on every Side. On the other hand, their Enemies, whose numbers were continually increasing, being headed by leaders who had no authority over each other, there was no entering into Treaty with them, one Band not looking upon it self bound by what another did. Thus the English having nothing to gain, but much to lose, were at a loss what measures to take against these Enemies, who carried desolation wherever they came. I am very sensible the Danish Historians set these matters in quite another Light. They express the advantages the Danes had over the English in their first Incursions, by the name of Conquests, and stile the struggles of the English to free themselves from Oppression, so many revolts.

But notwithstanding their giving things these specious Names, their advantages are to be considered as before represented, at least for the first hundred years after they began their ravages.

Before I leave this Subject it will be proper to observe that the English and Danish Historians give very contradictory accounts of these Wars. Each endeavours to the utmost of his Power, to magnify the advantages of his own Nation, and lessen those of the opposite Party. However it is but too visible that the Danes could not have got such footing in England, had not victory generally inclined to their Side. But this is not all wherein Historians disagree. They differ chiefly in Chronological Matters, and in the names of the Persons of whom they are speaking, which must of necessity breed the greatest confusion in History.

Through all these difficulties am I obliged to steer my Course, with all imaginable circumspection and wariness, lest I should be put to a stand by the obstacles that every Moment occur. If the Readers do not find that Connection, and those other Embellishments they could wish for, it must be remembered, that the narration of a War, carried on for the sake of plunder only, is hardly capable of Connection or Embellishment.

After these Remarks, which seemed to me necessary for the better understanding of the Sequel, it is time to return to the Reign of Egbert, which was left unfinished in the foregoing Book, where he appeared only as King of Wessex. He is now to make his appearance as King of all England, and as real Monarch of the seven Kingdoms of the Heptarchy.

E G B E R T, first King of ENGLAND.

EGBERT, who began his Reign over the West-Saxons in 800, finished not his Conquests till 827 or 828, from which time his Title of King of England is to be dated. But to avoid mistakes, it must be remembered, that the Kingdom this Prince was in actual possession of, consisted of the ancient Kingdoms of Wessex, Suffex, Kent and Essex, that were peopled by Saxons and Futes. As for the other three Kingdoms, whose Inhabitants were Angles, he was contented with reserving the Sovereignty over them, permitting them to be governed by Kings who were his Vassals and Tributaries (2).

It has been seen how this Prince, before he turned his Arms against his Countrymen, attacked and subdued the Britons of Cornwal and Wales. Though his Power, after that, was exceedingly encreased, yet the Welsh by their proceedings plainly showed they designed to shake off his Yoke. Egbert informed of their Intent, gave them no time to put it in Execution. He marched into their Country with so numerous an Army, that they were forced to submit, without offering to come to a Battle.

Whilst Egbert was enjoying the Fruits of his Victories, the Danes, who had before made two descents on England (3), arrived at Charmouth (4) with thirty five Vessels.

As they met with no Opposition, they landed and fell to ravaging the Country. Egbert, upon the first news of this Descent, marched against them with what Troops he could hastily draw together, verily believing at his approach they would repair to their Ships; which though he found they did not do, but on the contrary firmly stood their Ground, he resolved to attack them. But he soon experienced he had to deal with much more formidable Enemies than he imagined. After a long and bloody Battle (5), he had the vexation to see them victorious, and his own Army entirely routed. Nay, he found himself so very hard pressed, that he was forced at length to follow his flying Troops; being indebted to the darkness of the night for his very Life. This mortification, very grievous to a Prince hitherto ever victorious, caused him to take other measures for his defence against these new Invaders. In the mean time the Danes, having no design to make Conquests, were satisfied with plundering the Country, and returning to their Ships.

Two years after, another band of Danish Pirates, having been informed by their Spies, that the Cornish Britons (6) were extremely desirous of throwing off the yoke of the English, went and landed in their Territories, where they were received with Joy. Being reinforced with some British Troops, they began their march in or-

EGBERT, first King of England. 828. Tyrrel. p. 254.

The Danes make a Descent. 833. Ann. Sax. Malmsh. l. 2.

(1) A furore Normannorum libera nos, Domine. Rapin.

(2) It is to be observed, he was not perfectly absolute, though he became Monarch of England; for some, if not all the petty Kings, notwithstanding they were Tributaries, held their Titles for many years, and some Successions of Monarchs after him; as Witlaf King of Mercia under Egbert; and Bertrich under Ethelwulf his Son, Berred King of Mercia, and Edmund King of the East-Angles; and so they continued, at least until Edward the Elder. See Ingulp. p. 8, 11, &c. Brady, p. 111.

(3) Viz. in 789, at Portland; and in 832, in the Isle of Sheppey, which they laid waste. Affer. Ann. p. 154. Sax. Ann. Huntingd.

(4) In Dorsetshire.

(5) There were slain in this Battle, among others, the two Bishops of Winchester and Sherborne, Harsfert and Wigferth, and the two Earls Dudda and Osmond. Huntingd. p. 345. Sax. Ann.

(6) For they still inhabited Cornwal, paying Tribute to Egbert. Rapin.

der to give the English Monarch Battle. They were in hopes to surprize him, but were themselves astonished to hear he was marching directly towards them with the same Intent. His former Misfortune having made him more cautious, he had kept his Army in readiness to march upon the first notice of their Arrival. Accordingly being informed they were landed in the West, he hastened thither with all his Forces. He engaged them near Hengist-dun (1) in Cornwal, and obtained a signal Victory, which quite effaced the dishonour of his former Defeat.

After this fortunate Blow, which delivered the English for a short space from the Danish Invasions, we find but one remarkable particular in Egbert's Reign. It is said that this Prince, by a publick Edict, approved by the general Assembly of the Nation, ordered, That for the future the name of England should be given to that part of Great-Britain, conquered by the Anglo-Saxons, and erected into seven Kingdoms (2). But it is much more likely, he only confirmed or revived this Name, which certainly is older than the Reign of Egbert. We find in Bede's Ecclesiastical History, that before that time the three Nations settled in Great-Britain, are indifferently called Angli or Engliffi. And indeed Bede himself, who wrote long before Egbert, gives his History the title of the Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation, though it much more relates to the Churches of Kent, Wessex, Sussex and Essex, than to those of Mercia, Northumberland, and East-Anglia. I have already said, that the change of the name of Britain into that of England, ought to be carried back to the Year 585 or 586. In confirmation of which, and to shew the improbability of Egbert's being the Author of this Change, I shall alledge the following Proofs, which to me seem very strong. In the first place, Egbert had no reason to call the seven Kingdoms England, since he himself was a Saxon, and the Provinces, his own Kingdom consisted of, were peopled with Saxons and Jutes. Besides, the Angles or English, inhabiting Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumberland, were his Vassals and Tributaries. Now is it at all likely, that the Conqueror should impose on his victorious Subjects the Name of those they had subdued? This might indeed be done insensibly, but it is not probable a Conqueror should enjoin it by an Edict; but as this amounts to no more than Conjecture, I shall proceed to more substantial Proofs. An Historian positively affirms, that a little after the founding of the seven Kingdoms, the name of England was given to Britain by the unanimous consent of the seven Kings. But this can by no means be applied to the time of Egbert (above two hundred and fifty Years after) since that Prince could not have published this Edict till after the dissolution of the Heptarchy. Besides, how came Bede, who lived one hundred and fifty Years before Egbert, to call the three Nations settled in Britain, Engliffmen, if that Monarch was the Author of that Name? But what is still more convincing, though the Subjects of Ina, King of Wessex, were Saxons or Jutes, that Prince however, in his Laws enacted for the West-Saxons, only styles them Engliffmen. If an Engliffman, says he, commits Theft. — Again, If a Welsh Slave shall kill an Engliffman. — Is it not plain that unless this name had been common to the three Nations, Ina would not have called his Subjects Engliffmen, but Saxons? In short, it is not at all strange that immediately after founding the seven Kingdoms, the Anglo-Saxons should term their Conquest, England, since the Angles were in Possession of a larger and more considerable Tract of Land than both the Saxons and Jutes. But it was not natural this Name should be introduced in the Reign of Egbert, when the three Kingdoms of the Angles were gone to decay, and the Kingdom of the West-Saxons in a flourishing Condition.

Egbert died in 838 (3), after he had reigned thirty seven Years, twenty Years as King of Wessex only, seven Years with the dignity of Monarch, and ten Years as real Sovereign of all England. Redburg his Spouse had never assumed the Title and Port of a Queen, because of the Law made in Wessex, on account of the death of Brithric. She is said to have persuaded the King to forbid the Welsh on pain of Death to come beyond Offa's Dike, the Boundary of Mercia and Wales.

Egbert left but one Son, named Ethelwulph, who succeeded him both as King of Wessex, Essex, Kent and Sussex, and as Sovereign of the other three Kingdoms. Egbert had doubtless another Son, since this was designed for the Church. A modern Author gives the name of Ethelbert to Egbert's eldest Son; but I know not whence he had his Information. Some say he had also a Daughter called Edgith, who founded the Abbey of Pollesworth (4), but this is uncertain.

By all that has been said of Egbert, it is easy to see this Prince had all the Qualifications of a great Warrior. He accomplished his Ends, not by such methods as Hengist and Offa had taken, but by way of Arms, which tho' no less Criminal, tarnishes not the Reputation of those that make use of it, especially when crowned with Success. It is a lamentable thing that Ambition, by which Princes are led to invade the Property of others, should pass in the World for a Virtue, and that an Historian, by reason of Men's depraved Notions, should not dare to represent it in its true colours, since, generally speaking, they are your ambitious Princes that are honoured with the Sirname of Great.

2. ETHELWULPH.

ETHELWULPH, Egbert's only Son came to the Crown after his Father's Death. Some say he was forced to have a Dispensation from the Pope, because he was in Holy-Orders. But it is not very likely, that after the Death of his elder Brother, Egbert would suffer him to be bred a Churchman, since he had no other Son to succeed him (5).

Ethelwulph was hardly warm in his Throne, when a Fleet of Danes (6) appeared near Southampton. After they had roved up and down for some time, they landed and ravaged the flat Country. Ethelwulph, a lover of Peace and his Ease, sent Wulfberd his General against them, who beat them back to their Ships. But the King had not reason long to rejoice at this Victory. Before his Army returned, News was brought him, that more Danish Forces, having landed at Portland, were plundering and destroying the Country. Though he had no reason to be displeased with Wulfberd (7), he sent Earl Ethelhelm to command the Army, who was shamefully beaten and put to flight (8). Herbert the succeeding General was still more unfortunate, for he was not only vanquished, but lost his Life in the Battle. These two Victories gave the Danes opportunity to overrun several Counties, particularly Kent and Middlesex (9). Canterbury, Rochester, and London were great sufferers on this occasion, the Enemy committing unheard-of Cruelties before they returned to their Ships.

Some make Witglaph King of Mercia die this Year 839. Others place his Death two Years sooner in 837. But this difference is of little moment, this Prince making but a very mean Figure after he became Vassal to the King of Wessex (10). Berthulph his Brother succeeded him.

The next Year Ethelwulph, not at all satisfied with his two last Generals, were resolved to go in Person against a Body of Danes that were arrived in thirty five Ships, and landed on the Coast of Wessex. The two Armies engaging at Charmouth, the English were worsted, and thought

(1) Now called Hengston-bill. Rapin.

(2) The whole account of this Matter is thus; " Egbert having subdued the Six Saxon Kingdoms, and forced them to submit to his Dominions, called a Great Council at Winchester, whereto were summoned all the Great Men of the whole Kingdom; and there, by the general Consent of the Clergy and Laity, Egbert was crowned King of Great-Britain: And, at the same time, he enacted, That it should be for ever after called England; and that those who before were named Jutes or Saxons, should now be styled Engliffmen." Annals of the Cathedral Church of Westminster in Monastic Anglican. Vol. I. p. 32. R. de Dixto. p. 449. Chronol. St. Augustin's Monast. Cant. in X. Script. p. 2238; and after them all our modern Chroniclers. Egbert may indeed have published an Edict for the confirming or reviving of that Name; but that it was in use long before this time, is evident (as Rapin observes) from the Laws of King Ina; from Bede's Ecclesiastical History; from Matt. Westm. p. 200, &c.

(3) Some place his death in 836 or 837. He was buried at Winchester. Malmfb. p. 37. Brompt.

(4) In Warwickshire.

(5) Brompton and Huntingdon say, that he had been consecrated Bishop of Winchester; but, upon his Father's death, other Heirs failing, he took upon him the Reins of the Government, p. 802, 348.

(6) Of thirty three Sail. Sax. Ann.

(7) Wulfberd was probably then dead; for he died in 837, according to the Saxon Annals, which place Egbert's death in 836.

(8) In this Battle Earl Ethelhelm was slain. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 347.

(9) They killed abundance of People in Lindsey, East-Anglia, and Kent. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 347.

(10) He was buried at Rependum, or Repton in Derbyshire. Flor. Wig.

themselves happy that the Enemies, after their Victory, were contented with carrying off their Booty, the only end of these Danish Expeditions.

Defeat of the Picts.

Boeth. Boeth. Hollingh.

This year (or as some say the year before) was very remarkable for the entire destruction of the Picts. After a long War with the Scots their neighbours, they lost two successive Battles, which disabled them from making any farther Resistance. Keneth II. King of Scotland, exasperated against them for having slain his Father, and inhumanly mangling his Corps, told the Scots they ought not to lose the present opportunity of rooting out a Nation that had been their perpetual Enemies. His advice was approved of, and executed with such a barbarous Fury, that from that time nothing remains but the bare memory of that miserable Nation, which had so long flourished in Great-Britain. It is chiefly owing to his extirpating the Picts, that Keneth II. was looked upon by the Scots as an illustrious Prince, and one of the Founders of their Monarchy.

The Danes continuing their Incursions, Ethelwulph, who was naturally slothful, thought himself unable to govern alone all his dominions, exposed as they were to the perpetual Insults of Foreigners. This consideration, and perhaps his tender Affection for Athelstan his natural Son (1), made him resolve to resign to him the Kingdoms of Kent, Essex, and Sussex (2), with the Title of King of Kent, reserving to himself the Sovereignty of all England, with the Kingdom of Wessex.

Ethelwulph's natural Son.

ETHELWULPH in Wessex. ATHELSTAN in Kent.

841. Ethelred King of Northumberland. S. Dunelm. M. West.

ANDRED King of Northumberland died in 841, and was succeeded by Ethelred his Son.

Roderic, surnamed Mawr, (i. e.) the Great, was then King of Wales. This Prince, to whom the British Historians give the highest Commendations, attacked Berthulph King of Mercia with great success. As little inclined to War as Ethelwulph was, he was obliged to march in person into Mercia, to stop the progress of the Welsh Prince. He easily saw the dangerous consequence of suffering the Welsh to recover any part of the country taken from them by the English. And therefore, without staying to be solicited, he went and joined Forces with the King of Mercia. Whilst Roderic had to deal with Berthulph alone, he imagined he was powerful enough to dispossess him, if not of the whole, yet at least of good part of his Kingdom. But when he found Ethelwulph engaged in the quarrel, he desisted from his Enterprize and sued for Peace, which he obtained without any difficulty, both the Sovereign and his Vassal desiring only to live in peace and quiet. This same Roderic left three Sons, among whom he shared his dominions, which by that means were divided into the three Kingdoms of Venedotia, Demetia, and Powis.

Ethelred King of Northumberland expelled and restored. M. West.

Ethelred, who ascended the Throne of Northumberland in 841, was driven out of the Country three years after, by one of the Factions that for a long time prevailed by turns in that Kingdom, and Redwald put in his place. The new King being slain shortly after by the Danes, in a descent made on Northumberland, Ethelred was recalled by his Party, who were now become powerful enough to support him in the Throne.

845. The Danes defeated. Sax. Ann. Fl. Wig.

The Danes never failed to visit England once a year, purely for the sake of plunder. In 845 the Earls Enulph and Osfic, with Bishop Afstan, gave them battle near the River Parret (3), and obtained a signal Victory, which probably was the reason the English remained unmolested for some years.

Osbert King of Northumbria. 848. S. Duncim. Fl. Wig.

The King of Northumberland reigned but three years after his Restoration. The opposite Party having put him to death, a Lord, named Osbert, was placed on the Throne. The troubles and divisions in that Kingdom gave the Danes opportunity of making frequent Incursions. Whenever they came, they were sure of being welcome to the weakest Party. Neither of the Factions scrupling to join with the Danes in order to get uppermost.

851. The Danes land in Wessex, and are defeated. Sax. Ann.

Whilst the Danes were thus employed in the North, the Southern Provinces enjoyed some Tranquillity. But at length, in 851, they landed on the Coast of Wessex, where they committed unspeakable Cruelties. After ravaging the Country, they were met as they were returning to their Ships with their Booty, by Earl Ceorle, Ethelwulph's General (4), who waited for them at Wenbury (5). Being incumbered with their Spoils, they fought in such disorder, that they were entirely routed. Some time after, King Athelstan going on board his Fleet, fought the Danes near Sandwich, and took nine of their Ships. He could not however prevent another Band from wintering in the Island of Shepey.

The ill Success the Danes met with, did not in the least discourage them. The next Spring they came up the Thames with three hundred Sail (6), and nothing being able to oppose them, landed near London, where they began their usual Ravages. The two Kings, not expecting this sudden Invasion, did not dare to take the Field, till they had an Army capable of withstanding them, which they endeavoured to have with all possible expedition.

Whilst the two Princes were making preparations, the Danes made use of their time to plunder: They were not content with ravaging the Country, but attacked the Towns, which, for the most part, not being in condition to stand a Siege, were forced to open their Gates to their merciless Enemies. London and Canterbury were great sufferers on this occasion. Having pillaged these two Cities, they marched into Mercia, and overthrew an army led against them by Berthulph, in defence of his Country (7). Nothing more opposing their progress, they would have over-run all England, if the news that Ethelwulph and Athelstan designed to intercept them in their return, had not made them halt. They repassed the Thames, with design to give the two Kings battle, now encamped at Okely in Surrey. They committed in their march such barbarities, that the very mention of them would strike one with horror. In short, they engaged the two Kings in the very place where they had encamped in expectation of the Enemy. Here a bloody Battle was fought, wherein the English at length were victorious, and made so terrible a slaughter of the Danes, that very few escaped.

Berthulph King of Mercia died this year, and was succeeded by Buthred, with the consent of Ethelwulph, whose Daughter he had married.

After the Battle of Okely we hear no more of Athelstan, and therefore presume he did not long survive that great Victory, to which his Valour greatly contributed. Although Ethelwulph had several Sons born in wedlock, that were old enough to assist him in the administration of Affairs, yet he would not give Ethelbald his eldest, Athelstan's Kingdom. Besides his having no great Affection for him, he dreaded his restless and turbulent Spirit. The young Prince, who thought himself no less worthy of a Crown than Athelstan his Bastard-brother, was very much disgusted at this pretended Injustice.

852. Another Defeat of the Danes. After Huntingd.

Battle of Okely. Fl. Wig. Huntingd. l. 5.

Buthred King of Mercia. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. Fl. Wig. Athelstan's Death. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 24.

(1) The Sax. Ann. W. Malm. and Ethelwulph, call him only the Son of Athelwulph, p. 37, and 841. Chron. de Mailros styles him Ethelwulph's Brother, p. 37. and Mat. Westm. says, that he was his natural Son, p. 301. So little Agreement is there between the ancient Historians in this and other Matters.

(2) Together with Surrey. Sax. Ann.

(3) In Somersetshire.

(4) He was Earl of Dammoniam, or Devonshire. Sax. Ann. After. S. Duncim. Dugdale's Baron. Vol. I.

(5) In Devonshire, not far from Plimouth. It is called in Saxon Wicganbeche. See Sax. Ann. and Camden.

(6) After. and Sax. Ann. say with three hundred and fifty, Ann. p. 155. and Huntingd. only with two hundred and fifty, p. 348.

(7) After which he never made any Figure. Huntingd. p. 348.

ETHELWULPH alone.

Chron. of Ethelwulph,
855-856
P. 100.

ETHELWULPH was extremely addicted to Religion, both by Temper and Education. He would willingly, if permitted, have spent whole Days together in conversation with the Monks, whilst the Danes were ransacking his Kingdom in a merciless manner. The Victory of Okely procuring him some respite from these formidable Enemies, he was at liberty to follow his natural Inclination. He had two Favourites who equally shared his Affection and Confidence. They were both Bishops, but of very different Characters. The first named Swithin, Bishop of Winchester, was continually entertaining the King upon the Vanity of all worldly Glory, and the Joys of Heaven. The second, called Alstan, Bishop of Sherborn, was not at all pleased with the King's giving himself up wholly to his Devotions. He could have wished he would have exerted himself more vigorously in repelling the Danes, and employed his time in making preparations against their next return. To that end he never ceased animating him, by laying before him the glorious Deeds of his Ancestors, particularly those of his Father Egbert, in which he was most nearly concerned. He was not satisfied with stirring him up by lively Exhortations, but furnished him also with Money to hasten his warlike Preparations.

These two Prelates bore an absolute sway over the King, who was naturally of a slothful and indolent Temper. The one had the ascendant in Peace, the other in War. Alstan kept his ground a long while, by reason of the frequent Invasions of the Danes, which robbed the King of great part of the time he would have employed in his Devotions. But as soon as he found he was like to enjoy some Quiet, he was entirely guided by the Bishop of Winchester. This Prelate, taking advantage of the King's religious Disposition, so engrossed him to himself, that Alstan, whose advice was not so conformable to the King's Inclination, found his credit by degrees to diminish. Swithin, all in all with the King, confirmed him more and more in his natural Bias to a religious Life. Above all, he instilled into him an extreme affection for the Church and Clergy, wherein the main of Religion was then made to consist. By his advice it was, that this Prince, as it is pretended, granted to the Church the Tithes of all his Dominions (1). Hitherto the revenues of the Church were not very considerable; but by this new grant they were increased to that degree, that Ethelwulph's successors had frequent occasion to wish, he had left the Clergy in their former State. To this zeal for Religion it was owing also that he sent to Rome his youngest Son Alfred, then about five Years of Age. As he was very fond of this Child, he imagined no doubt, the Pope's Blessing would be ratified in Heaven, and procure him great Happiness. If we may believe certain Historians, Leo IV, did not only bless the young Prince, but gave him also the ceremony of the Royal Unction (2). But this appears to have no foundation, unless it is pretended the Pope knew by Revelation, that Alfred should one Day come to the Crown, though the youngest of four Brothers. Besides, Alfred had not the Title of King till long after, when the Crown was devolved to him by the Death of his three elder Brothers. There are some who, on supposition of this same Unction, maintain that the Pope only anointed him with Chrism at the ceremony of his Confirmation, which gave occasion for some to imagine that Alfred received the Royal Unction before-hand, because he was one Day to ascend the Throne of England (3).

Ethelwulph's great zeal for Religion would not let him be easy, without the satisfaction of paying a visit to the Pope in person, and receiving his Benediction. As England was then in profound Peace, he resolved upon going to Rome, and accordingly did so in 855 (4). At his arrival, Leo gave him an honourable Reception, and in return met with all the respect and submission that could be expected from so devout a Prince. During his stay at Rome, he diligently visited the Churches, Chapels, Holy Relics and every thing capable of feeding his Devotion. The English College founded by Ina and enlarged by Offa, having been burnt down [the Year before] he caused it to be rebuilt in a more magnificent manner than before; and desiring to endow the College with greater revenues than his Predecessors had done, extended the Tax of Peter-Pence all over his Dominions, which till then had been levied only in Wessex and Mercia. He obliged himself moreover to send to Rome yearly the Sum of three hundred Mancus's [or Marks] (5), two hundred whereof were to be expended in Wax Tapers for the Churches of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the remaining one hundred for the Pope's private use. These are the Liberalities, that gave occasion to certain Historians to assert, that Ethelwulph made his Kingdom tributary to the Holy See. But what wrong uses soever might be made of them in Time, it is certain they were no more originally than charitable Donations to the Churches and English College.

Ethelwulph having satisfied his Devotion and Curiosity by a twelve Months stay at Rome, returned home through France, where he married Judith, the Daughter of Charles the Bald (6), a young Princess of twelve Years of Age (7). This unfuitable as well as unseasonable Match, he having already several Children, was made another pretence for the Conspiracy forming against him in England.

Whilst Ethelwulph was busied at Rome in Acts of Devotion, Alstan Bishop of Sherborn, formerly his Favourite, but since the loss of his Credit, his Enemy, took advantage of his absence to seduce Ethelbald his eldest Son, by way of Revenge (8). This young Prince, being of an evil Disposition, was already very angry with his Father, for not investing him with the Kingdom of Kent after Ethelstan's Death; and therefore very readily closed with Alstan's pernicious Counsels. The Prelate represented to him, that Ethelwulph lived more like a Monk than a King, and by his negligence would, it was to be feared, expose his Kingdom to Dangers and Ruin; that since he delighted so much in conversing with the Monks, it was fit he should pass the residue of his Days in a Monastery, and leave his Kingdom to a Son, more capable than himself of governing it. The young Prince, burning with desire and impatience to enjoy the Crown, was shaken with this Discourse. As his Heart was not found, there was no need of repeating it often in order to gain him. The news of Ethelwulph's Marriage coming just at that very time, put the finishing stroke to the Matter. He thought he had reason to fear that, if there should be any Children by this second Marriage, they would be able to dispute with him the succession to the Crown, by help of the King of France. These considerations moved him to cabal with the Nobles how to prevent the King's return. Alstan, author of the Plot, did all that lay in his power to gain the Nobles and People to the Prince's Interest, and it was not long before he formed a powerful Party in his favour. Ethelwulph, informed of these Proceedings, immediately left France, and arrived in England, before his Son had taken all necessary measures to hinder his landing. However, Ethelbald pursued his Design, and openly declared his Intent to dethrone his Father. As Ethelwulph had dignified his new Wife with the Title of Queen, in consideration of her illustrious Birth, Ethelbald made use of that pretence to give some colour to his Revolt. He alledged, that by the express terms of the Law made upon the account of Brithric's Murder, the West-Saxons were absolved from their Oath of Allegiance to the King. All things now tended to a Civil War, which could not but prove fatal to England, since, besides other Mischiefs, it would undoubtedly bring on fresh Invasions from the Danes. But some of the wisest of the Nobility of both Parties, foreseeing the Calamities that might ensue, by their mediation endeavoured to bring matters to an Accommodation. Though right and justice were entirely on the King's side, yet he consented to peaceable Measures. But as he was old and easy-natured, and his

A Grant of the Tithes to the Clergy.
Ingulph.
p. 17.
Malmsh.
Huntingd.

855 Alfred sent to Rome
El. W. g.
Alfr.

Ty. 1.

855
H. 1.
S. D. 1.
Malmsh.

(1) In the Law of Offa, Tithes are settled on the Clergy. But in all likelihood these Laws were not observed, or perhaps Ethelwulph extended the Law of Offa to the whole of England. This Chapter is at length in the Statute of the Church.

(2) The Words of the Unction are: Unctionem ordinis nostri in Regem, & in p. adoptionis fibmet accepit confirmavit. St. Dunelm. p. 120.

(3) This time year 855, Ethelwulph with the Inhabitants of Kent, and Earl Hada with the Saxons, fought with an Army of Danes in the Isle of Thanet. The English got at first some Advantage, but great Numbers were killed on both Sides; and the two English Generals at length lost their Lives. Saxo Angl. p. 125. Hamm. p. 348. The next year they warred, for the first time, in the Isle of Shetley.

(4) Chron. in Sen. Alfred along with him. Alfr. p. 2.

(5) John Ingulph is mistaken in calling them three hundred Talents, p. 8. Rapin.

(6) She is called a German in the Saxo Angl. Rapin.

(7) This does not appear from our English Historians. R. Higdon says she married her in the 12th year of his Reign, p. 202. Ethelwulph's first Wife was Offa's Daughter, the Daughter of Offa his Capitan, who was deposed from Staff and Wiltshire. Alfr. p. 1.

(8) With them joined Enulph Earl of Somerset. Malmsh. p. 40.

Son highly threatned his opposers, the Balance very much inclined to Ethelwald's side. By the Treaty, which was managed by the Umpires, Ethelwulf was obliged to resign to his Son the ancient Kingdom of Wessex, and to sit down contented with that of Kent for himself, under which were comprised also Essex and Suffex. Some of his Courtiers advised him not to sign so partial and unequal a Treaty; but he would not hearken to them. He told them, he did not set so high a value on the Dominions allotted to his Son, as to purchase them at the Price of a Civil War; and though it might be in his Power to recover them, yet his death would soon put his Son in possession again.

ETHELWULPH in Kent. ETHELBALD in Wessex.

Ethelwald's Character.

ONE would think Ethelwulf foresaw his death was not far off, since he out-liv'd this Partition but two years, which he spent in a manner worthy of a Christian Prince, in doing acts of Charity, administering Justice to his Subjects, and endeavouring, by the force of his Example, to induce them to lead Lives conformable to the Precepts of the Gospel. Ethelwald, on the contrary, depending upon many years to come, thought only of spending his days in licentiousness and debauchery.

Edmund King of East-Angla Ann. Sax. P. W. G. J. Tinnmouth in Sanctis.

The Saxon Annals tell us, that about this time, Edmund, a youth of fifteen years of Age, was crowned King of East-Anglia. He was Son to Alcmund, a Prince of the Royal Blood, who fled into Germany when Offa seized upon East-Anglia. It is not said whether this was done with the consent of Ethelwulf and Ethelwald, or whether taking advantage of the dissension between the Father and Son, the East-Angles resolved to have a King of their own. Edmund was guided, during his Youth, by the advice of Bishop Humbert, who took care to form him to a virtuous Life, and instil into him Sentiments of Justice and Equity of which his Subjects reaped the benefit. I pass over in silence all the Miracles that are said to attend his Birth, and shall speak elsewhere of his tragical end, honoured with the name of Martyrdom.

Ethelwulf, finding death approaching, made his Will (1), wherein he disposed of his dominions to Ethelbert his second Son, and after his decease to Ethelred his third Son, and after him to Alfred his youngest. I am not sure, whether it was customary then for the Kings to dispose of their Dominions by Will, or whether Ethelwulf was the first that did so. However this be, it is certain Ethelwulf's Sons succeeded one another by virtue of this Will. Wherein he also order'd his Heirs to maintain one poor Person for every Tithing in his Hereditary Lands. He died soon after in 857, having reigned twenty years (2), leaving behind him four Sons and one Daughter, who was married to Buthred King of Mercia, and died at Pavia in 888. Ethelwald, eldest Son of Ethelwulf, being already in possession of the Kingdom of Wessex, Ethelbert his Brother had only for his share Kent, Essex, Surrey and Suffex, comprised under the name of The Kingdom of Kent. As for Ethelred and Alfred, his other Sons, they were at first but ill provided for; but in the end they mounted the Throne also. Besides Ethelstan spoken of before, some give Ethelwulf another natural Son called Neot, who was afterwards Professor at Oxford. But I very much doubt whether Neot was his Son. It is more likely he was only his Relation, of the Blood-Royal of Wessex.

Malmsh. M. Weilm. II. d. 11. 857.

3. ETHELBALD in Wessex. ETHELBERT in Kent.

Malmsh. J. 2. c. 3. After Ann. Ingulph.

ETHELBALD's Reign was remarkable neither for any Event of Moment, nor for any Action of his own, worth recording. All Historians agree, that he was a Prince of little Merit, and of an evil Disposition. He is said by the English Historians to make no scruple of marrying Judith of France his Father's Widow. But the French Writers mention not this Marriage. They tell us her Marriage with Ethelwulf not being consummated by reason of her Youth, she returned to France, from whence she was carried away by Baldwin Iron-hand Earl of Flanders. Perhaps they knew nothing of her second Marriage, or, it may be, did not think proper to mention it, as reflecting on the Family of Charles the Great. Be this as it will, the English Historians speak of it as certain. And one of them adds (4), Ethelwald was brought to a Sense of his Fault, by Swithin Bishop of Winchester, and underwent a severe Penance for it. This Penance, which probably consisted in some Grants or Donations to the Monasteries, made an Historian (5) say, his Death which happened in 860, was exceedingly lamented. He had reigned two Years in Wessex during his Father's Life, and about two Years and a half after his Decease. Ethelbert his Brother, already in possession of the Kingdom of Kent, succeeding to Wessex, by virtue of their Father's Will re-united the two Kingdoms.

He dies in 860.

(1) — Hereditariam, immo commendatariam, scribere imperavit Epistolam — After. vit. Alf. p. 4.

(2) The Saxon Annals allow Ethelwulf to have reign'd but eighteen years, and yet tell us his Father began to reign in 800, and that he reigned thirty-seven years seven months, and that Ethelwulf died in 857. Rapin. The Saxon Annals say he reigned eighteen years and a half. He was buried at Winchester with his Father Egbert. Sax. Ann. After, in the Life of Alfred, says he was buried at Stemrugan; and in his Annals, he calls the place Steningham, which Mr. Camden takes to be Stening in Suffex, p. 205.

(3) Here the Saxon Ann. inform us, that when the Pope heard of Ethelwulf's Death, he anointed Alfred King, and presented him to a Bishop to be confirmed, as his Father, when he sent him thither, had ordered, p. 77.

(4) Thomas Rudbourne in his History of Winchester — M. and also Mattbeo of Westminster. But After, who liv'd in those days, says no such thing.

(5) Huntingdon, who tells us he was buried at Sherborn. See Sax. Ann. Malmsh. p. 42.

ETHELBERT alone.

7. Domes.
1. 2. c. 3.
1. 2. c. 3.
1. 2. c. 3.

7. Domes.
1. 2. c. 3.
1. 2. c. 3.

7. Domes.
1. 2. c. 3.
1. 2. c. 3.

7. Domes.
1. 2. c. 3.
1. 2. c. 3.

7. Domes.
1. 2. c. 3.
1. 2. c. 3.

7. Domes.
1. 2. c. 3.
1. 2. c. 3.

THE Danes, having left England for some years unmolested, immediately after Ethelbert's Coronation renew'd their Invasions (1). As they had not been heard of for some time, they were almost forgotten, and consequently no preparations were made to repulse their Attacks. This neglect gave them great advantages, and helped them to penetrate as far as Winchester, the Metropolis of Wessex, which they reduced to ashes. They would have proceeded to much greater Mischiefs, had not Osric and Ethelwulph, two Hast-Saxon Earls, with some Troops drawn together in haste, beat them back to their Ships.

Another time they came in Autumn, and landed in the Isle of Thanet, where they winter'd in order to begin their Incurfions in the Spring. Ethelbert, very uneasy at their being so near him, but not knowing how to help it, offer'd them a Sum of Money to go off quietly (2). They accepted of his offer; but when they had finger'd the Money, they rushed into Kent and destroyed all (3) with Fire and Sword, Ethelbert not being in condition to be reveng'd of them. However, having learnt by this Treachery, that nothing but Force could free him from his Enemies, he set about levying an Army, to intercept them in their retreat, and prevent them from carrying off their Booty. The dread of these preparations made them embark with their plunder so hastily, that it was not possible to hinder them.

Ethelbert's Reign, which lasted but six years, affords little matter for History. He died in 866 (4), leaving two Sons, Adhelm and Ethelward, who did not succeed him, his younger Brother Ethelred ascending the Throne by virtue of Ethelwulph's Will.

5. ETHELRED I.

THE Reign of Ethelred was short and troublesome. From his Coronation to his Death, he had one continued Conflict with the Danes. They began with attacking Northumberland, which at length they became Masters of. They proceeded next to East-Anglia, which they also subdued. And after extorting Money from the Mercians, they enter'd Wessex. Notwithstanding the valour of Ethelred, and the many battles he fought, he had the vexation at his Death to leave them in the heart of his Kingdom, and in condition of soon completing the Conquest of the whole. These are the principal Events during this Reign, the most remarkable Circumstances whereof I am going to relate.

The Authority reserved by Egbert over the Kingdoms of Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumberland, and enjoyed also by his Son Ethelwulph, was now much weakened, by reason of the frequent Invasions of the Danes. Whilst the Kings of Wessex were employed in the defence of their own dominions, it was hardly possible for them to think of improving their Sovereignty over the three Kingdoms of the Angles, to whom Egbert was willing to leave a shadow of Liberty. And therefore, by degrees, the Northumbrians, as most remote from Wessex, had freed themselves from Servitude. The Factions that had long reign'd among them were grown cooler, and so far agreed at last, as with unanimous consent to place Osbert on the Throne. This happy Union would have restored Northumberland to its ancient splendor, if an unexpected Accident had not revived their Dissensions, and plunged the Country into a gulph of remediless Misery. The occasion of these new Troubles, which proved not only destructive of Northumberland, but fatal to all England, was this (5).

Osbert, who kept his Court at York, returning one day from hunting, had a mind to refresh himself at the House of a certain Earl named Bruern-Bocard, Guardian of the Coasts against the Irruptions of the Danes. The Earl happening to be from home, his Lady, to whose charming Beauty was joined the most engaging Behaviour, entertained her Sovereign with the respect due to his Quality. Osbert, ravish'd at the sight of so much Beauty, became in an Instant desperately in Love with her, and resolv'd, let the Consequence be what it would, to gratify his Passion without delay. Accordingly, on pretence of having some matters of Importance to communicate to her, in the Absence of the Earl, he led her insensibly into a private Room, where after several attempts to bring her to comply by fair means, he fell at length to downright Force. Entreaties, Tears, Cries, Reproaches, were ineffectual to put a stop to his raging Passion. After the commission of this infamous Deed, he left the Countess in that excess of Grief and Vexation, that it was not possible for her to hide the cause from her Husband. So outrageous an Affront is hardly ever forgiven. Though Osbert was King, and Earl Bruern his Subject, he resent'd so highly this Injury, that he resolv'd not to stick at any means to be revenged. He had a great Interest with the Northumbrians, and the base Action of Osbert was naturally apt to alienate the minds of his Subjects from him. Accordingly, by the management of the Earl, the Bernicians in a little time revolted; and looking upon Osbert as unworthy to govern them, elected another King named Ella, whom they placed on the Throne, with resolution to support him in it. Thus the old Divisions, which seem'd to be quite extinguished, were kindled afresh; and Northumberland once more divided between two Kings and two Factions, who continually aiming at each other's Destruction, were but too successful in their Endeavours.

A Civil War was the fatal consequence of this discord. The two Kings frequently strove to decide their Quarrel by Arms; but the equality of their Forces preventing the scale from inclining to either side, they both maintained themselves in the Throne. The injured Earl, one would think, should have been satisfied with Osbert's losing half his Dominions. But his revenge seem'd to him incomplete, whilst he saw him on the Throne of Deira. Mean while, deeming it very difficult to carry it any farther, without a foreign Aid, he fatally resolv'd to go and procure the Assistance of the Danes. This was not the first time the like Injury had produced the like Effect. Spain, under the Dominion of the Moors, felt at that very time the mischiefs an affair of this nature had occasioned. As soon as the Earl arriv'd in Denmark, he immediately applied to King Ivar [or Hingwar] (6), and giving him a particular Account of the distracted State of Northumberland, intimated to him, that if he would improve the present Juncture, he might with ease become Master of the Kingdom. Ivar very readily came into an Enterprize, to which he was prompted by the desire of Revenge as well as Ambition. Regnerus, his Father, having been taken Prisoner in England, was thrown into a Ditch full of Serpents, where he miserably perished. So barbarous a treatment having inspir'd Ivar with a furious hatred against the English, he embraced, without hesitation, the present opportunity of being revenged.

(1) This is the first Invasion of the Danes into England, p. 148.

(2) This is the first time that the Danes Men that offer'd them Money, and made a Power with them.

(3) This is the first time that the Danes Men that offer'd them Money, and made a Power with them.

(4) This is the first time that the Danes Men that offer'd them Money, and made a Power with them.

(5) This is the first time that the Danes Men that offer'd them Money, and made a Power with them.

(6) This is the first time that the Danes Men that offer'd them Money, and made a Power with them.

Ivar makes a Descent on Northum-
berland.
S. Dunelm.

867.

Osbert applies to Ella
for Aid.
Athen.

Malmfb.
Sax. Ann.

Osbert defeated and slain.

Mearhus.
Hist. Dan.

Defeat and Death of Ella.

868.

Ivar enters Mercia.
Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.

Ethelred
assists the King of Mercia.

Buthred buys the Danes off with a Sum of Money.

With this view he concerted with Earl Bruern all necessary measures to put their design in execution. In the Spring he entered the Humber with a numerous Fleet, which spread a Terror all over England. He was conducted by Bruern, and attended by his Brother Hubba, the most valiant Person of his Time. As the Northumbrians had received no Intelligence of this Invasion, they were in no readiness to dispute his landing. So Ivar without any difficulty became master of the northern side of the Humber (1). From whence he marched directly (2) to York, where Osbert was preparing an Army to oppose him.

In this great extremity Osbert applied to Ella, though his Enemy, for Assistance. Ella, conscious of his cruel Treatment of Ivar's Father, and dreading the Son's revenge, very willingly agreed to suspend their private Quarrel, and join their Forces against the common Enemy. Accordingly, he proceeded with all possible Expedition to bring him a powerful Reinforcement. If Osbert could have resolved to stay in York till Ella's Arrival, who was upon the March, he would doubtless have embarrassed the King of Denmark, who by that means would have been forced to oppose the Enemy in two Places at once. But his great courage would not suffer him to take to good a Resolution. Perhaps it was with regret that he saw himself constrained to have recourse to his Enemy, or it may be, was afraid of some Treachery. However this be, without expecting Ella's approach, he sallied out of York, and attacked the Danes so vigorously, that they could hardly stand the shock, and were very near being put in disorder. But their obstinate resistance having at length cooled the Ardour of their Enemies, they pressed them in their turn, and compelled them at last to retire in confusion into the Town (3). Osbert enraged to see a certain Victory, as he thought, snatched out of his hands, used his utmost endeavours to rally his Troops, but was slain in the retreat with abundance of his Men.

This Victory having opened the Gates of York to the Danes, they entered the Town to refresh themselves, whilst Ella was advancing in hopes to repair the loss occasioned by Osbert's Precipitation. Ivar having just triumphed over one of the Kings, and not believing the other to be more formidable, saved him some trouble, by going to meet him. This Battle was no less bloody than the first, nor less fatal to the English. Ella lost his Life, and his Army was entirely routed. Some say, this Prince was not slain in the Battle; but being taken Prisoner, Ivar ordered him to be freed alive, in revenge for his Father's Death. The Field of Battle was called Ellef-croft, that is, Ella's Overthrow.

After those two signal Victories, Ivar without any difficulty, took possession of all Northumberland. But this not satisfying his Ambition, he marched into Mercia, plundering and ravaging without mercy, whatever came in his way. Buthred King of Mercia, having had time to prepare, had called to his assistance Ethelred his Brother-in-law, who was come to join him with all the Forces of Wessex. Ivar was now advanced as far as Nottingham (4), in expectation to surprize the King of Mercia; but when he was informed Ethelred had joined him, he stopp'd short, being surprized to find his Forces inferior to those of the English Princes. The two Armies stood near one another for some time, expecting every moment to engage. But the consequence of a Battle, which in all likelihood would determine the Fate of both sides, kept them in suspense. At last, having faced one another a good while, they parted without fighting. Buthred chose rather to bribe the Enemy to retire, than hazard a battle, the success whereof was doubtful. Besides, he was sensible there was nothing to be got by the Danes, though Fortune favoured him, whereas his all was at stake in Case of a Defeat (5).

Ivar, from the time he arrived in England, had cruelly ravaged all the Places wherever he came, particularly the Monasteries, where the English endeavoured to conceal the most valuable Effects. It may easily be conceived, the idolatrous Danes had no great regard for the Nuns, and that Multitudes of them were exposed to their brutal Lust. We have a remarkable Story upon this Subject: The Abbess of Coldingham (6), upon the Approach of the Danish Army, prevailed with her Nuns, to cut off their Noses and Upper-Lips, in order to screen themselves from the outrages they were threatened with. This notable Expedient, it is true, preserved their Honor, but cost them their Lives. The Soldiers beholding, contrary to their Expectations, such monstrous Visages, set fire to the Monastery, causing them in the Flames to compleat the Sacrifice of their Persons, which they had already begun offering to God.

Ivar not having all the Success he expected in Mercia, turned his Arms another way, where in all likelihood he should meet with less Opposition. He left Hubba his Brother in Northumberland, and embarking with the flower of his Troops, made a Descent on East-Anglia (7), where Edmund was King, of whom I have already spoken. This young Prince, more used to Acts of Devotion, than to the exercise of Arms, having given the Danes Battle, was easily overthrown and compelled to save himself by Flight. He thought of concealing himself in a Church, but being discovered, was brought before Ivar at Hegilsdon (8). The Conqueror offered to leave him in possession of his Kingdom, provided he would acknowledge him for Sovereign, and pay him Tribute. Edmund refusing these Terms, Ivar ordered him to be tied to a Tree, and shot at with Arrows, and then to have his Head cut off. Humbert Bishop of the East-Angles was also put to Death by Ivar's Order. Edmund's Head being found some time after, was interred with his Body at St. Edmund's Bury, so called from him. Whilst the Roman Catholic Religion flourished in England, great Numbers of Miracles were pretended to be wrought at his Tomb. I do not know by what accident his Corps came to be at Toulouse, where it is said to be discovered in 1667.

Ivar being thus Master of East-Anglia, appointed a Danish Captain, one Godrim or Gotburn, Governor of it. Afterwards, having recalled his Brother Hubba from Northumberland, to be near his Person, he made Egbert, by birth an Englishman, but entirely at his devotion, King of that Kingdom.

The good success the Danes had met with, during this War, inspiring them with hopes of becoming Masters of all England, they began to form new Projects. Ivar (9), having perfect Information of the State of the Island, found he must begin with Wessex, in order to accomplish his designs. He was in hopes, could he once subdue that Kingdom, the rest would follow of course. On the other hand, he was sensible that all his Conquests elsewhere would be unfecure, as long as the King of Wessex was in condition to assist his Neighbours. These Considerations having determined him to attack Ethelred, he embarked his Troops and sailed for the Coast of Wessex, where landing his Army, he advanced as far as Reading. Ethelred, who had foreseen his design, marched his Army towards that quarter, accompanied by Alfred his Brother. It would be tedious, and perhaps impracticable, to relate the particulars of this War (10). It is sufficient to say in few words, that within the compass of one Year, Ethelred fought nine pitched Battles, and upon all occasions gave signal proofs of his Courage and Conduct, tho' Fortune did not always prove favourable. In the last Battle, which

(1) They came over the Autumn before, and wintered in East-Anglia, (Sax. Ann. After. vit. Alfr. S. Dunelm.) Entering into a Treaty with the East-Angles, they got Horses from them; which put them into a Capacity to over-run the neighbouring Counties. Huntingd. p. 348. Sax. Ann.

(2) By all the Accounts of the ancient Historians, it appears, that in the Spring of the Year 867, Ivar marching from East-Anglia, passed the Humber, and ravaged all the Country northwards, &c. See Sax. Ann. Huntingd. S. Dunelm. Hoved. Flor. Wig. M. Wilm. &c.

(3) Into which the English shut themselves up; but the Danes setting that City on fire, most of the English perished in the Flames. Malmfb. p. 42.

(4) Where the Danes took up their Quarters, and wintered: Here they were besieged by the English, but neither side being very forward to come to an Engagement, they struck up a Peace. Sax. Ann. After. Ingulph. &c.

(5) After the Conclusion of the Peace, the Danes went back to York, where they remained one Year. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 124.

(6) A famous Nunnery in the County of Mercia in Scotland.

(7) The Danes passed through Mercia, and wintered at Thetford. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 349. But the fullest Account of this and other Matters within this Period, being given by Ingulph, it will not be improper to give an Abstract of his Relation. In the Spring of the Year 869, the Danish Army putting out to Sea, landed at Halesham, and destroyed the whole Country, and Bardney Monastery in particular, killing every one of the Monks. Then, about Michaelmas, they passed into Kesteven, and there destroyed every thing that came in their way. About a Year after, Earl Algar, and some others, assembled an Army, and coming to an Engagement with the Heathens, defeated them, and slew three of their Kings [or Chiefs] but Algar himself was soon after slain. Whereupon the Danes continued their Ravages, and plundered and burnt the Monasteries of Croyland, Peterburgh, and Ely; killing every Person they met there. From thence passing into East-Anglia, they cut off, with all his Forces, Earl Ulfketill, who was come out against them, and so taking possession of that Kingdom, wintered there. Ingulph. p. 14-24. Brompt. p. 807.

(8) Now called Hoxon in Suffolk.

(9) Huntingd. calls the two Danish Generals Eafeg and Aldene, p. 349. The Sax. Ann. Basæg, and Healfden.

(10) The Particulars, delivered by Huntingd. and the Saxon Annals, are as follows:—The first Battle in these Parts, between the English and Danes, (three Days after the coming of these) was fought at Inglesfield in Berkshire; in which the English got the Victory. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 349. Four Days after, there was another Fight at Reading, in which Ethelred and Alfred were overcome. But, four Days after, they defeated the Danes at Aston near Wallingford; and Basæg, [so in the Originals] the two Saxons, and several thousands of Danes were then slain. A fortnight after, the English were beat at Basing in Hampshire; and again, two Months after, at Marden in Wiltshire, in which last Battle Ethelred received his death's wound. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 349. Spelman's Life of Alfred, p. 43.

After the Battle of Basing, there came a fresh Army of Danes from beyond Sea, and joined those that were already in England. After. vit. Alfr. p. 7.

872. was fought near Wittingham, he received a mortal Wound, whereof he died in 872 (1), after a reign of five Years (2).

Ethelred's
Death.
Brompton.

Ethelred seems not to be entirely free from blame, for suffering the Danes to over-run Northumberland and East-Anglia, without endeavouring to stop their progress. But probably this Prince, surprized at the defeat of the two Kings of Northumberland, and the swift progress of Ivar's Arms, did not think himself in condition to repair the misfortunes caused by the dissensions of the Northumbrians. Besides, he did not care, doubtless, to expose in the defence of Northumberland and East-Anglia, the Forces he foresaw he should want for the preservation of his own Kingdom. It may be farther said in his Justification, that the Terror, spread over all England, put it out of his Power perhaps, to dispose of his Army as he could have wished. This Terror was so great, that it was no easy matter to prevail with the English to march against so formidable Enemies, till compelled to it in their own necessary defence.

Tho' Ethelred was noted for his great Bravery, yet his

Ethelred's
Piety.
After de
Alfr. Reb.
C. 1. p. 7.

Piety is said to surpass even his Valour. An Historian tells us, that being at Prayers on a Day of Battle (3), he resolved not to move till the Service was over, tho' the Fight was begun, and the Danes had some Advantage. He adds, God rewarded his Piety with a signal Victory that Day.

Ethelred left several Children, of whom Alfred, the great Grandfather of Ethelwerd the Historian, was one. Some say also he had a Daughter called Thyra, married to Trotho VI. King of Denmark. Ethelred's Sons were deprived of the Crown for the same reasons the Sons of his elder Brother Ethelbert was set aside, I mean, Ethelwulph's Will. After his death, Alfred his Brother was placed on the Throne without any one's questioning his Title.

During Ethelred's reign, the Danes demolished the famous Monasteries of Croyland, Ely, Peterborough or Medeshamsted, besides that of Coldingham before mentioned. It is chiefly on the description of what befel the Abbies that Historians have enlarged, whilst doubtless, they omitted Events more remarkable, and more worthy the notice of a curious Reader.

Several Monasteries destroyed.
Ingulph.
S. Dunelm.

6. ALFRED the Great.

ALFRED
the Great.

ALFRÉD was no less infested with the Danes than his Predecessor. This Prince, as well as his Brother Ethelred, had frequent occasion of exercising his Valour, Firmness, and all the other Virtues Heaven hath adorned him with. Their Fortune however was different; as Ethelred was never reduced to so deplorable a Condition as Alfred, so on the other hand, he was never raised to that height of Glory. Divine Providence seems to have shown in the Person of Alfred, with what ease God casts down and sets up Princes, according to his good Pleasure. This is what I am going to show in the Life of Alfred, taking for my principal Guide a celebrated Historian, who has given an exact account of his Actions.

Spelman.

The State of the Kingdom.

Ethelred had left the Affairs of his Kingdom in a deplorable Condition. The Danes, already masters of Northumberland and East-Anglia, were in the very heart of the Kingdom of Wessex. Notwithstanding the many Battles Ethelred had fought with them, they were in possession of several Towns, and not only kept their footing in the Country, but had reason to hope they should soon go thro' with the Conquest of it. Alfred had scarce been a Month on the Throne (4), when he found himself obliged to take the Field (5) against these formidable Enemies, who were advanced as far as Wilton (6). Thither it was that he marched to attack them the first time, after his Brother's death (7). He flattered himself for some time that Victory would incline to his side; but the Scene changing on a sudden in favour of the Danes, he was forced at length to leave them masters of the field of Battle. However, his loss was not so considerable, as to make him despair of being revenged. As the Danes had also lost abundance of Men, he laboured incessantly to put his Army in condition to give them Battle again, before they should be reinforced. They were astonished at his Expedition, and tho' victorious, sued for Peace, finding they were unable to continue the War. How much soever Alfred confided in his Troops, who appeared eager to engage, he thought proper to embrace the present opportunity of getting rid of his Enemies, without hazarding a second Battle. As they offered to march out of his dominions, on condition he would molest them in no other part of England, he gladly accepted their offer, looking upon it as very advantageous, in his present Circumstances. And indeed, this Treaty gave him time to prepare against a fresh Invasion, which he had all the reason in the World to expect. But had he been bent upon engaging again and lost the day, his whole Kingdom would infallibly have fallen into the hands of his Enemies.

The Danes quitting Wessex retired to London (8), which they had taken during the late War. Ivar was gone back to Denmark having left the Command of the Army to his Brother Hubba, who being tied up from attacking Wessex, turned his Arms against Mercia. Buthred knowing he was unable to resist, since Alfred was bound not to send him any Succours (9), thought it his wisest course to buy off the Danes with a sum of Money, and save his Country from their Depredations. Upon the receipt of the Money, they marched towards Northumberland, designing to take up their Quarters with their Countrymen. But Provisions running short, by reason of the Devastations themselves had made there, they were under a sort of necessity to return into Mercia (10). Before they left Northumberland, they deposed Egbert whom they had placed on the Throne, and put Ricige, a Danish Earl, in his room (11). Buthred finding they were come again into his Dominions, complained of their breach of Faith; but without minding his Complaints, they obliged him to give them another considerable sum to save his Country from the Destruction it was threatened with. But no sooner was the Money paid, but they fell to plundering and ravaging, and let Buthred know that even his own Person was in Danger. The fear of falling into their hands obliged him to abandon his Kingdom, and retire to Rome, where he spent the residue of his Days in the English College. Mercia being thus left without a King, and Alfred under an obligation to send no Assistance, the Danes without difficulty became masters of that spacious Kingdom. However, not to frighten the Mercians too much, they set over them for King, Ceolulph one of Buthred's Domesticks. Tho' the new King was an Englishman, yet holding the Kingdom in trust only, till his masters should otherwise dispose of it, he resolved to make use of his time to fill his Coffers: So that the Mercians suffered as much by the continual Rapines and Extortion of their Countryman, as they would perhaps have done by the hands of a Foreigner.

Tho' the Danes were masters of Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumberland, they were not yet contented. They could not forbear looking upon Wessex, which contained the other four Kingdoms, with a greedy Eye. But as they had always met there with Princes that disputed every

The Death of Wilton, wherein Alfred is wounded.
Sax. Ann.
After.

He makes a Treaty with the Danes.
After.

872.
The Danes
enter Mercia, and are bought off with Money;
Sax. Ann.
After.

873.
Sax. Ann.
After-
but return again.

S. Dunelm.
Buthred flies
his Country, and goes to Rome.
After.
Sax. Ann.

Ingulph.

The Danes
masters of half England.

(1) The Sax. Ann. place his Death under the Year 871, after Easter. Neither they, nor After, Ingulph, or S. Dunelm. mention of what Death he died.

(2) He lies buried at Winton in Dorsetshire, where this Inscription was formerly to be read on his Tomb: In hoc loco quiescit Corpus S. Ethelredi Regis West-Saxonum, Martyris, qui anno Domini DCCCLXXII. xxiii. Aprilis per manus Danorum Paganorum occubuit. Cumb. This Inscription was taken away in the late Civil Wars. See Spelman's Life of Alfr. p. 43. Note. Some call this Epitaph in question, and say he died of the Plague which happened at that time.

(3) The Battle of Alton just now mentioned. This thing is also mention'd by S. Dunelm. p. 125, 126. Brompt. p. 808, 809. Hoved. p. 255.

(4) Spelman says, that Alfred (who had been crowned at Rome, as related above), was crowned a second time at Winton. Life of Alfr. p. 45.

(5) He marched against them with too few Forces, and that bore no manner of Proportion to those of the Enemy; which undoubtedly was the Cause of his overthrow. Alfr. Ann. p. 164, & ant. Alfr. p. 7. S. Dunelm. p. 127.

(6) Brompton says Wilton in Suffex, p. 809.

(7) Ethelred seems to intimate that Alfred was not in this Battle in Person, being busied about his Brother's Funeral, l. 4. c. 3.

(8) Though London lay within the Precincts of the Kingdom of Essex, yet it was then in Subjection to Mercia, where it has continued ever since as part of Middlesex.

(9) After affirms, that Buthred applied to King Alfred for Succours; who accordingly sent him a very considerable Army, that went and besieged the Danes in Nottingham, and forced them to make Peace. vit. Alfr. p. 6.

(10) They wintered at York in Lincolnshire; which, according to Spelman, was within the Kingdom of Northumbria. Spelman, p. 46. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. S. Dunelm. Ingulph.

(11) S. Dunelm. says, that Ricige reigned three Years, and was succeeded by Egbert, p. 145. See Hoved. p. 417, and Chron. de Manes. p. 144.

inch of ground with them, they were forc'd to make an Alliance with Alfred, till a favorable opportunity presented itself of executing their designs upon that Kingdom. Mean while, they fell to manuring their Lands, and began to consider the Country, they had so often and so terribly laid waste, as their own. England being thus divided between the English and Danes, Peace and Tranquillity seem'd to be going at last to be restored. The Danes appear'd satisfied with their Lot, and Alfred thought himself happy in the preservation of his paternal Dominions. But the Calamities England was afflicted with, were far from being at an end.

Whilst Alfred flatter'd himself with the enjoyment of some quiet, new troubles were preparing for him in Denmark. Halsden, a Danish General, had fitted out a Fleet, with which he came and made a descent on East-Anglia (1). The Season being far advanced, he lay still all the Winter, expecting the Spring in order to invade Wessex. The Arrival of Halsden with fresh Danish Troops, ought to have put Alfred upon his guard, since it was but too plain they were design'd against him. However, trusting to the Treaty he had lately made with the Danes, he remained unconcern'd, of which Halsden did not fail to take the Advantage. In the beginning of the Spring, he put to Sea, and went and took by surprize Warham-Castle (2), the strongest Place in all Wessex. The English hitherto seem'd not to know what sort of Enemies they had to deal with. They consider'd the Danish Irruptions as a regular War, wherein the whole Nation was concern'd. Accordingly they imagin'd that a Treaty concluded with one Band or Party, was obligatory to all the rest. But the Danes had other Thoughts of these Matters. They enter'd, with the consent of their Kings, into private Associations to man out Fleets and go shares in what Booty they could get in England and other Countries. For this reason, the several Bands were independent of one another, each thinking themselves bound by no other Treaty but what they enter'd into themselves. Alfred had made an Agreement with Hubba; but Halsden did not look upon himself as included in it. However, the English considering the surprize of Warham as a real Treachery, call'd Heaven and Earth to witness the Violation of the Treaty. But Halsden, regardless of their Complaints, was about to penetrate farther into Wessex, had not Alfred prevented him by entering into a particular Treaty with him (3). The Author of his Life says, the Danes swore by the Holy Relicks of the Church, that they would never set foot again in Wessex (4). Probably it cost the King dear to bring them to these Terms. It is something strange that Alfred should insist upon Mens swearing by the Holy Relicks, who being yet Pagans, could not think themselves more strongly bound by this, than their usual Oath, by their Bracelets. Perhaps his Reason was, that in case they should break their Oath, he thought Heaven would the more assuredly punish them for it. However this be, they made no more conscience of this, than of their former Oaths, but broke it even before they were out of Wessex. As they were marching towards Mercia, they met a Body of English Horse, who were riding in a careless Manner, by reason of the Treaty's being concluded, and unexpectedly setting upon them, slew the greatest Part of them (5). The Horses they took upon this occasion, were of service to carry them with the more speed towards the Western Parts of Wessex, where they laid Siege to Exeter (6).

Alfred finding it was in vain to conclude Treaties with such perfidious People, resolv'd to take more effectual measures to secure himself from their Treachery. To this purpose, he conven'd a general Assembly, and in a pathetick Speech plainly shew'd them, they had nothing to trust to but their Valour and Courage, to deliver them from their Miseries; that upon so urgent an occasion there was a necessity of venturing their Lives in defence of their Country, and of sacrificing Part of their Estates to preserve the rest; in fine, that a generous Resolution was the only means left to avoid the Calamities their Neighbours were fallen under. These remonstrances having produced the Effect he expected, an Army was levied, with which he engaged the Enemy seven times in one Campaign. But as fortune was not equally favorable to him in all these Engagements, he was once more constrained to treat with the Danes. Though he could have no great dependence upon their Promises, it was the best way he could take to put an end to this dangerous War. The new Treaty, by which the Danes were obliged to return no more into Wessex, was better kept than the former.

The West-Saxons looked upon the Retreat of these formidable Enemies as a great Deliverance. But they were not yet at the end of their Miseries. This band, that had struck them with such Terror, were scarce gone, when a new swarm arriv'd under the command of Rollo, the famous Norman General, that became afterwards the scourge of France. By good fortune, Alfred was prepared to receive them. After some attempts, Rollo despairing of procuring a settlement in England, resolv'd to go in quest of one in France. In all probability, finding the best Part of England in possession of his Countrymen, and Alfred ready to dispute the rest with him, he imagin'd he had a better prospect in France. Some affirm, it was revealed to him in a dream what great Success he should meet with on the other side of the Water.

After Rollo's departure, Alfred enjoy'd some Repose, which afforded him leisure to think of means to prevent these frequent Invasions. He found no better or readier way than to equip a good Fleet, and engage the Danes before they came to land, where they generally had the Advantage. As hitherto, the ingaging them at Sea had not been thought of, their Ships were only fit for Transports, whereas those, now built by Alfred, were contriv'd on purpose for Service. It was not long before he reaped the Fruit of this wise Precaution. His Fleet meeting with six (7) Danish Vessels, gave chase to them, and one of the largest being taken, the Soldiers and Mariners were thrown overboard. This first Engagement was followed by a much more considerable one. An hundred and twenty Sail of Danish transport Ships making to the Shore in order to land their Men, the King's Fleet attacked them, and sunk the greatest Part of them. The next year another Danish Fleet sailing Westward, met with so violent a Storm, that all the Ships perished, except a few which fell into the hands of the English.

Alfred encouraged by these Successes, resolv'd to attack the Danes in the West, where they had fortified themselves by the taking of Exeter. Besides, the Cornish Mer- had all along sided with them. He executed this resolution with that Courage and Success, that in the end he oblig'd the Danes to give him Hostages, and entirely abandon Wessex. They retir'd into Mercia (8), where being weary with leading such unsettled lives, they were incorporated with their Countrymen, who were in possession of that Kingdom. After that, they depos'd, with one consent, Coeluf, and divided the Land among themselves (9). What kind of Government they established we know not; the English Historians, passing over in silence the Civil Affairs of the Danes, relate only their Wars. Thus an end was put to the Kingdom of Mercia, after having subsisted near three hundred Years.

The year before (10), the Kingdom of Northumberland and of had met with the same Fate. Halsden, who was gone thither, made Egbert King in the room of Ricfige, who died in 876. The new King or Vice-Roy was of no long Continuance. In the first year of his Reign, Halsden dethron'd him, and divid'd the Land among his Countrymen: Which no doubt gave occasion to the Danes in Mercia to do the same thing. Thus the Kingdom of Northumberland, which had lasted three hundred and thirty years from the time of Ida the first King, was canted out among the Danish Officers. It prov'd a very difficult matter to drive them thence, as will be seen hereafter.

Though the Danes were in possession of three of the ancient Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, yet was there not room enough for all those that were already in England, and for those which were continually coming over with intent to settle. The new-comers beheld Wessex with a

(1) This does not appear from the ancient Historians: On the contrary they affirm, That Anno 875, the Danes left Repton, and dividing themselves into two Bands, one part went along with Halsden to Northumberland, and wintered there near the Tine: These plundered the Picts and Strathclydes, i. e. the Inhabitants of Galloway; and Halsden making himself Master of Northumberland, divid'd it amongst his Followers, who began to cultivate it. The other Body of Danes, with their three Generals Godeson, Osbyr, and Anand, went and winter'd at Cambridge, where they staid about a twelve month; and the next year went out privately from Cambridge, and seiz'd Warham-Castle; without any mention of Halsden's being concern'd in that Expedition. See Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 349. S. Dunelm. What Rapun says here of Halsden, Huntingd. relates it of Halsden's Brother, p. 350.

(2) In Dejense.
(3) Alfred and Huntingd. say, this Treaty was made with the Danish Army. vit. Alf. p. 8. Hunt. p. 350; and the Sax. Ann. that it was with the Heathens; without the least mention of Halsden.

(4) The most solemn manner of Swearing among the Danes and other northern Nations was by their Arms. Olaus Mag. l. 8. c. 2.

(5) Alfred and Flor. of Worcester. say, they slew all Alfred's Horse.

(6) Huntingd. and Saxon Annals tell us that they who had Horse, breaking the Treaty, rode to Exeter in the Night (by which, it seems probable, it was only the Danish Cavalry that went and seiz'd Exeter, where they winter'd.) The next year, part of the Foot that remained at Warham, march'd to Exeter, and were pursued by Alfred, but got into Exeter before he could come up with them; the other part, going by Sea, were shipwreck'd near Swanwick in Hampshire, and a hundred and twenty of their Ships lost. Huntingd. p. 350. Alfred. vit. Alf.

(7) The Sax. Ann. say Seven.

(8) Ingulph says, Alfred annex'd it to his Dominions.

(9) This is plac'd by Alfred, and Sax. Ann. under the year 875. Alfred. vit. Alf. p. 8.

greedy eye. On the other hand, they, who had shared the Lands of the other Kingdoms among them, perceiving their Countrymen envied their good Fortune, were apprehensive they might think of dispossessing them, if they were not otherwise provided for. This made them all agree to invade Wessex, and exert their utmost to conquer that Kingdom, which hitherto had so bravely withstood their Attacks. They carried on their design with all possible Secrecy and Expedition. On a sudden appeared in the Field a more formidable Army of Danes than had yet been seen (1), advancing towards Wessex (2) before Alfred could possibly put himself in a posture of Defence. They marched directly to Chippenham (3), one of the finest and strongest Cities of the Kingdom. The taking of this Place, which the Danes made themselves masters of in few Days, inspired the West-Saxons with such a Terror, that they had no longer the Courage to defend themselves. Some fled into Wales or beyond Sea, whilst others ran over to the Danes, and swore Allegiance to them. In this so general a Revolt, Alfred was left alone with a few Domesticks, who, out of Duty and Affection, were unwilling to abandon him in his Adversity. But as they were chargeable to him, and could do him little Service, he dismissed them all, that he might with more ease shift for himself. Such was his Distress, that he was forced to go and conceal himself at a Neat-herd's (4) in the Isle of Athelney in Somersetshire (5). This place was surrounded with a large Morass, through which there was but one narrow Foot-Path leading to the Neat-herd's Cottage, that was hid by Bushes and Briars. In this place the King lay concealed for some time, from his Friends as well as Enemies, without being so much as known by the Neat-herd's Wife, who employed him about her little household Affairs (6). This was a wretched Situation for a Prince. But God, who designed only to exercise his Patience, left him not long in these Circumstances. He had not been six Months in his Retreat, when the Scene was shifted by a lucky and unexpected Turn in his Affairs. It is pretended that this happy Change was revealed to him in a Dream by St. Cuthbert, formerly Bishop of Lindisfarn, who appeared to him and told him, he should suddenly be raised to an infinitely more glorious State than that from whence he was fallen. But without insisting on these idle Tales of the Monks, who could not find in their Hearts to pass over an extraordinary Event without introducing some Apparition or Miracle, I shall relate how this great Revolution was brought about by means of a desperate Undertaking.

Hubba, who commanded the Danish Troops in the absence of his Brother Ivar (7), had invaded Wales, and destroyed all with Fire and Sword. After which he entered Devonshire in the Kingdom of Wessex, with the same Intent. At his Approach, the Earl of Devon (8) with a handful of brave Men, retired into Kinwith Castle (9) to avoid the first Shock of the Danish Fury. Hubba was not long before he laid Siege to the Castle, not doubting but the Garrison, being few in Number, would soon be obliged to surrender. The Earl of Devon, finding all the Defence he could make would be to no purpose, took a sudden Resolution. He represented to the Besieged the Danger they were in of falling into the hands of their merciless Enemies, and assured them they had but one way to escape, which was, by opening themselves a passage with their Swords thro' the Enemy's Army. He told them the Enterprize was not so rash and desperate as they might imagine; that undoubtedly the Danes were very negligent and secure, not regarding a handful of Men pent up within Walls; that therefore what he proposed was far from being impracticable, provided they gave the Enemy no time to prevent it; that after all they ventured only their Lives and Liberties, which would be in much greater danger by standing a Siege. This Remonstrance had such an effect upon the Besieged, that without farther deliberation, they sallied out Sword in hand upon the Danes, and by their sudden and furious attack put them immediately in extreme disorder. This happy beginning made them forget their first design, and inspired them with a resolution to pursue their Advantage. They continued therefore to press the Danes with a fresh Impetuosity, without giving them time to recover themselves, and having at length entirely dispersed them, made a dreadful slaughter of them (10). Hubba was slain (11), and his famous Standard, called Reafan, or the Raven, fell into the hands of the English. The Danes had a Notion, there was a secret virtue in this Standard, which Ivar's Sisters had wrought with their own hands (12). By the help of a strong fancy, or the delusion of the devil, they imagined they saw this Raven before a Battle, clap his Wings in token of Victory, or hang down his Head, as a preface of their Defeat. This at least is what Historians tell us, adding, that the loss of their Standard did not a little contribute to dishearten them afterwards.

The news of this defeat, and the death of the Danish General, having reached Alfred in his Retreat (13), he immediately considered how to turn this seasonable Defeat to his Advantage. He sent word to his Friends, where he was, to the end they might come and consult what was to be done in this Juncture. After he had conferred with them, he gave them orders to draw together in several Parts of the Kingdom, small Bodies of Troops, which at a minute's Warning might be ready to join one another (14). The most difficult as well as most important Point was, to know exactly the posture of the Enemy, that measures might be concerted accordingly. Alfred, not knowing who to pitch upon for this necessary Service, took the boldest Resolution that ever entered into the thoughts of a Prince, which was, to go himself into the Danish Camp, and be informed by his own Eyes of the condition of the Enemy. To this end, having disguised himself and taken a Harp in his hand, as if he had got his livelihood by playing on that Instrument, he entered the Danish Camp, and stay'd there several days, observing, to the utmost of his power, every thing he wanted to know. Among other things, he took notice, that whereas generally the Danes were wont to encamp and intrench themselves on a Hill, they had neglected to do so now. They had not so much as placed any advanc'd Guards to secure the Avenues to their Camp, as having nothing to fear, since the Enemy had no Army in the Field (15). Having observ'd every thing, he returned to his Friends at Athelney, and appointed Selwood Forests (16) for the general Rendezvous of all their Troops. This Affair was transacted so secretly and expeditiously, that in a little time the King at the head of an Army (17) appeared near the Danes before they had the least Intelligence of the matter. They were in the utmost Consternation when they saw on a sudden the English Army approaching to attack them. Alfred was unwilling to give them time to come to themselves; and therefore briefly exhorting his Troops not to have the least dread of an Army already vanquish'd by their Fears, gave the Signal of Battle. The Danes, tho' assaulted thus unexpectedly, defended themselves however with a great deal of Courage. But whether they had not time to draw up their Troops in order, or the loss of their Standard had possessed them with a notion that their Gods were averse to them, they were at length entirely routed, and almost their whole Army cut in pieces: The few that escaped betook themselves to a Castle, where they were immediately besieged. Alfred taking advantage of their Conster-

(1) Alfred says, it was the Army that left Exeter. vit. Alfr.

(2) It was about Christinas. Sax. Ann.

(3) In Wiltshire, by the Saxons called Cyppanham, now only famous for its Market, whence it had its Name; for Cyppan signifies to traffic, and Cyppan a Merchant; and we still retain Chapen and Chapman. Camb. Of the same Original is Chenyside, London.

(4) One belonging to him. Alfr.

(5) Formerly called Athelney, i. e. the Island of Nobles. It lies near Taunton, where the Tbone and Parret join. The firm ground is not above two Acres.

(6) She having one day set a Cake on the Coals, and being busied about something else, the Cake happen'd to be burnt; upon which she fell a tending at the King for his Carelessness in not looking after the Cake, which she told him he could eat fast enough. Alfred was then sitting in the Chimney-corner, making Bows and Arrows, and other warlike Instruments. Alfr. vit. Alfr. p. 9.

(7) The Sax. Ann. Alfr. Huntingd. Flor. Wor. Sec. say, it was the Brother of Ivar and Halfdene: But S. Dunelm. and Cbron. de Mailros affirm, it was Ivar and Halfdene themselves, with twenty three Ships, p. 144, 146.

(8) Odda. See Dugdale's Baron. Vol. I. p. 12.

(9) Which stood on the River Tar below Ralegh. There are at present no footsteps of it. Camb. p. 35. See Alfr. vit. Alfr. p. 10.

(10) There were twelve hundred slain. Alfr. Ann. 167. Flor. Wor. p. 590. Twelve hundred and twenty. Cbron. Mailros, p. 144. The Sax. Ann. and Huntingd. say, but eight hundred and forty. The Place was afterwards called Habbeforce or Habbelow, from the Mount raised on the place where Hubba was buried. For it was the common way of burial among the Danes to raise Mounts upon the Bodies of the famous Men, which were called Loues. See Spekman's Life. Alfr. p. 61. note. Brompt. p. 809. Camb. n.

(11) S. Dunelm. says, that Ivar and Halfdene were also slain in this Battle, p. 146.

(12) They pretend it was work'd magically in almost an instant, in one Forenoon. Alfr. vit. Alfr. p. 10.

(13) Brompton affirms, that Alfred was in the Battle, p. 809.

(14) In 848, about Easter, Alfred erected a Fortification at Athelney, from whence he often sallied out, with a Body of Somersetshire-men, and defeated the Enemy. Alfr. vit. Alfr. p. 10. Sax. Ann.

(15) This Relation is not in Alfr. or Ethelward, but in Ingulph. Malmsh. and most of the modern Historians.

(16) That is, the Great Wood in Somersetshire. This was done seven Weeks after Easter, and the Rendezvous was Petra Fibranti, supposed to be Exetan in Somersetshire: saying there one Night, he marched away the next Morning to Begles, or Okeley, where he encamped one Night: The next day he came to Edendun, or Edington in Somersetshire, where the Battle was fought. Alfr. vit. Alfr. p. 10. Sax. Ann.

(17) Consisting of the Inhabitants of Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and Hampshire, that had not fled beyond Sea. Alfr. vit. Alfr. p. 10.

Grants the Danes advantageous
Terms.

nation, press'd them so briskly, that they were soon brought to capitulate (1). The Terms, he granted them, were more advantageous than they had room to expect in their Circumstances (2). He articked to give up the Lands of East-Anglia to those that were willing to turn Christians, but required the rest immediately to quit the Island, never more to set foot in England, and to give Hostages for the performance of the Articles. Guthurm, Governor of East-Anglia, who since the Death of Hubba commanded the Danish Army, agreed to these Conditions, and came to Alfred, with thirty of his chief Officers, having embarked all those that refus'd to be baptiz'd (3).

He confirms to the Danes the possession of East-Anglia, and presents them Guthurm
for King.

This great Victory set Alfred at the height of his wishes. He had, by one single Battle, driven out the Danes, and recovered his Kingdom, and saw every day his Subjects flock to him, whom fear had dispers'd or constrain'd to submit to the Enemy. He gave Guthurm and his Officers a very civil Reception, and kept his Word faithfully with them. All the Historians agree, that he invested the Danish General with the Title of King of East-Anglia (4). But it is not known, whether he did this by virtue of some private Treaty made before with him, or designed by it to gain his Affection to that degree that he might entirely confide in him. However this be, it is certain Guthurm held with the Title of King, the Kingdom of East-Anglia, which was wholly inhabited by Danes, and whereof Ivar had made him Governor. He divided the Lands among his Countrymen, and exercised the Regal Authority, as long as he lived. Some, particularly Aferius, add, that Alfred gave Guthurm the Kingdom of Northumberland also. But this is very improbable, since the Danes had long been Masters of Northumberland, and had shared the Lands among themselves (5). The case was not the same with respect to East-Anglia, where the Danes had no fix'd abode, and which was still consider'd as part of the English Monarchy, tho' the Danes were most powerful there. So that Alfred did nothing more than confirm them in the possession of that Kingdom, by granting them a King of their own Nation, who was to be his Vassal (6).

Malmsh.

In all that has hitherto been said it may be observ'd, that at the time of the last Battle, there were in England two sorts of Danes, those that were already settled, and those that were endeavouring to procure themselves Habitations. With these last it was properly that Alfred treated. As for the others, having seen their Brethren so roughly handled, they thought themselves happy in the enjoyment of their Possessions. As the Event was uncertain, they chose rather to sit down contented, and acknowledge Alfred for their Sovereign, than run the risk of losing their all, by continuing the War. Accordingly, the Danes settled in the three Kingdoms of the Angles, submitted to Alfred, and swore Allegiance to him. It was however next to impossible that all should be equally satisfied with their Lot. Several accepted of the Terms of the last Treaty, only because they knew not where to go, having elsewhere neither House nor Home. If they seemed desirous to turn Christians, it was to procure a Subsistence, in expectation of a favourable opportunity to return to their old course of Life: That this was the case, evidently appeared from what followed. When it was least expected, the most considerable among them, headed by one Hastings, earnestly solicited Guthurm to renew the War in Wessex (7); but not prevailing (8), they put to Sea, and went and ravaged the Coast of Flanders. Shortly after, another and no less numerous Troop, informed of the great Booty the first Ravagers had met with at Gant, embarked to join them. These two Bands thus united over-ran Brabant, Hainault, Flanders, Picardy, and Artois, acting unheard-of Cruelties. After which, being again divided into two Bodies, one of them failed back for England, in hopes of

All the Danes run After for their Sovereigns.

879.

Affer.
S. Dunelm.

The Danes return to England, and are repulsed.

plundering the Country, where they imagined they should come unexpected. Having landed in Kent, they marched towards Rocheſter, with design to surprize the City. But Alfred, who, contrary to their expectation, had his Army in a readiness, speedily marching that way upon the first notice of their arrival, his approach made them fly to their Ships in such haste, that they left their Plunder behind them (9). The vigilance of this Prince having prevented their designs upon England, they returned to France, and rejoining their Companions, continued their Devastations in that Kingdom.

Hitherto the English had been only upon the Defensive. Exposed to the continual Invasions of the Danes, and uncertain where the Enemy would land, they were generally surprized, before it was in their power to defend themselves. The Sea-Coast remaining uninhabited, there was nothing to hinder these Rovers from landing where they pleased, Alfred being in Peace, which he had never enjoyed 'till now, resolved to put his Affairs in better order. His first care was to equip a considerable Fleet, the advantage of which he had already experienc'd. As soon as his Fleet was in condition to sail, the Admiral had orders to cruise along the Coasts, and attack all the Danish Ships in what place soever he should meet them. He surprized sixteen in the Port of Harwich (10) in East-Anglia, of which taking some and sinking the rest, he brought off a considerable Booty (11). Guthurm incensed at this act of Hostility in one of his Harbours, and as it were before his Face, suffered the Parties concerned to endeavour to retrieve their Losses, and even furnish'd them with means. It was not long before they found an opportunity of attacking in the night the King's Ships (12), and had some advantage over them. However, the Fleet kept the Rovers in awe; and freed England from their ravages.

Alfred having thus secured the Sea-Coasts, diligently set about fortifying the rest of the Kingdom with Castles and walled Towns, which he stood in great need of. He repaired those that were gone to ruin (13), and built others in so strong a manner, that they could not easily be assaulted. In a word, there was not a Pass or Avenue capable of being fortified, but what was defended by some Works, to prevent the sudden Incurſions of the Danes. But however, he could not be entirely guarded against them, without one important Place, the possession whereof would be of great consequence to him in all respects. This was the City of London, considerable both for largeness and situation, and which being in the hands of the Danes would give them a free passage into Wessex, whenever they had a mind to invade his Dominions. This consideration made him resolve to invest it, knowing the Garrison to be weak and unable to stand a long Siege. Accordingly, the Besieged were in a little time obliged to capitulate. He was no sooner master of this great City, but he very much added both to its strength and beauty (14). He committed the Government of it to Ethelred, who had married his Daughter Eſſeda, or rather gave it him in Fee, with the Title of Earl of Mercia (15). Some will have it he conferred on him the Title of King; but I doubt they have no ground for what they advance. By creating Ethelred Earl of Mercia, he did not invest him with power over any part of Mercia, but only over London. All the rest of Mercia was in possession of the Danes, over whom he asserted no other right but that of Sovereignty, to which they had lately consented. Ethelred therefore was honour'd with an empty Title, 'till such time as by his Valour he became master of good part of that Province.

The great number of Towns repaired and fortified by Alfred, found him employment some years. These Fortifications served equally to defend the Kingdom against the foreign Danes, and to keep those in awe that were settled

(1) In fourteen days time. Affer. p. 10. Sax. Ann.

(2) See the Treaty between Alfred and Guthurm, among Alfred's Laws, in Dr. Wilkins's and Lambard's Leg. Sax. and in Brompt. p. 828, 829.

(3) Alfred took a Godfather to Guthurm, and named him Ethelstan. He was baptized about three Weeks after the Conclusion of the Treaty at Atchney, with thirty of his Officers. Affer. p. 10. Sax. Ann.— And with almost all his People. Malmsh. p. 43. Hoved. p. 418. Alfred made him very considerable Presents, and also to his People. See Affer. p. 11. S. Dunelm. p. 129. Huntingd. p. 350. Sax. Ann.

(4) In which Essex was also included. See the Treaty in Wilkins and Lambard. Tit. 1.

(5) In the year 883, Alfred having slain the two Danish Generals, Hingwar and Hastings, causing the wasted parts of Northumberland to be again inhabited, and Guthred, a youth, Son of Ardenen, who had been sold to a Widow at Whittingham, being redeemed by Abbot Edred, was made King of York, and Egbert of Northumberland. Circe de Mailles. p. 145. S. Dunelm. 147.

(6) Anno 879, the Danes removed, in pursuance of the Treaty, from Chippenham to Canterbury, where they staid one year; and from thence went away to East-Anglia where they settled. Sax. Ann. Affer. p. 11.

(7) They came up the Thames, and wintered at Fulham. Affer. Sax. Ann.

(8) The Danish Army here, was not so scrupulous; for they joined them, notwithstanding their Oaths and Engagements to Alfred. Affer. p. 11. S. Dunelm. p. 129. Brompt. p. 812.

(9) Consisting of the Prisoners they had taken, and abundance of Horses they had brought over from France or Flanders. Affer. p. 11.

(10) In Essex, famous for its Harbour, its name importing in Haven where an Army may lie. The Walls are built and the Street pitch'd with a sort of petrified Clay falling from the Cliffs thereabouts. From the Side of the Cliff between the Beacon and the Town, issues a Spring that petrifies Wood as well as Clay: A large piece sent from hence is retained in the Repository of the Royal Society. Cand. Addit. to Essex.

(11) Affer. says, that all their Ships, and Booty were taken, and Alfred ordered all the men to be put to death. Var. Affr. p. 11. Flor. Warr. p. 592.

(12) They attacked them in the Mouth of the Thames, when the Soldiers were asleep and detenteled. S. Dunelm. p. 130. Huntingd. p. 350.

(13) Particularly Wapping. Spelman. p. 161.

(14) We have no certain Account of the Original of this famous City. But as it is not evident there was any such Place in Cæsar's Time, and yet a great Town in Nero's, it is probable it was founded in the Reign of Claudius, and inhabited by the Britons and Romans together, being a Trading, though not a Manufacturing Colony from the very beginning. The Walls are said to be built by Constantine the Great, at the Request of Helena his Mother, containing within them an oblong Space of three Miles in Circumference. That part which ran along the Side of the Thames is quite wash'd away, the rest remains to this day. There are seven Gates, Ludgate, Norwiche, Aldersgate, Cripplegate, Moorgate, Bishopsgate, and Aldgate. The Origin of its Name is unknown. Cæsar's saying, the Britons called the Places fence'd round with Woods and Groves, Cities or Towns, made Cædmon conjecture London was so named from Litana, which signifies in British such a Town, as if we should say by way of Eminence, The City. Cand. Addit. to Midd. See Strut's Survey, B. 1.

(15) See Dugdale's Barons, Vol. I. p. 7. Affer. Malmsh.

in the Island; who seeing all the Precautions taken by this wise Prince, were much more disposed to remain in submission. They even permitted several of the English, whom they had driven from their Habitations, to return and live among them under the King's Protection (1).

England is in quiet twelve years.

Then it was that Alfred had the satisfaction to see Peace and Tranquillity restored, after so many years of Troubles. This happy calm lasted twelve years (2), during which this Monarch had leisure to rectify the disorders introduced by so long a war both in Church and State. As I design hereafter to give a particular account of the Regulations made by this Prince during the Peace, I shall pass over these twelve years, and finish the relation of his Wars. It suffices at present to say, that in this Interval he laid out his constant Endeavours in procuring the good and benefit of his Subjects, till he was interrupted by fresh Invasions, of which I am now going to speak.

893.
The Danes
renew their Invasions;
Sax. Ann.
Flor. Wig.
Huntingd.

The Danes, who, under the conduct of Hastings, ravag'd for twelve or thirteen years together France and the Low-Countries, were not satisfied with the prodigious Booty they had gained. According to the custom of Pyrates, as they prodigally squandered away what they had acquired without pains or labour, they were always under a necessity of renewing their Ravages in order to have wherewithal to subsist. However, disheartened by two terrible checks given them by Eudes and Arnulph Kings of France and Germany, they resolv'd to return into England, not so much for the sake of settling there, as plundering the Island. To that purpose, they fitted out three hundred Ships, which they divided into two Fleets. With the first, consisting of two hundred Sail (3), they arrived on the Coast of Kent (4), and took Appledore (5). This place, which was then very considerable, made them masters not only of that Province, but also of Suffex and Surrey. The other Fleet commanded by Hastings (6), entered the Thames and landed at Middleton (7). It would be difficult to describe the Miseries inflicted on the Inhabitants of these unfortunate Provinces by the Barbarians. But when we consider, they were idolatrous Rovers and Pyrates, we shall easily conceive they made no scruple of committing the most enormous Crimes. Alfred was then in East-Anglia, on account of Guthurm's death (8). As he had received no Intelligence of their designs, he had made no Preparations for his defence.

and take Appledore and Middleton.

The Danes of East-Anglia
join them.

All he could do for the present was to take a new Oath of Fidelity from the East-Anglian Danes, which they regarded only whilst he stay'd with them. After his departure, being no longer restrained by his presence, they went and joined Hastings, in order to go shares in the Plunder. Alfred, amidst all these dangers was not however discouraged. He drew together what Troops he could, and march'd against the Danes who were pillaging Kent. But being informed by the way, that another Body of Danes had entered Wessex, he alter'd his course, and advanced towards these last, as judging them most dangerous. The Danes, who were now before Exeter, hastily rais'd the Siege, and went and vented their Fury in some other Place.

Confusion in the History of these Wars.

It is impossible to give the particulars of this War, so confusedly are they related by the Historians. The Reason no doubt was, because there were several Bands of Danes ravaging England, one in Kent, and another in Wessex, and roving continually from place to place. This is what the English Historians could not have a very distinct knowledge of, since a War undertaken solely for Plunder, must needs be very irregular. Accordingly we find in their Histories, the same Leaders, sometimes in one Province, sometimes in another, without being able to perceive when or how they got thither.

Alfred is freed on a sudden.

We are ignorant also by what fortunate Accident Alfred saw himself freed on a sudden from his cruel Enemies, who were spread over his whole Kingdom. Thus much however is certain, after they had reduced England to a deplorable State, the last comers retired, though Historians have not been pleas'd to tell us the cause of their retreat. I am apt to believe their sudden departure was owing to the Plague, which rag'd then in England, and swept away great numbers of Danes as well as English. To this may be added, their having plundered the Country in such a manner, that there was nothing left to pillage. The greatest part of the Danish Rovers returned to France, under the command of Hastings; but they did not stay there long. Presently after, Hastings had new Projects on foot. The Terror he had every where spread along the Sea-Coasts having put all upon their Guard, he resolv'd to steer his Course where he was not expected, and sail'd for the Mediterranean. Whilst there, he found means, by an impious and perfidious Stratagem, to become master of Luna, situated on the Coast of Tuscany. He pretended to be mighty desirous of turning Christian, and was actually baptized by the Bishop, whom he had sent for. Some days after, the Bishop was told, his new Convert was departed this Life, and died like a good Christian, earnestly desiring to be buried in the Church of Luna, to which he had bequeathed a considerable Legacy. By this Device, a great number of Danes, on pretence of attending the Corpse, entered the City, and immediately fell to murdering and plundering the Inhabitants.

Hastings, after so much mischief done to England, chose at length for his Retreat, the City of Chartres (9), which Charles the Simple presented him with, on purpose to keep him quiet. Here it was he ended in Peace, a Life almost wholly spent in plundering the maritime Countries of Europe. The Danes, that refus'd to follow him when he left England, put themselves under the command of one Sigefert settled in Northumberland. For some time, these likewise committed ravages on the Coast of Wessex (10), without venturing however to advance into the Country, by reason of their small Number, and at last they retir'd to seek their Fortune elsewhere.

Alfred, being at length freed from his Enemies, pass'd the rest of his days in profound Tranquillity. Hitherto I have consider'd this Prince as a Warrior only, sometimes victorious, and sometimes vanquish'd, but, whether prosperous or unfortunate, shewing on all occasions signal marks of valour and military Conduct (11). It is now time to display his other Virtues, and set him in another Light. Henceforward he is to appear as a just, learned, and religious Prince, a lover of his Subjects, and an indefatigable promoter of Arts, Sciences, Justice and Religion. But, not to confound his Political with his Moral Virtues, I shall begin with what he did for the good of his People, as Sovereign, and then speak of his private Life, and manner of regulating his domestick Affairs.

As soon as the Danes, settled in England, found they were deprived of the assistance of their Countrymen, they bethought themselves how to secure their present Possessions. The continuation of the War was so far from being likely to encrease their Advantages, that they had reason to fear they should by that means lose what they already possess'd. But supposing they were able to maintain their ground by force of Arms, yet a War, which oblig'd them to have always their Swords drawn, and prevented them from manuring their Lands, could not but be very prejudicial to them. These considerations induc'd them at length to submit to the Dominion of Alfred, and acknowledge him for Sovereign of all England. Historians do not inform us whether he was oblig'd to use Force to bring them to this: But it is certain, his authority was acknowledged, as well in Northumberland, Mercia, and East-Anglia, as in Wessex (12). The Welsh themselves, who had been terribly plundered by the Danes, finding they were in no condition to resist, became his Tributaries (13). It is further added, the King of Scotland paid him Homage also. But this is too disputable a Point to be affirm'd for Truth (14).

The Kingdom
is freed from the Danes.

The Danes
acknowledge Alfred for their Sovereign.

(1) In the year 890, or 891, died Guthurm King of East-Anglia, and was buried at Headleaga (perhaps Hadley in Suffolk.) Affr. Ann. p. 171. Sax. Ann. Flor. Wig. p. 595.

(2) Spelman says it lasted ten or twelve years, p. 77. But he, Milton, and others, say, the Danes infested England in 885, and in 893 they came again. So there could be but eight years peace.

(3) Of two hundred and fifty, say the Saxon Annals, and Flor. Wig.

(4) In the Mouth of the River Limine, suppos'd by Spelman to be the Rother, p. 78. See Camden.

(5) Where they built a strong Castle. Affr. Ann. p. 172. See Huntingd. p. 351. Sax. Ann.

(6) And consisting of eighty Sail. Sax. Ann. Flor. Wig. Mat. Westm.

(7) Now Milton in Kent. The Danes built a Castle here, part whereof is still remaining at Kemsley-Downs. They now call it Castle-Ruff. On the other side of the Water, the Ditches of Alfred's Fortifications, with some Stone-work, remain also by the Name of Baword-Castle, near Sittingbourne. Camd. Ant. to Kent.

(8) And upon some Complaints of his Subjects against the inland Danes. Spelman, p. 79.

(9) Forty two Miles from Paris.

(10) But Alfred having caus'd Ships, twice longer, taller, swifter, and more steady than those the English or Danes us'd to have; and of forty-Oars, and above, he put to Sea, with nine of them, took twenty or more of the Enemies Ships, and order'd the Men to be hung up along the Sea-coasts, for a Terror to the rest. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 351. S. Dunelm. p. 151. Spelman, p. 90.

(11) He is said to have fought fifty-six pitch'd Battles with the Danes.

(12) And Egfric, which was part of the Kingdom of East-Anglia, was taken into Alfred's hands; who created Berthelf, a Saxon, Duke or Earl of it. Spelman, p. 91. Dugdale's Baron. Vol. I. p. 16.

(13) This is to be understood of the Inhabitants of South-Wales, who, though they had been reduc'd before, observing Alfred engag'd in other Wars, had thrown off their Obedience. As for North-Wales, the Ordovices, People of a fierce and troublesome Spirit, are scarce to be reckon'd entirely subdu'd before Edward the First's Time, two hundred years after the Norman Conquest. Spelman.

(14) It is said that Griogur King of the Scots obey'd him and serv'd him in all his Wars, and that Donald his Successor aided him with five thousand Men and died in his Service. Spelman, Hollingb. p. 121. See Buchan.

Alfred makes a Body of Laws. The first thing Alfred had in his thoughts, the moment he saw himself thus peaceful and absolute, was to make use of his power for the good and benefit of his Subjects. As the Laws, during the Wars, had been very much trampled upon, and were become almost unknown to the People, he laid out his pains for some time, in making a Collection of the best Laws he could find. He inserted some of the Judicial Laws (1) of the Old Testament, and several of those formerly enacted by Ina King of Wessex, and Offa King of Mercia (2) in their respective Kingdoms. To these he added many of his own, adapted to the Circumstances of his People. Throughout these Laws may easily be observed, an ardent zeal for Justice, and a sincere desire of rooting out Oppression and Violence (3). They were indeed mild, if compared to those of later Ages, seeing they punished most Offences by Mulcts and Fines (4). But the strictness wherewith Alfred caused them to be observed, counterbalanced their Lenity. If with respect to private Persons the rigour of the Law was somewhat abated, it was not so with regard to corrupt Magistrates; to such Alfred was ever inexorable. He was very sensible it would be in vain to oblige his Subjects to an exact observance of the Laws, if care were not taken that the Magistrates should give them a good Example. History takes notice of his executing four and forty Judges within the space of a Year, for not doing Justice (5).

Institution of Juries. These precautions seemed to be sufficient to hinder the Poor and Low, from being oppressed by the Rich and Great. But as Alfred was sensible, the Spirit of oppression naturally grew upon Men in Authority, he studied to prevent that Inconvenience. To that end, he ordered, that in all Criminal Actions, twelve Men, chosen for that purpose, should determine concerning the Fact, and the Judge give sentence according to their Verdict. This Privilege, enjoyed by the English to this day, is doubtless the noblest and most valuable, that Subjects can have. An Englishman accused of any Crime, is to be tried only by his Peers, that is, by Persons of his own Rank. By this means, he is out of all danger of being oppressed, how powerful soever his accusers may be. These twelve Men, chosen out of many others, with the approbation of the Person accused, are called by the collective name of Jury. These are properly the Persons, by whom the life or death of the party accused is determined. Happy the People that enjoy so glorious a Privilege!

Division of the Kingdom into Shires, Hundreds and Tythings. The Wars had caused such disorders and licentiousness in the Kingdom, that Vagabonds and Vagrants every where abounded, who committed all manner of Crimes with impunity, their poor and mean condition screening them from Justice. As they had no settled abode, upon committing any Offence they shifted their quarters, and went where it was difficult to discover them. Alfred beholding with Indignation honest Men thus exposed to the insults of Villains, was extremely desirous to put a stop to so great Mischief. Having consulted those whom he judged capable of giving him good Advice, he took the following method to prevent any Person from living in his Dominions, without being obliged to give an Account of his Actions. He divided all England into Shires (6) or Counties, the Counties into Hundreds, and the Hundreds into Tythings. This being done, all the Inhabitants of the Kingdom were obliged to belong to some Tything; whoever did not, were looked upon as Vagabonds, and as such denied the protection of the Law. Every Householder was to answer for his Wife, his Children under fifteen years of Age, and his Domesticicks. If any one by his way of living fell under suspicion, he was obliged to give security for his good Behaviour: In case he could find none, the Tything threw him into Prison, to prevent their being liable to the penalty he should incur by any Offence (7). Thus the Householders being responsible for their Families, the Tything for the Householders, the Hundreds for the Tythings, and the Counties for the Hundreds, every one was watchful over his Neighbours Actions. If a Stranger guilty of any Crime made his Escape, information was taken of the House where he lodged, and if he had been there three days, the Master of the Family was condemned to pay his Fine. But in case he had not stayed so long as three days, the Householder was acquitted upon making Oath he was not privy to his Crime. I might add here abundance of particulars not so entertaining to Foreigners, as to the English, who behold with pleasure in these regulations, the origin of those Laws they so happily live under at this present Time. But it suffices to say, these wise Institutions produced such good Order and Tranquillity as the like had never before been known in England (8).

In short, to prevent the Kingdom from being infested any more by foreign Enemies, Alfred disposed the Militia in such manner as enabled him to make head against an Invasion, in case the Danes should renew their Incursions. He kept in each County a body of Troops always ready to march under the conduct of the Earl or Governor. Upon the first notice of an Invasion, the Earl had orders to join Forces at certain Places, under the command of a Generalissimo appointed by the King. By this means, together with a numerous Fleet which was always either ready to put to Sea, or cruising round the Island, he kept the foreign Danes so in awe, that during the rest of his Reign, they durst not attempt to make a Descent. And for the same reason, those that were settled in the Island, found themselves constrained to be quiet.

When by these wise regulations Alfred had provided for the safety of the State, he endeavoured to make the People relish the Fruits of Peace, by introducing Trade and Commerce. He ordered a good number of Merchant-ships to be built, which he let out to the principal Merchants, for the encouragement of Traffick. So that by degrees the English were in a condition to repair by this means the losses occasion'd by so long a War. It is affirmed that some of these Merchants traded as far as the East-Indies, from whence they imported several things, before unknown to the English (9).

After this great Prince had thus regulated Matters, he turned his thoughts to the Arts and Sciences, which the Wars had almost entirely frightened from the Land. To this end he invited over from foreign Countries learned Men, to whom he gave Pensions, and dispersed them in the several Dioceses, to instruct the People. But not satisfied with this, and desirous of having in his own Kingdom a Nursery of Learning, he founded four Schools, or Colleges at Oxford. In the first, the Abbot Neots and Grimbald read Divinity. In the second, Ajferius, a Benedictine Monk, taught Grammar and Rhetorick. In the third, John, a Monk of St. David's, set up a Chair for Logick, Arithmetick, and Musick. In the fourth, Johannes Scotus professed Geometry and Astronomy. This last was surnamed Erigena, that is, the Irishman, from the word Erin or Irin, the true name of Ireland. He was also called Scotus no doubt upon the same Account, the Inhabitants of Ireland being then termed Scots. It is related of this Johannes Scotus, so famous in the republick of Letters, that he was stabbed to death by his Pupils with Pen-knives. But some say, he taught in Malmesbury-Abby, and not at

(1) With the Dialogue at their Head. See them in Wilkins Leg. Saxon. and Lambard. These Laws of Alfred were used at Higimynster, as low as the Reign of Edward IV. Spelman p. 99. Note.

(2) And likewise Ethelbert King of Kent, who was the first that reduced the Saxon Laws into Writing.

(3) If King Alfred, as is supposed, drew up a complete Body of Laws, 'tis now lost; for those lately publish'd by Dr. Wilkins, (who has given us all the Laws extant from Ethelbert, the first Christian Lawgiver in England, down to the Magna Charta of Henry III.) tell short of an entire System of Laws. Alfred's Laws are rank'd under two Heads, 1. The Laws of Alfred, forty in Number. 2. The League between Alfred and Guthrum, which seems to be no more than Articles of Pacification, and Conditions on which Guthrum was to hold East-Anglia. The 37th Law secures the Entail of Estates, and enacts, That those who have Back-Land (or Estates in Land) left them by their Parents, should not annul it from their Heirs, provided there could be proof made that he that first granted the Estate, settled it upon condition of Non-alienation. Another Law forbids the buying a Man, a Horse, or an Ox, without a Voucher to warrant the Sale. The Occasion of this Law was this: When the Danes first settled in England, it was a common Practice between the two Nations, not only to steal Horses and Oxen, but also Men and Women, and sell them to one another. By which means, Owners not only lost their Cattle, but Men were wrongfully made Slaves. To remedy which this Law was enacted. Afterwards Towns and Markets obtained the same Privilege, of Vouchers. But as to Horses, the Frauds were so common, that the Statute of 31 Eliz. 12, reviv'd the express Law of Alfred.

(4) The 40th Law sets a certain Value upon every Limb and Member, as well as upon every Person, from a King to a Bond-Slave.

(5) He us'd to re-examine 'the Causes tried in his Absence, and in case he found any Injustice done out of Favour or Interest, he punished the Judges severely. If they pleaded Ignorance, he sharply reprimanded them, and ask'd how they durst presume to take a Commission to determine about Life and Property, when they knew themselves so wretchedly unqualified! and ordered them either to know better or quit their Post. Thus the Earls and Great Men, rather than be turn'd out of their Office with Disgrace, applied themselves to Study. See Mirror of Justice, c. 20. and Malm. l. 2. p. 201. Hampden says, Justice was so strictly administr'd in Alfred's Reign, that though there were gold Bracelets hanging up at the parting of several Highways, no Man durst touch them, p. 818.

(6) From the Saxon Word Scyre, i. e. to branch or divide. Spelman says, that Alfred was not the first that divided the Kingdom into Shires, but only fix'd their Number and Limits. Rapin.

(7) There is much the same Regulation in China. See Hist. of Monacca. Rapin.

(8) Spelman ascribes also to Alfred the Institution of Sheriffs, Under-sheriffs, and Original Writs, &c. p. 113, 114.

(9) It is not likely they traded to the Indies by Sea, at a time the Mariner's Compass was not found out. Repp. You have a large Account of this Matter in Spelman's Life of Alfred, l. 2. c. 23. Malmesbury says, he sent a Present to the Indies in honour of St. Thomas. Angelin Bishop of Shetburn was employ'd to deliver it, who performed the Voyage successfully, and brought back precious Stones, Perfumes and other Commodities, which were then great Curiosities in England. It was thought Alfred caus'd with these Diamonds a more August and Imperial sort of Crown than had been used before to be compos'd. For in the arched Roof in the Cloisters of Westminster-Abby, where the ancient Regalia of the Kingdom are kept, upon a Box, the Cabinet of the most ancient Crown, there are these Words, Hic est principalis Corona cum qua coronabantur Reges Aliredus, Edwardus, &c. This Crown is of a very ancient Work, with Flowers adorned with Stones of somewhat a plain Setting. Spelman.

Oxford (1). We find moreover among the learned Men encouraged by Alfred, Plegmund a Mercian, who became Archbishop of Canterbury, and some others, whose Names, as they will not serve to make them more known, it is needless to repeat. It is also unnecessary to stay to examine, whether the Colleges founded by Alfred were the first Foundations of the University of Oxford, or whether before that, there were at a Place called Greeklade the like Schools, which were removed from thence to this City. Besides that the dispute would lead me too far, it would be of little use to examine it thoroughly, considering how few are concerned in it. It is enough to observe, that from these small beginnings, the University of Oxford, famous throughout all Europe, has grown up to its present Height.

Though Alfred was very capable himself of knowing the best means of promoting his Designs for the good of his People, yet he consulted others, eminent for their Abilities, and paid a great deference to their Opinions. He had ordered matters so that all resolutions relating to the publick were to pass thro' three several Councils. The first was a Cabinet Council, to which none but those the King had a particular Esteem for, were admitted. Here all Affairs were first debated that were to be laid before the second Council, which consisted of Bishops, Earls, Viscounts, Judges, and some of the principal Thanes, called afterwards Barons. This resembled the present Privy-Council. None belonged to it but those the King was pleased to appoint. The third was a general Council or Assembly of the Nation, called in Saxon, Wittena-Gemot, to which Quality and Offices gave a right to sit, independent of the King. This Assembly, stiled at present the Parliament, a name taken from the French, was composed of the two Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Bishops, Earls, Viscounts or High-Sheriffs of the Counties, and the Thanes of the first rank or Barons. It is now disputed with great warmth, whether the People had a right to send Representatives to this Assembly. But this point shall be discussed in another Place. However this be, we behold in these three Councils the original of the Cabinet and Privy Councils, as well as the Antiquity of Parliaments. These Councils, and particularly the Wittena-Gemot, which was conven'd generally once a Year, being for the most part held at London, it is easy to conceive that the City received by it a greater air of splendor than before. The Danes, who had been Masters of it for some time, had demolished it in such manner that it was hardly to be known. It was a pleasure to Alfred to beautify it and augment its Privileges. The Figure it afterwards made, and still continues to make, is in some measure owing to the care of this Prince (2).

Matters of greater moment being settled as well as could be desired, Alfred, ever mindful of what might be advantageous to his People, believed he ought not to be forgetful of one thing in itself useful and to the Kingdom very ornamental; and that was to induce the English to build their Houses for the future in a stronger and more regular manner, than they had been used to. At that time, there were scarce any but Timber-Houses. It was a rarity to see a House built with other Materials. Alfred having raised his Palaces with Stone or Brick, the Nobility by degrees began to follow his Example. But this Custom did not become general 'till several ages after. The Monasteries, we may believe, that were destroyed by the Danes, and afterwards rebuilt, had their share of this Improvement, as places that were held in still greater veneration in the following than in the present Century. The religious Houses however did not begin to be inhabited again 'till the following Reigns. At the time I am speaking of they were almost forsaken, for the Lands designed for the maintenance of the Monks being waisted by the Danish Wars, there was scarce a Man to be found willing to embrace a monastick Life; which is a clear Evidence, that it was not so much Devotion, as the hopes of being maintained without Labour, that filled the religious Houses. During the Reign of Alfred, the backwardness to a monkish Life was so great, that the King was forced to stock the Monasteries with Foreigners, there being scarce such a thing as a Monk in the Kingdom. But after his Death, when the Lands were restored to the Monasteries, the zeal for that way of Life began to rekindle. Whereas in Alfred's Days, there were more Monasteries than Monks, in a few years after the Monks were grown so numerous, and encreased daily in such a manner, that there were not religious Houses enough to contain them.

Hitherto we have considered Alfred so taken up with the care of the publick, that he seems to have had no time or leisure for his own private concerns. But we must have a very different Idea of this Prince. He was one of those happy Geniuses that seem born for whatever they do, and are continually employed, without appearing to be so. He knew too well the value of time, to lose any part of it. So far was he from being like most Princes, who imagine their high Station gives them a Privilege of spending all their time in diversions and trifles, that he endeavoured to improve every moment. Whilst he lay concealed in the Isle of Athelney, he made a vow to dedicate to the Service of God, the third part of his time, as soon as he should be restored to a State of Tranquillity. Accordingly he was punctual to his Vow, and allotted eight hours every day to acts of Devotion, eight hours to publick Affairs, and as many to sleep, study, and necessary refreshment. As the use of Clocks and Hour-Glasses was not as yet introduced into England, he measured the time by means of Wax-Candles, marked with circular lines of divers Colours, which served as so many Hour-lines (3). And to prevent the wind from making them burn unsteadily, it is said he invented the expedient of enclosing them in Lan-thorns (4). But it is a question whether this Invention be of so modern a date.

His Charities were very extraordinary considering his Revenues, and so much the more praise-worthy, as they were done privately, or at least without Ostentation. He educated, at Court or at Oxford, a great many young Noblemen, who were instructed in all things necessary to render them one day serviceable to their Country. But this was not his only method to cause the Arts and Sciences to flourish: His own Example greatly contributed towards it, for never was Prince more given to his Studies. The progress he made in Learning, notwithstanding his being so long employed in his Wars and the administration of the Government, demonstrate how well he improved his Intervals from publick Business. The Author of his Life assures us, he was the best Saxon Poet of his time, an excellent Grammatician, Orator, Philosopher, Architect, Geometrician, and Historian. He composed several Works, that were in great Esteem. Among others, he translated into Saxon, Gregory's Pastoral, Boetius de Consolatione (5), and Bede's Ecclesiastical History (6). What a shame and reproach was it for the English Nation to be so ignorant, when they had so learned a King at their Head? This excellent Prince complained bitterly (7) that from the Humber to the Thames there was not a Priest that understood the Liturgy in his Mother Tongue, and that from the Thames to the Sea, there was not one that knew how to translate the easiest Piece of Latin. This universal Ignorance, and the little relish the English had then for the Arts and Sciences, caused the King to seek all occasions, of earnestly inviting into his Dominions Foreigners that were eminent in their Professions. He took particular care to have always about him the most noted Workmen and Architects, and to keep them employed, with the sole view of improving their Skill. He placed in the Chairs at Oxford, Men famous for their Learning, and allowed them handsome Salaries. His aim was to stir up the Emulation of the English, and provoke them to use their Endeavours to come out of that state of gross ignorance they were in. The Fame of his great Wisdom and Piety reaching as far as Rome, the Pope sent him a large Quantity of Relicks, and upon his account granted some new privileges to the English College. Abel Patriarch of Jerusalem, willing also to show him marks of his Esteem, sent him a present of Relicks, which the King received with great Satisfaction.

It is time now to take a view of the manner of his ordering his Domestic Concerns, where his Prudence was no less conspicuous than in his Management of State Affairs. He made three Divisions of his Attendants, who were to

(1) Camden says, Alfred founded but three Halls or Schools; the first at the end of High-street for Grammarians, was called Little-University-Hall; the second in School-street for Theologians, was stiled Leys University-Hall; and the third in High-street, more to the West than the first, for Divinity, was named Great University-Hall, now University-College.

(2) He repaired also, or rebuilt Winchester and Norwich, Spelman, p. 162, 164.

(3) He ordered just such a quantity of Wax to be made into six Candles, each twelve Inches long, with the Division of the Inches mark'd out distinctly. These being lighted one after another, did orderly burn four Hours apiece, that is, every three Inches an Hour, so that the whole six Candles lasted just twenty four Hours, the watching of which was committed to the Keepers of his Chapel, whose Office it was to put him in mind how each Hour passed.

(4) Glass was then a great Rarity in England, so that the King was forc'd to order some fine white Horn to be scraped so thin as to become transparent, and put into glass Frames of Wood, which defended the Candles from the injury of the Wind. Thus Lan-thorns, tho' of vulgar Use and Estimation, were the Invention of a King. Spelman, Affor. vet. Alf. p. 20.

(5) Published at Oxford, An. 1698, 8vo. by Christopher Rævelin, Gentleman-Commoner of Queen's College. Some say it was translated by Wenefrid, Bishop of Worcester; but Dr. Plot tells us Alfred did it at Woodstock. Alfred was so delighted with this Book, that he always carried it about him in his Bosom.

(6) Published at Cambridge in 1644, by Mr. Whelock, who observes, 'tis rather a Paraphrase than a Translation. He is likewise said to have translated the Old and New Testament. However 'tis on all Hands agreed he undertook a Version of the Psalms, but died when it was about half finished. See Spelman's Life of Alfred, l. 3. c. 130. For an account of the rest of his Works, see the same Author, p. 210, 211, 212.

(7) In his Preface to Gregory's Pastoral; which see in Spelman, p. 141, &c. and at the end of Affor's Life of Alfred.

wait monthly by turns: A Custom, which tho' not practised then in other Courts, was afterwards followed by other Princes. As for his Revenues, he divided them in two Parts, one whereof was wholly assigned for charitable uses, and subdivided into four Portions. The first for Alms to the Poor: The second for the maintenance of the Monasteries he had founded: The third for the Subsistence of the Professors and Scholars at Oxford: The fourth for poor Monks, as well Foreigners as English (1). The other half was thrown into three divisions; one was expended in his Family; another in paying his Archbishops, and other curious Workmen; and the rest was bestowed in Pensions upon Strangers, invited to his Court for the encouragement and instruction of his Subjects. When I speak of his Revenues, I mean his own hereditary Estate. It was not customary in those days, for Princes to levy Taxes upon the People, in order to squander the Money in Luxury and Extravagancies.

What has been said of this illustrious Prince, may suffice to make known the principal events in his Reign, and to give an Idea of his personal Qualities. I might add many more particulars, since his Life alone affords matter for a large Volume. But I believe I may venture to stop here, without injuring the memory of this Monarch, who is justly distinguished with the Surname of Great. No Historian charges him with any Vice, but all unanimously agree to represent him as one of the most glorious Princes that ever wore the Crown (2).

He died in 900, and in the 52d year of his Age, after a reign of twenty-eight years and six months (3), the greatest part whereof was spent in wars and troubles, and the rest in peace (4). His History shews, that both in War and Peace, he govern'd with prudence and steadiness. But what chiefly distinguishes him from the generality of Princes, was his sincere and constant love for his People. Of this he gave demonstration, not by words only, as is too commonly the case, but by real and substantial deeds. Accordingly never was Prince better beloved by his Subjects. No doubt this mutual Affection contributed to destroy in the Danes, settled in England, all hopes of shaking off his Yoke, when once they had submitted to it.

Alfred had several Children by Alswitha his Queen: Some of them, particularly Edmund his eldest Son, whom he designed for his Successor, died before him. Of those that survived him, Edward mounted the Throne after him. Ethelward, who was bred a Scholar at Oxford, was a very learned Man, and died in the fortieth year of his Age, in 922. Elfreda, his eldest Daughter, Wife to Ethelred Earl of Mercia, became very famous in her Brother Edward's Reign. Alswitha or Ethelswitha, called also Eltrude by the Flemish Writers, married Baldwin Earl of Flanders. Ethelgitha, who chose to be a Nun, was made Abbess of Shaftsbury Nunnery, founded by the King her Father (5).

7. EDWARD the Elder.

WHEN Edward ascended the Throne, England was almost equally divided between the English and Danes. The Danes inhabited Northumberland and East-Anglia, from whence they had driven the English during the wars. The English were still in possession of Wessex, containing the ancient Kingdom of Essex, and all the Country lying South of the Thames. As for Mercia, it was peopled with a mixture of Danes and English, but in such manner, that the English were superior in the South and West Parts, and the Danes in the East and North. During the latter part of Alfred's Reign, the Danes had remained very quiet, out of fear of provoking that Prince to invade their Possessions. Besides, they were very well pleased to enjoy some repose, in order to fortify their Settlements in England. For this reason, the retreat of their Countrymen was to them rather an occasion of Joy than Sorrow. Indeed, they could never have attained to their ends, if the War had been continually renewed by the arrival of other Danes, who under the name of Friends, would have been as incommodious to them as to the English themselves. The retreat of these dangerous Guests, and the profound Tranquillity spread over the whole Kingdom, by Alfred's just Administration, having given them time to cultivate their Lands, and augment their Riches by Commerce, they began to entertain thoughts of shaking off the English Yoke. Accordingly, they embraced the first favorable occasion to excite new Troubles in England, not doubting in the least but they would prove the means of putting their design in Execution.

I have observed that King Ethelbert, elder Brother to Alfred, left two Infant Sons. Ethelward, the eldest, being grown, at the death of Alfred, to Man's Estate, thought it time to assert his right to the Crown. He pretended, that Ethelwulf his Grandfather could not with Justice settle the Kingdom upon all his Sons successively, to the prejudice of the Children of the eldest. That granting he had a power to do this, there was no reason the Succession, after the death of the four Brothers, should continue in the Family of the youngest, when the Heirs of the second were alive. That besides, at most he could but entail the Kingdom of Kent, which he was in possession of, and not the Kingdom of Wessex, which belonged not to him when he made his Will. These reasons appeared very plausible; yet Ethelward could meet with no encouragement from the English. Doubtless, the great Veneration they had for Alfred's Memory, made them adhere to his Son, or it may be, they did not question Ethelwulf's power of settling the Succession as he pleased. The ancient Historians not having expressed themselves clearly upon this point, it would be difficult to decide the matter by the publick Laws of the Saxons, which are not sufficiently known. And therefore, to confine my self to the bare relation of Facts, I shall only say, that Ethelward, finding his Countrymen unwilling to support his Title, was forc'd to apply to the Danes, who probably had put him upon this undertaking.

Ethelward began his design upon the Crown, with seizing Winburn, a fortified Town in Dorsetshire (6). He expected to be attacked; but hoped, if that place made never so little Resistance, the Danes would keep Edward so much employed in other parts, that it would not be possible for him to retake it (7). But his hopes were all in vain. Edward came upon him with such Expedition, that he was like to have surprized him in Winburn, before he had taken necessary measures for his defence. He had hardly time to get out of the Town (8) and fly to the Danes (9), who were now up in Arms. Upon this Prince's coming among them, they proclaimed him King of England, pretending, as they were in possession of half the Kingdom, they had as much right to make a King, as the West-Saxons.

The retreat of Ethelward among the Danes, made the King sensible he was going to be involved in a troublesome War, the consequences whereof were to be dreaded. Not that he thought himself unable to withstand the Danes settled in England, but was apprehensive the foreign Danes would take this opportunity to plunge the Kingdom again into its former Calamities. This Consideration made him resolve to do his utmost to put an end to the War, before the Danes had time to send for their Countrymen to their Assistance. Immediately after the taking of Winburn, he marched towards Northumberland (10), at the head of his Army, which daily encreased, by Troops coming in from all Parts. The Danes were astonished at this Expedition, and finding themselves in no condition to resist him, were constrained to abandon and banish from their Country, the Prince they had undertaken to protect. They had soon reason to repent of espousing his Cause, or not defending it better. This fruitless attempt of

(1) He sent Money to the Monasteries throughout his Dominions; and also in Wales, Ireland, France, Armenia, &c. Alfred. p. 20.

(2) We have the Sum of his Character given us by a great Man, to the following Effect: O Alfred, the Wonder and Admiration of all Ages! If we reflect on the devout part of him, he seems to have lived always in a Chaplain. If on his Conduct and Exploits in the Field, one would think he had spent his Days in a Camp. If on his Writings and Studies, one would conclude the University had engrossed him. And lastly, if we regard his Prudence and Skill in the Administration of Government, he seems to have made Law and Politics his whole Study.

(3) Alfred. Sax. Ann. Floer. Wigorn. &c. say, he reigned twenty-nine years and a half; and the two last place his death under the year 901.

(4) He was born at Wantage, now Wantage in Berkshire, which was formerly a Royal Manor. His Body was buried first at Winton, next removed into the Church of the New Monastery; and lastly, his Body, Monument, Church and Monastery were all removed (about two hundred years after) without the North Gate of the City, since call'd the Hide.

(5) Besides this Nunnery, Alfred built two Monasteries, one at Athelney, and another at Winchester. Alfred.

(6) Besides Winburn, Ethelward seized upon Tewkesham, i. e. Christ Church in Hampshire. Sax. Ann. Camd.

(7) Ethelward shut himself up in the Town, and swore he would either conquer or die. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 352. Brompt. p. 838.

(8) He escaped in the night. Huntingd. p. 352. Brompt. p. 832. Floer. Wigorn.

(9) That is, the Danes in Northumbria. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 352. Alfred. Ann. p. 174.

(10) The Sax. Ann. and Floer, Wern, say only, that the King ordered his Men to pursue Ethelward, but they could not overtake him.

Edward I.
Edward II.
Edward III.
Edward IV.
Edward V.
Edward VI.
Edward VII.
Edward VIII.
Edward IX.
Edward X.

Matt. West.

903.

The Council
of the King
of the Danes
in Mercia.

904.

The Council
of the King
of the Danes
in Mercia.

905.

Ethelward
flourishes in
Sax. Ann.
Flor. Worc.
Dunelm.

907.

Ethelward
makes a Peace with
the Danes.

The War is renewed.

910.

912.

Ethelred
Earl of Mercia dies.
Sax. Ann.

theirs cost them several strong-holds in Mercia, which Edward deemed necessary to secure. He did not think proper to chastise them more severely at this time, lest the War, which seemed to be over, should break out afresh, if he reduced them to a necessity of sending for Succours from Denmark. He was satisfied with repairing some Fortresses in Mercia, in order to confine them within narrower Bounds (1). Ethelred Earl of Mercia, and the Princess Elfreda his Wife, were very serviceable to the King in this War, by making head against the Mercian Danes, and preventing the Welsh from coming to their Aid. It is related of Elfreda, that having had a very hard Labour with her first Child, she made a resolution never to come into the like Case again, and was as good as her Word. From thenceforward she wholly devoted herself to Arms, and like a true Amazon, gave proofs of her courage in all the King her Brother's Wars with the Danes. She was generally styled [not only Lady and Queen, but] King, in admiration of her Manlike and Royal Abilities.

Mean while, Ethelward, though absent, was not idle. Upon leaving England, he applied to France, and obtained a powerful aid of Normans. With these forces he landed in Essex (2), and easily became Master of that Kingdom. Edward, not expecting his Enemy could have been so soon ready to make a fresh attempt, had taken care only to guard Mercia against the Northumbrian-Danes, imagining Essex to be in no danger. The arrival of the Normans roused the Danes of Northumberland and East-Anglia, and caused them to resolve to make a diversion in favor of Ethelward. Accordingly they take up arms again, and throwing themselves into Mercia, ravage the Country inhabited by the English in a merciless manner (3). Edward, not without extreme regret, saw himself forced to bear their Insults, till he could draw his Troops together, which he had dismissed, as believing he should not want them so soon. The moment he was at the head of his Army, he made the Danes pay dear for the mischief they had done the English. In this War he gained so many Victories, that the Danes lost all hopes of throwing off the English yoke, and his Cousin of mounting the Throne. At length Ethelward being slain in Battle (4), and the Danish forces considerably diminished, they were not able to carry on the War with that vigour they begun it. However, they continued it two years after Ethelward's Death. But having in vain endeavoured to repair their Losses, they sued for Peace (5); which Edward readily granted them, on condition they would acknowledge him for Sovereign as they had done his Father, and the Normans forthwith return to France.

This Peace could not hold long between two neighbouring Nations so exasperated against one another. Accordingly after three years, the War was renewed (6). It proved fatal to the Danes, who lost in a very little time two Battles (7). Edward, who knew how to improve his Victories, took from them several Towns in Mercia, and at length drove them quite out of that Kingdom. Then it was that Ethelred, who had all along bravely seconded the King his Brother-in-law, became in reality Earl of Mercia; but was not long so. He was taken out of the World by Death, almost as soon as that whole Province was united under his Government. This Earl was not barely Governor or Viceroy of Mercia: He had some particular Power, the nature of which it is very difficult to learn from the Historians that speak of it.

Malmshury says he held the Country as a Fief of the Crown, much in the same manner as the German Princes hold their Territories of the Empire (8). Of this, Elfreda his Widow's cession to the King her Brother of the Cities of London and Oxford, is a farther Proof. If Ethelred, had been only Governor or Viceroy, Elfreda would have had no right to resign these two Places, since they would not have belonged to her (9).

Elfreda having taken upon her the Government of Mercia, after Ethelred's Death, followed the example of her Father and Brother, in fortifying Towns, to take away from the Danes all hopes of settling in Mercia again. Among the Places she repaired, or fortified, these are the Chief, Warwick, Tamworth, Wedensbury, Charbury, Eadsbury, and Chester (10). This last had lain in ruins for some Time (11). When Elfreda had taken these Precautions, she carried her Arms into Wales (12), and after several victories, obliged the Welsh to become her Tributaries.

The year 915, as some affirm, is memorable for the founding of the University of Cambridge by King Edward. But all agree not in this Matter. Some maintain the Origin of this famous University is of a much later date. Others, on the contrary, carry its Antiquity a great deal higher, and attribute the founding of it to one Cantaber, a Spaniard, three hundred and fifteen years before the birth of our Saviour. Some again, cutting off almost a thousand years of this Antiquity, are contented with asserting, that Sebert, who reigned in Essex in the beginning of the VIIIth Century, was the first Founder. I shall not take upon me to decide this Dispute, rendered very warm by the emulation between Oxford and Cambridge. It is sufficient to have briefly mentioned the diversity of opinions in this matter. However, I cannot forbear observing, that if the University of Cambridge was in being in King Sebert's Time, or even in Alfred's, it is very surprising, that neither Bede in his Ecclesiastical History, nor Affterius in his Life of Alfred, should take the least notice of it.

From the year 910, when the War between the English and Danes was rekindled, to the year 922, we find in History nothing but a long series of Battles, the relation whereof must be unpleasant to the Reader (13). I shall therefore without any scruple pass them over in Silence, and mention only the most remarkable Consequences.

The Princess Elfreda, Sister to King Edward, died during this War (14), leaving an only Daughter, named Elfrida, then marriageable. Elfreda, as was said, succeeded her Husband in the Sovereignty of Mercia: I say Sovereignty, because it was certainly more than a bare Government. But not to give wrong notions of this matter, it will be proper to consider the state of Mercia at the Time I am speaking of. Historians not having clearly expressed themselves, have left us very much in the dark as to this Point. It must be remembered, that Ethelred, with the Title of Earl of Mercia, was in possession only of London and its Territory, or at most of the County of Middlesex, and that London, the Capital formerly of the Kingdom of Essex, was become the Metropolis of Mercia. Afterwards, Ethelred's narrow territories being much enlarged by his conquests upon the Mercian-Danes, Alfred's present to his Son-in-law was become so considerable, as to raise the jealousy of the new King, and make him apprehensive of Ethelred's successors growing too power-

(1) This year, 903, a Battle was fought between the Kentishmen and the Danes at Hulme, or Hulmwood in Suffex. Sax. Ann. Flor. Worc. places it under the year 904, and inserting in the 12th year of King Edward. p. 353.

(2) Præmyst says, he landed in Northumbria, the same year he went away, and came the next year by Sea to Essex. p. 332.

(3) They over-ran and spoiled all Mercia, as far as Creekelede in Wiltshire, and there passing the Thames, carried away whatever they could find in Bedford Forest in the same County. In the mean time King Edward pursued them, and waited all the Country that lies between the Devil's Ditch upon Newmarket Heath, and the Ouse. Edward recalled his Forces from thence, but the Kentishmen staying behind, were surrounded by the Danes; whereupon there followed a smart Engagement, in which several were killed on both Sides, and among the rest Ethelward; but the Danes got the Victory. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 332.

(4) The Sax. Ann. tells us, the Battle was obstinate and bloody on both Sides; the King left the Earls Sigulf and Sigelm, with many more of his Nobles. On the Danes part was slain Ethelred their King, with a greater number than of the English, though they had the honour of keeping the Field and burying their dead. Sax. Ann. 903.

(5) S. Dunelm. says, that Edward was forced to make Peace, p. 133. This Peace was concluded at Ytingesford, supposed to be Iford near Chrift-Church in Hampshire. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 352. Hoved. p. 421. Brompt. p. 832.

(6) The Annals say not by whom the Treaty was broken; but Hoveden lays it to the Charge of the Danes, p. 421. Upon the renewing of the War, King Edward sent, Ann. 910, an Army of West-Saxons and Mercians into Northumbria, who plundered that Kingdom for five weeks, and slew many of the Danes. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 352.

(7) The first was in 911, at Widnospeld. For the Danish Army in Northumberland not regarding the Peace which King Edward and his Son had made with them, wasted again the Province of Mercia. In this Battle were slain several thousands of the Danes, with their Kings Eowils and Healfden. They were succeeded by one Regnold. The second Battle was fought at Totenale, or Tetnal in Staffordshire. Sax. Ann. Flor. Worc. Huntingd. p. 352. Brompt. p. 832.

(8) Ethelred bore the Title of Subregulus Merciorum. Selden affirms, Subregulus is the same with Feldman or Count. Du Cange says, it signifies sometimes Emil, sometimes Sen-Rex or De-Rex. In this last Sense, it must be understood with respect to Ethelred, according to this Passage of Malmshury, Ethelredus duo Regna Merciorum & Vin-Saxonum conjunxit, Merciorum nomine tenet, quippe commendatum Duci Ethelredo. Ropin.

(9) Ann. 915, in November, King Edward built a Castle at Horsford.—The next Summer he built Witbam in Essex, and lay encamped at the same time with his Forces at Malden: And the greatest part of Essex, which then belonged to the Danes, came in to him. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 353. Brompt. p. 833.

(10) She also built or repaired Castles at Stafford, Bridgeforth, Runcerne in Cheshire, and at Secriate or Scargate. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. Hoved. These Castles were built to secure the Mercian Frontiers against the Danish and Welsh Incursions. Tyr. p. 316.

(11) It was demolished by E. filius King of Northumberland, and afterwards by the Danes.

(12) And took Breconshire (supposed to be Brecknock). She also took, in 913, Dorset, and, in 920, Lincoln, York, &c. Sax. Ann. Huntingd.

(13) Ann. 917, the Danes slew many of the English at Honerton in Oxfordshire; but a Body of them was defeated the same year at Leighton in Bedfordshire. Ann. 921, the Danes besieged Twickenham in Northamptonshire, and Wigmore in Herefordshire, but were repuls'd. The same year they took Colchester, and killed all the People in it; but making an attempt upon Malden, they were beaten back and lost several hundreds of Men. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 353. Brompt.

(14) Regin says, that in respect of the Cities she built, the Castles she fortified, and the Arms she managed, it might have been thought she had changed her Sex. She died at Canterbury in Staffordshire, and was buried in the Pouch of the Monastery of St. Peter in Glaugher, which she and her Husband had built. Sax. Ann. Malmsh. l. 5. c. 5.

ful. However, whilst Elfreda lived, Edward seemed not to be jealous of her Prosperity, and had no thoughts of dispossessing her of what she had gained in great measure by her own Valour. But after her Death, he did not think fit to leave her daughter Elfwina in possession of a Demesne, which put it in her power to raise new troubles in England by some ill-contrived Match. And indeed, there are Historians who affirm, the young Prince had resolved upon marrying a Danish Prince (1), and that therefore her Uncle deprived her of her Dominions. He was afraid no doubt, she would introduce the Enemies of the Kingdom into those very Places, that with so much difficulty had been wrested out of their Hands. However this be, after Elfreda's Death, he seized upon Mercia, and carried his Niece with him into Wessex. In all likelihood she passed the rest of her days in a Nunnery. Whether Elfwina's design of marrying a Dane was matter of fact, or an invention to vindicate the King's proceedings against his Niece, it equally proves what was before observed, that Ethelred and Elfreda were proprietors of Mercia. If they had been no more than Governors, Edward would have had no occasion to alledge her intended marriage as a reason to deprive her of the Government; as, on the other hand, there would have been no necessity of inventing such a Pretence, supposing there was no Foundation for it. I have enlarged a little on this Subject, because of the great variety of opinions concerning the Right of Earl Ethelred.

In their wars with Edward, the Danes daily lost ground, whilst the King, who knew how to improve his Advantages, pushed them incessantly without giving them time to breathe. By which means he at length compelled them to submit, and own him once more for their Sovereign. The Mercian-Danes were the first that threw down their Arms. The East-Angles followed soon after, and submitted without Terms. The Northumbrians were the last, as being the most powerful, almost all Northumberland being inhabited by Danes. The progress Edward had made in the other Provinces, convinced them, it would be better to submit than continue a war, which must end in their ruin. They were then governed by three Kings. Sithric and Nigel his Brother reigned beyond the Tine, and Reginald, who resided at York, ruled all the Country between the Tine and the Humber. Some time after, Sithric having slain his Brother Nigel, became sole King of the North.

The state of the Welsh depended in some measure on that of the Danes. As long as the Danes were in Arms, the Kings of England left the Welsh peaceably to enjoy their Liberty. But as soon as they had nothing to fear from the North, they seldom failed to attack them. At such a juncture it was, that Elfreda, assisted by the Troops of the King her Brother, compelled them to become her Tributaries. After her death the Welsh endeavoured to free themselves from the Tribute she had laid upon them, and to keep Edward employed, sent a powerful Aid to the Danes. Edward, having then other affairs upon his hands, took no notice of it; but as soon as he had concluded a Peace with the Danes, marched against Rees ap Madoc (2) King of Wales, who was assisted by Leoffreth a Danish General. After several indecisive Skirmishes, Edward at last obtained a signal Victory, which reduced the Welsh King to a necessity of suing for Peace, with a promise of paying the usual Tribute. In fine, the Britons of Cumberland, who had put themselves under the Protection of the Danes, submitted also to Edward. Some Historians pretend, the King of Scotland following their Example, did Homage for his Kingdom to the King of England. But the Scots not only deny the Fact, but maintain it could not possibly be, since the word Homage was never used in Great-Britain till after the Norman Conquest. But this reason is not decisive, for the thing signified by that Term might be in use under another name. And indeed, the Sovereignty of Alfred and Edward over the Northumbrian Danes and the Mercians in the time of Ethelred and Elfreda, was nothing else but a right of Homage from those Countries, though perhaps the word was not then in use.

Edward was enjoying the Fruits of his Victories, feared and respected by all that could give him any umbrage at home, and greatly esteemed by all Princes abroad, when death took him out of the World in 925, after a reign of twenty four years (3). He gained as great a Reputation by his Arms as the King his Father, since, like him, he gave Law to all England, and procured the Kingdom a repose. But if he equalled the great Alfred in military Virtues, it must be owned he was far short of his illustrious Father in all other respects (4).

He had Children by three Wives, the first named Elfwina, a Shepherd's Daughter, was only a Concubine. An Historian relates concerning this Woman, a sort of Romance, which, on account of the Sequel, it will be necessary to insert. I call it a Romance, since by the Author's own confession, it has no better Foundation than some old Songs handed down to his time (5); much the same with your Spanish Romances, wherein are related several Stories of their ancient Kings. The Historian says, Egwina, a Shepherd's Daughter, as she lay asleep in the Fields, dreamt that the Moon shone out of her Womb so bright that all England was enlightened by the Splendor. Some time after, she took occasion to relate her Dream to an old Woman that had been King Edward's Nurse. This Woman, who pretended to interpret Dreams, imagining there was something extraordinary in this, took Egwina into her House, and educated her not as a Country Wench, but as a Person of Quality. Egwina answered all the old Nurse's care and pains about her, and in time became an accomplished Beauty. Whilst she was in the House of her Benefactress, Prince Edward, before he was King, happening to pass by the place where his Nurse lived, made her a Visit. He cast his Eyes on Egwina, and immediately fell desperately in Love with her. His passion was so violent, that in the most moving and affecting manner he solicited the Nurse to put him in possession of the charming Egwina. The old Woman, who had a great affection for Edward, and had always the Dream in her Thoughts, yielded to his request, and brought Egwina to consent to what he desired so passionately. From that Time, Edward was extremely fond of Egwina, and had by her three Children, of whom Athelstan, the eldest, succeeded him. Alfred the second died before his Father. The third was a Daughter, called by some Editha, by others Beatrix.

By another Wife, Edward had two Sons and six Daughters, Elfwald the eldest Son died at Oxford a few Days after his Father; so that he had no time to taste the sweets of a Crown. Edwin the second was deprived of his just Rights, and came to a tragical End, as shall be related hereafter. Of the six Daughters, some were married to powerful Princes, by the care of their Brother Athelstan, and others became Nuns. Elfreda the eldest was Abbess of Ramsey (6). Ogina was married to Charles the Simple, King of France, and was Mother of Lewis d'Outre Mer. Edilda passed her Days in a Monastery. The fourth, of the same Name, was married to Hugh the Great, Earl of Paris, Father of Hugh Capet. Edgitha was Wife of Otho Emperor of Germany. Edgiva the youngest espoused Lewis the Blind, King of Provence, who had a Son by her, named Constantine.

By Edgiva his third Wife, Edward had two Sons and two Daughters. Edmund and Eddred the two Sons were both Kings of England. Edburga was a Nun, and her Sister Edgiva was married to Lewis Prince of Aquitain.

It is very probable, this Edgiva was confounded with her Sister of the same name by the second Wife, who was married to Lewis King of Provence, because there was then no Prince of Aquitain mentioned in History.

The Danish Historians give Edward another Daughter named Thyra, who, as they affirm, was Wife of Gormon III, one of their Kings. It is strange they should speak so positively of a Princess of England, unknown to all the English Historians.

During the reign of Edward the Elder, Rollo chief of the Normans in France, had gotten such firm footing in Neustria, that it was not in the Power of the French to drive him thence; Charles the Simple, then King of France, was forced, in order to free himself from the continual fears of so troublesome a Neighbour, to give him a grant of that part of Neustria he was possessed of, lying between the Seine and the Epte, with the Title of Duke of Normandy. The conditions were, that Rollo should do Homage to the Crown of France, be baptized and marry Giselle the King's Daughter. Rollo died, according to Mezerai, in 917. Some place his death in 924, and others with still less reason in 928. William his Son, by Peppa Daughter of the Earl of Bayeux, was his Successor.

(1) Reginald King of the Danes. See Tyrrel.

(2) He died at Farringdon in Berkshire, and was buried at Winchester by his Father. Sax. Ann. Malmsh.

(3) He built and repaired several Castles and Towns; viz. Ann. 918, he built two Castles at Buckingham, one on each Side the River Ouse. Ann. 919, he built one at Bedford, on the South Side of the River. Ann. 920, he repaired and fortified Maiden in Essex. Ann. 921, he did the same at Tewkesbury in Northamptonshire, Wigmore in Herefordshire, Colchester in Essex, and Huntingdon. Ann. 922, He built a Castle at Stratford. Ann. 923, he repaired Tutbury in Leicestershire and Mancheſter. Ann. 924, he built a new Town at Nottingham, on the South Side of the Trent; and also one near Bakewell in Derbyshire. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. Brompt.

(4) Magis ex cantilenis, quam ex libris, says Malmſbury. The Story is told at large in Brompton, p. 331.

(5) In Hampſhire.

8. A T H E L S T A N.

925.
Athelstan is elected
King of England.
Sax. Ann.

Malmsh.
1. 2. c. 6.

ELSWARD, Edward's eldest Son, surviving his Father but a few Days, and the rest of the legitimate Children being all under Age, Athelstan, Son of Egwin, was placed on the Throne, with the Consent of the Clergy and Nobility. Though this Prince had a mixture of Base and Royal Blood in his Veins, the last had so far the ascendant, that the blemish of his Birth was entirely effaced by his noble Qualities. Alfred his Grandfather had conferred the honour of Knighthood upon him, by girding him with a Sword according to the Custom of those days. Edward his Father had committed the care of his Education to Earl Ethelred his Brother-in-law, and the Princess Elfleda his Sister, who did their utmost to train him up to Virtue. As he had been present at all their Councils, and attended them in all their warlike Expeditions, he had acquired so great experience both in Military and Political Affairs, as joined to his natural Parts, gained him the esteem of all the World. So that when he mounted the Throne, he was not only of a fit age, being then in his thirtieth year, but also very capable to govern. History does not inform us what determined the English to give the Crown to this Prince, notwithstanding his illegitimate Birth (1). However, his Father thought this defect a sufficient Reason to set him by, and name for his Successor another of his Sons born in Wedlock, though younger than Athelstan. In all likelihood, after the death of Elfwald, Athelstan's mature Age and noble Qualities gained him the preference before Edwin, the eldest of the legitimate Sons, but too young to govern (2).

A Plot
against the King.
Malmsh.

This Election however was not pleasing to all. Some of the principal Lords disdaining to be governed by a Bastard conspired to dethrone Athelstan, and place Edwin in his room. Alfred, chief of the Conspirators, had even taken private measures to seize Athelstan at Winchester, and put out his Eyes. This Plot being discovered, he was apprehended by the King's Order, but would confess nothing. He obstinately persisted in protesting his innocence, and offered to purge himself by Oath in the presence of the Pope. Although this way of justifying himself was far from being a proof of his Innocence, Athelstan was satisfied with it, and sent him to Rome, to take his Oath before Pope John. Perhaps he was unwilling to begin his Reign with Blood, or it may be, was apprehensive, the treating too severely a person of the first Rank, would draw upon him the ill-will of the Nobles. Shortly after, word was sent him from Rome, that Alfred having sworn his Innocence before the Pope, suddenly fell into a fainting fit, which lasting three days, ended with his Life; and that the Pope, convinced by this accident of Alfred's Perjury, had ordered his Body to remain in the English College 'till the King's pleasure should be known. Athelstan, pleased with being thus rid of his Enemy without having directly contributed to his death, consented he should have Christian burial. However, his Lands were confiscated, and given to Malmshury-Monastery. The King took care to insert in the Grant the whole Conspiracy, to testify to the world that he dedicated to God what was his own.

The Danes
begin to stir.

Athelstan
marches into Northum-
berland.

They are forced to submit.
Malmsh.
Fl. Wig.

In the mean time, new troubles were preparing for the King. As the Danes, settled in England, had been subdued by force, they thought it lawful to make use of the same means to shake off their yoke. The death of Edward, and the conspiracy of Alfred, affording them, as they imagined, a favourable opportunity to revolt, they had begun to take such measures as obliged Athelstan to march into their Country. He would doubtless have met with more resistance, had he given them time to make greater Preparations. But as they had not yet drawn their Forces together, they were so surprised by the arrival of the King on their Frontiers, that without endeavouring to defend themselves, they returned to their Allegiance. Sithric, one of their Kings (3), went and sued for Peace, upon what terms the King was pleased to impose. Athel- stan being desirous to live in Peace with the Danes, that he might have time to establish himself in the Throne, not only pardoned his Revolt, but gave him his Sister Edithe in Marriage, on condition he would receive Baptism (4).

The troubles in the North being thus appeased, Athelstan marched back to Wessex, where advice was brought him soon after of Sithric's Death, who by a former Marriage had left two Sons (5), Anlaff and Godfrid. As the Histories of those times are not very particular, we are ignorant of the reason of Athelstan's resolving to deprive these two Princes of their Father's Dominions. However that be, as soon as he heard of Sithric's Death, he returned at the head of his Army into Northumberland. His march was so expeditious, that Anlaff and Godfrid (6), as well as Reginald, another Danish King residing at York, had scarce time to escape falling into his hands. Their hasty flight gave him opportunity of becoming master of all Northumberland, except the Castle of York.

Athelstan's second expedition to the North.

Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.
Huntingd.
Kewd.

He seizes all Northum-
berland.

Though he had taken care to secure his Conquest, by placing strong Garrisons in all the Towns, he was uneasy at the escape of the three Danish Princes. He would have been very glad to have them in his power, but, with regard to two, the thing was impossible. It was not known what was become of Reginald, and Anlaff was fled into Ireland, where it was no easy matter to come at him. Athelstan therefore was forced to be satisfied with requiring Constantine King of Scotland to deliver up Godfrid, who had retired into his Dominions. Constantine being sensible, he was not in condition to deny any thing to a Prince at the head of so powerful an Army, promised to deliver the Prince into his hands, and give him a meeting at Dacor (7). But whilst he was preparing for his Journey, Godfrid made his escape, either through the negligence or connivance of Constantine, who however went to meet Athelstan accompanied with Eugenius King of Cumberland. Athelstan admitted Constantine's excuses for the Danish Prince's escape. But if the English Historians are to be credited, he obliged both the Kings to do Homage for their Kingdoms (8). However, the Scots positively deny that England had ever any right of Sovereignty over Scotland 'till the twelfth Century. But this dispute, which was never decided, will for the future be dropt, since England and Scotland make now but one Kingdom.

An interview of the Kings of England
and Scotland.
Malmsh.

Remarks on the pretended homage of Constantine.
Buchanan.

Before Athelstan quitted the North, Godfrid made an Attempt upon York, by means of the Castle, where he had still some Friends (9). But missing his aim, he put to Sea, where for some time he exercised Piracy. At length, tired with that way of Life, he surrendered himself to the King of England, who received him kindly, and allowed him a handsome Pension. Some time after, upon some disgust or ill-grounded suspicion, he withdrew again, and was never more heard of.

Godfrid's
defiance.

Anlaff, a Prince of greater Abilities than his Brother, took better measures for his Restoration. He had retired into Ireland, where being informed that the King of Scotland was displeased with Athelstan, believed he might make use of this opportunity to persuade him to espouse his Cause. To that end, he came into Scotland and intimated to Constantine, that he had reason to fear the worst from the King of England. He represented to him, that Athelstan having by surprise seized upon Northumberland, without any the least Pretence, might proceed in the same manner with regard to Scotland, and therefore it was absolutely necessary to prevent him. To this he added the offer of a powerful aid from Ireland, assuring him, with that increase of strength he might easily drive Athelstan out of Northumberland, and free himself from a troublesome and dangerous Neighbour, by restoring that Kingdom to the Danes, who would serve as a barrier against England. Anlaff found no great difficulty to prevail with the King of Scotland, who, besides his being secretly exasperated at the haughty reception he met with at the late Interview, was grown uneasy at Athelstan's Successes, and apprehensive of being invaded himself. He resolved there-

Anlaff and Constantine join against Athelstan.

Malmsh.
Hoveda.

(1) Malmshury says, that there was no other Objection against him but this, if it was true, p. 48.
(2) Athelstan was crowned at Kingston upon Thames by Athelm Archbishop of Canterbury. This Ceremony of Crowning and Anointing the English Kings was, in all probability, first used in the Reign of Alfred.
(3) King of the Northumbrians. Malmshury, p. 48.
(4) She was Daughter to Edward and Egwinna. After Sithric's Death, (who lived but one year after his Marriage,) she became a Nun at Polesworth in Warwickshire. Flor. Wor. Malmsh. Jo. Wallingford says, that Sithric upon his Marriage with Edithe, was advanced by Athelstan to the Title of King, and that he gave him for his Kingdom all the Country from the River Tees, as far as Edinburgh; from which time the Danes began to settle in those Parts, who before rambled about all over England. See Tyrrel, p. 330.
(5) Flor. Wor. more probably supposes Anlaff not to have been the Son of Sithric King of Northumberland, but of another of that name, King of Ireland, and who had married the Daughter of Constantine, p. 603. Brompt. 839.
(6) Huntingden and Brompton call him the Father of Reginald, p. 354, 838. Malmshury calls him Aldulph, p. 48.
(7) Dacor in Cumberland. Camd.
(8) This Homage is mentioned neither in the Saxon Annals, nor in Marianus Scotus, or Florus of Worcester.
(9) But Athelstan took it and pulled it down. Malmshury, p. 50.

fore to embark in this Enterprize; and having concerted Measures with Anlaff, they parted in order to go and prepare what each had engaged to provide.

Mean while Athelstan, having viewed his Garrisons, and taken all the Precautions he thought proper to secure his late Conquests, was returned into Wessex, where he remained in Peace, not knowing what his Enemies had plotted against him. Shortly after, he was engaged in a War with Howel King of Wales. This new Enemy was raised by Constantine, to keep him employed against the Welsh, whilst he and Anlaff should invade Northumberland. Athelstan, by his expedition, broke all the measures of the King of Scotland. The moment he was informed of the Motions of the Welsh, and the Aid sent them by Constantine, he marched into Wales, and giving Howel Battle obtained a complete Victory (1). After this happy Success, he augmented the Tribute paid by that Prince to England (2).

This War being thus ended, Athelstan approached the Borders of Scotland, to make Constantine repent of his assisting the Welsh. As soon as he entered the Enemy's Country, he took some Towns, and gave the Scots reason to dread more considerable Losses. As Anlaff was not yet arrived with the promised Supplies, Constantine durst not venture to engage alone in this War against so powerful an Enemy, who was already in his Dominions, and in condition to carry on his Conquests much further. Wherefore, to gain time till the Irish joined him, he sued for Peace. Athelstan readily granted his request, being extremely desirous to make that Prince his Friend, for fear he should countenance the Insurrections of the Northumbrians. For this reason he restored to him all the Places he had conquered in Scotland, in expectation of gaining by this Generosity a Prince whose Friendship it was his Interest to cultivate. Some Historians however affirm, Athelstan obliged Constantine to do him Homage for Scotland. But this is what the Scots will never allow.

Athelstan's Generosity was not sufficient to hinder Constantine from pursuing the Execution of his first Projects. He rather hastened his Preparations the more, being extremely vexed, he should be forced to receive Obligations from a Prince whom he always considered as his Enemy. Mean while, Athelstan was returned to Wessex, where he hoped to enjoy some Repose, as he saw nothing about him likely to give him any Disturbance. But he met at home in his own Family with what troubled him more than any thing the War could occasion.

A certain Court-Lord, Enemy to Prince Edwin the King's Brother, accused the young Prince of being concerned in Alfred's Conspiracy. The King too readily gave Ear to this Accusation. He was easily induced to believe that a Prince in whose favour the Conspiracy was formed was not innocent. It may be too, he was not forry to find him guilty, as it gave him an Opportunity to dispatch him out of the way. However, he would not put him to death publicly, but ordered him to be exposed to the Fury of the Waves in a Vessel without Sails or Rudder. The young Prince went on board protesting his Innocence, but finding the King inexorable, he cast himself headlong into the Sea (3). Athelstan at first was secretly pleased with this Occasion to destroy his Brother; but the moment he had gratified his Passion, was seized with grievous Remorse. To quiet his Conscience he was advised to atone for his Crime by some meritorious Act. With this View he founded the Abby of Middleton in Dorsetshire (4), where Prayers were offered to Heaven, Day and Night, for him and his Brother's Soul. The Historians add (5), that, not content with this, he submitted to a seven Years Penance, but do not inform us wherein it consisted. Edwin's Accuser had not reason long to rejoice at the Success of his malicious Calumnies. One day as he waited at Table with the King's Cup, one of his Feet slipping, he would certainly have fallen, had he not by the Nimbleness of the other recovered himself. Whereupon he jokingly says, See how one Brother helps another. This jest cost him his Life. Athelstan, who overheard what he said, taking it for a Reproach or Banter upon him, ordered him to be executed immediately, and thus revenged his Brother's Death by That of his false Accuser (6).

Whilst these things passed at Court, Constantine continued his Preparations for the execution of the Project concerted between him and Anlaff. This last, whom some groundlessly stile King of Ireland, had found means to engage in the League, the Irish, Welsh, and Northumbrian Danes, who ardently desired to have a King of their own Nation on the Throne. Anlaff appeared as head of this League, though Constantine was no less concerned in it, the War being carried on chiefly at his Expence. This Project was managed so privately, that Anlaff entered the Humber with a Fleet of six hundred Sail, and invaded Northumberland before Athelstan had any Intelligence of his Motions. With so considerable Forces, and the Assistance of the Danes settled in those Parts, he easily became Master of several small ill-guarded Towns. But the fortified Places that were well garrisoned by the English, stopped his Progress, and gave Athelstan time to draw his Army together. He used so great expedition, that he surprised the two confederate Princes. They were now upon the March towards Bernicia, in order to conquer it for the King of Scotland, but found they were obliged to turn back and oppose King Athelstan, who was very near them, when they imagined him as yet employed in his Preparations. The two Armies met at Brunanburgh (7), where a bloody Battle was fought. Victory declared for Athelstan, and the Allies lost Constantine King of Scotland, six other Irish or Welsh Kings, and twelve Earls and General Officers. This Victory was chiefly owing to the Valour of Turketul, the King's Cousin, who was afterwards Abbot of Croyland. Athelstan after winning this Battle, easily extended his Conquests farther into Scotland, and chastised the Welsh by raising their Tribute to twenty Pound weight of Gold, three hundred of Silver, and twenty five thousand Head of Cattle. Besides, they were pent up beyond the Wye, and lost all the Country between that River and the Severn. As for the Northumbrian Danes, who had openly sided with the Allies, Athelstan for a Punishment encreased their Yoke, and kept for the future a stricter hand over them. After he had settled the Affairs of the North, he marched against the Cornish Britons, who had likewise assisted the Confederates. He took Exeter, formerly destroyed by the Danes, and caused it to be carefully repaired and fortified. From that time, the Britons were forced to retire beyond the Tamar, which served for a Boundary to the two Nations. They were, before this Expedition, mixed with the English in some of the Western Counties.

In almost every page of the Histories of those Days, we meet with Miracles wrought in favour of the Friends and Protectors of the Monks. Athelstan who had been a good Benefactor to them, with intent to atone for the murder of his Brother, was a great favourite with them. Accordingly they have not failed to give him the usual marks of their Gratitude. They say, at the word of St. John of Beverly, he struck his Sword three Yards deep in a solid Rock, which yielded like Butter. They tell us also, that having lost his Sword in the Battle of Brunanburgh, another from Heaven came and sheathed itself in his Scabbard. But it would be lost time to relate all the Miracles the Monks have thought fit to stuff their Histories with. It will not be amiss however to note, that the Custom of embellishing all remarkable Events with Miracles, was in fashion for several Ages.

I shall conclude the Reign of Athelstan with an Incident, the best Historians have thought worth their Notice. A few days before the Battle of Brunanburgh, Anlaff wanting to know the Posture of the Enemy, went into the English Camp disguised like a Harper, as Alfred the Great had formerly done. But notwithstanding his Disguise, he was known by a Soldier, who however suffered him to go away

(1) But he restored Peace (and Constantine) to their Kingdoms, saying, It was more glorious to make a King, than to be one Malm. p. 48. Brompt. 833.

(2) Malmbury intimates it was he who first laid it on. See him p. 50.

(3) With the Prince was put on board his Equire, who after the Prince had cast himself into the Sea, was resolved to save himself if he could, and meeting with better Fortune, was driven on Shore at a Place call'd Whitland, on the Coast of Picardy. Malm. Brompt.

(4) Now call'd Marm-Aby; it lies three Miles North of the Piddle. The greatest Part of it is still standing, as having been the Seat of the Monks ever since its Dissolution; from whom it is lately come to the Latterels of Dunfer-Castle, by the Marriage of the Heiress of Sir John Tregunell. Camden.

(5) Brompton and Malm.

(6) As the Affair of Edwin is the only thing that falsifies the Memory of Athelstan, Malmbury, who relates it, disbelieves the whole Story, because of his great Kindness to his other Brothers and Sisters, and owns it was grounded only on some Old Ballads. Huntingdon speaks of the Letter Edwin wrote, but mentions it as a sad Accident, and a great Misfortune to Athelstan. Brompton indeed delivers it as a certain Truth. But Baillan the Saxon Historian, such was his Malice to this King's Memory makes Athelstan not only to have procured the Death of his Brother Edwin, but also of his Father King Edward, whom he therefore takes to have been call'd the Martyr; and not content with this neither, adds, that he put to Death his Brother Edward also. More Mistakes can scarce be committed in so few Lines; for in the first Place, it is agreed by all our Historians, that King Edward died a natural Death; and as for him whom he calls the Martyr, he was Son of King Edgar, nor did he begin to reign till above a hundred and fifty Years after. But as for what Baillan objects against some of our late Historians for making Constantine to do Homage for Scotland to Athelstan, he seems to be in the right. See Note above.

(7) Suppos'd to be Bromford, near Bromwich, in Northumberland; though some think it was somewhere nearer the Humber. In the Description of this Battle, the Historians and Poets of that Age are extraordinary full of Rapture and Bombast. The Saxon Annals, went to be febrile and sweet, launches out blazon upon this Occasion. Sax. Ann. 938. Ascanster in the Borders of Deorshire is famous for the Torments of the Saxon Prince slain in this Battle at Brunanburgh, and brought hither after their Death. Camden, Vol. I. p. 44. After this Victory, Athelstan took Cumberland and Wesmerland from the Danes, and recovered Northumberland from the Danes.

Athelstan
defeats
Howel King of Wales.
Malm.

Brompt.

934.
He marches into Scot- land.
Sax. Ann.
Fordun. l. 4.
c. 22.

and makes a Peace with Constantine.

938.
Constantine
renovates the War.

Athelstan puts his Brother Edwin to Death.
Brompt.
Malm.

and repents
of it.

Constantine and Anlaff invade North- umberland.
Sax. Ann.

Irish History

Malm.

Miracles done in favour of Athelstan.
Brompt.
Fordun. l. 4.
c. 23.

He, and his being slain
by Athelstan.
Malm.
l. 2. c. 6.

undiscovered. As soon as the Soldier thought him safe, he told Athelstan what had happened, and advised him to remove his Tent, judging Anlaf had some design upon that Quarter. He excused himself for not having discovered this Secret sooner, by saying, he had formerly given his Military Oath to Anlaf, and therefore could not resolve to betray him. Athelstan forgave him, and followed his Advice, which he soon found to be of great consequence. The next Night the Danish Prince, with a Body of chosen Troops, attacked the English Camp, and penetrated to the very place where he had seen the King's Tent. A Bishop (coming to the Camp that Night, and) accidentally pitching his Tent in the same place, was slain with all his Followers.

941. Athelstan out-lived the Victory of Brunanburgh but three Years. He died a natural Death in 941, in the forty sixth year of his Age, and the sixteenth of his Reign (1). Historians have dilated on the glorious Success of his Arms, but much more on the Miracles Heaven wrought in his favour. But without insisting on the wonders his History abounds with, I shall content myself with giving him this Commendation: His Merits made him to be equally feared by his Neighbours, beloved by his Subjects, and respected by the greatest Princes in Europe (2). The Emperor Otho, and Hugh the Great his Brothers-in-law, gave him frequent demonstrations of their Esteem, by making him considerable Presents. The noble Matches he made for those of his Sisters who preferred the Marriage-state to a Cloyster, are clear Evidences of his great Reputation in the World. His Sister Ogina, Widow of Charles the Simple, King of France, being obliged to fly for refuge into England with her Son Lothar, who from thence had the Sir-name of Outremer, he gave them an honourable Reception and furnished them with all things necessary during their Exile. It is even affirmed, his Application and Credit did not a little contribute to the restoring the King his Nephew to the Throne of his Ancestors. Tho' he seemed to be intirely engrossed by military Affairs, he found time however to cause Justice and Civil Government to flourish in his Dominions; witness the excellent Laws he from time to time added to those of Alfred his Grandfather. It appears from these Laws, several whereof are still extant, that his Intent was, all Persons, Ecclesiastical as well as Civil, should be subject to them. He was no Friend to those Privileges and Immunities, the Clergy have so much improved, and which very often serve only to authorize Wickedness, and prove a Sanctuary to Criminals.

Amongst all the Monuments of his Piety, which for the most part consisted only in building and endowing Monasteries, according to the Custom of those Days, the Translation of the Scriptures into Saxon, the then vulgar Tongue, is one, the Usefulness whereof appears to be least dubious. He took particular care to have it well done, employing those that were deemed the most learned Persons in the Kingdom. Hence it is evident, how much the State of Learning had been improved by the wise regulations of the Great Alfred, since in his time it would have been impossible to find any Englishman capable of undertaking a Work of that nature.

The famous Dunstan, so often mentioned hereafter, was born in the first Year of this Reign.

Athelstan having no Issue, Edmund, the eldest of the legitimate Sons of Edward the Elder, was unanimously placed on the Throne.

He gets the Bible translated into Saxon.

Birth of Dunstan.

Edmund made King.

9. EDMUND I.

Edmund I.

ATHELSTAN left England in profound Tranquillity. The Welsh paid their Tribute regularly. Anlaf, after his Defeat, was retired into Ireland, where he seemed to lay aside all Thoughts of any further Projects; and the Danes remained in subjection. But as soon as this Prince was laid in his grave, these last prepared for a Revolt. Edmund's Youth made them hope, they should at length be able to accomplish their long projected Design of having a King of their own Nation, and throwing off the English Yoke. Anlaf having perfect Intelligence how they stood inclined, resolved to make use of this Juncture to recover the Crown of Northumberland. But as he was sensible this grand Undertaking could not be executed without a foreign Aid, he found means to persuade Olaus, King of Norway, to espouse his Cause, who promised to assist him to the utmost of his power. With the Troops lent him by this Prince, he once more entered Northumberland, and appearing before York, the Gates were opened to him, by means of the good understanding between him and the principal Inhabitants. The Example of the Metropolis was followed by most of the other Towns, whose Garrisons were either expelled, or cut in pieces by the Citizens, who were generally of Danish race. Anlaf, not content with being master of Northumberland, marched into Mercia (3), where his Countrymen received him with open Arms, and assisted him in recovering several places which Edward the Elder had formerly taken from them.

Tho' Edmund was not above seventeen or eighteen Years of age, the Progress of the Enemy was so far from daunting him, that it rather made him more eager to decide by a battle, to whom a Country, so often and so long contended for, should belong. As soon as he had drawn all his Forces together, he resolutely marched towards the North, though he well knew the Superiority of his Enemy. On the other hand, Anlaf hearing Edmund was advancing with long Marches to give him Battle, went to meet him with the same Resolution. The two Armies meeting near Chesler (4), came to an Engagement, wherein Victory held the Balance so even, that when Night came, neither could boast of the least Advantage. Both Sides prepared to renew the Fight as soon as Day should appear. But the Archbishops of Canterbury and York (5), who were in the two Armies, laboured so earnestly to make Peace, that a Treaty was begun that very Evening, and concluded by break of Day. This Peace was the more easily made, as neither of the Parties could insist upon any Advantage gained in that Day's Action, since neither of them could know either their own or the Enemy's Loss. By this Treaty, Edmund was obliged to deliver up to the Danes all the Country lying North of the Roman High-way, called Watlingstreet, which divided England into almost two equal parts, running from North Wales to the most southern parts of Kent, quite to the Sea. Edmund was not at all pleased with these Terms, but was in a manner forced to accept them by the Nobles that were in his Army. These Lords, weighing the hopes of recovering what was lost, with the Apprehension of being still greater Losers, judged it better to end the War on these Conditions, than continue it with the Hazard of what might happen. Doubtless the Remembrance of the Calamities England was formerly exposed to, made them the more willing to come to this Resolution. Accordingly, Anlaf was put in possession of the Kingdom of Northumberland, whose Bounds by this Treaty were enlarged with several Counties which his Father Sithric had never enjoyed.

The Northumbrian Danes had not reason long to rejoice at the Restoration of Anlaf, which they had so ardently desired. This Prince having contracted a large Debt with the King of Norway for the Troops he had lent him, was willing to pay it. To this end, he laid heavy Taxes on the People, by which he forfeited their Affection. The Inhabitants of the ancient Kingdom of Deira were the first that revolted, and having sent for Reginald, his Brother Godfrid's Son, crowned him King at York. Reginald was no sooner on the Throne, but he made Preparations for the War against his Uncle, who was also preparing to dispossess him. The Quarrel between these two Kings, put Edmund upon marching towards the North, at the head of an Army, as well to improve the present Opportunity, if there was any Appearance of Success, as to appease the Troubles there, being apprehensive they might give occasion to the foreign Danes to return into England. He arrived upon the Borders of Northumberland when the Uncle and Nephew, wholly intent upon their private Quarrel, thought of nothing less than repulsing the English. Probably, he might with ease have made himself master of that Kingdom; however, he was satisfied with procuring Peace between the two Kings, in such a manner that Reginald was to keep the Crown he had lately received,

Edmund and Anlaf divide England between them.

944. Divisions in Northumberland.

Edmund marches thither.

and subjects the two Kings who are baptised.

(1) He was buried with a great many Trophies at Malsbury.

(2) See the Character of Athelstan with this Sentence: His Life was little in Time, but great in Action, lib. 2.

(3) When he landed at Winton; from thence he went to Tamworth, and ravag'd all the Country round about. S. Dunelm. p. 134. Hoved. Cbron. de Mercia.

(4) Ancient Chester, call'd by the Romans, Urb Legionis. Rapin. It was so nam'd from the twentieth Legion, who were encamp'd here to keep the Ordovices in awe: for the same Reason it was call'd by the Britons or Welsh, Caer-lyon, and by the Saxons, Legion-caester, suppos'd to be built about that time. Rapin. Cbron. de Mercia.

But at the same time, Edmund obliged them both to swear Allegiance to him, and be baptized, himself standing Godfather.

The Wars breaks out again.
Sax. Ann.
Huntin. l. 5.

This forced Peace lasted not long, Edmund was hardly return'd into Wessex, when the two Danish Princes took up arms with one consent to free themselves from his Yoke, having engaged the Mercian Danes and the King of Cumberland to espouse their Quarrel. Whereupon, Edmund immediately marched into Mercia, and before the Danes there could be joined by the Northumbrians, took from them Leicester, Stafford, Derby, Nottingham, and some other places of less note. Then advancing with the same expedition towards Northumberland, he surpris'd the two Kings before they had drawn their Forces together. This sudden Attack threw the Northumbrians into such disorder, that the two Kings fearing to fall into the hands of Edmund, believed it their only Refuge to abandon the Island, where they could not possibly remain in safety, so closely were they pursued. Their Flight depriving the Danes of all Hopes of withstanding Edmund they threw down their Arms, and swore Allegiance.

The two Danish Kings fly out of England.

945.
Edmund
subdues
Cumberland and gives it to the King
of Scotland.
Sax. Ann.
Fordun. l. 4.
b. 24.

Before he returned to Wessex, Edmund resolv'd to punish the King of Cumberland, who, without cause, had sided with the Danes. He easily subdued that little Kingdom, whose Forces bore no proportion to his. However, he kept it not for himself, but thought it more for his Advantage to present it to the King of Scotland, in order to attach him to his Interest, and prevent him from assisting the Northumbrians (1). However, he reserv'd the Sovereignty of it, and oblig'd that Prince to do him Homage, and appear at the King of England's Court, at the time of the solemn Festivals, if summoned. This perhaps is what gave occasion to say, that from thenceforward the Kings of Scotland were Vassals to the Kings of England. They were certainly so with regard to Cumberland; but it does not follow from hence they did Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland.

Edmund's Successes, his Valour and Abilities, rendered him famous both at Home and Abroad. The King of Denmark, tho' frequently sollicit'd by the Danes in England, did not think proper to assist them against a Prince of so great Reputation, and from whom there was so little to be got.

Edmund was not wholly employ'd in military Affairs; The Laws of there are some of his Laws still in being, which demon- Edmund's strate how desirous he was of his People's Welfare and Homage. Happiness. Having observ'd, Pecuniary Punishments were not sufficient to put a stop to Robberies, which were generally committed by People who had nothing to lose, he order'd, that in Gangs of Robbers, the oldest of them should be condemn'd to the Gallows. This was the first Law in England that made it Death to rob or steal.

Probably this Prince would have render'd his People happy, had his Reign been longer; but a fatal Accident robb'd him of his Life, when he began to enjoy the Fruits of his Victories. One day, as he was solemnizing a Festival (2) at Pucklekirk in Gloucestershire (3), he spied Loth, a notorious Robber, who, though banish'd the Kingdom for his Crimes, had the Impudence to come and sit at one of the Tables in the Hall where the King was at Dinner. Enrag'd at his Insolence, he command'd him to be apprehended (4). But perceiving he was drawing his Dagger to defend himself, the King leapt up in great fury, and catching hold of him by the Hair, dragg'd him out of the Hall. This imprudent Action cost him his Life. Whilst he was wholly intent upon venting his furious Passion, Loth stabbed him in the Breast with his Dagger, so that he immediately expired upon the Body of his Murderer. This was the tragical End of King Edmund in 948, in the twenty fifth Year of his Age, and the eighth of his Reign (5). By Elgiva his Wife he had two Sons, Edwy and Edgar, who did not succeed him by reason of their Minority. Edred his Brother was placed on the Throne by the unanimous Consent of the Clergy and Nobility (6).

948.
The tragical End of Ed- mund.
G. Malm.
S. Dunelm.
Br. Hist.
Malm.

During this Reign Dunstan began to appear in the World. He was in great Favour with Edmund, who made him Abbot of Glaffenbury.

H. W. f. and Children.

About this time William Long-Sword, second Duke of Normandy, was assassinated by Arnold Earl of Flanders, in a little Island of the Somme over against Pequigni. Richard I. his Son, a Minor, succeeded him. As the Affairs of Normandy will hereafter be often mix'd with those of England, it is necessary to give an Account beforehand of the Succession of the Dukes in that Dukedom.

Dunstan.

The Affairs of Norman- dy.

10. E D R E D.

EDRED.
War of Northum-
berland.

THE Northumbrian Danes bore the English Yoke with extreme Impatience. Nothing but Force was sufficient to keep them in Subjection. Whenever they thought they had a favourable Opportunity to revolt, they seldom failed to embrace it. Tho' during Edmund's Reign they had not been very successful, yet upon news of his Death, they began to think of means to recover their Liberty. They hop'd his Successor, whom as yet they knew not, would not have his Bravery, or at least wanting his Experience, would not have the same advantage over them. The better to execute their Designs, they gain'd to their Side Malcolm King of Scotland, who look'd upon all Obligations to be cancelled by the Death of Edmund. This Prince, as well as the Danes, was persuaded, Edred, by reason of his Youth, would be so embarrassed at this unexpected Attack, that it would not be possible for him to make any Resistance. But the Success was not answerable to their Expectations, Edred, not being inferior to his Predecessor, either in Conduct or Courage, was so very expeditious, that he was in the Heart of Northumberland, before the Danes were ready to oppose him. They were extremely surpris'd to find themselves thus attacked, when as yet they had hardly discover'd their Intention to revolt. However, as Edred was in the midst of their Country, they were forced to submit and sue for Peace upon what Terms he pleas'd (7).

Sax. Ann.
Huntin. l. 5.

Edred chas-
ses the Danes.
S. Dunelm.

He punishes
the Danes.
Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.

After having chastiz'd the Danes, by fining some, and punishing others of the principal Authors of the Revolt, Edred advanced towards Scotland, to be revenged of the ungrateful Malcolm. But Malcolm seeing the Northumbrians subdued, and himself destitute of Assistance from that Quarter, concluded a Peace with Edred, paying him the Homage due to him.

This Expedition being ended, Edred returned into Wessex, imagining he had nothing more to fear from the North. But he was unacquainted with the Danes. He had scarce begun to enjoy some Repose, when they revolted again and recalled Anlaf. Their Measures were so just, and Anlaf's Expedition so great that he made himself master of the most considerable Places before Edred could draw his Army together. Whilst he was preparing to save Northumberland, Anlaf continued his Conquests and put his Affairs in such condition, that his Enemy saw no Possibility of recovering that Kingdom out of his hands. But the turbulent and tyrannical Temper of the new King would not suffer him to treat his Subjects more gently than formerly. In a little time so strong a Party was formed against him, that he was forced once more to retire to Ireland, and one Eric was placed on the Throne.

949.
Anlaf is recalled, and recovers Northum-
berland;
Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.

is driven out by his Subjects.

952.

Mean while, part of the Northumbrians still adhering to Anlaf, Northumberland was divided into two Factions, who endeavouring to destroy one another, gave Edred an Opportunity, he very well knew how to improve. He march'd his Army without loss of time into the North, whilst all was in confusion there, and before the Northumbrians had taken any Measures to resist him (8). At his Approach, Eric fled into Scotland, leaving his People to the Mercy of Edred, who threatn'd utterly to destroy their Country. Though they had no room to expect a second

Edred subdues North- umber-land, and reduces it to a Province.
Ann. Sax.

950.

S. Dunelm.

(1) He had it, upon condition of assisting Edmund in his Wars both by Sea and Land. Sax. Ann. Malm. p. 53. Huntingd. p. 355.

(2) In Memory of St. Augustin, who first preach'd the Gospel to the Anglo-Saxons. Malm.

(3) Now Puckle-Church, a small Village only, the Seat of the Deans's, whose Family have been eighteen times Sheriffs of that County. Camd.

(4) Malm. and Brompton say, that the rest of the Gueils being drunk, he was the only one that spied him, and flying upon him in a violent Passion, was stabb'd, p. 54. 858. But Hoved. Chron. de Maîtres, &c. say, that he received the Wound as he was endeavouring to rescue Len his Sewer out of Loth's Hands. Brompton relates, that, according to some, Loth escap'd during the Confusion and Hurry occasion'd by this tragical Action, p. 838.

(5) He was buried at Glaffenbury, where Dunstan was Abbot; and the Town where he was kill'd was bestow'd upon the same Monastery to sing Masses for his Soul.

(6) And crown'd at Kings-ten, by Odo Archbishop of Canterbury. S. Dunelm. p. 156. Hoved.

(7) Accordingly, Ann. 947. Wulfstan, Archbishop of York, and all the Northumbrian Archbishops swore fealty to him in a Town call'd Tadenclyff. S. Dunelm. p. 156. This Submission of theirs was brought about by means of Turketul, Chancellor to Edred, who was sent to reduce the Northumbrians to their Duty. See Inguib. p. 30.

(8) And destroy'd all the Rebels in a merciless manner. He wast'd the Country so that it remained uncultivated for many Miles a long while after. In this general Devastation, Rippon Monastery was burnt. Malm. p. 155. Inguib. p. 41. S. Dunelm. p. 156.

Pardon, after so notorious an Abuse of the first, yet as they had no Refuge left, they cast themselves upon Edred's Mercy, and amused him with the strongest Protestations and most solemn Oaths. As this Prince was naturally of a generous Disposition, he was moved with their submissive Behaviour, and replaced Eric on the Throne, satisfied with imposing a Tribute, and making him swear Allegiance, when he had, as he thought, allayed these Commotions, and he returned towards Wessex, marching in a careless manner, not mistrusting any Treachery from a People that had just received such sensible Marks of his Clemency. But the Danes, who had been rather compelled by his Arms than gained by his Mildness, laid hold of the present Opportunity to attack him with Advantage. They privately came together, and laying an ambush in his way, suddenly fell upon his Rear, and put them in extreme Disorder. Had it not been for the Valour, Conduct, and Resolution of the King, his Army had infallibly been cut in pieces; and it was not without great difficulty, that he escaped the present Danger. Enraged at their Perfidiousness, he returned to Northumberland, with a resolution to punish them without mercy. His Return caused an universal Conternment. They beheld him ready to take Vengeance on them for their breach of Faith, without being able to make the least Resistance. Their Ruin was unavoidable, if they offered to defend themselves. In this extremity, Submission was their only Refuge (1). But being very sensible Edred would not be imposed upon any more by general Protestations and Oaths, they humbly implored his Pardon upon what Terms he should please to enjoin them. And to convince him further of their Sincerity, they solemnly renounced their Allegiance to Eric, and put Amac, Son of Anlaff to death; charging them with being the principal Authors of their Treachery (2). Edred was appeased by these Submissions. However, to prevent the like Revolts, he secured all their Towns, and garrisoned them with English. After that, having entirely divested it of its Royalty, he reduced Northumberland to a Province, and made Earl Osluf, an Englishman, the first Governor. From thenceforward the Northumbrians, kept in awe by strong Garrisons and the English Earls or Governors, gave England no further Disturbance, till such time as the foreign Danes once more became masters of Northumberland, as we shall see hereafter.

After the Northumbrians were thus quelled, Edred lived in profound Peace. Absolute Lord of all England, and dreaded by the Kings of Scotland and Wales his Neighbours, he governed his Dominions in perfect Tranquillity. This great Calm was the Occasion of his turning his Thoughts entirely to religious Affairs, being guided by the Advice of Dunstan Abbot of Glassenbury, who had great Influence over him. The Abbot knew so well how to improve his Credit with the King, that he became master of his Confidence, and consequently of all State-Matters. When once a Prince suffers his Conscience to be governed by his Ghostly Father, he will find it very difficult to withhold from him the Management of his temporal Concerns, there being hardly any one thing but what may be made to relate to Religion in some respect or other. The Trust Edred placed in Dunstan was so great, that not content with being advis'd by him in all things, and making him Treasurer, he submitted sometimes even to received Discipline from his Hands. He was persuaded, this blind Submission to Dunstan was the readiest way to Heaven. To gratify this Favourite it was that he undertook the rebuilding of Glassenbury Church and Monastery, in a very sumptuous and magnificent manner. He laid out immense Sums upon this Work, without having the Satisfaction however to see it finished (3).

The Monks made use also of Dunstan their Protector's Interest, to get into the Ecclesiastical Benefices, which they could never have done without him. Though Dunstan's Proceedings in this affair raised the Clamours of the secular Clergy, he gave himself no trouble about them so long as he could obtain his Ends. However, his haughty manner of acting procured him many Enemies, who in the following Reign made him feel the Effects of their Hatred, which they had taken care to conceal during Edred's Life. If Dunstan favoured the Monks, they were no less zealous upon all Occasions to promote his Glory. They every where proclaimed that Dunstan was a great Saint, that Heaven daily wrought Miracles in his favour, and that he was frequently honoured with divine Revelations. In their account, neither the Saints of the first rank, nor the Apostles themselves, were Partakers of so many Graces as he. Though all they said of this Prelate was aggravated to the last degree, it failed not however to make impression on the Minds of the generality of the People, who were more easily confirmed in their Belief of what they were told; as they who knew better things, durst not contradict the Monks, for fear of incurring the Displeasure of the King and his Favourite.

Had Edred lived any time, Dunstan and the Monks would doubtless have carried all before them. But this Prince died when the Monks were but just beginning to creep into the Benefices. Those Historians who have made it their business to extol the Merits and Sanctity of Dunstan, tell us, that Edred's Death was revealed to him by a Voice from Heaven, as he was coming to see him. They add, his Horse fell down dead under him, at the prodigious Noise, the Voice made (4). But judicious Authors have taken care not to stuff their Writings with Tales of this Nature.

Edred reigned but ten Years (5). Elfrid and Bedfrid, his two Sons, whom he left very young, did not succeed him. His Nephew Edwy, Son of Edmund his elder Brother, was placed on the Throne after him. This Election, by the way, seems equally to favour those who are of Opinion, that in the Saxon times the Succession to the Crown depended entirely on the Suffrages of the Clergy and Nobility, and those who maintain it belonged of right to the next Heir. On one hand, we find Edred's Sons deprived by the great Men of the King their Father's Inheritance, and at the same time, the Crown given to the Son of the elder Brother, in prejudice of those of the younger.

We find in one of Edred's Charters, that he took the Title of Monarch of Albion; and in another, that he styled himself King of Great-Britain (6), in which he was followed by Edgar his Nephew. If these Charters were not forged, it may be inferred from thence, that Edred subdued Scotland. But this is no proper place to examine this matter, which has caused such warm Disputes between the English and Scots. However this be, the Title Edred and Edgar affected to use, was neglected by their Successors, till the time of James I, about the end of the sixteenth Century.

II. EDWY.

EDWY (7) came to the Crown at fourteen Years of age, with very different Notions of Dunstan from those of his Predecessor. Whether he was prepossessed by the Enemies of that Minister, or had some particular cause of Complaint against him, he was no sooner on the Throne, but he ordered him to give an account of the Sums the late King had entrusted him with. Dunstan replied, the Money that had passed thro' his Hands, having been laid out in pious Uses, he was not accountable for an administration solely relating to Religion. As he urged the building of Glassenbury, which the late King had so much at heart, Edwy's Council thought it not proper to push the affair any farther, lest the People should espouse the Abbot's Cause. The founding and repairing of Monasteries were at that time such sacred things, that there was no speaking against them, without being branded with the Name of impious and prophane. And therefore the King's Council finding there was no attacking Dunstan on that head, without running some risk, took another Course to undermine his Credit, which was

(1) They made him also very considerable Presents. Hoved. p. 413.

(2) Wulfstan, Archbishop of York, was taken into custody for abetting this Rebellion. But after he had been in Prison some time, Edred set him at Liberty in respect to his Character. However, he is said to take his Disgrace so to heart, that it occasioned his Death soon after. Malm. l. 2. Mat. West. l. 1. He was imprisoned for causing several of the Inhabitants of Thetford to be put to Death, in revenge for their having murdered Abbot Alwin, p. 189.

(3) He also rebuilt Greyland, and Abingdon Monasteries. Ingulph. p. 41. The last was founded by Ina, and had been destroyed by the Danes. Speed. p. 346. Heddingh. Vol. I. p. 188.

(4) Some think this was a Contrivance of Dunstan's, to keep the Treasure Edred had committed to his Trust. See Hollingsh. Vol. I. p. 158. Col. 2.

(5) He was buried in the old Minster at Winchester. S. Dunelm. His Bones, with those of other Kings, are preserved in a gilt Coffin fixed upon the Wall, in the south Side of the Quire. Speed. p. 346.

(6) Buchanan says, that by Great Britain is meant, that part of Britain lying on the South of Adrian's Wall, which the Britons inhabited.

(7) He was so extraordinary fair and comely, that he obtained the Surname of Pancalus, or, The Fair. Ethelwerd. l. 4. c. 8. He was crowned at Winton by Odo Archbishop of Canterbury. S. Dunelm. p. 157. Brompt. p. 86.

He makes
Eric swear Allegiance.

He is suddenly attacked by the Danes, and in great Danger.

He returns into Northumber-land.

The Danes
submit to his Mercy.
Huntingd.

Northum-
berland is made a Province.
S. Dunelm.
Ch. Mailbox.

Edred turns his Thoughts to Religious Affairs, Is guided by the Advice of Dunstan.
Malm.

Dunstan's
great Credit.

955.
EDWY.
Dunstan's
Disgrace.

955.
Edred's
Death.

Edwy his Nephew succeeds him.

Ingulph.
Dugdale's
Monast.
Vol. I.

Malm.

to reverse whatever had been done in favour of the Monks. Accordingly, the Monks were turned out of their Benefices, and the secular Priests put in their room. By this notable Proceeding, three things were intended: First, to mortify Dunstan, which it must do in a very sensible manner. Secondly, to lessen the People's Esteem for him, since the pulling down what he had set up, was a clear Evidence, the Court had no very great Opinion of his Sanctity. Besides, the restoring the Benefices to the secular Clergy, plainly intimated it was wrong to dispossess them. Lastly, as Dunstan and the Monks were in strict Union. Their Disgrace could not but reflect upon him. The Persecutions of the most cruel Tyrants against the Church, never extorted from the primitive Christians such bitter Invectives, as this pretended Persecution did from the Monks. As they represent the matter, Religion was never in so great danger. The most pernicious Heresies were nothing in comparison of what was then acted. The Monks of Malmesbury, who were the most concerned, made the greatest Noise of all, and for that reason were turned out of their Monastery, which was given to the secular Priests. William of Malmesbury upon this occasion says, that after it had been inhabited by Monks two hundred and seventy Years, it was made a Stable of Clerks (1) Whether Dunstan stirred up the Monks to make these Complaints, or the charging him with it was made a Pretence to punish him, he was banished the Kingdom. Some say he voluntarily went into Exile, without any previous Condemnation. However this be, he retired to a Monastery in Flanders (2), where he lived in expectation of being recalled by some favourable turn of Affairs.

Dunstan's Enemies gloried in his Disgrace. The King himself was highly delighted with being freed from a Man whom he hated, and who, in the former Reign, had shown him Marks of Disrespect. But he soon learnt how dangerous such kind of Enemies are. He found, by fatal Experience, there is no giving Offence to Ecclesiastics with Impunity, and to Saints least of all others. The Monks, enraged to the last degree for the Loss of their Benefices, cried down, to the utmost of their power, the Administration of the young King, whom they looked upon as the principal Author of their Disgrace. By their Lies and Calumnies which they every where spread, they at length persuaded their Votaries, he was the most impious of Men. The Consequence of which was, that great Numbers of Malecontents appeared in Mercia, of whom Edgar, the King's Brother, was declared Head and Protector. Perhaps he was made to believe, by the Suggestions of the Monks, that he would do God service in deposing his wicked Brother: Or rather he used that Pretence to mount the Throne, of which he had yet but a very distant Prospect. However this be, having secured Mercia, he went into Northumberland and East-Anglia, where he found the Danes ready to join him. They desired nothing more than to see the English involved in Trouble and Confusion. This Insurrection was the more surprising to Edwy, as he had never given his People, much less his Brother, any just Cause of Complaint. Besides, he never imagined the Monks could have Interest enough to raise so great Disturbances. However, it was but too true, and as he was taken unprepared, he was not in condition to extinguish the Flame already kindled. In this Extremity, not knowing how to recover what he had lost, he chose to reduce himself to the sole Kingdom of Wessex, which continued faithful to him, and deliver up all the rest.

In the mean time, the Rebels dreading to fall again under the Dominion of Edwy, came to a resolution of having a King of their own, whose Interest would oblige him to protect and defend them. But as they were a mixture of English and Danes, each Nation was desirous the Choice should fall on one of their Countrymen. The Danes, to attain their Ends, endeavoured to make it be believed, that the only way to be safe from Edwy's Attacks, was to call in the Assistance of Denmark. But in truth, their Aim was only to carry the Election. The English, on the contrary, perceiving their Intent, did all they could to hasten the Election, representing how fatal their present State of Anarchy might prove. But the more forward the English appeared to be, the more full of Delays were the Danes, who daily raised fresh Obstacles, in hopes there would be a Necessity at last of sending for Aid from Denmark. At length, after a year spent in Debates, Edwy making no Efforts for the Recovery of his Dominions, and consequently the Assistance of Denmark becoming unnecessary, Prince Edgar was chosen with the Title of King of Mercia, by which was meant all the Country lying North of the Thames, except the ancient Kingdom of Essex. To heighten the Merit of the new King, it was given out, that whilst the great Men were deliberating on the Choice of a King, a Voice was heard from Heaven, commanding them to elect Edgar. The Revelation was easily swallowed by the People, at a time when it was the general Opinion, that every the least remarkable Event was attended by some Miracle.

EDWY in Essex. EDGAR in Mercia.

THIS Partition of England lasted not long. The being deprived of the Kingdom of Mercia, and the seeing the Monks triumphing over his Misfortunes, sat so heavy upon Edwy's Mind, that he fell into an excess of Melancholy, which brought him to his Grave, after he had reigned four Years and some Months (3).

If we believe the Monkish Writers, Edwy was a very wicked Prince. Indeed, how was it possible for a King that did not please them, to be reckoned otherwise? However, when we examine all they say to blacken his Reputation, we find but One thing which can have any foundation, and which after all has very much the Air of a Fiction, or at least, is greatly aggravated. They say, he kept the Wife of one of his Courtiers for his Mistress, and on the very Day of the Coronation, whilst the great Men were debating the Affairs of the Kingdom, he abruptly withdrew to the Apartment of this Woman, from whence he was brought back by Dunstan, who alone had the Boldness to reprimand him for this infamous Action (4). From that time, if we may believe them, the King and his Mistress were so incensed against this holy Man, that they would have proceeded to the taking away his Life, had he not prevented their wicked Design by voluntary Exile. But to give still a more convincing Proof of the Dissoluteness of Edwy, and the Holiness of Dunstan, they have vented a Thing which plainly shows what Spirit they were of. They say, after Edwy's Death, his Soul being dragged into Hell by a Legion of Devils, one of them was dispatched with the good News to Dunstan. But far from rejoicing at it, the Saint prayed so intensely for the Soul that was going to be eternally miserable, that God, moved by his Zeal, snatched it from the Devils, and translated it into Paradise. This last Instance of the Animosity of the Monks against Edwy, renders their charge of Adultery very suspicious, especially if we consider he was not above fourteen Years of Age when he ascended the Throne. Moreover, there are Historians who assure us, this pretended Mistress was his lawful Wife (5). However this be, we may be certain Edwy might have had one or more Mistresses, without all that Clamour against him, had he been a Favourer of the Monks. For they were not at all offended at the Amours of his Brother Edgar, who was much more guilty than he in that respect. But the one was their Friend, and the other their Enemy. All Historians however have not been guilty of this Injustice to Edwy. Some have been more favourable to him, either passing over in silence these frivolous Accusations, or giving him the Commendation he deserved (6).

(1) Malmesburienſe Cœnobium plus quam 270 annis a Monachis habitatum Clericorum ſtabulum fecit. Malm. l. 2. c. 7.

(2) S. Dunelm. and Hoved. call it the Monastery of Blandinum, or Blandinum, p. 157, 425. Hallingsf. and Brompt. say, it was the Monastery of St. Amande at Gant. p. 863, 159.

(3) He was buried at Wincheſter, in the new Monastery. Hoved. p. 425.

(4) Some, to make the matter worſe, ſay, he kept not only the Daughter, whoſe Name was Elgyva, but the Mother too, and that he was on the Bed between them both when Dunſtan came to fetch him. M. W.

(5) Some ſay ſhe was his Wife, but too near a-kin, and therefore, that Osdo the Archbiſhop ſecending Dunſtan, put the King under the leſſer Excommunication, and branded Elgyva in the Forehead with a hot Iron, and then baniſhed her to Ireland. After her Return, his Heat againſt her continuing, he baniſhing'd her, ſays Malmſbury; but Osbern lays it upon the Revolters. Vit. Dunſt. l. 2. Hoved.

(6) Huntingdon, who was no Party in the Quarrel, gives him a handſome Character, and ſays, the Country flouriſhed under his Government, and ſeems to lament he liv'd no longer. Hunt. l. 5. p. 204.

12. EDGAR the Peaceable.

957.
Qualities of Edgar.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsb.

EDWY dying without Issue, his Brother Edgar succeeded him, and united the two Kingdoms that were lately divided. Though he was not above sixteen Years old, his great Genius and solid Judgment rendered him more capable of governing than many other Princes of a more advanced Age. It cannot be denied, there are some Men born with so good natural Parts, that their Judgment is ripe before the usual time. Edgar was one of this number. If he had given proof of his Ability in depriving his Brother of the half of his Kingdom, he continued to do the same when he came to reign alone. He knew how to make himself obeyed by his Subjects, and feared by his Enemies, two things that undoubtedly demonstrate the great Capacity of a crowned Head.

Sax. Ann.

The first thing Edgar did, after he was elected King of Mercia, was to recall Dunstan from Banishment, and promote him to the See of Worcester, then vacant (1). The Suddenness wherewith this Prelate was recalled, gives room to suspect, he was, though absent, concerned in the Insurrection that placed Edgar on the Throne of Mercia. His great Interest at Court during this Prince's Reign, strengthens this Suspicion.

Edgar's great Preparations procured him a constant
Peace.

The Reign of Edgar is chiefly remarkable for the continual Peace the Kingdom enjoyed; from whence he was surnamed the Peaceable. This uninterrupted Calm was owing neither to his Victories nor Slothfulness, but to his extraordinary Preparations for his Defence, in case he should ever be engaged in a War. By this means he became so formidable, that no one durst venture to attack him. He always kept a standing Army in the northern Provinces, as well for a Terror to the Kings of Scotland and Wales, as to keep in awe his own Subjects, particularly the Danes. This Precaution was so much the more necessary, as he was very sensible they were always ready to take advantage of any Troubles and Commotions in the State. His own Experience had taught him so much, since by their Assistance it was, that he triumphed over his Brother. On the other hand, to prevent the Invasions of the foreign Danes, who were no less to be feared, he took the most effectual Method. He is said to have fitted out, great and small, four thousand Ships. Some have even raised the number to four thousand eight hundred (2). It is probable, this thing has been very much magnified:—However, it shews at least the number of his Ships was extraordinary. This numerous Fleet, being distributed in all the Ports of the Kingdom, and cruising incessantly round the Island, made the Pyrates beware of making Descents, and suffered no Ship to come upon the Coast unexamined. These Precautions produced the Effect intended by Edgar. They prevented Invasions from abroad, and kept all quiet at home, by cutting off all hopes of foreign Assistance. With such an Army and Fleet, this Prince, without once drawing his Sword, obliged the Kings of Wales, Ireland, and the Isle of Man, to swear Allegiance to him, and acknowledge him for Sovereign. As a Proof of his Superiority over the Kings his Neighbours, the English Historians relate a very extraordinary Fact, which, if true, fully makes good what they assert. They tell us this Prince keeping his Court at Chester, and having a mind to go by Water to the Monastery of St. John Baptist, was rowed down the Dee in a Barge by eight Kings, himself sitting at the Helm (3).

His prodigious Fleet.
Flor. Wig.
Malmsb.
M. West.
Ethelred.
Rievall.
Hoved.

Sax. Ann.

Edgar's great
Fleet.
Angl.
Malmsb.
I. 2. c. 6.
S. Dunelm.
Brompt.
961.
H. Hist.
England
from H. Hist.
Brompt.

Edgar, not content with having secured England from all foreign Assaults, thought it necessary, for the further repose of his Subjects, to free them from two domestick Plagues, by which they were infested. The one was a horrible multitude of Wolves, which coming down in droves from the Mountains in Wales, made such a terrible Havock among their Flocks and Herds, that the Country was in a continual Alarm. Hitherto they could find no Remedy for this Evil: but Edgar bethought himself of an Expedient, which quickly cleared the Country of them. In the first place he converted the Tribute of Gold, Silver, and Cattle, paid him yearly by the Welsh, into three hundred Wolves-Heads. In the next place he published throughout all England, a general Pardon for all past Offences on condition each Criminal brought him by such a time a certain number of Wolves-Tongues, in proportion to his Crimes. Upon publishing this Act of Grace, the Wolves were hunted and destroyed in such a manner, that in three Years there was not one left in the Kingdom.

The other Plague that infested England was no less grievous, it was another sort of Wolves, who, not satisfied with eating up Flocks and Herds, devoured Houses and Families. I mean the Magistrates appointed in the Cities and Provinces to administer Justice to the People. These mercenary Judges, abusing the exorbitant Power Edgar's Predecessors had suffered them to usurp during the Wars, were become intolerable to the Nation. Without any regard to Law or Justice, they consulted only their own Interest. They who made them the largest Presents, were sure to be favoured; and though by that means the Poor were most oppressed, the Rich were not entirely screened from their partial Proceedings. Alfred the Great endeavoured, by an extraordinary Act of Severity, to put a stop to this Evil; but the ensuing Wars prevented his Successors from executing his Laws. Edgar, undertaking to reform this Abuse, set about it himself with great application. To this end he took a Progress every Year through some part of the Kingdom, on purpose to hear the Complaints that were made against those Judges who abused their Authority. He was not satisfied with inspecting himself into their Misdemeanors, but thought it farther necessary to redress them for the future, by making a Law, that every Judge convicted of giving Sentence contrary to the Laws, should be fined twenty six Shillings (4), if he did it ignorantly; but if knowingly, should be cashiered for ever. It cannot be denied, that in this he acted as became a great Prince, and that Subjects, who enjoy the double Privilege, of being guarded against Invasions from abroad, and Oppression at home, are perfectly happy. Such is the State of the English at this Day under the present Government.

Edgar's
Severity to corrupt Magistrates.
Malmsb.
S. Dunelm.

If Edgar was a Lover of Peace, it was not for want of Courage; That was never laid to his charge. There is a Story related of him, which, though it has the Air of a Fiction, proves at least, he was reckoned a courageous Prince. It is said, that being informed, Keneth III. King of Scotland had jested on the Littleness of his Stature, he sent for him to Court, and walking with him in a certain Place where he had ordered two Swords to be hid, he bid him take his Choice, telling him withal, he should see if he pleased, what a little Man could do. Keneth, as the Story goes, was so far from accepting the Challenge, that he threw himself at his feet and begged his Pardon. I observe this Relation is very improbable. In the first place, it is generally referred to the beginning of Edgar's Reign; whereas Keneth III. came not to the Crown of Scotland till five or six Years before that Prince's Death. In the second place, the Character the Scotch Historians give Keneth, will not suffer us to think him capable of such a piece of Cowardice. Lastly, this Adventure seems to have been confounded with one of the same nature, between a King of Scotland, and one of the Lords of his Court, related by Buchanan.

Ethelred
Rievall.
Lex. 8.
apud Brompt.

Proof of Edgar's being thought a courageous Prince.
Malmsb.
I. 2. c. 8.

Edgar's noble Qualities, and the Tranquillity England enjoyed during his Reign, render him, no doubt, very praise-worthy. But perhaps they would have been buried in eternal Oblivion, had not his extraordinary Attachment to the Monks engaged them to proclaim his Praises, even to an extravagant degree. His Bigotry to them, which pass'd then for the most sublime Virtue, was the principal reason of the Commendations given him by Historians, and of his being honoured with the Title of Saint after his Death. He is said to have founded forty Monasteries (5), and repaired and beautified many more, particularly that of Glasfenbury built by his Uncle Edred. In short, he was so very liberal to the Monks, that it was hardly in his power to do more for them than he did. Ingulphus, in his History of the Abby of Croyland (6) says, that in the Reign of Edgar, the Treasure of that Monastery amounted to ten

Edgar's Attachment to the Monks contributed to his great Fame.
Malmsb.
Ingulph.
S. Dunelm.

(1) A great Council being held at Bradford in Wiltshire, Dunstan was, by the general Consent of all there present, chosen Bishop. Vit. Dunstan.
(2) S. Dunstan and Gen. Malmsb. have three Thousand six Hundred, p. 150, 160. W. Thorn says, the whole number was but three Hundred, which is most probable. See also p. 33. To maintain the Charge of this Fleet, besides the Contributions of his Subjects, he enter'd into a Treaty at Chester with six Kings, who engag'd to assist him both by Sea and Land. Sax. Ann. With this Fleet he used to sail round England every Year after Epiph. Flor. Wig. p. 600.
(3) These might be the Kings of the several Kingdoms in Wales, of Anglesey, Man and Ireland. Some reckon among them Keneth III. of Scotland, who was vassal to Edgar for Cumberland. Hoved. Rapin. There was no such Man as Keneth cotemporary with Edgar. See Andreas's Tables. These eight Kings were Malcolm, King of Cumberland; Mackus, Lord of the Isles; and these six Welsh Princes, Deifnal, Syffert, Hawel, Jago, Indell, Jocast. S. Dunelm. p. 159. Malmsb. p. 56. Brompt. Isid. p. 8, 9.
(4) H. Hist. Law 1. y. 1. hundred and twenty. See in Brompt. Lex. 8. And in Wilkins.
(5) Above forty eight. Ingulph. p. 4.
(6) He says that in 944, in Edgar's Reign, one Swanling a Monk of Croyland died in the hundred and sixty second Year of his Age, another in the hundred and fiftieth, which is the more remarkable, because that Abby was situated in a fenney and watery place in Lincolnshire. p. 51.

thousand Pounds, besides Holy-Vessels, Shrines, Relicks, and the like. This was a very great Sum, considering that House had been rebuilt but thirty Years. Hence may be gueſs'd the immense Riches of the Monasteries in those Days.

Edgar, not content with being thus liberal to the Monks, undertook to put them in possession again of the Ecclesiastical Benefices, which he performed with a high hand. Dunstan, whom he had made Archbishop of Canterbury, was the principal Author of this Project. This Prelate was so much in his Favour, that Edred's Affection to him was nothing in comparison of Edgar's. As he made a very considerable Figure both in this and the following Reign, it will not be improper to take a nearer View of him. Besides he pass'd for a Saint of the first Class, and nothing can be added to the Praises bestowed on him by Historians.

Dunstan, Son of Herstan, and Nephew of Athelm Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Glaſſenbury in 925. He spent his youthful Years with his Uncle the Archbishop, who took care to have him instructed in all the Sciences, as far as that Age of Ignorance would permit. He excelled particularly in Musick, Painting, and Engraving, in which he took great delight all his Life. As soon as he had finished his Studies, the Archbishop recommended him to King Athelstan, who sent for him to Court, but however gave him no Preferment. The Author of his Life (1) pretends, the Courtiers envying his Virtue and Learning, maliciously represented him to the King as a dissolute and scandalous Liver: Which the King believing, forbid him the Court, without examining the Truth. Some time after the Archbishop finding means to undeceive the King, Dunstan was restored to Favour, and presented with some Lands near Glaſſenbury. Here he spent several Years in Retirement, with certain devout Men, whom he had drawn thither, living with them a sort of monastick Life. Glaſton or Glaſſenbury was antiently a small Church, founded, according to the vulgar Opinion, by Joseph of Arimathea, as hath been observed elsewhere. This Church having been destroyed, Devy Bishop of St. David's built another in the same Place. This being also gone to ruin, was repaired by twelve Devout Persons, who coming from Armorica, settled in this Place. Ina King of Wessex, having pulled it down to the ground, raised a stately Church, and dedicated it to Christ, St. Peter and St. Paul. Several Persons famous for their Piety, most of them Irish, retired to this Church, where they were maintained by Edgar's Bounty. From that time there were always Devout Persons, who made choice of this Place for their Retreat (2).

After Dunstan had been some time at Glaſſenbury, Edmund, Successor of Athelstan, having conceived an Esteem for him, built there a Monastery (3), and made him Abbot. As Dunstan was a Person of great Address, he knew how to manage this Prince so dexterously, that he was very much in Favour all his Reign. His Interest at Court still encreased under Edred, to whom he was Prime Minister, Favourite and Father Confessor. Dunstan's extreme fondness for a monastick Life, made him use, without any caution, all his Interest to restore the Monks to the Benefices and eject the Secular Priests, whom he heartily despised and at length mortally hated. This Attachment to the Monks, added to his haughty carriage, procured him abundance of Enemies, and drew upon him the Displeasure of Edwy, Successor of Edmund, as we have seen. The haste Edgar was in to recall this Abbot from Flanders, is a clear Evidence, he was indebted to him for the Crown of Mercia. Upon Dunstan's return to England, Edgar promoted him to the See of Worcester. Some time after, the Bishoprick of London being vacant, he was entrusted with the Management of it. This has led some Writers into the Mistake, of imagining he was Bishop of Worcester and London at the same time. Edgar never ceased to give him fresh marks of his Esteem; and his high conceit of him was the more confirmed by the Miracles attributed to him. The Monks took all imaginable care to spread the Fame of these Miracles every where, and were so very particular in their Circumstances, that one must have been much freer from Prejudice than they generally were in those Days, not to have believed them. It is however very unlikely, that Edgar himself, who was not of the number of those weak People that suffer themselves to be so easily deceived, was thoroughly convinced of the Truth of all those Miracles. But perhaps he was of opinion, those Pious Frauds were no detriment to Religion. Be this as it will, he had a very great opinion of Dunstan's Sanctity. After Athelm's Death, Odo, by Birth a Dane, was made Archbishop of Canterbury, but lived not long after his Installation. To him succeeded Elfin, who died as he was going to Rome for his Pall (4). This happening in the beginning of Edgar's Reign, Brithelm Bishop of Bath was elected to the vacant See. But Edgar being desirous of having Dunstan Archbishop, called a general Council, where he represented Brithelm as unqualified for so great a Post; whereupon he was ordered to return to his old Dioceſe, and Dunstan was chosen in his room. This Election not being exactly Canonical, it was thought fit Dunstan should go to Rome, on pretence of receiving his Pall, that he might at the same time justify these Proceedings. The Pope, who was not ignorant how great a Sway Dunstan bore at the Court of England, and with what Zeal he had espoused the Interest of the Church of Rome and the Monks, readily confirmed his Election, constituting him moreover his Legate for England, with a very extensive Authority. At his Return, Oswald his Relation was through his means made Bishop of Worcester, and Ethelwald his intimate Friend, of Winchester. These three Prelates, by holding together intirely governed the Church during this Reign. Edgar committing to them the Management of all Ecclesiastical Affairs, was not contented with granting whatever they desired, but even took a pleasure in doing them Favours, unasked.

As soon as Dunstan saw his Credit firmly established, he returned to his grand Project in favour of the Monks, which he had been forced to lay aside during the Reign of Edwy. This Affair was not without its Difficulties. The great Men of the Nation look'd upon it as a Misfortune, that the guidance of the Churches should be wrested out of the Hands of the antient and lawful Governors. They were still less pleased with its being committed to the Monks, who, by the Rules of their Order, and according to the Custom hitherto observed, were excluded from the Pastoral Functions, in order to employ themselves wholly in Prayer within the Walls of their Monasteries. Besides, they were of opinion, that instead of encouraging and enriching the Monks, it would be much better to put a stop to the People's Zeal, who were perpetually bequeathing to them considerable Legacies, whereby Estates were passed away in Mortmain, to the great Prejudice of the Nation. It was easy therefore to see this Project would meet with great Opposition from the Nobles. But on the other hand, the People, who did not look so far before them, were intirely in the Interest of the Monks, and extremely offended at the scandalous Lives of the Secular Clergy, who applied the Revenues of the Church to uses directly contrary to the intent of the Donors (5). It must be confessed, the Clergy, at that time were very ill Livers, and that Pride, Avarice, Gluttony, Drunkenness, Luxury, openly reigned among them. Dunstan and his Party did all that lay in their power to expose these Irregularities, in order to irritate the People against their Pastors. They succeeded so well in their Design, that Multitudes espoused the Cause of the Monks, purely out of contempt of the Secular Clergy. But what did the Monks most Service, was the King's being so vigorous a Champion for them. His good Opinion of them was still increased by comparing them with the Seculars, who indeed observed no Measures in their Excesses. And therefore this Prince thought to do the Church signal service in putting it under the Government of the Monks, whom he looked upon as so many Saints. Edgar being thus inclined, Dunstan found no Difficulty to persuade him to countenance a Reformation he believed so advantageous to the Church. To give the finishing stroke to this Work, he caused a Council to be assembled, in hopes their Authority, together with the King's, would surmount all Obstacles. Edgar was pleased to assist in Person at this Council, and made a Speech, which plainly showed how greatly he was prejudiced in his favour. As this Harangue manifestly discovers the Disposition of the King, of Dunstan, and of the other Directors of the Affairs of the Church, with regard to the Secular Clergy, it

(1) Osborn.

(2) They are said to teach here the Liberal Sciences, Musick, Engraving, and the like.

(3) Mr Camden says Dunstan introduc'd into this Monastery a new Order of Monks, viz. Benedictines, who by the Bounty of Princes got so much Wealth as exceeded that of Kings. After they had as it were reign'd here for above six hundred Years (for all their Neighbours were at their Beck) they were driven out by Henry VIII, and the Monastery, which was environ'd with a Wall of a Mile in compass, and replenish'd with stately Buildings, was by Degrees entirely demolish'd. In his time there was a Wall-nut Tree in the Church-yard (but it is now gone, and a young one in its Place) that was said never to bud before Barnabas Day 11 of June and always to shoot out its Leaves on that very Day. And also a Haw-Thorn-Tree in Wigorn Park bred by that budded on Christmas Day as if it were in May. This Tree has been cut down many Years; but there are some still growing in the County from Branches of the old Tree, particularly one in the Garden of William Street Esq; Possessor of the Ground where the other stood, and another in the Garden of the White-Hart Inn in Glaſſenbury. These Things seem to be Relicks of an old Monks.

(4) He was frozen to Death on the Alps, which the Monkish Historians interpret as a Judgment for his Disrespect to Odo's Grave. Maimsb. l. 1. de Gift. Port. Angl. Others for his Simony. M. Welf.

(5) It must be observed, that after the dissolving of the Abbeys in Alfred's Time, the Secular Clergy repair'd some of the Monasteries, took Possession of them, were incorporated under certain Regulations, perform'd Divine Service in their respective Churches, liv'd single or married as they thought fit, and stood in the same Condition with our present Prebendaries.

will not perhaps be amiss to give the Reader the whole of it; and the rather, as it relates to one of the principal Events of this Reign.

Edgar's
Harangue to the Council
Ethelred,
Rievallensis,
p. 360.

" Almighty God having vouchsafed of his infinite " Mercy to shew his Goodness to us in a remarkable " manner, 'tis most reasonable, Reverend Fathers, we " should exert our Endeavours to make a suitable Re" turn. That we are in possession of this plentiful " Country is not owing to any Strength of our own,
" but to the help of his all-powerful Arm, who has " been pleased to manifest his Loving-kindness towards " us. 'Tis but just therefore we should bring our selves,
" our Souls, and Bodies, in Subjection to him, who has " subdued all things for us, and should take care that " all that are under us should be obedient to his Laws.
" It is my Office, Reverend Fathers, to administer
" Justice without respect of Persons; suppress the Re" bellious; to punish the sacrilegious; to protect the " Poor and Weak from the hand of the Oppressor.
" It is my Business also to take care that the Church
" and her Ministers, the holy Fraternities of the Reli" gious, have all things necessary to their Subsistence and " well being. But it is your Duty to examine into " the Life and Conversation of the Clergy. To you it " belongs to see that they live agreeably to their Pro" fession: That they are sober, temperate, chaste, hos" pitable to the Poor and the Stranger: That they are " careful in the Administration of their Office, constant " in their Instructions to the People. In a word, that " they are worthy of the glorious Character of the Mi" nisters of Jesus Christ. With submission be it spoken, " Reverend Fathers, had you taken due care of these " things, I should not have had the Dissatisfaction of " hearing from all hands the enormous Crimes daily " committed by the Clergy of this Land. I insist not " on the Smallness of their Tonsure, contrary to the " Canons of the Church, or their Effeminacy in their " Habits, or their Haughtiness in their Gestures, on their " immodest Discourses, which plainly shew all is not right " within. I omit their Negligence with regard to Di" vine Service: Hardly will they vouchsafe their Com" pany at the publick Prayers, and when they come to " Church to celebrate the Holy Mysteries, one would think " they are going to act à Play. But the chief Subject of " my Complaint, I speak it with extreme Regret, is what " ministers occasion of Grief to the Good, and of Joy to " the Prophane, I mean the lewd and scandalous Lives of " the Clergy. They spend their Days in Diversions, En" tertainments, Drunkenness and Debauchery. Their " Habits may be said to be so many Sinks of Lewdness, " Perils of Sin, and Obstacles of Libertines. There
" they have Gaming, Dancing and obscene Singing. There
" they pass the Night in Rioting and Drunkenness. 'Tis
" thus, Reverend Fathers, 'tis thus the Bounty of my Pre" decessors to the Church, and their Charities for the " Maintenance of the Poor, and what is more the ador" able Blood of our Saviour, are consumed. Was it for " this that our Ancestors exhausted their Treasures? Was " it for this they were so liberal of their Estates? Was it " to deck the Concubines of their Priests, to provide for " them splendid Entertainments, to furnish them with " Dogs and Hawks, that our Forefathers display'd their " Munificence to the Church? these are the Crimes
" which the People complain of in private, and the Sol" diers in publick; which are sung in the Streets, and " acted on the Stage; and yet they are forgiven, they are " overlook'd, they are conniv'd at by you! Where is " now the Sword of Levi, and the Zeal of Simeon?
" Where is the wrath of Moses against the Worshipers of " the Golden Calf? Where is the Indignation of St. Peter
" against Simon the Magician? Imitate, Reverend Fa" thers, imitate the Zeal of these holy Persons, and fol" low the way of Righteousness, shewn you by the " Lord. It is high time for you to draw the Sword of " St. Peter, whilst I make use of the great Constantine's.
" Let us join our Forces to expel the Lepers out of the " Temple, to cleanse the Sanctuary and to cause the " Lord to be served by the true Sons of Levi, who said " to his Father, and to his Mother, I know you not, and " to his Brethren, I know not who you are? Let the Dis" respect to the Relicks of the Saints, and the daily Pro-" phaning of the holy Altars, rouse you up. Be moved
" at the great Abuse of the Piety of our Forefathers. One " of my Ancestors, you all know, dedicated to the " Church the Tithes of the Kingdom: The glorious Al" fred, my great Grandfather, laid out his Revenues in " religious Uses. You are not ignorant of the great Be" nefactions of my Father and Uncle, which it would be " highly dishonourable so soon to forget, seeing the Al" tars are still adorned with them. You, O Dunstan, " Father of Fathers, raise your Imagination a little I pray

" you, and fancy you behold my Father looking down
" from Heaven, and expostulating with you in this Man" ner: It was you that advised me to the Building of so many " Churches and Monasteries, It was you I made Choice of
" for my spiritual Guide, and the Inspector of my Beha" viour. Did not I always obey your Advice? Did I not " always prefer your Advice before Wealth? How frankly " did I lay out my Treasures, when you said the Word?
" My Charities were always ready when you called for them.
" Whatever was desired for the Churches was immediately
" granted. If you complained the Monks were short in their " Conveniences, they were forthwith supplied. You used to " tell me, such Liberalities brought forth immortal Fruit, " and were highly meritorious, since they were expended in " supporting the Servants of God, and maintaining the Poor.
" And is it not an intolerable Shame they should be laid out " in adorning and decking a Pack of Prostitutes? Are these " the Fruits of my Benefactions? Are these the Effects of " your glorious Promises? These, O Dunstan, are the " Complaints of the King my Father. What can you an" swer to this Charge? I am convinced that you have " hitherto been unblameable, when you saw a Thief you
" consented not to him, neither have you been partaker with " the Adulterer. No, you have endeavoured to cor" rect these Abuses. You have argued, exhorted, threat-" ned. But since these means have proved in vain, 'tis " time to apply more effectual Remedies. You have here " ready to assist you the Reverend Father Ethelwold Bishop " of Winchester, and the venerable Oswald Bishop of Wor" cester. To you three I refer the Management of this " important Affair. Exert the Episcopal in Conjunction " with the Regal Authority, to expel from the Church of " God the disorderly Clergy, and put in such as live regu" larly in their Room (1).

After the King had made so full a Declaration of his Mind, the Friends of the Seculars durst no longer oppose Dunstan's Designs, perceiving it would be to no purpose.
Shortly after, the secular Priests were expelled from the Monasteries, and the Regulars put in their place. Ethel- wold Bishop of Winchester leading the way in his Diocese, was quickly followed by Dunstan and Oswald, and all the other Bishops, who being Monks, without much solicitation, imitated these three Prelates. The antient Historians, for the most part, represent those Days as the Golden Age, and as the happiest England ever knew.

Perhaps it will seem strange that the secular Clergy should at this time be more bitterly inveighed against than in the following Centuries, when the Lives of the Priests were no less scandalous. To account for this, it must be observed, the Popes had for some time prohibited the Clergy from marrying, and were very severe to all who refused to comply with their Decrees. This Prohibition, which at present is a fundamental Article in the Church of Rome, met at first with great Opposition, especially in England, which set the Popes upon using all means to bring the English Priests to a Compliance. Dunstan's Interest, and his Address to ingage Edgar in the Project, were mighty Helps to them. We must therefore carry in our Minds this Prohibition against the Clergy's marrying, in order to comprehend the Occasion of the Complaints of the Monks and their Favourers against the Seculars, and to judge how far they are to be credited. Though it is but too true, the Priests at that time led very disorderly Lives, yet that was not the thing that drew this Storm upon them. It was their Marriage which gave the Offence, and which their Enemies would fain have to be thought a more heinous Crime than Concubinage, or any other they could lay to their Charge. Their Wives were always called Concubines, or by a more opprobrious Name. But notwithstanding all the Endeavours of the Court of Rome, this pretended Abuse could not be reformed till the End of the twelfth Century, when the Celibacy of the Clergy was established after a three hundred Years Struggle.

The Monks were bound in Gratitude to make a suitable Return for the service Edgar had done them. Accordingly, the Monkish Historians have endeavoured by their excessive Commendations, to make him pass for a real Saint. But whether for want of Attention, or some other reason, they have related some Particulars of his Life, which beget not that Idea they intended to give of him. Indeed, to consider only his Political Actions, it must be confessed, he was a great Prince. But a great King and a great Saint, are two very different Characters. For instance, it is dif-

964.
Ann. Sax.
Malmbs.
1. 2. c. 8.
S. Dunelm.

Remarks on the Invectives against the secular Clergy.

Deut. xxxvi.
9.

(1) Collier observes this Speech is raised and polished in the Original above poet's Figures might have worked the Matter ne found into a brighter Form,
1. 3. p. 190.

ficult to justify, by the Rules of the Gospel, a bloody Execution (1) done by Edgar's Order in the Isle of Thanet, upon a very slight Occasion, as Historians do allow. What might not these same Historians have said of his unruly Lust, and vicious Inclination to Women (2), of which I am now going to give a few Instances, who publish'd to the World that the Soul of his Brother Edwy was about to be dragged into Hell, for having had but a single Mistress?

It was easy to see if Edgar had not purchased the good Opinion of the Monks by his excessive Complaisance, they would have given him no better Quarter than his Predecessor, who was much less faulty in that respect.

To conclude the Reign of Edgar, which was disturbed neither by foreign nor domestick Wars, it remains only that I give an account of his Amours, which are something uncommon, and shew his good Qualities were not without a great mixture of Failings. His first Mistress was a Nun (3), whom he took by Force out of a Convent, and could not be prevail'd with to set back again by the Solicitations of Dunstan. He had a Daughter by her nam'd Editha, who was greatly celebrated for her Sanctity. It is true, he aton'd for his Crime by not wearing his Crown during the space of seven Years. A severe Penance indeed for a fault his Confessor ought to have looked upon as a Sacrilege! But this is not the first time the Sins of Princes have been extenuated, and the rigour of their Penance magnified. His second Mistress, whom some however call his lawful Wife, was Elfreda firman'd the Fair, from her Complexion. By her he had a Son call'd Edward, who succeeded him. An extraordinary Adventure gain'd him a third Mistress. Going one day by Andover, he took up his lodging at a Lord's House, who had a very beautiful Daughter, with whom he fell passionately in love at first Sight. As he was very violent in his Passions, he resolv'd to gratify his Love without delay, so commanded the young Lady to be brought to his bed, without troubling himself to obtain her Consent. The Mother of the Lady being utterly against her Daughter's being the King's Concubine; but withal, dreading by her Denial, to draw down his Displeasure upon herself and Family, devis'd this Expedient. She prevail'd upon one of her waiting Women to lie with the King instead of her Daughter. At break of Day the King perceiving his Bedfellow was going to rise, would not let her, by which means she was forc'd to discover the Cheat. He was at first very angry at being thus deceiv'd. But the good-liking he had taken to the Girl, moderating his Anger, and giving him time to reflect on the Dishonour he intended his Host, he readily forgave the Trick he had been serv'd. He kept this Girl as his Mistress till he married.

As all Edgar's Amours, it seems, were to have something particular in them, so his very Marriage was not to be in the common way. He was informed that Ordang, Earl of Devonshire, had a Daughter the greatest Beauty in England, upon which he resolv'd to marry her, if she answered the description given of her. However, as he was unwilling to make any advances he might have reason to repent of, he communicated his Design to Earl Ethelwold his Favourite, and ordered him to go upon some pretence, and see whether the Lady's Beauty was as great as Fame reported. Ethelwold being arrived at the Earl of Devonshire's, had no sooner cast his Eyes on Elfrida his Daughter, but he fell desperately in love with her. His Passion was so sudden and violent, that forgetting all the King his Master's Favours, he demanded Elfrida for himself. His Suit being granted, he was married as privately as possible, making his Father-in-Law believe he had important reasons for not divulging his Marriage. Returning soon after to Court, he told the King there was nothing extraordinary in Elfrida; that he was amazed the World should talk so much of her Charms; that probably, the Fame of her Beauty was owing more to her Father's riches than any thing else. This report, which was far from inflaming the King's Love, had the Effect Ethelwold expected. Edgar, growing out of conceit with the Match, laid aside all thoughts of it. Ethelwold perceiving the King was grown perfectly cool upon the matter, represented to him one day, that though the Fortune of the Earl of Devonshire's Daughter was nothing to a King, yet it would be the making of a Subject; and therefore humbly desired his Leave to make his addresses to her, as being the greatest Heiress in the Kingdom. Edgar who had lost all Inclination to Elfrida, very willingly granted his Favourite's request, and even appeared extremely well pleased that he was likely to marry to so great an advantage. Ethelwold, as soon as he had obtain'd the King's consent, return'd to his Wife, and publickly solemniz'd his Wedding. But fearing his Spouse should appear too beautiful in the King's eyes, he kept her on some pretence at his Country Seat, without suffering her to come to Court.

How cautious soever Ethelwold had been, it was not possible his Treachery should be long a Secret. Favourites are seldom without private Enemies, who desire nothing more than to have an opportunity of ruining them. Edgar at length was informed of the Truth; but doubting his Repentment, he was willing, before he shew'd it, to be satisfied with his own eyes of the Truth of what had been told him. To that end, he took occasion to go into those Parts where Ethelwold kept his Wife, and when he came near the place, told him he had a mind to visit his Lady, of whom he had formerly heard so many fine things. Ethelwold was thunder-struck at this, and did all he could to divert the King from his purpose; but his Artifices were all in vain, and served only to confirm the King the more in his Resolution. All he could obtain, was Leave to go before, on pretence of preparing for the King's reception. As soon as he came home, he threw himself at his Lady's feet, and confessing what he had done for the sake of possessing her, conjur'd her to use all her endeavours to conceal her Charms from the amorous King. Elfrida promised him whatever he desired, but was bent however to break her Word. No sooner was he gone to meet the King, but she set off her natural Beauty with all the Art she was mistress of. The event answered her expectation. The moment Edgar cast his eyes on her, he fell desperately in love, and from that instant was resolv'd to make her his own. The better to effect his design, he pretended to see nothing extraordinary in Elfrida's Beauty; at which the Husband was overjoyed. Accordingly he took his Leave of her with a seeming indifference, but at the same time in his Heart rag'd Love and Revenge; which of all the Passions raise the most violent emotions in the Soul of Man. Quickly after, he ordered Ethelwold to go for Northumberland, on pretence of some urgent Affairs. But the unfortunate Earl never performed his Journey. He was found dead in a Wood, where he was thought at first to be murdered by Robbers. But people's Eyes were soon opened, when they saw that the King, instead of making inquiry after the Murderers, married the Widow. Some say, that Edgar slew Ethelwold with his own hand at a hunting Match (4).

After what has been said, it is easy to see, there was a great mixture of good and bad Qualities in this Prince, and that the Commendations given him, are in many respects carried too far. This was the effect of the Prejudice of the Monks in his favour, for his so vigorous espousing their Cause. This Prejudice was so great that one of them makes no scruple to say, Edgar was to the English, what Romulus was to the Romans, Cyrus to the Persians, Alexander to the Macedonians, Arfaces to the Parthians, and Charlemain to the French. But one plainly perceives, this Encomium raises his Character too high, since he came infinitely short of the great Men he is compared with. Accordingly, After-Ages less prepossessed in his favour, have ranked him among more suitable Company, in a much lower class. Very judicious Historians have taken him from among the Saints, where his Flatterers placed him, and have not scrupled to rank him in the number of the vilest of Princes (5). This Notion of him may be grounded on what is related of Canutus the Great, who upon mention of the Sanctity of Editha, Edgar's Daughter, said, He could never believe it possible for the Daughter of so wicked a Father to be a Saint. This leaves room to suspect, the Monkish Historians have passed over in silence several of Edgar's Actions, which would have made us conceive a very different Idea of their Hero, from what they have given us.

Edgar reigned sixteen Years from the death of his Brother Edwy. He died in 975, in the thirty second Year of his Age, leaving two Sons and a Daughter. Edward, his eldest Son, was born of a Concubine, or at least of a very doubt-

(1) Edgar in the Saxon Annals, Anno 969, is said to have ordered all Thanet to be laid waste. Brompton says, it was for insulting his Laws. M. Welfin affirms, it was for seeing and plundering some Nick Men that touched upon the Island.

(2) Malmibury owns, that he was reported to have been Lascivious and Cruel, p. 59.

(3) Wulfilda.

(4) Malmibury says, he took Ethelwold into a Wood (Harwood Forest) upon pretence of Hunting, and killed him there with his Lance. The natural Son of this Nobleman, happening to come in at this Accident, and viewing the dead Body of his Father, the King sternly asked him, How behav'd the Game? The Youth reply'd calmly, that what he pleas'd the King, ought not to be displeasing to him. This courtly Answer, on to moving an Occasion, surpris'd the King, and gave him a strong Affection for the young Man ever after. Elfrida built a Nunnery in the place where her Husband was slain. Malmib. 2. de Gest. Reg. Angl.

(5) Dr. Burnet in his Preface to the History of the Reformation, places Edgar in the same Class with Brunchild and Irene. Rapin.

Edgar's
Character.

S. Dunelm.
Brompt.

Brompt.
p. 969.

975.
Edgar's
Wife and Children.

ful Marriage, Ethelred, his youngest, was the Son of the beautiful Elfrida. Editba his Daughter by his first Mistress passed her days in a Nunnery, and after her Death was honour'd with the Title of Saint (1).

Edgar had too well deserved of Them, who looked upon themselves as authorized to reward their Votaries with a Sainthood, not to have a place in the Calendar. But as there are no other Proofs of his Sanctity during his Life, but his Affection to the Monks, and his founding Monasteries (2), it is pretended, he gave more substantial ones after his Death. It was reported, when his Body was taken out of the Coffin, to be put into a stately Shrine, it was as fresh as when he resign'd his last Breath. It was further affirmed, that the Shrine being made too short, tho' he was very little of Stature (3), and some Body daring to sever his Head from his Body, the Blood gush'd out in great abundance. After such convincing Proofs as these of the Sanctity of this Prince, his Body was placed near the High Altar of Glassenbury Church, where it was said to work afterwards several Miracles.

13. EDWARD II. the Martyr.

Disensions on account of the Monks.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.
l. 2. c. 6.
Hunt. i. 1.
S. Dunelm.

UPON Edgar's Decease, they who had with impatience born the great Power of the Monks, thought it a fair Opportunity to reduce them to their primitive state. Elfer, Duke of Mercia, their sworn Enemy, (4), turn'd them out of all the Benefices they possess'd in that Province, and replac'd the Seculars in their room. Some other Lords did the like in other places. But the Duke of East-Anglia (5), and several other great Men, firmly adher'd to Dunstan and his Party. This diversity of opinion, on account of the Monks, caus'd such Heart-burnings among the Nobles, that they were upon the point of coming to Blows. The Breach still grew wider, when they came to chuse a Successor to the deceas'd King. That Prince had left two Sons who had both their Adherents, though their Age would not permit them to prosecute their respective Titles to the Crown. Many believ'd it was devolv'd to Ethelred, pretending there was a Flaw in Edward's Birth, and that his Mother was never lawfully married to Edgar. But Dunstan and all the Bishops were for Edward, pleading his being nam'd his Successor by Edgar in his last Will and Testament. To this was added another and no less powerful Motive to them that espoused his Interest, namely, their Expectation of governing the Kingdom under this young Prince, which they could not hope for, if they plac'd his Brother on the Throne, because his Mother Elfrida did not seem much inclined to be guided by their Counsels.

In the mean time Ethelred's Party being most numerous, Edward was in danger of being excluded, if Dunstan his Supporter did not find means to break their Measures. As he saw himself favour'd by the People from their high Conceit of his Sanctity, he made use of their Inclination to execute his Designs. In the midst of the publick Debates which of the two Princes should succeed, Dunstan suddenly rising up, and taking Prince Edward by the hand, leads him towards the Church, attended by the other Bishops and a great crowd of People. As soon as he comes there, he anoints the young Prince King, without regarding the Opposition of the contrary Party. The Nobles bemoan'd their falling once more under the Government of that imperious Prelate. But as they saw the People ready to support him, they were forced to submit.

Edward was but fourteen Years old when he began to reign under the Guardianship of Dunstan, who immediately took all the Power into his hands. As soon as he was fix'd in the Regency, he us'd all possible Endeavours to keep the Monks in possession of the Benefices, they had acquir'd in the last Reign, and made use of the King's Authority to that end. But he met with greater opposition than he imagin'd. As the King was but a Minor, the Orders given in his name were not so readily complied with. Dunstan assembled several Councils about this Affair (6). But perhaps his Endeavours would have all prov'd ineffectual, if by means of several Miracles, which were never wanting upon occasion, he had not brought the People to believe that Heaven interpos'd in the Affair.

In one of these Councils held at Winchester, the majority being against the Monks, they would have infallibly lost their Cause, if, on a sudden, a Crucifix that hung aloft in the Room had not pronounc'd these Words with an audible Voice; It shan't be done, it shan't be done: You have decided the Matter well hitherto, and would be to blame to change. Astonish'd at this Oracle, the most obstinate came in and voted for the Monks.

Another time at an Assembly in the same place, Dunstan us'd all his Endeavours to have one Elphegus a Monk chosen Dean of that Church; but the People were for having that Dignity conferr'd on a secular Priest. The Contest ran so high, that there was like to be a Sedition which might have been of dangerous consequence. But St. Andrew the Apostle on a sudden revealing to St. Dunstan in the audience of all the People, that the Monk ought to be elected, he was immediately install'd. These and several other Miracles, too many to be inserted here, not being however sufficient to unite all Men in favour of the Monks, there was one at last that stopp'd the Mouths of their most strenuous Opposers.

Dunstan had called a Council at Calne in Wiltshire, to decree that the Monks should keep possession of their Benefices. This was one of those mixt Councils spoken of hereafter, where the King and all the Nobility were present, as well as the Bishops and Abbots. Probably the Affair would have been decided against the Monks, considering the great number of their Opposers in this Assembly. But whilst they were warmly disputing on both sides, the floor of the Room happened to break under the Company, and crush'd several to Death. The Beam on which Dunstan's Chair was plac'd, was the only one that did not give way, so that he came off unhurt (7), whilst scarce a Man besides himself in this numerous Assembly escap'd being either kill'd or bruist. This was sufficient to convince the People, the Monks were the Favourites of Heaven, since their Head and Protector was so wonderfully preserv'd. There were some malicious People however, who insinuated that Dunstan prevented the King, contrary to custom, from being in the Council that Day. After this seasonable Accident the Monks were left unmolested; whether the miraculous preservation of Dunstan had made an Impression upon the minds of his Enemies, or their most potent Opposers perish'd in their Fall.

Besides these Ecclesiastical Matters, we find nothing remarkable in the Reign of Edward, but his tragical Death in 979, four Years after he ascended the Throne. The Story is thus related by the greatest part of Historians: Edward passing one Day, as he was returning from hunting, near Corf-Castle, (8), where his Mother-in-law Elfrida resided with her Son Ethelred, rid off from his Company in order to pay her a visit. Elfrida being told the King was at the gate, ran to receive him, and urg'd him very earnestly to unlight, and come in to

(1) By Elfrida whether his Wife or Concubine is uncertain he had Edward who succeeded him. Howel. p. 426.—By Wilfrida, a Nun, he had Editha. Monast. p. 60.—And by Elfrida, Earl Ordgan's Daughter, he had Edmund, who died in his Infancy in 971. and Ethelred. Sax. Ann.

(2) It is observed that his building to many Monasteries (twenty eight, says Iugulphus, p. 45.) proved one great Occasion of the Danes conquering England; for by these means he exhausted the Treasury, and gave great Portions of Lands for the Maintenance of the Monks, who refused his Son Ethelred Assistance according to his Necessity. Brady. p. 122.

(3) Tho' Edgar as to his Person was both low and slender, yet was he so well proportioned, that he is said to contend often with such as were thought strong in his Court; and disliked nothing more than that they should spare him out of Respect, or Fear of hurting him.

(4) And several others of the great Men. S. Dunelm. p. 160.

(5) Fritelstan. He, and Others, attracted an Army, and protected the Monasteries in East-Anglia. S. Dunelm. p. 160.

(6) Particularly one in 977 at Kendry, in East-Anglia. Says S. Dunelm. p. 160. and Claren. Mart. p. 161. (now Killing or Catlidge, in Cambridgeshire.) The Sax. Ann. call the Place Kyringstane, which is supposed to be Kyrington in Oxfordshire. Tyriel. p. 16. Another of these Synods was held at Andisbury. Flor. Vener.

(7) Howel relates, he saved himself by taking hold of a Beam. p. 357.

(8) In the Island Paulsk in Dorsetshire. This Castle is a considerable Piece of Antiquity; the Foundation whereof is not cleared by History. After the strength and safety of the Realm began to consist in Castles, this was one of the most principal belonging to the Crown. It was repaired by Henry VII. and in the Civil Wars was a Canton for the King, defended by the Owner, Lord Chief Justice Banks. Camd. Antiq. de Dorset.

Dunstan excites Edward by his own Authority. S. Dunelm. Brompt.

The Contest between the Priests and the People increased.

Several Councils about it

Miracles in favour of the Monks.
Malmsh. l. 2. c. 9.
Eadmer.
J. Pike.

978.
A remarkable Accident at the Council of Calne.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.
Huntingd.

Eadmer.

979.
The tragical End of King Edward.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.
l. 2. c. 9.

refresh himself. But as the King's Design was only to pay his Respects to his Mother-in-law as he went by her Castle, he only desired a Glass of Wine to drink her Health. Whether Elfrida had already form'd a Design of destroying the King, to make way for her Son to the Crown, or that favourable Opportunity put the thought in her head, the young King had no sooner lifted the Glass to his mouth, but a Russian stabb'd him in the Back with a Dagger (1). Perceiving himself wounded, he set spurs to his Horse, which soon carried him out of sight. But not being able to keep his Saddle by reason of the Loss of Blood, he fell off his Horse. To complete his Misfortunes, his Foot hung in the Stirrup, and by that means he was dragged a good way before his Horse stoped, just by a poor blind Woman's House that stood in the road. To this House, the People sent after him by Elfrida tracing him by his Blood, found him dead, and his Body miserably torn. Elfrida imagining she could conceal this horrid Deed, known only to her Domesticks, ordered the Corps to be thrown into a Well. But it was found there a few days after, and carried to Warham (2), from whence it was removed to Skeftsbury, and laid in a Monastery founded by King Alfred. It is pretended to have worked many Miracles there; that a blind Man was restored to his Sight, and a Cripple to his Limbs, by only touching the Body. The poor Woman also, in whose

Brompton.

House his Body lay one night, is said to be cured by his Intercession; and the Well into which he was thrown, endued with the virtue of healing several sorts of Distempers. In fine, it is reported that Elfrida, curious to know herself the truth of these Miracles, resolved to go to the place, but her Horse, in spite of all her Endeavours, would not stir one Step forward. With such Prodiges as these do the Histories of those Times abound. Thus far is certain, Elfrida, willing to atone for her Crime, founded two Nunneries, one at Ambresbury (3), and another at Whorwel near Andover. In this last she shut herself up, ^{Malmste.} in order to do Penance the residue of her days. She is said to have frequently covered her Body all over with little Crosses to keep off the Devil, whom she had but too much reason to fear.

I do not know upon what foundation Edward was made both a Saint and a Martyr, unless it was pretended, he was murdered out of Revenge for his great Affection to Dunstan and the Monks. Indeed that was sufficient then to procure him these glorious Titles: It is certain, in those days all the Favourers of the Monks pass'd for so many Saints, and their Enemies for the Objects of God's Wrath. However this be, the young Prince, whose Reign I have gone through, is generally known by the Name of Edward the Martyr (4).

T H E

S T A T E of the Church of ENGLAND,

FROM THE

Union of the Seven Kingdoms, to the End of the Reign of EDWARD the Martyr.

State of the Church.

THE continual Wars in England during the hundred and fifty Years we have just run through, were no less fatal to the Church than the State. They produced an extreme Corruption of Manners, and a profound Ignorance all over the Kingdom. The Destruction of the Churches and Monasteries, the plundering what was designed for their Subsistence, and the Necessity of defending themselves against the Danes, and being wholly employed in the Exercise of Arms, turned Multitudes from the Study of Religion. It is no wonder therefore, if during such troublesome times, we meet with very few Materials for an Ecclesiastical History. To this may be added, the greatest part of the Monasteries, where the Memoirs of what passed in Church and State were laid up, having been demolished, the Historians who have wrote of those times, were deprived of that assistance. The Reader therefore must expect to find but few remarkable Events relating to Religion, but few Councils to inform us of the Doctrine and Faith of the Church of England, and but very few learned Men, whose Writings might afford us some light. It will be necessary however to relate the principal Circumstances transmitted down to us, as they will be of service in clearing the Events of future and more happy times.

During the reign of Egbert, nothing happened in the Church worth notice. Ethelwulph's Reign furnishes us with a Subject, which, though mentioned elsewhere, it will not be amiss to speak a little more largely of in this place;

I mean the Grant of the Tithes. The Charter runs thus.

"I, ETHELWULPH, by the Grace of God ^{Ethelwulph's Charter for the Tithes} King of the West-Saxons, &c. with the Advice of the Bishops, Earls, and all other Persons of Distinction in my Dominions, have, for the Health of my Soul, the Good of my People, and the Prosperity of my Kingdom taken the prudent and serviceable Resolution of granting the tenth part of the Lands throughout my whole Kingdom, to the Church and Ministers of Religion to be enjoyed by them, with all the Privileges of a free Tenure, and discharged from all Services due to the Crown, and all other Incumbrances incident to Lay-Fees. The Grant has been made by us to the Church, in honour of Jesus Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and All Saints, and out of regard to the Paschal Solemnity, and that Almighty God might vouchsafe his Blessing to us and our Posterity."

Dated at the Palace of Wilton, in the Year 854, Indiction the second, at the Feast of Easter.

The Terms, Date and Subscriptions of this Charter, ^{Remarks on this Charter.} have induced several learned Men to believe it spurious. But without entering into the Controversy, I shall content myself with observing, that long before this Charter, the Clergy of England claimed a right to the Tithes, if they were not already in actual Possession of them.

(1) Knighton says, that Elfrida herself stabbed him. p. 2313.

(2) in Derbyshire. Part of his Body was buried in Lea or Lea's Monastery, (perhaps Leominster) near Hereford; and the other part at Abington. Knighton, p. 2314. and Hogen, p. 269.

(3) in Wiltshire, so called from Ambrosius, who built here a Monastery for three hundred Monks, to pray for the Souls of the British Noblemen slain by Hengist. The Tomb of Guinevere, Arthur's Wife, was found here within this last Century, and this Inscription on the Wall in massy Gold Letters, R. G. A. C. 600. The Antiquity of which is very suspicious, since she must have out-lived Arthur fifty Years; and besides, she is said by Historians of Credit to have been buried at Gloucester. Queen Elfrida's Nunnery is famous for Queen Eleanor's being a Nun there; and also Mary Daughter to Edward I. with thirteen Noblemen's Daughters, were veiled here on Assumption Day, p. 1285. Camd. Add. to Wilt.

(4) King Edward's Martyrdom was kept on three several Days; on the Day he was murdered, and at the two removes of his Body. See Martyr. Engl. 18 of March, and Pib. and June 20. He has likewise the Honour of standing in the Roman Martyrology, March 18. where Barnius takes Notice of a Letter in Pope Innocent V's Register, for the keeping St. Edward's Festival, Coll. l. 3.

This is evident from the seventeenth Canon of the Council of Calcuth, held in 785, where we find they urged the payment of Tithes from the Law of Moses. It is true, King Ethelwulf might have a mind to confirm the Rights of the Clergy, by granting them a Charter for the same. But in that case, it is something strange he should pass over in silence the Divine Right of Tithes, on which the Clergy chiefly insisted. If this Charter therefore is not to be considered as a Forgery, it seems at least to be of very doubtful Authority. Add to this, that by the tenth part of the Lands must necessarily be meant the tenth part of the Profits; which must be owned to be a very forced Interpretation, especially in a primordial Act, such as this (1).

In the Reigns of Ethelbald, Ethelbert and Ethelred I, we have nothing relating to the Church, but the Destruction of the Monasteries, and the pathetick Descriptions made by the Historians, of the Danish Fury exercised upon the Monks. This they chiefly insist upon, as being, in their Opinion, the most material historical Events. They particularly lament the three famous Monasteries of Croyland, Ely and Medebshamsted, whose Monks were all massacred, and the Libraries burnt (2).

Remarks on Edmund's
Martyrdom.

The pretended Martyrdom of Edmund King of East-Anglia would require our notice, had it not been spoken of elsewhere (3). I call it pretended, because it does not appear, this Prince lost his Life in any of those Causes which make the Sufferer a Martyr. Otherwise, we must say that there were in England as many Martyrs as there were Christians put to death by the Danes. However, he stands in the Calendar with that Title, and Miracles were affirmed to be frequently wrought at his Tomb during several Ages (4).

Tho' I have amply insisted on every thing relating to the Reign of Alfred, it will not be improper to remind the Reader of two things, which may be of use hereafter. The first is, the Ruin of the Monasteries; which was so great, there was not a Monk left in England, being all slain by the Danes, or forced to fly out of the Kingdom. Some of them perhaps took other Professions when they saw the loss of their Revenues had deprived them of their Subsistence. As soon as Alfred was rid of the Danes, he built Monasteries, and furnished them with foreign Monks, there being none to be found in the Kingdom. It will seem strange, no doubt, that he should chuse to be at the charge of new Monasteries, rather than repair the old, whose Walls, for the most part, were still remaining. But it must be observed, the Secular Clergy had taken possession of them, and lived there in common under the Direction of an Arch-Priest. It is plain, Alfred saw some Inconveniency in dislodging them.

The other thing I would put the Reader in mind of, is, the gross Ignorance the English were fallen into during the War with the Danes. We have already seen in the Life of Alfred, how that Prince himself complained of it; and resolved for that reason to invite into his Dominions as many learned Foreigners as possible, to found the University of Oxford (5), and use several other means to restore the Sciences in his Kingdom.

Edward the Elder, following the example of his Father, founded, for the same reason, the University of Cambridge, as some assert (6). I shall not here alledge the Arguments for and against the Antiquity of this illustrious University, as being a matter attended with great Difficulties, and besides, not immediately relating to the state of the Church. But we have another particular belonging to this Reign, where Religion is more concerned, by reason of the Consequences pretended to be drawn from thence, and which it will be proper to insist upon a little.

Malmesbury relates in his History, that in the Reign of Edward the Elder, Pope Formosus being informed, there had been a seven Years Vacancy in the West-Saxon Sees, sent a Bull into England, excommunicating the King and all his Subjects. Whereupon the King assembled a general Council, and Plegmund Archbishop of Canterbury, causing the Bull to be read, it was resolved the Vacancies should be filled, and three new Sees erected in Wessex. Plegmund (continues the Historian) went afterwards to Rome, to get the Censure taken off, and at his return, consecrated seven Bishops in one day. An antient Register of the Priory of Canterbury says much the same thing, with this Addition, that the Council made a particular Provision for the Cornish Men to recover them from their Errors. By the way, we are to understand by the Errors of the Cornish, who were some of the Remains of the old Britons, their refusing to acknowledge the Papal Authority.

The Roman Catholick Writers make a great flourish upon this Bull, and produce it as a strong Instance of the Pope's Authority, not only over the Bishops, but the Kings of England. But after all, this Bull upon examination will be found inconsistent with Chronology. Malmesbury dates it in 904. But Pope Formosus died in 896, and was dragged out of his Grave in 897, by Stephen his Successor. Baronius, to solve this Difficulty, says the Date in Malmesbury is false, and should be written 894 instead of 904. 'Tis true, this Correction sets the matter right as to Formosus, but then the Cardinal falls into another Anachronism with regard to Edward, who did not ascend the Throne till the Year 900. Edward therefore must be changed into Alfred. But no Historian mentions Alfred's being excommunicated. Notwithstanding all this, they are extremely loth to part with this pretended Bull. Some have supposed two Excommunications; one by Pope Formosus in 894, against the Bishops only, without any mention of King Edward: Another by Pope John IX, which threatened the King. To support this Supposition, Malmesbury, who speaks of Formosus's Bull, and Polydore Virgil, who mentions Pope John's, are cited. But these Authorities are very insufficient, since Malmesbury is plainly mistaken, either in the date, or in the name of the Pope; and Polydore Virgil does not say it was John IX, as is pretended, but John X, that threatened Edward with Excommunication, as indeed it must be, if the Bull was dated in 904. Thus this Bull, which has been so much ended Bull

+ P. 44
Formosus.
Malm. l. 2.
de Gift.
Reg. An

Stelm.
C. nec.
Vol. I.
p. 327.

The Catholick
Divines Answer to Sir
Edward
Coke, p.
136, 137.
Spelman.
ibid.

(1) The Charter here translated is in the Monasticon, p. 100. and is dated at Wilton in 854. Whereas there is another Charter very different from this in Ingulphus and Matthew of Westminster, dated at Winchester in 855. To solve this Difficulty, it is supposed that Ethelwulf repeated this Grant first at Wilton for the Tithes only of his own Demesnes, and the Year following at Winchester for the Tithes of the whole Kingdom. Though it must be owned that they both seem'd equally to extend to all his Dominions. See Ingulphus p. 17. East. Gal. & M. West. Flo. Hist. An. 854. Ingulphus says, this Charter was made after Ethelwulf's Return from Rome; but that could not be, seeing he was then only King of Kent.

(2) See Ingulphus, p. 22, 23, 24. where you have a lamentable Account of the Destruction of these three Monasteries.

(3) Anno 946. K. Edward I. gave one of his Royal Towns, then called Beadricefworth, with divers other Lands to build a Church and Monastery, in memory of St. Edmund the Martyr, whose Body was there enshrined; which Town was from him called St. Edmundsbury. Mat. West.

(4) Matthew Westminster says, his Head being thrown among the Briars and Thorns in the same Wood where Ledebech was murdered by Bern, the East-Anglian, after the Danes were gone, went out to see for it, and having sought in vain for some time, the Head at last cried out, Here, Here, Here, and never ceased till they came to the Place. The Head was put to his Body, and buried with it. When they came to take up his Corps, many Years after, it was found whole and entire, and the Head grown to the Body, without the least Scar, only a Mark round the Neck like a scarlet Thread. Mat. West. Flo. Hist. An. 870. Malmesb. Gest. Pontif. l. 2.

(5) There is a Passage in Aldrich's Life of K. Alfred published by Mr. Candlish, p. 16. that talks of a Dispute between Grimbald, whom Alfred had sent to Oxford, and the school scholars settled there before. From whence it is inferred, that Alfred was not the first Founder of this University. On the other hand, it is objected, that this Passage in Aldrich is spurious. That it is not in the Copy published by Archbishop Parker; that Usher is positive for its being interpolated, and that it speaks of things done after Alfred's Death, &c. It is further objected, both against the Antiquity of Cambridge, as well as Oxford, that neither of them are mentioned by Bede; that Alcuin pushes them over in silence, and talks of York as the Seat of Learning then: That Ingulphus, in his Descriptions of the Burning of the Libraries and Monasteries by the Danes, says not a Word of any Damage done to Oxford or Cambridge: That Alfred complains there were very few in this side the Humber that understood the Church-Prayers in English, or could converse Latin. Lastly, That had there been then in being two famous Universities in England, what Occasion was there for his sending beyond Sea for learned Men to instruct his Subjects? The most probable Opinion therefore is, that the University of Oxford was first founded by Alcuin in 866. See Bayle of Words, Herd. l. 6. Harpfield's Malm. The first time Oxford is mentioned in the ancient Historians as an University or School of Learning, is in Ingulphus, Abbot of Croyland, who lived in the Reigns of William I. and II. Speaking of himself, he says, "Ego Ingulphus, — pro literis addiscendis in tenebris erate constitutus, primum Westmonasterio, postmodum Oxoniensi studio traditu sum. Cumque in Aristotele arripendo supra multos coetaneos meos profectum, etiam Rhetoricam Tullii primam, & secundam, talo tenus inducibam." Ingulph. Edit. Oxon. p. 73.

(6) There is a Manuscript Charter of Privileges, lodged in the Library of Clare-Hall, said to be granted to Cambridge by this King Edward. But however, some have carried back the Antiquity of this University to the Year 394 before Christ, pretending it was then founded by one Camalot, a Spaniard, and that it was restored by Sigebert King of East-Anglia, in 630, whom others account the Founder. But it is plain from the Reasons in the Note above, that there was no such Thing as any University at all till Alfred's Time. And as some say, Call. East. Hist. p. 299, we have no authentic Testimony of any University at Cambridge till the Year 1110, (Xth Hen. I.) when Joscelin, Abbot of Croyland, sent one Grisebort, a Norman, and three others to Cambridge, to teach the Sciences. These Monks coming to Cambridge, hired a Barn to teach in, and in a Year's time their Audience increased, that no Hospital-Barn was big enough to contain them. From this slender beginning, says Peter Blacensis, the University of Cambridge grew up to a noble Seat of Learning. The first College, viz. Peter-House, was founded by Hugh Baulham, Bishop of Ely, in 1284. — boasted of, falls to the ground, as inconsistent with Chronology.

As to the Consecration of the seven Bishops mentioned by Malmsbury, there is not the same reason to question the matter of fact. Tho' as to the time, this circumstance is somewhat perplexed, it is certain however, in the beginning of the Xth Century there were six Bishops in Wessex, whereas a little before there were but three. Ralph de Diceto places the erecting of the three new Sees in 909. To reconcile this Historian with Malmsbury, who fixes the date of them to 904, this expedient is proposed, which, if it has no foundation, is at least not improbable. It is thought, that in the Synod or mixt Assembly held at Winchester in 904, the erection of the three new Bishopricks was resolved. But as these new Sees were to be taken out of the Dioceses of Winchester and Sherburn, it was agreed, this should not be done 'till after the death of the present Bishops, that the Revenues they had hitherto enjoyed, might not be lessened. Both these Bishops happening to die in 900, or perhaps a little before, and the Bishopricks of Hereford and Suffex being also vacant at the same time, Plagmund consecrated seven Bishops at once, namely, Fridstan Bishop of Winchester, Werstan of Sherburn, Kenulph of Worcester, Beornock of Selsey in Suffex, Eadulph of Crediton, or Kirton, Athelm of Wells, and Athelstan of Petrockstow or Padstow in Cornwall. The three last Sees were the newly erected. Tho' Malmsbury and Higden affirm the new erected Bishopricks had the Pope's Confirmation, it is certain at that time, and for more than two hundred years after, there was no such thing requir'd. And therefore very probably, when these two Historians mentioned the Pope's Confirmation, they had an Eye to the Custom of their own Times.

We meet with very few particulars of moment, except some Councils spoken of hereafter, in the Reigns of Athelstan, Edmund, and Edred. The most remarkable thing was the Charter of Privileges granted by Edmund, on account of Dunstan the first Abbot, to Glassenbury Abby, after it was rebuilt. These Privileges were so extensive, that the King seem'd to intend to invest the Abbot with a sort of sovereign Power within the Precincts of his Jurisdiction (1).

The Abby of Croyland was also rebuilt in the Reign of Edmund by Turketul the King's Cousin and Chancellor. He afterwards turned Monk himself, and was made Abbot by Edred, who put him in possession, by the delivery of a Pastoral Staff, according to the custom of those days. Turketul obtained a very advantageous Charter for his Abby. However, Edred refus'd to grant him the Privilege of Sanctuary, which that Abby had enjoyed before its destruction, being unwilling Malefactors should be protected from Justice.

This Prince was entirely sway'd by Dunstan, who made use of his Interest, not only to put the Monks in possession of the Abbies, which the secular Clergy had appropriated to themselves, but also of the Benefices. If Edred had not died so soon, Dunstan would doubtless have settled this Affair in such a manner, as to have made it unalterable. But this Prince dying before it could be compleated, Edwy his Successor turn'd the Monks out of the Benefices, and even out of some of their Monasteries. To read the tragical Complaints of the Monkish Historians upon this occasion, and their bitter Invectives against Edwy, one would imagine this Prince had utterly rooted out the Christian Religion. Whereas upon a closer Inquiry, it will appear, the Monks were dispossessed only of the two Monasteries of Abington and Malmsbury (2). This Loss however was so grievous to them that they stirr'd up the Northumbrians and Mercians to a revolt, as hath been related.

It is needless to repeat here what has already been said of the great Interest of Dunstan in the Reign of Edgar, and what he did in favour of the Monks. The Truth is, he can't be blamed for exerting his power in replacing them in the Monasteries. Though the religious Houses were deserted during the wars, they belonged not to the secular Clergy, since they were founded for the Monks.

But he can't be so easily excus'd, for endeavouring to introduce the Monks into the Benefices; on pretence that the secular Priests were most of them married. I shall not examine here upon what ground the Councils and Popes prohibited the Clergy from marrying. This matter has been so fully handled by several Authors, that nothing new can be added. I shall only remark, that from the Conversion of the English to Dunstan's time, the Clergy of England were not oblig'd to Celibacy, and that Dunstan undertook an unprecedented thing, when he attempted to bind them to it, in pursuance of the Papal Decrees. It has been observ'd in the Reign of Edgar, how Dunstan, countenanced by that Prince, gain'd his point so far, as, not indeed to oblige them to put away their Wives, but to expel them their Benefices for keeping them. However notwithstanding his great Interest and Affection to the Monks, he could never re-instate them in the northern Monasteries. For above two hundred years the Abbies in those parts were uninhabited, and the very name of a Monk was scarce heard of there.

I have but little to say (3) concerning the new Bishopricks, or the removal of the Episcopal Sees from one place to another, at a time when one half of the Kingdom was in the hands of the Danes, who as yet were Pagans. Northumberland, Mercia and East-Anglia, being expos'd to their continual ravages, it is not to be expected the affairs of the Church should proceed in a regular course. East-Anglia had never a Bishop for above two hundred years, and in Northumberland, the See of Hagulfstad was reduc'd to so wretched a state, that having long been without a Bishop, it was forced at last to be united to York. During Alfred's Reign, the Bishopricks of Leicester and Lincoln were united in one, and the See remov'd to Dorchester (4), where it continued 'till the Reign of William the Conqueror, when it was translated again to Lincoln. I have already mention'd the erection of the three new Bishopricks in Wessex, and therefore it is needless to say any thing more of them. This is all that occurs, unless I were to give a List of the Names of the Bishops that succeeded in each See; which would lead me too far. Those who have a mind to it, may consult Dr. Heylin, who has published a Book upon that subject, where you have the year of the Instalment of each Bishop.

The Councils held in this interval, were properly mixt Assemblies, consisting of the Clergy and Nobility, and term'd in Saxon, Witena-Gemot, that is, an Assembly of wise Men, or rather Micel-Synod, which signifies in the same Language, the Great, or General Assembly. Both these names were rendered in Latin by the word Concilium. But because in these Assemblies, Laws and Ordinances relating to the Church as well as the State, were enacted, several of them are reckon'd among the Councils or Synods. As for Councils purely Ecclesiastical, it does not appear there were any, from Egbert to Edward the Martyr.

Next to the Assembly at Winchester, where Ethelwulf is said to have given a Grant of the Tithes, the most considerable with regard to religious Affairs, was the Synod of Graetley, in the Reign of Athelstan. The Canons or Laws of this Council are Nine.

The Ist enjoins the Payment of Tithes (5).

The IId commands the Magistrates to put the Laws in execution against those that were convinced by all the Circumstances of an Ordeal Tryal (6).

The IIIId is against Witchcraft and Highwaymen.

The IVth relates to the Towns where the Money was to be coined. At Canterbury there were to be seven Mints, four for the King, two for the Archbishop, and one for the Abbot of St. Augustine's. Rocheſter

(1) This Charter was engross'd in Letters of Gold in a Book of the four Gospels, and presented to the Abby by the King.

(2) And perhaps Glassenbury, which were all the Monks had in Edwy's Time, the rest were in Possession of the Seculars. See Tinmouth. Hist. Ant. Ms. l. 21. Wulfstan. Vit. Ethel.

(3) Edred founded a Bishop's See at St. Germans in Cornwall, which was afterwards annexed by Canute to the See of Crediton or Kirton. Speed, p. 341

(4) In Oxfordshire.

(5) To which is added the King's Order to all his Officers and Governors, to maintain a poor Man in Diet and Clothes; namely, that out of every two of his Villages, or Towns, there should be given an Amphora, or nine Gallons of Meal, a Gammon of Bacon, or a Ram worth five Pence. They were each of them also to manumite a Slave. Spelman. Conc. Vol. I. p. 393.

(6) See the Manner of this Tryal at length, in the Dissertation on the Government and Laws of the Anglo-Saxons.

was to have three, two for the King, and one for the Bishop (1).

The Vth regulates the Circumstances and Formalities of the Ordeal Trial, to know whether the Person accused were guilty or not. And here we have two things worth remarking. The first is, That the Priests are spoken of as fixed or settled, in certain places. Whence it is plain, that in those days they did not live together in common; but each had his particular Church. The second is, that the accused Person was to receive the consecrated Bread. Whence it may be inferred, that since the Eucharist was called Bread after the Consecration, the Church of England was far from believing Transubstantiation.

The VIth forbids buying and selling on Sunday.

The VIIth is against Perjuries and false Witness (2).

Brompt. The VIIIth orders the Bishops to assist the Judges in the execution of the Laws, and to sit upon the Bench with them (3).

The IXth lays a Fine upon remiss and negligent Magistrates, which was to be paid to the Bishop (4).

Spelman, Vol. I. p. 425. We find another Synod, or mixt Assembly, in the Reign of Edmund, wherein the Ceremonies of Marriage, and Preliminary Securities the Parties were to give one another, are settled.

I have spoken elsewhere of the Council where Edgar harangued so strenuously against the secular Priests, and of several others, that were assembled on occasion of the Controversy between the Monks and Clergy, and therefore shall say nothing more of them here.

Odo's Constitutions. 923. Spelman, Conc. Vol. I. p. 415. To the Ecclesiastical Laws passed at these General Assemblies or Councils, may be aptly subjoined certain Constitutions made in those days. The ten following are Odo's, Archbishop of Canterbury.

The first threatens all those who injure the Church in her Property with Excommunication.

The II^d exhorts Princes [and other great Men] to be governed by the directions of the Bishops, because God has entrusted them with the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven.

The III^d admonishes Bishops to discharge their Duty (5), without any mercenary Views, or respect of Persons.

The IVth and Vth give good Advice to the Clergy.

The VIth does the same with regard to the Monks.

The VIIth prohibits unlawful Marriages, upon the score of nearness of Relation: But the degrees of Consanguinity and Affinity are not recited.

The VIIIth recommends Unity and Charity among Christians.

(1) London was to have eight, Winchester six, Lewis, Southampton, Exeter, Shaftsbury, Wareham, two each, and every other great Town was to have one. If any Person belonging to these Mints was found guilty of debasing the Coin (which was to be all of one Sort) his right Hand was to be cut off, and nailed upon the out-side of the Mint. See Spelman, Conc. Vol. I. p. 399. The same Appointment was made by Archebald, only he ordered that (besides the Places here mentioned) Canterbury should have seven, Rochester three, Hastings and Chichester one each, &c. See Leg. 64. in Wilkins.

(2) The Penalty is, not to be believed afterwards, and to be debarred of Christian Burial.

(3) In this same Council were some remarkable Civil Laws enacted, particularly one against Thieves, requiring, That if a Thief be taken in the fact no man shall spare him, if he be above twenty years old, and had stole any thing above the value of eight pence. If any one do contrary thereto, he shall pay the value of the Thief's head, and make amends for the fault, and yet the Thief himself shall not be spared; who if he contumaciously make resistance, or fly for it, shall find no favour. A Thief cast into Prison shall stay forty days, and then after the payment of one hundred and twenty Shillings be discharged; but his Kindred must give security for his good behaviour; after which if he steal again, they must either pay the value of his Head, or bring him back to Prison; and in case one resist, he shall pay to the King, or to any other whom it concerns, the value of his own Head; and if any defend him, he shall pay to the King one hundred and twenty Shillings.

(4) Namely, of the Diocese where the Magistrate lived.

(5) That is, to go and preach about their Diocese every Year, &c.

(6) The III^d orders the Payment of the Tithe of Cattle before Whitsuntide, of the Fruits of the Earth before the Equinox, and of Seeds at the Feast of St. Martin. Spelman, p. 444.

(7) And to continue 'till break of Day on Monday, Spelman p. 445. Edgar made several other Constitutions for the Regulation of Religious Houses. In those in the Book belonging to Winchester Cathedral, Edgar makes himself General of the Monks, and Queen of the Nuns. Spelman, p. 447.

(8) These Canons were translated by Sir H. Spelman, from a Saxon Manuscript in Bennet-College in Cambridge. 'Tis not known where or by what Authority they were drawn up. Coll. Eccl. Hist. p. 186.

(9) That is, the consecrated Bread. Had they thought then, that our Saviour's Flesh and Bones, as the Trent Catechism words it, had been present under the Appearance of Bread, they would never have burnt the Eucharist in this manner.

(10) The LIId orders Priests to preach every Sunday. Spelman, p. 454.

(11) The LXIVth declares Hunting and Hawking are improper Diversions for a Priest, who is to make Books his Entertainments. Spelman.

The IXth prescribes fasting on Wednesdays, Fridays, and the four Ember Weeks.

The Xth enjoins the punctual Payment of Tithes, Mal. iii. 12. from Reasons taken out of the Old Testament, without any mention of Ethelwulf's Charter.

There are other Constitutions, published under King Edgar, but the Author of them is unknown. The principal are, Odo's Constitutions. Spelman. p. 444.

The Ist, which confirms the Civil Privileges and Immunities of the Church, and orders the payment of Tithes ().

And the Vth, by which the Solemnity of Sunday is to begin at three o' Clock on Saturday in the Afternoon (7).

In this Reign were publish'd a Body of Canons (8), of which the following are particularly remarkable.

By the Vth, if a Priest receiv'd any Injury, the Complaint was to be preferr'd to the Synod, who were to treat the Case, as if the Injury had actually been done to the whole Body of the Clergy, and take care that satisfaction be made at the Discretion of the Bishop of the Diocese.

The XIth enjoins the Priests to learn some employment, in order to get their livelihood in case of misfortune.

The XVIIth orders Parents to teach their Children the Lord's-Prayer and the Apostles-Creed, without which they were neither to be admitted to the Eucharist, nor buried in consecrated ground.

The XXIXth forbids the burying in Churches all those that were not of known and approv'd Probity.

The XXXIId prohibits the Priests from officiating without the Service-Book before them, for fear the trusting to their Memories might make them mistake.

By the XXXVIth, no Person was to eat or drink before the receiving the Communion.

The XXXVIIIth enjoins the Priest to have the holy Eucharist (9) always ready by him: But in case it grew so stale that it could not be eaten without disgusting the Palate, it was to be burnt in a clear Fire, and the Ashes laid under the Altar. Hence it is easy to see what the Church's Opinion was then of the Eucharist, since it was believ'd it could grow stale, and was to be burnt after it was spoil'd (10).

The LIIId forbids the eating of Blood (11).

After these Canons, there follows a very particular Form of Confession, with what Penances the Confessor is to enjoin. We find here that the Penitent was order'd to say the Lord's-Prayer threescore times a day, but not so much as one Ave Maria; a clear evidence, that the praying to the Virgin Mary was not yet introduced into the Church.

Nothing more remains relating to the Church of those days, but to give a brief account of the most noted Persons for Piety and Learning.

Swithin.

The first Saint we meet with is Swithin or Swithun (1), who having been Preceptor to King Ethelwulf, was promoted to the See of Winchester. By his advice Ethelwulf is said to have granted a Charter of the Tithes to the Church. This alone was sufficient to gain him a Saintship, though he had been distinguished upon no other account. But besides this, he is affirmed to have wrought abundance of Miracles, with which I do not think proper to swell this Abridgment.

Humbert.

Humbert, Bishop of East-Anglia, massacred, or, if you will, martyr'd by the Danes, with King Edmund, has the Honour also of being rank'd with the Saints.

Alfred.

Alfred the Great, independently of his Royal Dignity, was one of the most considerable for his Piety and Learning (2).

Scotus.
Affin. vit.
Alii.

Johannes Scotus, surnamed Erigena, that is, Irishman, [Ireland being then called Erin] liv'd at this time. He had acquired a great reputation in France, where Charles the Bald entertain'd him at his Court, and us'd to converse with him with great Familiarity (3) when Alfred invited him into England. At first she was the King's Preceptor in Languages and the other Sciences; afterwards he taught at Oxford, from whence, in all probability, he was remov'd to Malmesbury, since it was in this Monastery that he is said to be stab'd to death by his Scholars with Penknives. Before he left France, he was engaged by the Emperor's Order in the dispute concerning the Nature of the Eucharist. In his Treatise (4) upon this Subject, he strongly argued against Pascasius's Doctrine, who maintained, the Body of Christ in the Eucharist to be the same that was born of the Blessed Virgin. It must needs be, that the contrary opinion defended by Scotus, was not look'd upon then as heretical, since it prevented not Alfred from inviting him into England, from having a very great esteem for him, and entrusting him with the Education of youth. Nay it is certain, he was honoured as a Saint and a Martyr after his death. Roger de Hoveden says, Scotus at first had an obscure burial; but afterwards a miraculous Light shining over his Grave for several nights together, the Monks of St. Lawrence's remov'd his body into their Church, and buried it close by the Altar. His Epitaph also, the antiquity whereof, according to Malmesbury, appears from the Structure and Diction of the Verses (5), is exprefs for his passing for a Saint, when that was made. All these circumstances are a strong presumption, at least, that Transubstantiation was not the Doctrine of the Church of England at that time. For had it been so, how was it possible the English should honour as a Saint one that had so openly combated their Opinions? This inference a little perplexes the Roman Catholics. However, one of their Historians does not scruple to own, that the name of Scot is registred in the SUPPLEMENT of the Gallican Martyrology, and commemorated among the Saints on the fourth of the Ides

Creffy's Church History of England.
p. 772.

of November. He moreover adds, that his Name had been inserted even in the Roman Martyrology, and did remain there 'till expung'd by Cardinal Baronius. This Historian indeed pretends, Scotus retracted his former Errors: but gives us no Authority for what he says. He only alledges, that without a recantation it is not likely the Church would have honoured his Memory. But this is supposing that Transubstantiation was the doctrine of the Church at that time, which must first be proved, before this Argument can be of any force.

Grimbald liv'd also in the same Century: He was one of the first Class for his Learning, and had a great reputation. He was invited into England by Alfred the Great (who was acquainted with him at Rheims) and prefer'd to the Government of the new Abby at Winchester.

Among the Englishmen, eminent for their Learning, Affricus was one of the most considerable. He wrote the Life of Alfred the Great in 893, and died Bishop of St. David's in Wales (6). He must not be confounded with another of the same name, Bishop of Sherburn, who died in 883.

Werefrid, Bishop of Worcester in Mercia, lived in the Reign of King Buthred. When the Danes became masters of Mercia, he retired into France, from whence he was recalled by King Alfred. He translated the Dialogues of Gregory the Great into Saxon; and having acquired a great reputation when living, he was registred a Saint after his Death.

Plegmund, who was Archbishop of Canterbury, pass'd for a very learned Prelate, and was particularly eminent for his Skill in Divinity.

Dunulf had been an Herdsman. He is affirmed by some to be the same that sheltered Alfred, whilst the Danes were masters of the Kingdom. However this be, he had the good fortune to be known to this Prince; who finding him a Person of a Genius superior to his Birth and Employment, got him instructed in Learning, and promoted him afterwards to the See of Winchester. As this City was then the Metropolis of Wessex, where Alfred kept his usual residence, he us'd the advice of this Prelate in Affairs of the greatest moment.

Wulfig Bishop of London, had also a great share in Alfred's Esteem, as appears by his Letter to this Prelate prefixed to his Translation of Gregory's Pastoral.

Neots was an Abbot distinguish'd for his Birth, Learning, Regularity, and Zeal for promoting the Interest of the true Religion. Some say, he was nearly related to King Alfred, and others that he was descended from the Blood-Royal of East-Anglia. He died in 890 in Cornwall, where he left his name to the Town of Neotstow or St. Neots (7).

Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury, was the Son of an East-Anglian-Dane. Though he was born of Pagan Parents, he had the good fortune to know and relish the Christian Religion, and for that reason was expelled his Father's House. In this extremity, he put himself into the service of an English Nobleman, who had him baptiz'd, and sent him to School. When he became capable he entered into Orders, in the Reign of Edward the Elder. His zeal, virtue, and capacity, gained him so great a Character, that Athelstan made him Bishop of

(1) He was bred a Monk at Winchester, where he was made Abbot. Malm.

(2) He was twelve Years of Age before he could read, which he first began to learn upon this occasion. His Mother seeing him one Day mightily delighted with a little Book, beautifully adorned with Capital Letters in Gold and other Colours, laid, in his and his Brother's hearing, She would give that Book to him that should first get it by Heart. Alfred, who knew not so much as his Letters, though twelve years old, applied himself to diligently to his Business, that he never left 'till he could read and repeat the Book to his Mother. From this time, he had a great Relish for Books, and studied hard. There is extant of this Monarch's Works relating to History, a Paraphratical Translation of Bede's Ecclesiastical History, and a short Genealogy of the Kings of the West-Saxons. Posterity had so great a Veneration for his Memory, that he has the Title of Saint sometimes bestowed upon him, and what is more, his Name stands in the Calendar of the English Martyrology, printed in 1608, and in two Saxon Calendars cited by the Annistator on the Saxon Translation of the N. T. The Day of his Death is registred on the 20th of October.

(3) The Emperor one Day, as he was sitting opposite to him at Table, asking him merrily, Quid interest inter Scotum & Sotum? He replied, Mensuratum. Which the Emperor took in good part. Heard.

(4) This Book was condemn'd by the Council of Verceil in 1050, Bering. Epist. ad Rich. 'Tis now lost, though some will have it to be the same with that which goes under the Name of Ratram or Bertram. But Mabillon confutes this Opinion.

(5) Clauditur hec Tumulo sanctus Sophista Johannes,
Qui dictus erat jam vivens dogmate miro.
Martyrio tandem Christi concendere Regnum, Quo meruit, Sancti regnant per Sæcula cuncti. Malm.

(6) He was bred a Monk of Monavia or St. David's, whom the King prevailed upon, with much ado, to come to Court, on condition he should stay there six Months, and at his Abby six Months, by turns. He wrote the Life of Alfred to the 45th year of his Age, i. e. to the year 893, according to his Computation. It was continued to Alfred's Death by some later Hand. He shows through the whole a great deal of Modesty. He mentions nothing of the visionary Dialogue betwixt Alfred and St. Guthbert, which other Historians largely insist on. He is copied by Florence of Worcester and others. This Treatise was first published by Archbishop Parker in the old Saxon Character. A new Edition is lately put out by Mr. Wise, Fellow of Trinity College Oxford, with a Vindication of the contested Clause about the Antiquity of Oxford. Another Piece has been published by Dr. Gale, under the Title of Affricus's Annals. The learned Editor does not question but 'tis the true Offspring of Affricus. Leland calls it the Chronicle of St. Neots, because he found it in that Monastery.

(7) Where he was buried, and when Earl Alric's Seat in Huntingtonshire was turned into a Monastery upon his Account, his Body was removed thither, and the Town before called Annulpsbury, was from him named St. Neot's. From whence his Bones were a third time removed to Creyland Minster in 1217.

Sherburn. Some ascribe to the efficacy of his Prayers, the glorious victory, obtained by that Prince over the Danes at Brunanburgh. Odo had no less Interest with King Edmund, who resolved to promote him to the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury: But Odo modestly excused himself, telling the King his abilities were too slender for so high a Post. The King not admitting his excuse, he further alledged, that Translations were not warrantable by the Canons. This scruple being removed, by the examples of Justus and Mellitus who were translated from Rochester and London to Canterbury, he started another Objection, and alledged, that the Archbishops from Augustin downwards having been all Monks (1), he looked upon himself as unqualified for that Station, since he had not been educated under any religious Rule. This new difficulty was also got over by sending to the Abbot of Fleury in France, and entreating him to admit Odo into his Society. Thus the Prelate having nothing more to object, accepted at length, though with great reluctance, the See of Canterbury. As he became afterwards a vigorous Champion for the Monks, it may be presumed, this was one of the chief reasons of placing him among the most illustrious Ecclesiasticks of his time. He is said also to have the gift of Miracles, which the Favourers of the Monks seldom failed to be honoured with.

Dunstan would make a large Article here, did I not think what I have elsewhere said of him sufficiently makes known his Character. There are modern Historians, even among the Protestants themselves, who, carried away by the Testimonies of the antient Writers, have given great commendations to this pretended Saint, without considering upon what doubtful Authorities they proceed. It is highly propable, that Dunstan's firm adherence to the Monks, was the ground of those excessive praises bestowed on him, of which, perhaps, he would otherwise have been deemed unworthy (2).

The same may be said of Ethelwald, Bishop of Winchester, and Oswald, Bishop of Worcester first, and afterwards Archbishop of York. Their great zeal in the cause of the Monks, is doubtless what contributed most to their reputation. The Monks, being almost the only Writers in those days, have drawn the characters of Persons according to their Prejudices or Interests.

Turketul, King Edmund's near Relation and Chancellor, became famous in this Age, for preferring a Cloyster to a Court, where he lived in great Reputation. But what raised his merit most with the Historians, was his rebuilding and restoring to its former splendor, the Abby of Croyland (3), demolished by the Danes.

(1) There were several that in all probability were not Monks, as Wigberd, whom Bede, l. 4. c. 1. calls a Priest, and Nothelm, who succeeded Tatwine.

(2) The famous Story of St. Dunstan and the Devil is thus related by the Monkish Historians. As St. Dunstan was one day busied in his Cell near Glastenbury, in making a Gold Cup of a curious Workmanship, the Devil appeared to him in a beautiful Form, tempting him to Sin. Dunstan perceiving in Spirit who he was, takes up a red-hot pair of Tongs, and catching hold of the Devil by the Nose, made him howl in such a terrible manner, that he was heard all over the Neighbourhood. Hig. Polych. p. 270. Edit. Gale. Brompt. p. 878, 879.

(3) Turketul left the Monastery at his Death in possession of many curious Relicks; among the rest Ingulphus (p. 51. Hist. Croyl. Edit. Gale.) mentions the Thumb of St. Bartholomew the Apostle, given him when Chancellor by the Emperor; he had so great a Veneration for it, that he always carried it about him, and when in any Danger, cross'd himself with it. The naming of Bells, together with the Benediction, as a defensive against Thunder and Lightning, being introduced in this Age by Pope John XIV. Turketul cast a great Bell, which he called Gutblac. His Successor taking the hint, added some more to it, and made the first tuneable Ring of Bells in England. Ingulph. p. 53.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK V.

Containing the Reigns of the Kings of ENGLAND, from ETHELRED II. to the Norman Conquest, being the Space of about Eighty Eight Years.

14. ETHELRED II.

978.
ETHEL-RED II.
crown'd.

Malm. 1. 2.
c. 10.

Hoveden.
Ingulph.
p. 54.

Sax. Ann.

Malm. &
Brompt.

980.
Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.

His Character.
Malm.

AFTER the murder of Edward, there was not the least pretence to refuse the Crown to his Brother Ethelred, who was the only Prince of the Royal Family, and too young to be accused of partaking in his Mother's crime. Accordingly, Dunstan could not help crowning him⁽¹⁾, being then but twelve years of age, though he plainly foresaw it would prove fatal to his whole Party. It is affirmed, that Dunstan at his Coronation foretold, by the Spirit of Prophecy, the Calamities England was going to be exposed to in his Reign. But Predictions of this Nature are always to be suspected, when attributed to Saints, such as Dunstan, by Authors who wrote after the Event. However this be, the People had very different thoughts of this new Reign. They flattered themselves, they were about to enjoy a state of Tranquillity, under a Prince who had already given an Instance of his good Nature, in bitterly lamenting the Death of the King his Brother, though it procured him the Crown. An Historian says, his Tears appeared so unseasonable to his Mother, that catching up a Wax-taper in a passion, she beat him so unmercifully with it, that he could not endure the sight of a Wax-light ever after.

The first thing Ethelred did after his Coronation, was to remove the Body of the late King to Shaftsbury Church. Hardly had he performed this Office, but he found himself attacked by the Danes, who suffered him to enjoy no repose during these residue of his Life. If this Prince had followed the steps of his Predecessors, perhaps he would have caused the old invaders to lay aside all thoughts of any new attempts upon England. But his natural Cowardice, joined to an extreme Sluggishness⁽²⁾, and insatiable Avarice, and many other Failings, soon let them see, he was not like to prove a very formidable Enemy. For sixty years past they seemed to have forgot England, and the English on their side, to have lost all remembrance of the Calamities they had suffered from the hands of those cruel Enemies. However, after so long an Interval, during which the Danes settled in England, seemed to have entertained the same affection for this their second Country, as the Natives themselves, the foreign Danes took it in their heads to renew their Invasions. They no sooner appeared, but the others, resuming their old Inclinations, joined their Countrymen, in order to improve the present Opportunity, and free themselves from the Dominion of the English.

The Danish rovers made their first Attempt on Southampton, where they arrived with seven Ships, and after plundering the Town and the adjacent Country⁽³⁾, they carried the same devastations into Cornwall.

This year another band landing at Portland, pillaged, and sacked the Country round about, after which they proceeded elsewhere to increase their Spoils⁽⁴⁾.

These frequent descents were so much the more incommo-dious to the English, as having so many Coasts to guard, they knew not where to assemble and expect the Enemy. If at any time they happened to have it in their power to give them Battle, all the advantage they could gain, in case fortune favoured them, was to recover the Plunder. But when they themselves were worsted, the Country was sure to be exposed to all imaginable cruelties before another Army could be drawn together. Very often, whilst the English Troops were upon the march, to oppose one of these Bands, they were forced to change their Rout, and march where the danger seemed more pressing. Thus, what care soever might be taken, one part of the 981.

The Danes
renew their Invasion.

Sax. Ann.
Malm.
S. Dunelm.

982.

The Advantages of the Danes in the War.

(1) He was crowned at Kingsfm, April 25. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. 1. 5. Brompt. p. 877.

(2) This cowardly and sluggish Temper of his was predicted by Dunstan, when at his Baptism (like Constantine the Emperor, from thence called Constantinus) he bewrayed the Faint, when, Malmesbury says, disturbed Dunstan so, that it made him swear by God and St. Mary, this Boy will prove a Poltron, lib. 2. c. 10. de Gest. Reg. Ang. But this has very much the Air of a Monkish Alperison.

(3) They either slew, or carried captive, almost all the Inhabitants. They came from thence to the Isle of Thanet, and plundered it; and another Band ravaged Chester. S. Dunelm. p. 161. Brompt. p. 877.

(4) This year also the City of London was destroyed by Fire, but by what Accident is unknown.

Kingdom was always exposed, since there was no foreseeing where the Pyrates would land. There was but one way to remedy this Inconvenience, which was, to keep a Fleet at Sea strong enough to engage the Danes, before they disembarked their Troops. But a time of Minority was not very proper to take such a precaution.

In this manner passed the first ten years of this Reign. It would be needless to describe at length the ravages committed by the Danes during that time. It is easy to imagine the whole Kingdom was a Scene of Murders, Commissions, Plundering, and other Devastations, which, after some short intermissions, were continually renewed.

During these Troubles, Ethelric, Duke of Mercia, one of the best Subjects of his Country, died in 983. His little regard for the Monks after Edgar's Death, was probably the reason of their reporting among their Votaries, that he was eaten up of Lice. Alfred's Son succeeded him.

The next year, Ethelwald Bishop of Winchester, one of Dunstan's Confidants, and a great Friend of the Monks, departed this Life. He is said to have founded a dozen Monasteries. If that be true, he was, no doubt, assisted by the Liberality of the two former Kings, with whom he was in great Favour (1).

The Credit of the Monks declined very much in the Reign of Ethelred, as well by reason of the frequent Invasions of the Danes, as because the People, full of their Misfortunes, were regardless of every thing else. Nay, they began to mistrust the Sanctity of the Monks, not being able to forbear wondering, that Men who had obtained from Heaven so many Miracles on their own private account, could not by their merits and prayers secure the Kingdom from the Calamities it was incessantly exposed to. On the other hand, as their credit with the former Kings had helped to acquire them a great Reputation, so this King's disinclination to them turned greatly to their prejudice. Ethelred, whose thoughts were not taken up with Religion, put the Monks and other Ecclesiastics upon a level with the rest of his Subjects. He gave a convincing proof how little he regarded the Clergy, in a difference between him and the Bishop of Rocheſter. The Bishop having haughtily refused to comply with some demand of the King's, he ordered the Soldiers to lay waste the Lands belonging to the Cathedral dedicated to St. Andrew (2). In vain did the Bishop threaten him with vengeance from the Apostle, and cause Archbishop Dunstan to interpose in his quarrel; Ethelred slighted both, nor could be appeased but by Money (3). Dunstan, displeased to the highest degree at this Behaviour, denounced upon the King and his Council the Judgments of God, ready to fall on their heads, for presuming to lay sacrilegious hands on the Church's Property; but he was not heard. His credit was sunk so low, that hardly was he known to be alive, so careful were the new Ministers to depress him. He died quickly after in the year 988; not so much of old Age, as of grief and vexation to see himself no longer distinguished as formerly.

Osvald Archbishop of York soon followed him. He was his particular Friend, and one of the three Prelates that governed the Church during the Reign of Edgar. The death of these Patrons of the Monks, a contagious distemper (4), which swept away multitudes, and moreover, the continual Invasions of the Danes, put an end to the quarrel between the secular and regular Clergy, in such manner, that it was never more heard of.

After the Danes had pillaged the Coasts of England ten years together, they gave over their ravages for about two years. This Intermiſſion put the English in hopes, their Enemies having turn'd their thoughts to some other Country, would for the future leave them in quiet. But these hopes were short-lived. In 991, Fuſtin and Guthmund, two Danish Captains, landed a great body of Troops at Gipſwich (5). Whilst they were busy in plundering, Brithnoth, Duke of East-Anglia, advanced towards them, in expectation to surprize them, but found them too well prepared. He was overthrown, and his defeat exposed the adjacent Country to greater devastations. The victorious Danes having nothing more to fear, penetrated still farther into the Country, where they committed terrible ravages.

Ethelred, being without an Army, and unable to stop their progress, was persuaded by Syric Archbishop of Canterbury (6), to give them a large Sum of Money. Perhaps he would have acted wiser, if in imitation of Alfred and Edgar, he had laid out the Money in fortifying the Kingdom against their Inſults. However this be, the Archbishop's Advice was deemed a prudent and very good to England. The Present given to the Danish, served only to allure others, who being no less greedy of Money, thought they had an equal right to make advantage of the weakness of the English.

Two years after, another of their Fleets sailing up the Humber, the Pyrates landed on the North Side, and ravaged in a merciless manner all that belong'd to the English in those quarters. Ethelred sent an Army against them, under the command of three Earls, Frema, Brithnoth, and Goodwin. But the Generals, having led their Forces in fight of the Enemies, were the first that turned their backs, and by their shameful Cowardice occasioned the loss of the Army. The King had imprudently trusted these three Lords with his Troops, who, being of Danish Extraction, were suspected of Treachery.

How great ever the miseries inflicted hitherto on England by these Foreigners might be, it is certain, they were nothing in comparison of what followed. Styren King of Denmark, and Olaf (8) King of Norway, allured by the good Success of their Subjects in England, wanted to share in the spoil brought from thence every year. To that purpose, fitting out a numerous Fleet, they entered the Thames, and landed their Troops near London. They made several attempts to become masters of the City, but meeting with a braver resistance than they imagined, retired. To make themselves amends for the time spent in vain before London, they went and plundered Kent, Hampshire, and Suffex, threatening to lay waste the whole Kingdom. Ethelred, who had no more conduct than courage, not knowing how to put a stop to these ravages, had recourse to the same means made use of before on a like occasion. He bound himself by a Treaty to pay a certain Sum of Money (9) within such a time, on condition they left his Subjects unmolested, and departed the Kingdom. Whereupon, the two foreign Kings caused all Hostilities to cease, and retired to Southampton. Shortly after the King of Norway paid a visit to Ethelred (10), who persuaded him to be baptiz'd, and stood himself Godfather. At his departure, Olaf obliged himself by Oath never to infect England more, and perform'd his promise.

It would have been happy for the English, if Sweyn, who departed at the same time, would have followed his Example. For they would have escaped all those Calamities, that Prince afterwards brought on the Land. When he failed for Denmark, he left a Fleet at Southampton, to keep the English in awe, and oblige them to perform the Articles of the Treaty. After his departure, his Admiral very earnestly pressed the payment of the Money. But as there was no haste made to comply with his demands, he took their delay for a refusal, and resolved to renew the war. Mean while, to deceive the vigilance of the English, he set sail, as if he designed for Denmark, but on a sudden, he unexpectedly entered the Severn, and after destroying the Country of the Welsh with fire and sword, cross'd the River and penetrated into Dorsetshire (11), where he committed the same ravages. All the Forces that could be brought against the Danes were as soon defeated as levied. They sacked whole Counties, it being impossible to oppose them. At last, finding nothing more to plunder in those parts, they put to Sea again, and landed in Kent (12). The Inhabitants, by endeavouring to make some resistance, only increased the fury of their Enemies, who treated them with the utmost barbarity. To complete their misfortunes, a Fleet equip'd by Ethelred to engage them at Sea, was rendered useless by the dissensions and unskilfulness of the Commanders. In this melancholy situation, England would have irretrievably perished, if the Danes by a lucky and unexpected Accident had not been called to the assistance of Richard II, Duke of Normandy, whom the King of France would have dispossessed of his dominions. Ethelred took this opportunity to go

(1) He had the King's Purſe at command, besides those of most other People, who then looked upon such Works as meritorious. Tyr. p. 24.

(2) He sent and desired Richard, but not being able to take it, he wasted the Lands of the Cathedral. Malmſb. & Dunelm.

(3) One hundred Pounds. Ann. p. 2314. Malmſb. p. 62.

(4) A bloody Flux. S. Dunelm. p. 101. Beulſb. p. 55.

(5) Ipswich in Suffex, where there are twelve Puriſh-Churches, with the Ruins of six or seven religious Houses. In Camden's time it had fourteen. As for the Antiquity, we find no mention of it before this Danish Invasion.

(6) And by the Dukes Ethelred and Alfred, and the rest of the Nobility. S. Dunelm. p. 162. Chron. Major. p. 152.

(7) Ten thousand Pounds. Sax. Ann. 991.

(8) Some pretend Olaf or Olaph was the time with Adlaf mentioned in the Reigns of Edmund and Edgar. But before that one was King of Norway, which can be made of the other, Adlaf must have been exceeding old, since seventy years before he was a General. There is no mention of him in the English History. Reyn.

(9) Sixteen thousand Pounds. Sax. Ann. 994.

(10) As before in Denmark and Somerſetſhire. See Sax. Ann. Bromf. p. 882.

(11) They went up the Meuse to Rocheſter. Sax. Ann.

993.
A Danish Fleet.
Sax. Ann.
S. Dunelm.

994.
Sweyn and Olaf invade England.

S. Dunelm.
W. Malmſb.
l. 2. c. 10.

Ethelred promises them a Sum of Money.

Olaf takes Christen.

The two Kings return home.

997.
The War is renewed.
Sax. Ann.

998.
The Danes ravage England.

999.
Are unexpectedly called off.
Sax. Ann.

and ravage Cumberland, but for what reason is unknown (1). After that, he returned to London, where he kept his usual Residence.

1000.

1001.

They return to England.
Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.
S. Dunelm.

The Quiet Ethelred enjoyed was of no long Continuance; the Danes staying in Normandy no longer than was necessary to put the young Duke out of Danger, returned into England. Cornwall felt the first Effects of their Fury; then entering Wessex, they became Masters of Exeter. The Consternation of the English was so great, that they made but a faint resistance. Whether Ethelred was betrayed by his Generals, or the long Peace enjoyed by the English during the foregoing Reigns, had enervated their Courage, they were constantly vanquish'd. The King himself was seized with such Terror that he durst not venture to be present in the Battles for fear of falling into the hands of the Danes, who probably would have shown him no favour. In fine, the Danes ever victorious, got possession of the Isle of Wight, Hampshire, and Dorsetshire, where they had their Magazines. From hence they made continual IncurSIONS into the neighbouring Counties, without any one daring to oppose them. England was then in a deplorable Condition. The southern Counties were perpetually ravag'd by the foreign Danes, and the northern People by the same Nation, whom the English could not but look upon as their Enemies. For, they not only refused to fight against the Foreigners, whom they still considered as their Countrymen, but joining with them, even helped to destroy a Country they ought to have defended with all their power, since it was become their own. In this extremity, Ethelred, who had no resolution, was far from imitating the Firmness of his Ancestors, who in like circumstances, were never daunted by Misfortunes. This timorous Prince, seeing no other way to avoid the still greater miseries the Nation was threaten'd with, yielded at last to pay the Danes thirty thousand Pounds (2). This Sum, which in those Days was very considerable, was levied by a Tax, called Danegeld, that is, Danish Money, or Money for the Danes (3). This was the original of that famous Tax which afterwards became so extremely burthensome to the Nation, even long after the Danes had quitted England. But the Clergy and Monks always found means to be exempted.

Sax. Ann.

1002.

Origin of Danegeld.

The Danes
return home,
but several stay behind,

who behave
insolently.

Hist. Boeth.
Hist. Scot.
J. Walling are three called Lord
Danes.

Ethelred
marries Emma of Normandy.
Huntingd.
l. 6.
Brompt.

The Danes, satisfied with this Agreement, ceased their ravages, and return'd home. However, abundance of them, perceiving England to be much preferable to Denmark, staid behind, and lived among the English. Their number indeed was not so great as to render them very formidable, considering they were dispersed; but then they were supported by their Countrymen of Northumberland, and East-Anglia. Besides, the English dreaded nothing so much as the renewal of the war, which made the Danes very insolent. They did what they pleased, without any controul. The English, dispirited by their past Calamities, were afraid, on the least Occasion, of drawing into the Kingdom fresh Armies of Foreigners. Thus whilst the Danes abounding in wealth and ease, passed their Time agreeably, the English were forc'd to labour and toil incessantly, to satisfy the Avarice of their new Masters. In short, the whole Kingdom stood in such fear of the Danes, that they had always the appellation of Lord-Danes. The Word it self, as well as the Meaning, was altered a little after. At this day, in some parts of England a rich idle Man that takes upon him, is by way of derision called a Lurdane. But notwithstanding this alteration, the traces of its original signification are still visible in the word.

Elgiva, Ethelred's Queen, dying, whilst the Danes were thus insolently domineering in England, the King demanded Emma (4), Sister of Richard II, Duke of Normandy, in marriage. His suit being granted, and the Marriage consummated, he thought himself out of danger, depending upon the assistance of the Duke his Brother-in-Law, when there should be Occasion. This expectation inspired him with the barbarous and furious resolution of destroying the Danes by a general Massacre. To execute this Project, orders were sent so privately (5), throughout the Kingdom, that in one day all the Danes were slain with such implacable Fury and Cruelty, that the particulars cannot be read without Horror (6). Sweyn's Sister (7), who was married to an English Lord, having at first been spared, Ethelred was so barbarous as to cause her Children to be murdered in her presence, and then her Head to be cut off. This Princess, who met her death with an heroic Constancy, was severely revenged shortly after.

This bloody Tragedy, acted on the thirteenth of November 1002 (8), was very like the Massacre of the Romans by the Britons under Boadicea; not only the same Barbarities, but the same consequences also attended both. The English, as the old Britons, were so far from throwing off their yoke by this wicked Expedient, that it served only to make it more heavy and insupportable. Though Historians assure us, all the Danes in England were massacred on this occasion, it is hard to conceive how this could be effected in Northumberland and East-Anglia, where the Danes were most powerful. Was it possible they should stand still and suffer their Throats to be cut, without making any resistance worth notice? This consideration makes me apt to believe, that by all the Danes, we are to understand only those, lately settled in England, and dispersed in Wessex and Mercia.

Ethelred was persuaded, this bloody Massacre of so many Thousands, would procure him some Repose. He could not imagine, the Danes would ever think of any future Invasions. At least, he hoped, in case the desire of revenging their Brethren should bring them to England again, the English would see the necessity of shedding the last drop of their Blood to prevent falling into the hands of their incensed Enemies. He relied moreover on the Assistance of his Brother-in-law the Duke of Normandy, a powerful Prince, interested in his Defence. But such a detestable Policy rarely produces the intended Effects, or rather, seldom fails of ending in the ruin of the Projector. God, who beholds such Tragedies with horror, does not often suffer them to go unpunished. Of this we have an instance in the miseries that befel Ethelred and his Subjects, who were almost as guilty as their King.

Sweyn received the news of this Massacre by some Danes, who escaped by getting on board a Vessel ready to sail for Denmark. Their relation of the Cruelties of the English to those of his nation, would have been sufficient to throw him into resolutions fatal to England. But when he was informed of his Sister's death, and the barbarous manner of it, he was seized with a raging Fury. Every thing contributing to stir him up to revenge, he solemnly swore he would never rest till he had satisfaction for so bloody an Outrage. It was not therefore with intent to plunder, that he made a second expedition into England, but to destroy the whole Country with Fire and Sword. However, as he did not doubt but Ethelred had taken all possible precautions to oppose his Entrance, he would not fail without being sure beforehand of a place where he might safely land his Troops. Cornwall was then governed by Earl Hugh, a Norman, whom the Queen had placed in that post as a Man the King might perfectly confide in. To this Governor Sweyn dispatched a trusty Messenger, to endeavour to gain him to his Interest, by the offer of a great Reward. Hugh yielding to the Temptation, promised to admit the Danish Fleet into his Ports, and suffer the Troops to land without Molestation.

Upon this, Sweyn, having equipped a Fleet of three hundred Sail, landed in Cornwall with a numerous Army, and meeting with no opposition, marched directly to Exeter. As this City was in no apprehension of an Attack, he easily became master of it, and putting the Inhabitants to the Sword, reduced it to Ashes. This first exploit was followed by several others, no less fatal to England. Where-ever Sweyn carried his Arms, revenge and not con-

(1) Though not one of our English Historians have mentioned on whom or for what this War was made, John Eborac in his Saxon History gives this Account of it: Ethelred having paid large Sums to the Danes, sent to Malcolm Prince of Cumberland, under Gytha King of Scotland, to pay his Share; which he refused to do, and asserting he was only bound to take War with the rest of the Kingdom, when required, Ethelred invaded his Country, in presence he favoured the Danes: but presently after the two Princes struck up a Peace, and became Friends. See also S. Dunelm. p. 70, 80.

(2) All Historians agree in saying that it was done by the Advice of the Witten-Gemot, or Council — a Rege & Precibus Hist. de norm. eff. Sax. Ann. — habito Concilio cum regni sui Primatibus — S. Dunelm. p. 164. Horv. p. 429. — Concilio Primatum totum. — Ed. Hist. p. 166.

(3) For the Payment of this Money every Hide of Land was taxed yearly Twelve-pence. A Hide of Land is such a quantity of Land as may be ploughed with one Plough in a Year. Bede reckons it as much as will maintain a Family. Some say it was an hundred Acres; others, that it contained a great Number of Acres. The Distribution of England by Hides of Land is very ancient, mention being made of it in the Laws of Ear. Inga. Danegeld was the first Land-Tax in England. It was afterwards called Hydegium, which Name remained afterwards upon all Taxes and Subsidies imposed on Land. The Normans called these sometimes Taxes, sometimes Tallages, and Auxilia & Subsidia. The Saxon Kings before this had their Levies of Money upon Land and Services, towards the building and repairing Cities, Castles, Bridges, Military Expeditions, &c. which from the West Sax. that is, West-Saxons, were termed Burgbute, Brigbute, Haregeld, &c. Danegeld was related by Edward the Confessor, but levied again by William I. and II. Then it was renewed again by Henry I. and finally by King Stephen. This ancient Tax probably might be a Precedent for our Land-Tax for three or four Shillings in the Pound, when first granted. See Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 12.

(4) In Saxon, Elgiva. S. Dunelm. p. 164. She was called from her extraordinary Beauty, The Pearl of Normandy. Ran. Hist. l. 6. Huntingd. l. 6.

(5) Huntingd. says, that he himself, when a Child, heard it from certain old Men, that by the King's Command Letters were privately dispatched all over England, to make away the Danes in one Night. The Saxon Annals add, it was because the King was told the Danes designed to deprive him and his Nobles of their Lives, and to seize the Kingdom. Ann. MII.

(6) Among other Cruelties, the Danish Women were plac'd in Holes in the Earth, as deep as their Waists, and then had their Breasts torn off by Mastiff Dogs. See Jol. Walling. p. 447. Edw. Gale M. West. lays the Odium of this whole Scene of Barbarity on Hana, General of the King's Forces, one of his evil Counsellors, p. 391. Brady questions the Truth of it, p. 124. Note (m).

(7) Her Name was Gumilda; she is said to have been married to a noble Dane of great Power and Wealth, who had been settled for some time in England, his name was Paleng. She was a Christian, and had been a great Instrument in making Peace between the English and Danes. Mat. West. p. 392.

(8) On the Feast of St. Brice, upon a Sunday. Walling. ibid.

quest being his chief aim, he destroyed all with Fire and Sword. Towards the end of the summer, being informed Alfric, Duke of Mercia, was advancing with a powerful Army (1), to give him Battle, he resolved to meet him. Ethelred acted very unadvisedly in giving the Command of his Army to this Lord, whom he had formerly banish'd the Kingdom out of mere caprice, and whose Son's Eyes he had ordered to be put out (2). The Remembrance of this Injury being still fresh in the Duke's mind, he was pleas'd with having so fair an opportunity to revenge it. As soon as he was in sight of the Enemy, he feigned himself sick on a sudden, and pretending he was unable to fight in his present condition, ordered a Retreat, which he took care to make with so much Confusion, that the Danes very easily routed his Army. After this Victory, Sweyn took several Towns (3), with an immense Booty. But as he had no design to keep them, he set them on fire, and went and pass'd the Winter in Denmark.

The Calm England enjoyed upon Sweyn's Departure, lasted not long. In the following Spring he landed in East-Anglia, and taking Norwich, burnt the whole Town to the ground. Ulfketel, Governor of East-Anglia, unable to resist him, gave him a great sum of Money, to prevent his doing any farther Mischief (4). But upon receipt of the Money, Sweyn breaks the treaty, and takes Thetford by Surprise, a Town then of great note, and served it as he had done Norwich. Incens'd at this Breach of Faith, Ulfketel levied some Troops with wonderful Expedition, and posted himself betwixt the Danish Army and Fleet. Sweyn perceiving he intended to cut off his Retreat to his Ships, march'd back to give him Battle, before he should be reinforced with more Troops. He found the English very advantageously encamp'd, expecting him with a Resolution to stand their ground, and exert their utmost in Defence of their Goods and Chattels, which their Enemies were carrying away before their face. The ill Fortune of the English was come to that Height, that it was almost impossible they should so much as once get the Advantage. The Danes obtain'd a signal Victory, though not without great Loss on their side. They even own'd they were never in more Danger of being defeated (5). Ulfketel, though of Danish race, was the faithfulest as well as bravest of all Ethelred's Subjects, and did him the most Service. But it was not so with the other Lords. All the Historians agree, Ethelred was betray'd by all that approach'd him. Sweyn had his Spies, not only in his Court, but in his very Council. The Great Men, for the most part, were brib'd, or at least, there was scarce one that serv'd the King heartily, by reason of their little Esteem for him. Whatever Councils were held to consider of Ways and Means to resist the Danes, the Dissensions between the Nobles, too common in the Courts of Princes so little respected, prevented them from coming to any Resolution, or putting what was resolv'd in execution. The Avarice of the Clergy, and particularly of the Monks, very much help'd to encrease the Disorder. Notwithstanding their great Riches, they refus'd to contribute their Quota in defence of the Kingdom, pleading their Privileges and Immunities, as if they had no Share at all in the Danger. It is no wonder therefore the Danes obtain'd so many Victories in a Country so ill defended by them, who were so much concern'd for its preservation. The Famine that happened soon after, would have compleated the Misfortunes of the English had it not accidentally prov'd the occasion of Sweyn's returning to Denmark for want of Subsistence in England.

Upon the Retreat of the Danes, and ceasing of the Famine, the English began to entertain hopes of enjoying some Tranquillity, when they saw another Danish Fleet arrive at Sandwich in Kent. Ethelred immediately levied an Army (6) to give the new Invaders battle: But after committing some Ravages, they retired to the Isle of Thanet, where it was not possible to attack them. They knew the English Army consisting only of Volunteers who serv'd at their own expence, would soon disband themselves, as it actually happen'd. Winter coming on, the English returned to their Homes, it not being in the Power of the King to keep them any longer together. Then the Danes issuing from their Retreat, renew'd their Ravages in Kent (7) and the neighbouring Counties, well assur'd they should meet with no Opposition. Ethelred saw no other Course to stop the progress of a mischief that threaten'd the whole Kingdom, but to give them the sum of thirty thousand Pounds, with which they were very well satisfied.

The King, being freed from this Incumbrance, celebrated the Wedding of one of his Daughters with Edric first named Streon (8), a very powerful Lord, whom he had just made Duke of Mercia. If hitherto Ethelred had lived in continual Fears and Troubles, it was nothing in comparison of the Misfortunes he drew on himself by this fatal Marriage. He had inconsiderately taken into his Family a Traitor sold to the Danes, who never failed on all occasions, to betray the King and Kingdom to the Foreigners.

Hardly was a Year pass'd since the last Treaty with the Danes, when they demanded the same Sum again (9), pretending it to be a yearly Tribute due by Contract from Ethelred. This Demand was accompanied with Threats of destroying the whole Kingdom with Fire and Sword, if the Money was not immediately paid. This new Pretension of the Danes convincing the King and his Council, there was no possibility of ever contenting their insatiable Avarice, it was judg'd the Money would be better laid out in equipping a Fleet capable of defending the Kingdom from their Incursions. Necessity made them put this Resolution so speedily in practice, that quickly after, the King had a Fleet well mann'd and victuall'd (10), the Command whereof was given to Brithric, Brother of mdric Streon, Duke of Mercia. These Measures oblig'd the Danes to retire for fear of being forced to a Sea-Engagement, which their Ships were not so fit for as those of the English (11).

The first thing Brithric did, after his being made Admiral, was to use all his Interest to ruin Ulnoth, a Lord of distinguished Quality (12), but his Enemy. He accused him to the King of I know not what Crimes, of which Ulnoth did not think fit to purge himself by a publick Trial, being sensible his Condemnation was already concert'd. He resolv'd therefore upon a voluntary Exile, to screen himself from this persecution; and perswaded nine Captains (13) to follow him with their Ships. After which he infested the English Coasts, and did as much mischief as the Danes. Brithric, enraged at his Enemy's escape, and his daring to brave him thus, put to Sea with eighty Sail to give him chase, and endeavour to seize him alive or dead. But he met with so violent a Storm, that the greatest part of his Ships were lost or fell into the hands of Ulnoth. Thus this great Fleet, which could not be fitted out, without a prodigious expence, was render'd unserviceable by the Admiral's passion. The loss became still more irretrievable, by the dissension among the Sea-Officers; several of whom went and join'd Ulnoth.

In the mean time, the Danes took advantage of these Disorders. The next Spring two of their Fleets arrived in England, one in East-Anglia, under Turkil, another in the Isle of Thanet, under Heming and Anlaf. These Leaders joining their Forces in Kent, plundered the Country, and then laid Siege to Canterbury. The City would have infallibly fallen into the hands of the Danes, if the Inhabitants had not purchased a Peace with a large sum of Money (14).

Whilst the Danes were pillaging Kent, Ethelred drew an Army together to oppose their Ravages. As soon as he was ready, he posted himself between them and their Ships to prevent their embarking and carrying off their Booty. Probably, he would have executed his Project, and perhaps gained some further considerable Advantage, considering the Superiority of his Forces, if Edric had not found means to bring off the Danes. The Traitor perceiving their Danger, represented to the King, his Father-in-law, that it would be more advantageous to let them retire than hazard a Battle, which might prove fatal to him. This pernicious Advice made such Impression on the King, that he suffer'd them to march by, with all their Plunder, unmolested. But instead of sailing for Denmark, as 'twas expected, they threw themselves into the Isle of Thanet; from

(1) Which was drawn up in Wiltshire and Wiltshire. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 360.

(2) Though the Danes and some of the Ravens, Malmesbury says it was for his Father's Perfidiousness, who had revolted several times.

(3) Historia Britanica and Annales. Sax. Ann.

(4) But he did not ———— and in that same Precedent in Ordo Angliæ, quibus optimum visum est. Sax. Ann.

(5) The Saxons remark'd, that the English were very thorp, and did in a great Slaughter on both sides, wherein abundance of the English Nobility were kill'd. But still the English Fleet had been there, the Danes had never reach'd their Ships. Anna 1004.

(6) Consisting of the Marquis of Wiltshire and Mercia. Sax. Ann.

(7) The Danes took Canterbury they plunder'd [not Kent] but Hampshire and Berkshire, as far as Reading, and burnt Wallingford. See Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 360.

(8) Edric was a Saxon, and not a Danish, and therefore it was not a Proper, but a Surname only. Rapin.

(9) Which was statin'd at Sandwich. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 360. S. Dunelm. p. 166.

(10) The Saxon Annals tell us, this was the largest and best Fleet, and had ever seen. It was built after this manner all over England; every hundred and thirty Hides of Land were oblig'd to find one Ship, and every eight Hides a Helmet and Breast-Plate. Ann MVIII, MIX. It must be observ'd that the Danes, and the English, somtimes paid the Danes, as well as the Tax for building a Fleet, were all levied with the joint Consent of the King and his Council, or Witten-Gemot.

(11) Edric was a Saxon, and not a Danish. Sax. Ann.

(12) The Saxon Annals say, and the rest of the Historians, say twenty. See Huntingd. p. 360. S. Dunelm. p. 166.

(13) Three thousand Pounds. Sax. Ann. MIX. After they had got these three thousand Pounds, they sail'd round to the Isle of Wight, and plunder'd Isle, Hampshire, and Berkshire, burning several Towns. And here it was that Ethelred drew an Army against them, not whilst they were ravaging Kent. See Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 361. S. Dunelm. p. 167. Brompt. p. 807.

Ulfketel defeated.

The Danes mount some of their Troops, and become Masters of almost all Wessex. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. S. Dunelm. Brompton.

1012. They burn Canterbury. Thora.

Money is given them.

They retire. S. Dunelm. M. West.

1013. Sweyn returns into England.

whence, during the whole Winter, they made incursions into the neighbouring Counties. They even made several attempts upon London; but were always repuls'd. Mean while, Ulfketel, Duke of East-Anglia, willing once more to try the fortune of a battle in defence of his government, had the misfortune to be overthrown, and by his defeat left them masters of the country, he intended to defend.

Hitherto the Danes wanted Cavalry, by reason of the difficulty of transporting Horses from Denmark. But as soon as they were in possession of East-Anglia, a country abounding with Horses, they mounted part of their troops, and by that means extended their conquests. Shortly after they subdued Essex, Middlesex, Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire (1), Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Huntingtonshire, Northamptonshire, Kent, Surrey, Sussex, Hampshire, Wiltshire, and Devonshire, whilst Ethelred, who had scarce any thing left, kept himself shut up in London, without daring to take the field and stop their progress. In all the abovenamed Counties, London and Canterbury were the only places in the King's power. But at length they attack'd the last so vigorously, that they took, plundered, and reduced it to ashes. Elphegus the Archbishop being taken prisoner, was afterwards murdered by these Barbarians (2). They proceeded with the same cruelty towards the Monks of St. Augustin's, whom they put under a decimation, destroying nine parts in ten (3).

England being reduced to this deplorable state, all the great Men of the kingdom assembled at London with the King, to consult upon a remedy for such violent evils. The best expedient they could find, was to bribe these foreigners with money to leave the kingdom. The sum agreed upon amounted to 48,000 pounds (4), which having received they departed with their booty (5).

Though the retreat of the Danes cost England dear, the people thought themselves happy to be thus freed from their enemies, hoping they should repair by a peace, the damages sustained by the war. But they were far from seeing yet the end of their miseries. Hardly had they enjoyed any quiet, when news came that Sweyn (6) was entered the Humber (7) with a powerful fleet, threatening the whole kingdom with desolation and ruin. As this Prince found the country unprovided with troops, and unable to defend itself, he quickly became master of Northumberland, East-Anglia, in a word, of all the Counties lying north of Watling-Street. But these conquests not satisfying his ambition, he takes hostages of all the principal towns; and leaving his Son Canute to command the newly conquered Counties, he advances southward, and on a sudden lays siege to London, where Ethelred was shut up. Though he was but ill provided with necessaries to besiege in form a place of that importance, he imagined the citizens would be terrified at his Menaces. But finding they were not moved by them, he desisted from his enterprize, and went and ravag'd the western parts of Wessex, where he found no opposition to his arms. However, as he could not be easy whilst London was out of his power, he resolved to besiege it once more. But whilst he was preparing for the siege with greater precaution than before, he had information of Ethelred's departure from thence. This unfortunate Prince ever dreading to fall into the hands of an enemy he had so heinously injured, and perceiving himself unsafe at London, retired into Normandy with all his family. Whereupon the Londoners being left to take care of themselves, judged it a rash undertaking to maintain alone the rights of a Prince relinquished by himself. They resolved therefore to submit to the King of Denmark, to whom all the rest of the kingdom was now subject. Presently after the surrender of London, Sweyn was proclaimed King of England without any opposition, no one person in the kingdom daring to dispute his title.

If becomes Master of several Counties. Sax. Ann. Malmsh. Huntingd. S. Dunelm. M. West.

15. SWEYN King of Denmark, and first of the Danish Kings in England.

SWEYN imposes a great Tax.

1014. He dies suddenly. Malmsh. S. Dunelm. M. West.

THE first act of Sovereignty exercised by the new King, was an immense tax on the kingdom for payment of the Danish troops who assisted him in his conquests. No Historian mentions the coronation of this Prince. Perhaps he neglected this solemnity, believing it unnecessary; or, it may be, matters of greater importance afforded him no time to think of it, during his short reign of less than a year. Some say he died a natural death, being choak'd by a rheum. Others believe he was poisoned. Whatever was the cause,

'tis certain he died suddenly, which gave occasion to the legend Writers to say he was killed with a Club or Lance by St. Edmund, formerly King of East-Anglia. It is pretended, this Saint did it to save the town, where his Body lay buried (8), from being plundered for refusing to pay the tax imposed by the new King. The shortness of his reign, and perhaps his not being crown'd, are the reasons Historians, for the most part, have not reckon'd this Prince in the number of the Kings of England.

ETHELRED II. restor'd.

ETHELRED II. 1014.

Sax. Ann. Malmsh. Huntingd. S. Dunelm.

UPON the death of Sweyn, his Son Canute was proclaimed King of England by the Danes. But the English recalled Ethelred, promising to support him in the throne, against all the attempts of the Danes, whose government was become insupportable. Ethelred at first was loth to trust to their promises, being apprehensive of a design to deliver him into the hands of his enemies. But being encouraged by the good reception his Son met with, whom he had sent before to sound the people's inclinations, he returned to England. He was received with great demonstrations of joy; and his Subjects swore allegiance to him again, as if he had begun a new reign, his flight being considered as a sort of abdication of the crown. For his part, he promised to reform whatever was amiss in the administration of the government before his retreat. The eagerness of the English to throw off a foreign yoke, made them flock to the King with such zeal and haste, that he soon found himself at the head of a powerful army. His first expedition plainly showed, his misfortunes had made no great alteration in him. Instead of marching against the Danes, he made use of his Forces to be reveng'd on the Men of Lindsey (9), who had some way displeased him. After he had gratified his passion by the chastisement of these people, he prepared to march and fight the Danes, who little expected so sudden a revolution. Though Canute had for

He chastises the Lindseymen.

(1) Oxford being burnt that year by the Danes, all studies ceased there till the year 1133. Tho. Redburn.

(2) He was killed at Greenwich, to which place, the station of their Ships, they had brought him prisoner. And therefore in the old Church of Greenwich, on the top of the partition Wall, between the Nave of the Church and the Chancel, was this inscription, This Church was erected and dedicated to the Glory of God, and the Memory of St. Alpheg, Archbishop of Canterbury, here slain by the Danes; because he would not ransom his Life by any unreasonable Sum of Money. An. 1012. He was first buried at St. Paul's in London, and afterwards removed to Canterbury. He was honour'd as a Martyr, and stands in the Roman Martyrology on the 19th of April.

(3) Florence of Worcester says, the Burghers were served in the same manner; so that only four Monks, and about eight hundred Laymen were left alive. Lambard supposes there were about forty three thousand two hundred persons massacred. Peramb. of Kent.

(4) Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 361. and Brompton say but eight thousand.

(5) Forty five of their Ships submitted to Ethelred, and promised to defend the kingdom, provided he would allow them Victuals and Cloathes. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 361.

(6) The English Historians have not told us the Reason why Sweyn staid away so long, as from 1005 to 1013, eight years.

(7) He came first to Sandwich, and from thence sailing to the Mouth of the Humber, he went up the Trent, as far as Gainsborough. Sax. Ann. Malmsh. S. Dunelm. Ingulph.

(8) St. Edmund's-bury.

(9) One of the three Divisions of Lindsey, viz. Holland, Kesteven, and Lindsey. The Saxon Annals tell us, the Men of Lindsey had provided the Danes with Horses, and designed to join with them in their Ravages. An. MXIV.

Nº VII. VOL. I. H h him

Canute returns into Denmark:
The Reason
of it.

The Cause of his leaving
England.

Avarice and Cruelty of Ethelred.
Sax. Ann.
S. Dunelm.

Puts two Earls to Death for their Estates.
Sax. Ann.
Malmib.
M. West.
S. Dunelm.

The Marriage of his Son Edmund.
Malmib.

1016.
Canute returns to England.

Is favoured
by Streon.
Ann. Sax.
Malmib.
Hunt. ind.
S. Dunelm.

him all the Danes, and the same forces his Father Sweyn had conquer'd England with, he did not think fit to hazard a battle. On the contrary, before Ethelred was advanc'd near enough to oblige him to fight, he led his Troops to the sea-side, and embarking them, set sail for Denmark. But before his departure, he ordered the hands and feet of the hostages he had in his power, to be cut off, leaving them thus mangled on the shore (1).

The retreat of this Prince cannot but seem strange, since he had never been worsted, and besides, had many strong places still in his hands. It is no less to be wonder'd, that the English historians should not explain the cause of so hasty a retreat. But what the English history passes over in silence, is supplied by the Danish. We are there informed, that Canute had a younger brother, named Harold, who being regent in the absence of his Father Sweyn, seized upon the Kingdom for himself. 'Twas this that obliged Canute to leave England, with a precipitation that seemed to be an effect of fear rather than sound Policy, as it really was. This Prince did not believe he ought to abandon the kingdom of his ancestors, for the sake of a strange and newly conquer'd country, ripe for a general defection. And indeed, if the revolt of the English had engaged him in a long war, as was but too probable, what assistance could he expect from Denmark, whilst the kingdom was in the hands of his brother? He made it but too visible afterwards, when having settled his affairs in the North, he returned with his victorious Troops to England, that he was incapable of the fear that was laid to his charge.

As soon as Ethelred saw himself freed from the Danes, he never thought of performing his promise to his Subjects. On the contrary, he resum'd his old maxims, and imposed, on several pretences, excessive taxes (2), which raised great murmurings among the Nobles and People.

To these occasions of publick complaint, he added others of a more private nature, which destroyed all the hopes entertained of his amendment. Morcard and Siffrith, Lords of Danish extraction, who had all along firmly adhered to the interest of the King and their new Country, were sacrific'd to his avarice. To draw these two Earls into his snare, the King conven'd a great Council at Oxford (3), where he caused them to be murdered, and then seized their Estates, as if they had been condemned by the common forms of Justice (4). Aligitha, Widow of Siffrith, was shut up in a Monastery, to which confinement she was indebted for her after greatness. Edmund, the King's eldest Son passing that way, some time after, had a mind to see a Lady so renown'd for her beauty, and fell so desperately in love with her, that he married her, even against his Father's consent.

The calm England enjoy'd after the retreat of the Danes, lasted but one year. Canute having got possession of the throne of Denmark, immediately set out for England, and, when least expected, landed a numerous Army at Sandwich. Ethelred, being then out of order, Edmund his Son, with Streon Duke of Mercia, his Son-in-law, had the command of the army against the Danes. Edmund soon perceiv'd his Brother-in-law was a friend to Canute. This discovery made him invent some pretence to divide the army into two bodies, that he might be separated from him, not daring to punish the traitor, for fear of exciting a revolt in Mercia, where Streon's Power was exceeding great. Besides, he dreaded his Father's displeasure, who would never be persuaded, his Son-in-law held intelligence with the Danes. Canute taking advantage of this division of the English forces, made large conquests immediately; and the treacherous Edric, who had join'd Edmund with no other view but to betray him, finding he had lost his aim, openly declar'd for Canute. This would have been rather an advantage than a detriment to the King's affairs, if the Traitor had not carried with him a considerable body of troops, with forty ships of war. This desertion which prov'd very serviceable to Canute, was a mortal wound to Ethelred. The People went over in crowds to the Danes, in proportion as the King's affairs fell to decay. Even Wessex itself was not very secure (5).

Canute's expectations daily increasing by these successes, he turn'd his arms against those of the Mercians who continued in their allegiance to the King, and at length, with the assistance of Streon, entirely subdu'd them. After which he form'd a design to attack Ethelred in Wessex itself. He had the more reason to expect success in this enterprize, as Edric had artfully insinuated into the Mercians that were in the English army, a notion that it was a sin to bear arms against a Prince, in possession of their country. All that Edmund could obtain of these troops, was that they would follow the King when he commanded the army in Person, refusing to fight under any other General. In this extremity, Edmund used all possible endeavours to persuade the King his Father, who feign'd himself sick at London, to take the command of the army. But the more Ethelred was press'd, the more he was confirm'd in his Suspicion of a design to deliver him to the Danes, imagining the English had no other way to make a peace with them. As he durst not quit London where he thought himself safe, he refus'd to go to the army; and the Prince his Son had the vexation to see his troops disperse, without being able to oblige them to stand a battle. In the mean time, Canute taking advantage of these disorders, enlarged his conquests with great rapidity.

In these wretched circumstances, Edmund saw no remedy but to go himself to London, and try to persuade the King to head the army. He prevail'd at last with great difficulty, and by his extraordinary care, rais'd another army more numerous than the former. His design was to give Canute battle, persuaded as he was, that nothing but a signal victory could retrieve the affairs of the English. Ethelred came to the army according to his promise, but upon his arrival was seized by his old fears. Whether he had any ground for his suspicion, or it was instill'd into him by the Traitors about his Person, he made but a very short stay, returning to London with all imaginable speed. After his departure, the army being much weaken'd by the retreat of the Mercians, who ultimately refus'd to fight without the King at their head, Edmund was oblig'd to keep at a distance from the Danes, for fear of engaging at a great disadvantage. Then Canute finding no farther opposition, became master of several counties in Wessex, and soon saw himself in condition to complete the conquest of the whole Kingdom.

Edmund perceiving he was unable to stop the progress of the Enemy, resolv'd to go and join Uthred Earl of Northumberland, who had levied some troops in the North. They ravag'd together those parts of the country that sided with the Danes (6), whilst Canute and the Duke of Mercia laid waste the southern counties that persisted in their obedience to Ethelred (7). But Canute did not long suffer his Friends to be expos'd to the ravages of the English. The moment he was informed of what pass'd in the North, he march'd thither with the utmost expedition, and compelled Edmund and Uthred to retire into Lancashire, where they were not very secure. Uthred, finding he was no match for Canute, thought best to submit to the Danish King, who continued him in his government, though but for a little while. As he plainly saw the Earl had changed sides purely by compulsion, and had reason to fear he would not remain faithful, he caused him to be put to death, and placed Eric a Danish Lord in his room.

Edmund being at a loss what to do, retired to his Father at London, and earnestly press'd him to exert himself on the present occasion; but all to no purpose. Ethelred, who till then had feigned himself sick, fell dangerously ill in good earnest, and died soon after in the fiftieth year of his age, and the thirty-seventh of his Reign (8). Never was England in a more deplorable state, than in the Reign of this Prince.

He had by his first Wife Elgiva (9), Edmund, who succeeded him; Athelstan, who died in his child-hood; ano-

(1) He sailed to Sandwich, where he set the Hostages on Shore, and then went away to Denmark. The Historians say, he cut off their Hands, Noses, and Ears, without any mention of their Feet. Sax. Ann. Malmib. p. 71. S. Dunelm. p. 171. &c.

(2) Particularly twenty one thousand Pound, for his Fleet and Army that was at Greenwich. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 362. S. Dunelm. and Hoved. say, it was thirty thousand Pound. p. 141. 435. --- Ann. 1014. Sept. 28. There was such an Inundation of the Sea, that it overflowed several Towns, and drown'd abundance of People. Sax. Ann. Malmib. p. 71.

(3) Of English and Danes. Malmib. p. 71. M. Westm. 395.

(4) Flora of Worcester, and Matthew Westm. relate, that these two Earls were privately accused by Edric, who gaped after their Estates, of treasonable Practices against Ethelred, by whose Order Edric invited them to a Feast, where he caused them to be treacherously murdered. Their Dependents, who went about to revenge their Deaths, were forced to fly into St. Fridolf's Church in Oxford, which being set on fire, they perished in the Flames. But the King's repenting of his Cruelty, caused the Church to be rebuilt. In this, and several other Particulars, it is plain, that Ethelred was egged on by the treacherous Edric, to make him odious to the People; and that he was not so bad as is represented, as appears from the good Laws he made, which are still extant. He was so particularly careful of the due Execution of Justice, that having found one Walgeatus, a Judge, whom he loved, guilty of Injustice, he deposed him from his Office.

(5) Canute plundered Derby, Wilt, and Somerset shires. Sax. Ann. Malmib. p. 71. S. Dunelm. p. 172.

(6) Staffordshire, Shropshire, Lancashire. Sax. Ann.

(7) Buckingham, Bedford, Huntingdon, Lincoln, Nottinghamshires; and so through Northumbria towards York. Sax. Ann. Malmib. p. 71, 72. S. Dunelm. p. 172. Brompt.

(8) He was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. Malmib. p. 72.

(9) Or Ethelgiva, the Daughter of Earl Egbert. Brompt. p. 877. He says in the same place, that he had his first Children by a Foreigner, that was his Concubine: --- by the Daughter of Earl Tostig, says Ricciardus. p. 302.

ther Son call'd Edwy, and three Daughters. Edgiva the eldest was married to an English Earl, who was slain in Battle. Edgith his second, had the misfortune to fall to the lot of the Traitor Edric Duke of Mercia. Edgiva the youngest was Wife of Uthred Earl of Northumberland. By Emma of Normandy his second Wife, he had Alfred and Edward, and a Daughter named Goda, who was first married to Walter

Earl of Manter, and afterwards to Eustachius Earl of Boulogne.

Ethelred has commonly the surname of the Unready given him by historians, either because he was often surpriz'd by the Danes, or was never Ready when he was to go to the wars. At his coming to the crown, he found the Kingdom in a rich and flourishing condition, but left it at his death in extreme poverty and desolation.

16. EDMUND II. Surnam'd Ironside.

AFTER Ethelred's death, the City of London and all the Lords there present proclaimed his Son Edmund King of England, who had already given signal proofs of his courage and conduct.

But the Danes and all the counties in their possession declar'd for Canute (1). However as the English obeyed their wills, abundance of them came and offered their service to Edmund, whom they looked upon as their lawful Prince, though they were constrained to swear to his Rival. By this means the two Kings were more upon an equality, which occasion'd many engagements with various success, that serv'd only to prolong the war, but not to decide the quarrel. The city of London being a great support to Edmund, the Danish King thought of taking it from him, believing the depriving him of his chief strength would put a speedy end to the war. With this view, whilst Edmund was elsewhere employ'd (2), he approach'd London, and forming the siege, carried it on vigorously. But the brave resistance of the citizens giving Edmund time to throw in succours from the other side of the Thames, Canute saw himself oblig'd to raise the siege. Having thus lost his aim, he us'd many stratagems to surprize the enemy, or draw him off from London. This last project succeeding, he went and laid siege a second time to the city. But he met with the same difficulties as before; the Inhabitants, by a very obstinate defence, giving Edmund time to come to their relief.

Canute vexed to see his measures thus broken, suddenly raised the siege, to go and offer Edmund battle (3), who was no less desirous of deciding the quarrel, by one single action, and therefore, instead of retreating, march'd towards him. In this battle, which was very bloody, they both gave signal proofs of their conduct and courage, without either of them being able to make victory incline to his side. After a long fight, the two armies were oblig'd to part with almost an equal loss. The English army however had like to have been worsted by the artifice of Edric Streon, who was on the side of the Danes. This Lord perceiving the English troops, contrary to his Expectation, fought in such manner as made the victory dubious, cut off the head of one Osmer a soldier, who very much resembled Edmund, and fixing it on the top of his lance, advanc'd to the foremost ranks, and exposing it to the view of the English, cry'd out aloud, Fly, fly, you scoundrels, behold the head of your King, in whom you trust. The English were thunder-struck at this sight, which would have occasion'd their defeat, had not the King shown himself with his helmet off to his astonish'd troops, and by that means reviv'd their courage, which the belief of his death began to cool. The battle lasting till night, without any visible advantage on either side, Edmund prepared to renew the fight next morning. But Canute, who had other designs, retired, during the night (4), to his fleet that expected him, and embarking his troops, rowed along the coast for some time, to amuse the enemy, who could not guess his Intention. When he thought he had deceived Edmund, he landed his forces, and besieged London a third time. But succeeding no better than formerly, he retir'd elsewhere.

The particulars of this war would be curious enough, if it were possible to give a clear account of them. But we meet with extreme confusion in this part of the Eng- lish history. What may be gathered from historians for certain, is this, that the two contending Princes fought within the space of one year, five pitch'd battles. One of these battles, fought in Essex, would have infallibly prov'd fatal to Canute, had it not been for the pernicious advice of Edric Streon, who continually changing sides, was then in the English army. Edmund had been so generous as to pardon him, and so easy as to give credit to his oaths of being entirely devoted to his service for the future. Nevertheless, this traitor, who was a creature of the King of Denmark, let no opportunity slip of serving the Dane. As he saw the Danes, hard pressed by the English, retreating in great disorder, he artfully persuaded Edmund to stop the pursuit of the fugitives, by making him apprehensive their despair might cause them to rally, and the victory, by some unforeseen accident, be snatch'd out of his hands. This artifice, which had formerly taken effect with Ethelred, wrought likewise with Edmund, who suffered himself to be guided by this fatal advice. One is at a loss which to admire most, Edmund's Imprudence in being govern'd by a man of known disloyalty, or the traitor's boldness and confidence. Tired at length with dissembling his real Sentiments, he threw away the mask in the last battle near Affandun (5). Whilst the two armies were engaged, he suddenly deserted his post, and joined the Danes, who received him as their real friend. This treachery caused such consternation among the English, that throwing down their arms, they thought of nothing but saving themselves by flight. Edmund's loss upon this occasion was irretrievable, the flower of the English nobility being slain in this unfortunate battle. The Earls Alfric, Goodwin, Ulfketel, Ethelward, all of distinguished valour and loyalty, fell that day with their swords in their hands in defence of their King and Country.

After this important victory, Canute looked upon himself as irresistible. He could not conceive, Edmund would ever be able to bring another army into the field that durst look him in the face. But as the English were in extreme danger, they made extraordinary efforts for their deliverance. Edmund had for him the hearts of his subjects, and particularly the Londoners, who were always ready to give him effectual proofs of their affection and loyalty. And therefore, so far was he from being cast down by this grievous misfortune, that he rallied his dispersed troops, and drawing together a more powerful army than what he had lost, went in quest of his enemy, who was marching to Gloucester. Canute, for his part, unwilling to give him time to augment his forces, made haste to meet him with intent to offer him battle. The two Kings stood in sight of each other for some time, at the head of their respective armies (6), without either giving the signal of battle. The dread of the event held them equally in suspense. Edmund was sensible, he should be irretrievably undone, if he lost the day; and Canute foresaw a general defection of the English, in case he were vanquish'd. Thus, in all appearance, the gain or loss of a great kingdom depended on the success of that important day. At last, Edmund, who was strong and robust of body, and for that reason surnam'd Iron-side, sent Canute word, that to prevent the great effusion of blood, that was going to be spilt in their quarrel, he judg'd it proper for them two to decide it by single combat. Canute returned in answer, that, though he came not be-1016.

Sax. Ann.
G. Malm.
Huntingd.
S. Dunelm.

The fatal Advice of Edric to the King.

The Battle of Affandun, wherein Canute
gains the victory
by the treachery
of Edric.
Sax. Ann.
Brompt.
M. West.
Huntingd.

Edmund
raises another
Army.

Sax. Ann.

Edmund
sends a Challenge to Canute, who refuses it.
Malmib.

(1) Simon of Durham, and others, say, that the Bishops, Abbots, and many of the English Nobles coming to Southampton, abjured the Race of Ethelred, at the same time they chose Canute for their King, and swore Fealty to him; who also swore to them in Matters Ecclesiastical and Civil, to be their faithful Lord.

(2) He was gone to secure Wessex, which submitted to him. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 362. S. Dunelm. p. 173.

(3) This was about Midsummer. Sax. Ann. Brompt. p. 904.

(4) This Battle was fought at Sceriflan, which Camden supposes to be Staston in Wiltshire; others think it to be the Place where four Stones, called Scerif-stones, part the four Counties of Oxford, Gloucester, Worcester, and Warwick. Milton makes the Battle to have lasted two whole Days, and Canute to have march'd all the second Night: so doth Matt. Westminster, p. 498. and he relates Edric's Stratagem under the second Day.

(5) Affandun in Essex near Walden. Canute built a Church here in memory of this Battle to pray for the Souls of the slain; and caused four Hillocks to be thrown up, as Monuments of those that were killed in the Battle. Two of these monuments being opened, and searched into, there were found three Stone-Collars, with abundance of pieces of Bones in them, and many Chains of Iron, like those on Horas Bits. These Hills are commonly called Battle-Hills, though they lie in Affandun Parish. Some think it was Battle Church that was built by Canute. See Magna Britannia, Vol. I. p. 670. and Camden.

(6) The Place was Deurbury in Gloucestershire. S. Dunelm. p. 175. Brompt. p. 905.

Edmund
proclaimed
King by the English.
Higden.
Polychron.
The Danes declare for Canute.
Sax. Ann.
G. Malm.
Huntingd.
S. Dunelm.
M. West.

London besieged twice,
and both times relieved.

A Battle
where neither Side had the Victory.

Artifice of Edric to debauch
the English.
Malmib.
Huntingd.
S. Dunelm.
Matt. West.
Brompt.

Canute
withdraws in the night.

and besieges
London again without success.

Five Battles between Edmund and Canute in one Year.

hind his antagonist in courage, yet being of a weak constitution and small stature, he should take care how he engaged in so unequal a combat. Adding, if Edmund was desirous to prevent any further effusion of blood, he was ready to refer the decision of matters to the principal Officers of the two armies. This proposal was received with joy by the Nobles of Edmund's party, who passionately desired to find some expedient to put an end to so fatal a war. Edmund, on the contrary, would fain have decided the quarrel by arms, but however, durst not oppose the Nobility, for fear it should occasion their desertion. Plenipotentiaries therefore were nominated on both sides, who met in a little Isle in the Severn, called Alney, over against Gloucester, to consult about settling the pretensions of the two Princes. After a short conference, the peace was concluded by the partition of the kingdom. Wessex, that is, all the country South of the Thames, with the city of London, and part of the antient kingdom of Essex (1), was assigned to Edmund. Canute had for his share the kingdom of Mercia, including Northumberland and East-Anglia. Every thing being settled, the two Kings met in the Isle of Alney; and mutually swearing to preserve the peace, Edmund retired into Wessex (2).

The Peace made by the division of the kingdom.
Sax. Ann.
S. Dunelm.

Remarks on the pretended Duel between the two Kings.
Huntingd.
Brompton.
M. Weft.
Ethel. Rie-
val.

Edmund's challenging Canute has given occasion to some Historians to affirm, the two Kings actually fought a duel in the Isle of Alney. And to make this appear the more probable, they have taken care to be very particular in the circumstances of this mighty combat. They tell us, after it had lasted a good while without any advantage on either side, Canute finding his strength to fail him, lifted up the Visor of his Helmet, and proposed the division of the kingdom, which Edmund consented to immediately. It is further added, at the same instant, they ran to embrace one another, to the astonishment of the two armies, who were spectators. But the best Historians not mentioning this single combat, it can't be conceived they would have neglected to embellish their Histories with so notable an event, had there been any foundation for it (3).

Edmund did not long enjoy the peace, that cost him so much pains. Edric Streon his Brother-in-law, fearing the union of the two Kings might prove fatal to him, bribed two of the King's Chamberlains to assassinate him. Some report, he employed his own Son in this execrable treason. Thus died that brave Prince, who deserved a better fate (4). He had not sat on the throne a whole year. But in so short a reign, he had given frequent proofs of an undaunted courage, a consummate prudence, and a generous temper.

He left, by Aligtha his wife, two Sons, Edmund and Edward, of whom I shall have occasion to speak hereafter. He had also a natural Son, named Eduy, who was afterwards put to death by Canute.

The Duke of Mercia, who was mightily pleased with doing Canute so signal a service, made haste to bring him the first news of it; but Canute detected so barbarous a deed. However he concealed his sentiments, because he thought he should have farther occasion for the Traitor, and even promised to advance him above all the Peers of the Realm. He kept his word with him; but in a very different manner from what the Villain expected.

1017.
Edmund's
Death.
G. Malmsh.
Huntingd.
M. Weft.
R. de Di-
etco.

Canute's Promise to Edric.
Huntingd.
Ethel. Rie-
vallenfis.
M. Weft.

17. CANUTE the Great, the second Danish King of England.

1017.
Canute gets himself acknowledge
King of all
England.

S. Dunelm.
Howd.
Brompton.

THE death of Edmund furnished Canute with an opportunity and pretence of becoming Master of Wessex, which the lawful Heirs were little able to dispute with him. It was not properly by force of arms, that he undertook to carry his point, but by extorting the consent of the Nobles. How averse soever the English might be to the Danish government, he was in hopes, the dread of plunging the kingdom into fresh calamities, would make a still deeper impression on them, and constrain them to comply with his desires. Wherefore he required a general assembly to be called in Wessex (5), in order to set forth his claim, reckoning it would be always seasonable to use force, if he met with too strong an opposition. Edmund having left two Sons and two Brothers, Canute did not seem to have any right to pretend to the Crown. But he maintained, that in the treaty of the Isle of Alney, the agreement was, the Survivor of the two Kings should succeed the other. He moreover plainly intimated, he should not stand to the determination of the assembly, if the matter were decided against him. Edmund's two Sons were very young, and his Brothers in Normandy, where they thought of nothing left than obtaining the crown of Wessex. On the other hand, Canute was in great power, and threatened very hard. Besides his possessing half the kingdom, he had many friends among the West-Saxons themselves, without reckoning those who were persuaded any expedient was preferable to the renewing of the war. It was therefore scarce possible for the friends of the English Princes to surmount so great obstacles. Had they been obstinately bent to continue the succession in the family of Edmund, they would have, probably, rekindled in the kingdom a war, which must have ended in its destruction. In this perplexity, they were contented with insinuating, that they would agree, Canute should be declared Protector of Edmund's children, till the eldest was of age to govern. By this means, though they placed not these Princes on the throne, at least they preserved their rights entire. But Canute was not satisfied with a borrowed power. He was willing to succeed Edmund in his own right, by virtue of the treaty of Alney; a right which though all did not acknowledge, yet none durst openly contest. Though the treaty did not expressly say what he asserted, he maintain'd it to be the true sense thereof, and that it could not be otherwise understood without infringement. To prove this to be the design and intent of the parties concern'd in the treaty, he called to witness all those who were present at the conclusion of the peace, and demanded of them, whether there was any thing stipulated in favour of Edmund's Sons? And upon their answering, there was no mention at all of the Princes (6), he inferr'd from thence they had no right to succeed their Father. This reasoning, weak as it was, being supported by the votes of his party, and moreover by the fears of the English in general, was sufficient to determine the assembly to comply with his will. His reasons were thought, or feigned to be thought, very solid; and without a closer examination, he was acknowledged and proclaimed King of all England, and all the Lords, both English and Danish, swore allegiance to him. Then he was crowned, and immediately after, he divided the kingdom into four governments, Mercia, Northumberland, East-Anglia and Wessex. The first he gave to Edric Streon, the second to Eric, the third to Turkill, reserving Wessex to himself, without appointing either Duke or Earl.

Canute was too politic not to know the motive of the English acknowledging him for their Sovereign. Tho' all that came near him, took care to hide their sentiments, he was sensible an Enmity of near two hundred years standing, and fomented by continual wars, could not be extinguish'd in so short a space. For this reason, he resolved to use all possible precautions to hinder the revolt of the English. To this end two things were equally necessary, namely, the gaining the affection of his new Subjects, and the getting rid of those that could give him any uneasiness. Tho' these two projects seemed inconsistent, he despised not however of accomplishing them, and accordingly spent the beginning of his reign to that purpose. As he well knew, the most effectual means of becoming popular, was to cause Justice to be administered fairly and impartially, he publicly declared there should be, for the

S. Dunelm.
Howd.

He divides
England
into four Parts.
G. Malmsh.
l. 2. c. 11.
Huntingd.
Sax. Ann.

He lays a Scheme to get rid of his Enemies, and gain the Love of the People.

G. Malmsh.

(1) And all East-Anglia. M. Weft. p. 401. Flor. Wore. p. 613.

(2) And Canute into Mercia. Sax. Ann.

(3) Ethelred Abbot of Rievall, gives a very particular account of what passed before, at, and after this famous duel. With him agree Huntingd. and Matthæus of Westm. Malmsh. says, Edmund challenged Canute, but he declin'd the combat, and offered to divide the kingdom. Simon of Dunelm. and Howden, mention nothing of the challenge or duel, but only speak of the division of the kingdom by the persuasion of Edric, in the same manner as the Saxon Annals. So great is the uncertainty of this fact.

(4) Malmsh. and Brompton relate, that the two Villains stab'd him with a sharp piece of Iron, as he was easing Nature. Some will have him to be taken off by poison: Others to be slain by an Arrow shot by an Image made on purpose, which discharged itself upon the King's touching it. But this is improbable. (See the various opinions about his death in Brompton, p. 906.) The Annals say only, he died suddenly. He was buried by his Grandfather Edgar at Gloucester. With him fell the Glory of the English Saxons, and by his death the Danes prevailed, and the Saxon Morality in a manner ended, after it had lasted one hundred and ninety years from the establishment by Egbert, four hundred thirty two from the founding of the Heptarchy, and five hundred sixty eight from the arrival of the Saxons under Hengist.

(5) It was at London. See S. Dunelm. p. 175. Howd. p. 436.

(6) S. Dunelm. and Howd. plainly say, that they lyed, p. 175, 436.

future, no distinction between the English and Danes. After this, he published an Edict (1), ordering that every County should be governed by the same laws as in the time of the Saxon Kings. He excepted however the northern Counties, because they were peopled with scarce any other but Danes, who had introduc'd particular laws of their own, which there was no occasion to alter. The same Edict denounc'd the severest punishments against Malefactors, of what nation soever; the King's aim being to let the English see, they had no reason to fear any respect of persons. These wise precautions produced the intended effect. The people were never weary of testifying their satisfaction to see themselves govern'd by their ancient laws, under the protection of an equitable Prince, who seem'd to have no other view but the happiness of his subjects.

As soon as Canute saw the progress he had made in the hearts of the English, he believed he might venture without danger upon the second branch of his project, the freeing himself from those that gave him most uneasiness, and particularly the Saxon Princes. Alfred and Edward, Brothers of the late King, were retired into Normandy, with their Mother Emma, plainly foreseeing it would not be in the power of the West-Saxons to do justice to the royal family. As for Edmund's two Sons, they remain'd in England, being too young to think of providing for their safety. These two Princes, notwithstanding their youth, made the new King somewhat uneasy, by reason of the People's affection for them. He would not have scrupled to put them to death; but he could not take such a step in England, without running the risk of becoming odious to the English, which was destroying his designs. However, as he did not think himself perfectly safe, whilst these two Princes were alive, he gave them in charge to one of his domesticks to carry them into Denmark (2), under colour of sending them abroad to travel. But in reality it was only to have it in his power the more easily to dispatch them out of the way, when their absence should have lessened the affection of the people. The person entrusted with the Princes, being conscious of the King's designs, was touch'd with compassion for these Innocents, and instead of carrying them to Denmark, conducted them to the King of Sweden, discovering at the same time his Master's intentions. The King of Sweden gave the English Princes a very civil reception; but however, not to quarrel with Canute, he sent them to the court of Solomon, King of Hungary, his relation, who was willing to take care of their education. In process of time, Solomon gave one of his daughters in marriage to Edmund; and to Edward, his Sister-in-law Agitha, daughter of the Emperor Henry II. Edmund died soon after his marriage; but Edward had five children, of whom two died in Hungary: The rest were, Edgar Atheling, Margaret, and Christina.

There were still in England two Sons of Ethelred II. both nam'd Edwy, of whom one was born in wedlock, the other a Bastard. This last was call'd, but for what reason I know not, The King of the Clowns. Canute was no less troubled about these than the other Princes, every thing contributing to the suspicions of a Prince, who, not being satisfied with the lawfulness of his title, thinks himself unsecure in the throne. And therefore to make himself easy in this respect, he banish'd them the realm. But some time after, recalling the first, under pretence of being reconcil'd to him, found means to dispatch him out of the way. The other, after enduring many hardships in exile, return'd into England, where he kept himself concealed, being privately supplied by his friends with necessities for his subsistence (3).

Canute would have been very glad to be freed with the same ease, from the trouble occasion'd by Alfred and Edward, Brothers of King Edmund, who were retir'd into Normandy with their Mother. But he knew not how to get them out of the hands of Duke Richard II. their uncle. He was even apprehensive, the Duke, whose forces were not to be despis'd, would one day espouse their cause. To prevent this danger, he bethought himself of gaining the Duke of Normandy to his interests, by demanding in marriage his Sister Emma, widow of Ethelred II. and by offering him at the same time Estritha one of his Sisters. These Proposals being accepted, the two marriage-solemnities were celebrated in a magnificent manner. If Emma was pleas'd with being once more Queen of England, it was not so with Alfred and Edward her Sons, who openly shew'd their dislike. Edward especially, never forgave her for thus scandalously espousing the mortal enemy of her first Husband. Both of them were also extremely incens'd against her for consenting, by the marriage-articles, on the Heirs of her body by Canute. This was cutting off, as far as lay in her power, from the family of Ethelred, all hopes of ever mounting the throne.

After Canute had by these precautions secured himself from all dangers from the Saxon Princes, he thought it time to get rid of some Lords, whose fidelity he suspected, or whose power made him uneasy. The three principal ones were, the Duke of Mercia, the Duke of East-Anglia, and the Earl of Northumberland. These Lords had done him signal services; but this was the thing that render'd them formidable to him, being sensible how it lay in their power to hurt him, if they should undertake it. He knew Edric Streon was a Villain, and as he could not rely on his fidelity, since he had so often betray'd the two former Kings, notwithstanding the obligations that ought to have attached him to their interests, he resolv'd to begin with him. He quickly found a fair opportunity to execute this design, by even doing an act of Justice very acceptable to the English. This Lord, having one day the insolence to upbraid him publicly, for not rewarding him for his past services (4), and particularly for freeing him from so formidable a rival as Edmund, afforded him the pretence he had some time been seeking. Edric had no sooner dropt these words, but the King answer'd in a rage, since he was so audacious as openly to avow so black a treason, of which he had hitherto been only suspected, he should receive his due punishment. At the same instant, without giving him time to reply, he commanded him to be immediately beheaded, and his body thrown into the Thames (5). It is said he ordered his Head to be fix'd on the highest part of the Tower of London (6), that he might perform his promise to the traitor, to raise him above all the Peers of the realm. Thus Edric received at last the just reward of his treacheries. Eric, Earl of Northumberland, was banished the kingdom shortly after, under some pretence. Turkil, Duke of East-Anglia, frighted by these examples, and perhaps by the King's emissaries, voluntarily absented himself (7), for fear something worse might befall him. Several other Lords of less note falling in like manner a sacrifice to the King's jealousy or suspicions, their posts were fill'd with those in whom he placed greater confidence. From this time the English began to enjoy a state of tranquillity, which appear'd the sweeter to them, as they had been many years strangers to it, and had no reason to expect it. However they were forced to pay a tax of fourscore thousand pounds (8) for the arrears due to the Danish army, great part of whom were sent back to Denmark (9).

Canute finding the whole kingdom in profound tranquillity, and having no reason to fear a revolt, resolv'd upon a voyage to Denmark (10). His presence was absolutely necessary there, on account of the Danes and Vandals being at war. He took with him such of the English Lords as he suspected, lest his absence should encourage them to raise disturbances in the kingdom. For this reason also he carried with him the flower of the English troops, under the command of Earl Goodwin, Son of Ulnoth, mentioned in the reign of Ethelred II. Goodwin, who was a person of great experience, signalized himself in this war, by a very bold though successful action. The two armies of the Danes and Vandals being near one another, Canute designed to attack the enemies early the next morning. Whilst his troops were refreshing themselves, in expectation of the battle, Goodwin privately withdrawing from the Camp, with the

(1) This was done by a Wittena-Gemet at Oxford. Brompt. p. 908.

(2) All the English Historians affirm, That Walgar (or that was the Domestick's name) had orders to carry them to the King of Sweden, Swanarum or Suagorum. Hoved. p. 436. M. Westm. p. 206. Flor. Wenc. p. 619, &c.

(3) These two Edwey's are confounded by several Historians; but they are plainly distinguished in the Saxon Annals, and in the Genealogy at the end of the History of Alfred, written by Spelman. Rapin. As also in H. Huntingd. who calls the first Edwardsdelinge, and the second Edwardsberlesing, p. 363. Malmsh. says, Edwey-adelinge was buried at Tawshak in Denmark.

(4) He upbraided him for having deprived him of the Earldom of Mercia. M. Westm. p. 402.

(5) He was beheaded in the King's Palace, and his Body flung out of a Window, into the Thames. Malmsh. p. 73. M. Westm. p. 402. So that the King's Palace stood close to the Thames. Other Historians say, That the Body was cast upon the Wall of the City, and left there unburied. S. Dunelm. p. 177. Hoved. Brompt. 908.

(6) That could not be, since the Tower of London was not built till the Reign of William I. Huntingd. says, he ordered it to be fixed on the highest Tower in London. p. 303. and Brompton --- on the highest Gate in London, p. 908.

(7) He went to Denmark, where, as soon as he landed, he was taken, and put to death. Malmsh. p. 73.

(8) The Saxon Annals, Anno MXVIII. say, it was seventy-two thousand pounds, Huntingd. and Brompt. eighty thousand pounds, besides eleven Pierene says fifteen thousand paid by the City of London. Hence may be seen the flourishing condition of that City in these days, since it could pay almost a sixth part of this great Tax.

(9) By the persuasion of Queen Emma. M. Westm. p. 405. Canute kept forty Ships in England. Sax. Ann.

(10) W. de n. Watered. S. Dunelm. p. 177.

Body under his command, fell upon the Vandals in the night, and putting them in disorder by this sudden attack, made great slaughter of them, and routed the whole army. At break of day, Canute preparing for the battle, and not finding the English at their station, did not question but they were revolted to the enemy. While he was perplexed in his thoughts at this unexpected accident, he saw the English General arrive, who was come himself to bring him news of his Victory (1). Though this action was of a dangerous consequence, the King however was very willing, upon this occasion, to dispense with the rules of military discipline, which requir'd that Goodwin should be punish'd for daring to fight without orders. He received him with abundance of caresses, and as a reward for so signal a service, created him Earl of Kent. I shall have frequent occasion hereafter to speak of this Earl, who became at length the greatest Lord in England.

Sax. Ann.
S. Dunelm.
Brompten.

Three sorts of Laws in England.

1025.
Expedition of Canute against the Swedes.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.
M. Weft.

1027.
He becomes Master of Norway.
Sax. Ann.
Hoved.
Malmsh.
Sim. Dun.
Brompt.

Canute turns
his thoughts to Acts of Devotion.

Malmsh.
de Galt.
Pontific.
l. 2.
Brompten.

This war being happily ended, Canute returned into England, where immediately after his arrival he convened the great council (2), to confirm the Danish laws, which, for some time, had been observed in part of the kingdom, and particularly in Northumberland. There were then in England three sorts of laws, namely, the West-Saxon, Mercian, and Danish laws (3). But these last had not the sanction of public authority, till Canute, at his return from Denmark, put them upon a level with the ancient laws of England.

Canute, after his return into England, lived in profound tranquillity, wholly employed in causing justice and peace to flourish, and rendering his Subjects happy. But some time after he was obliged to discontinue these pacific employments, and take a second voyage to Denmark, then invaded by the Swedes. This expedition was not very prosperous. The English troops he carried with him were great sufferers; and he had the mortification to meet with misfortunes he had not been used to.

Two years after, unmindful of his ill success in the last war with the Swedes, he entered into another, which made him ample amends for his former losses. He resolved to revive some old pretensions to Norway, which had never been fully clear'd. Olafus, who then sat on the throne of Norway, was a weak and unwarlike Prince. Canute thought it would be easier for him to prosecute his pretensions in the reign of such a Prince, than at any other time. He began the execution of his design with privately forming a strong party among the Norwegian Lords (4). As soon as matters were ripe, he sail'd for Denmark with a considerable body of English troops (5), and suddenly landed them in Norway. Olafus, who had no intelligence of his practices, surpriz'd at this attack, and more so, to see the major part of his Subjects side with the enemy, found there was no remedy but to abandon his kingdom, and save himself by flight. Upon his retreat, Canute was crown'd King of Norway, regardless of the right, so long as he had the power in his hands. Two years after the dispossession Prince attempting to recover his dominions, was slain by his own Subjects, and Canute remain'd peaceable Possessor of the kingdom. Olafus, after his death, was ranked among the Saints, and honoured with the glorious title of Martyr.

The conquest of Norway fully satisfied Canute's ambition. From that time, laying aside all thoughts of warlike affairs, he gave himself up to acts of devotion: That is to say, he made it his principal business to enrich the Churches and Monasteries; as if the usurpation of two kingdoms, and all the consequent evils could be repaired by so slight a satisfaction. Among other things he took particular care to give public marks of his respect to St. Edmund, formerly King of East-Anglia, slain by the Danes. Perhaps he gave some credit to the story of his Father Swein's being kill'd by that Saint, or rather, was willing to stifle the report. However this be, he built a stately Church over the grave of that Prince, and very much enlarged the town where his body lay buried, which from him had the name of St. Edmundsbury. The Monastery, which was in the same place, and call'd Bradstoworth, had been endow'd by Edward the Elder. Canute enlarging the building, and augmenting the revenues, this religious house became one of the finest and richest in the kingdom (6).

After he had shewn, as he thought, visible marks of his devotion, he resolv'd upon a journey to Rome, which he perform'd in 1031. Whilst he staid there, he made many rich presents to the Churches, and confirmed all the grants of his predecessors to the Church of Rome and the English College. He obtain'd, for his part, certain privileges for the English Churches, and some advantages for those who came to visit the Tombs of the Apostles. But the most material privilege procur'd for the English, was an exemption from paying any Toll as they pass'd through Italy. The Emperor Conradus I, who was then at Rome, and with whom he had contracted a strict friendship, granted him the same privilege. The King of France was pleas'd also on his account, to grant the same favour to the English in his dominions. By this means the English pilgrims and travellers were eas'd of a great expence, and freed from a thousand insults and oppressions to which they were most liable in France, Italy, and Germany. We have a large account of these matters in a Letter writ by this Monarch from Rome, to the Assembly-General of the English Nation, informing them what he had done in favour of his Subjects. In this letter he professes a great piety, and a fix'd resolution to govern his kingdom after the most exact rules of justice, desiring withal his nobles to assist him in this good design (7).

As soon as he came back to England, he applied himself to the dedication of the Church of St. Edmund, which he had begun before his journey to Rome. In fine, having spent some years longer in continual acts of devotion (8), he died in 1036, in the nineteenth year of his reign (9).

Historians have not failed to give this Prince the surname of Great, a title, which seems peculiar to conquerors, as if true grandeur consisted in invading the rights and properties of others. But, not to confine grandeur within such narrow bounds, Canute may be said to merit this glorious title, if we consider only the latter part of his reign. The end of his life was very different from the beginning. One would have thought he had not been the same Prince, who, to gain kingdoms that belonged not to him, had caus'd so much blood to be spilt, and trampled upon Religion and Justice. Some years before his death, he became humble, modest, just, and truly religious. If there be no exaggeration in what Historians say of him, from the time he was thoroughly settled on the throne of England, he gave daily marks of Piety, Justice, and Moderation, which gained him the affection of his subjects, and an universal esteem among foreigners. We have the following story of him, which shews at once his good sense, and to what height Courtiers are apt to carry their Flatteries. One day, as he was walking by the Sea-side (10), his attendants extolled him to the skies, and even proceeded to compare him to God himself. Offended at these extravagant praises, and willing to convince them of their folly and impiety, he ordered a chair to be brought, and seating himself in a place where the tide was about to flow, turn'd to the Sea, and said; O Sea, thou art under my dominion, and the Land I sit on is mine: I charge thee not to presume to approach any further, nor to dare to wet the feet of thy Sovereign. Having said this, he sat still for some time, as expecting the Sea should obey his commands. But the tide advancing as

(1) Huntingd. and Brompt. say, that Canute himself advanced as far as the Enemies camp, where he found nothing but Slaughter, &c.
(2) At Gloucester, at Easter: and there ----- Omnes leges ab antiquis regibus latas observari precepit. ----- Enjoined the Observance of the Laws made by his Predecessors. Malmsh. p. 75. Flor. West. says it was at Oxford, and that the English and Danes unanimously agreed to observe the Laws of Edgar, p. 619.

(3) West-Saxon laws, Mercian laws, and Danish laws. Bishop Norwich in his Letter to Dr. Wilkins, prefix'd to his Edition of the Saxon Laws, makes it appear that this threefold division of the English Laws is imaginary, and proceeded from the Norman Interpreters mistaking the meaning of the Word Laga, which they thought was the same with Ley or Law. Whereas Laga signifies Region, Territory or Province, as is plain from several places in the Saxon Laws, wherein Dena-laga means the same as among the Danes, or in the Danish Laws, Land or Province. See p. 53, and 135, of Dr. Wilkins's Anglo-Saxon Laws. The Author of the Dialogue De Saxonibus, was the first that led the way in this Error, l. 1. c. 16.

(4) By finding them large Sums of Money. S. Dunelm. Brompt. p. 911. with fifty. Flor. West.
(5) Leiland, who was an Eye-witness of this Town and Monastery in their Splendor, gives this description of them. *A City more neatly seated the Sun never saw, hanging upon a gentle Down, a little River runs East side; on a Mountain more great and stately, whether we consider the Endowments, Largeness, and unparallel'd Magnificence. The Monastery itself looks like a City, many Towers (some whereof are Bells) many Towers, and a Church, the richness meeting can be more stately, the richness of Appendages, there are three most admirable Beauty and Workmanship in the same Church-yard. There are two still entire; viz. St. Mary's and St. James's; the third, which Canute built, was the great Church of the Monastery. Besides the immense value of the Gifts at St. Edmund's Tomb, the Revenue at the Dissolution amounted to one thousand five hundred and sixty pounds a year; a large Sum in those days. See Camden in Stafford.*

(7) This Epistle, which is extant in Malmshury, was sent into England by Ingulfus Abbot of Tarvisleek. It was address'd thus; To Æthelnoth Bishop of Canterbury, to Alfrie of York, with all the Bishops and Prelates; and to the English Nation, as well Nobles as Plebeians, Knights, &c. In it he gives an account of the valuable Presents made to him, whilst there, in Gold and Silver Vessels, in curious Garments, &c. by the Emperor, and other Princes who were there at that time.

(8) He founded also the noted Abby of St. Bennet, in Hertfordshire. He gave rich and extraordinary Jewels to the Church of Wintonbury, of which one is recorded to be a Cross, worth one year's revenue of the kingdom. It was consumed with the Abby by Fire in Henry 1st's Time. He caus'd also to be created the Arm of St. Angustin the great Doctor, which he bought at Pavia in his return from Rome, and is said to give for it a hundred talents of Silver and one of Gold. Malmsh. p. 75. Brompt.

(9) He died at Shaftesbury the 12th of November, and was buried in the Old Monastery of Wintonbury. (10) At Southampton.

usual, he took occasion from thence, to let his base Flatterers know, that the titles of Lord and Master belong only to him whom the Land and the Sea obey. He is said, from that moment, never to wear his crown again, but ordered it to be put on the head of the Crucifix at Winchester.

He left three Sons, all of a fit age to govern, to whom he bequeathed his three kingdoms by will. Sweyn the eldest, and a bastard, had Norway for his share: Some affirm he was not his Son, but impos'd upon him for such by the Mother (1). To Harold his second Son, by the same woman, he gave England; and to Canute or Hardicanute, whom he had by Emma of Normandy, the kingdom of Denmark. Guniada his daughter by the same Princess, was wife of the Emperor Henry IV.

As I shall soon have occasion to mix the affairs of Normandy with those of England, it will not be improper to give some account beforehand of what passed among the Normans.

Richard II. Duke of Normandy, dying in 1026, Richard III. his Son succeeded him, who reigned but one year, and by his death left the dukedom to Robert his brother; who was no sooner in possession, but he shew'd an inclination to espouse the interest of Alfred and Edward his cousins, Sons of his aunt Emma and Ethelred II. As they were both at his court, and he could not help pitying their case, he believed his recommendation might procure them some favour in England. Persuaded of this, as soon as he heard of the death of Edmund's Son, he sent ambassadors to Canute, to intreat him to give the two Princes some part of the kingdom of their ancestors. This Embassy arriv'd in England, when Canute found himself to firmly seated in his throne, that he thought he might safely disregard the solicitations of the Duke of Normandy. Robert was so incensed at his refusal, that he resolv'd to compel him to do justice to the English Princes. To that purpose he fitted out a powerful fleet, and embarking with a numerous army, resolv'd to make a descent upon England, where he did not question but the English would readily join him. But meeting with a violent storm, he had the mortification to behold the greatest part of his fleet perish; a loss which could not be easily retrieved. In the mean time, these preparations satisfying Canute, that the Duke of Normandy really intended to attempt the restoration of his cousins, he endeavour'd to amuse him with offering them part of the kingdom of Wessex. But Robert would not have been impos'd upon by this offer, had not his misfortune at Sea constrain'd him to suspend the execution of his design, as it induced Canute also to go from his word. Some time after, Robert took a resolution to go in pilgrimage to Jerusalem, deferring, till his return, his intended invasion of England. But he died in his way home. He left only a natural Son, called William, on whom, before his departure, he settled the succession. This is the same William the Bastard, whom we shall see hereafter ascend the throne of England.

His Fleet is destroyed by a storm.

He died and was succeeded by William his Bastard.

R. de Diceto Brompt. Knighton.

Affairs of Normandy. W. Gemitiensis, l. 5. c. 10.

Robert Duke of Normandy protects the two Brothers of Edmund. Brompt.

18. HAROLD I. Surnamed Harefoot, the third Danish King of England.

HAROLD I. 1039.

WHEN Canute espoused the Princess of Normandy, it was agreed, that the Children by this marriage should succeed to the crown of England. Notwithstanding this agreement, Canute left England to his Son Harold born in Denmark, and gave Denmark to Hardicanute, his Son by Emma of Normandy (2). In all appearance, he did not think the English had been sufficiently inured to the Danish yoke, to venture to place on their throne his youngest Son, who was not above fifteen or sixteen years of age, and of no great genius. However this be, that article of his will met with great opposition from the English. They look'd upon Hardicanute, born in England, of a lawful wife, widow of one of their Kings, as the only person capable of succeeding; whereas Harold was considered but as a Foreigner and a Bastard. The Danes, on the contrary, were firmly bent to perform Canute's last will and testament. This difference might have been of ill consequence, if Harold had not with the utmost expedition seiz'd the treasure laid up by the King his father at Winchester (3). By the help of this, he was enabled to make himself feared, and to gain several of his opposers. Consequently, in a General Assembly in Mercia (4), he secured a majority of voices, and got himself proclaim'd King of England. The Danes were all for him to a man, and of course, the English Mercians, or the inhabitants on the North of the Thames, who looking upon the Danes as their Masters, durst not directly oppose their will.

Mean time, the West-Saxons, who did not think themselves conquer'd, as soon as they came home, conven'd an assembly of the States of Wessex, and by the management of Earl Goodwin, Hardicanute was elected and proclaimed King of Wessex, the West-Saxons leaving the Mercians free to acknowledge Harold for their King (5). For the better understanding this matter, it must be remembered, there were Danes, or people of Danish extraction, dispers'd all over England, but their chief settlements were in Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumberland. And therefore, in all the country north of the Thames, called then by the general name of Mercia, there were more Danes than English. On the contrary, in Wessex, that is, South of the Thames, the English were the most numerous, having admitted among them such of their countrymen, who, to avoid living under the dominion of the Danes, had quitted the northern parts. By this means Wessex was exceeding populous, and become more powerful than ever, being capable of bringing into the field as great armies as the rest of England. After this manner the kingdom of Judah in old time grew strong at the expence of that of Israel. The forces therefore of the West-Saxons and Mercians being equal, it is no wonder they were jealous of one another, and every one desired to have for Sovereign, him of the two Princes that was like to be most favourable. It was very probable, this division would cause a war between the two Nations. But Harold, who was not possess'd of his Father's qualities, imagin'd he was not strong enough to undertake the conquest of Wessex. It was owing therefore to the equality of their forces, that the two kingdoms remained in Peace.

Hardicanute, who was in Denmark (6), made no haste to come and take possession of the crown of Wessex; whether he was detained by other affairs, or on this, as well as on all other occasions, gave way to his natural sluggishness. During his absence, Earl Goodwin held the reins of the Government in an absolute manner, independent of Emma, the Queen-Mother, who was not beloved by the West-Saxons. Mean while Harold was contriving to gain by secret practices, a kingdom which he found himself unable to subdue by arms. As he had been deprived of it by the sole credit of Earl Goodwin, he believed there was no readier way to ascend the throne of that kingdom, than by gaining the Earl to his interest. He took advantage therefore of his Brother's absence, to make Goodwin his friend, by means, which, though not declared in history, may be easily guessed at (7). Be this as it will, he succeeded to his wish. Goodwin, who was not very scrupulous, finding his account in what was propos'd to him by Harold, promis'd to place him on the throne of Wessex. This affair was so dexterously managed, that suddenly, on pretence that Hardicanute neglected to come into England, Goodwin procur'd Harold to be acknowledged King of Wessex. This change however was not made

Ingulph.

Earl Goodwin Regent of Wessex.

Delivered up the Kingdom to Harold.

Harold proclaimed in Mercia, Sax. Ann. G. Malmfb. Ingulph.

and Hardicanute in Wessex. Sax. Ann.

(1) She is called by the Historians Algiwa, Alwa, or Alwina, (M. W. Gen. Hunting.) and by Flor. Werc. p. 622. and Brompt. said to be the daughter of Alfelm Earl of Northampton: being barren, she feigned a Lying-in, and got a Phis, or a Nun's, Son newly born, to be put upon her credulous Husbands. R. de Diceto, who calls her Queen, says she did the same by a Shoemaker's Son also, which was Harold, p. 470.

(2) She is called Elgiwa by the Saxon Annals and others, which is the Saxon Name for Emma. S. Dunelm. p. 164. Tyrrel, l. 6. p. 64.

(3) And which he had left to his Queen Emma. S. Dunelm. p. 179. Brompt. p. 932.

(4) At Oxford, Ann. Sax. MXXXVI. This Contest about the Election of a King, very much weakens the authority of Simon of Durham and others, in relation to Canute's Will, especially considering the Marriage Articles with Emma, and the Silence of the Saxon Annals. Besides, the States of the Kingdom very seldom or never failed to elect whom the last King appointed in his Will.

(5) It was agreed amongst them, that Emma should live in Winchester, and keep possession of all Wessex; and that Goodwin should be General of the Forces. Sax. Ann. Malmfb. p. 76. Huntingd. p. 364. Brompt.

(6) Ingulph says, that he was in England at the time of the Election, and went back to Denmark. p. 61.

(7) He is said to have promis'd the Earl to marry his Daughter.

with the unanimous consent of the West-Saxons, but by the sole contrivance of Goodwin and some other Lords, who engaged so heartily in the affair, that it was done before any measures could be taken to obstruct it. Thus the West-Saxons saw a new King on the throne, without having the liberty to deliberate whether they should approve or reject him. This is not the only instance of the like intrigues producing the like events.

Emma forms a design to place on the throne one of her Sons by her first Husband.
S. Dunelm.
Ch. Mail-
ros.
Hoved.
M. West.

Emma, Mother of Hardicanute, was extremely surprised at this revolution, which not only deprived her Son of the crown of Wessex, but herself also of the hopes of ever having any share in the government. She perceived, as matters stood, there was no possibility of recovering the crown for her Son Hardicanute; and therefore turning her thoughts another way, she formed a project, the execution whereof seemed to her very practicable, which was, to cause one of her Sons by Ethelred, to mount the throne. She was in hopes, the English would countenance with all their power an enterprize, tending to set the crown on the head of a Prince of the race of their antient Kings. Perhaps the desire of pulling down Goodwin influenc'd her project as much as her Son's advancement. To succeed in this design, there was need of great prudence and dissimulation. Above all it was necessary to find some pretence, without raising the King's jealousy, to send for the two Princes her Sons, who were in Normandy, that they might form a party for themselves. With this view, she feigned to be unconcerned at the expulsion of Hardicanute, confining herself to Winchester, where she daily frequented the Churches, and seemed to be wholly taken up with the care of her Salvation. When she imagined the King was sufficiently convinced of her disregard of State-affairs, she begged leave to send for the two Princes her Sons at Winchester, whom she had not seen since her second marriage. Her request being granted, Alfred and Edward arrived soon after in England, without discovering any other intention but to visit their Mother. They were caressed by great numbers of people, who, having English hearts, always firmly adhered to the antient Royal Family.

Alfred and Edward
come into England.

Goodwin
acquaints the King with the Queen's designs.

Goodwin, who was a person of great sagacity, quickly perceived the Queen's design. It was difficult to impose in this manner upon so refin'd a Politician. As soon as he began to suspect her, he employed so many Spies, that he found at length his suspicions were not groundless. He acquainted Harold with the matter, who seemed startled at it. But the Earl, who was not so easily alarmed, gave him to understand, the conspiracy was yet but in embryo, and might with ease be prevented; that the difficulty did not lie so much in avoiding the present, as in guarding against future danger: That to screen himself, once for all, from the like practices, he saw no better expedient than to make away with the two Saxon Princes, since so fair an opportunity offered. Harold approving of this project, Goodwin advised him to put on a seeming security, to draw them the more readily into the snare. This resolution being taken, Harold made as if he were ignorant of the Queen's designs, and the two Princes continued some time at Winchester, without his shewing the least uneasiness up-

He advises the murder of the two Princes.
Brompt.

on their account. At last, making use of an occasion, which naturally offered itself, he invited them to come and pass a few days at Court, before they returned into Normandy, where he feigned to believe, they intended to go very shortly. Emma was in great suspense on this occasion. She was very sensible it would be difficult for her Sons to gain a powerful party among the Nobility, without appearing at Court; where the Lords of the greatest credit were usually present. But on the other hand, she could not resolve to deliver them into the hands of a Prince whose interest it was to destroy them. In this perplexity, she took a course, which she judged proper to prevent the apprehended danger. This was, to send Alfred her eldest Son to the King, and detain Edward under some pretence: She imagined in case Harold had any ill design, he would defer the execution till he had both the Brothers in his power, seeing it would be to no purpose to make away one, whilst the other was alive. Goodwin, pleased that his advice had thus far succeeded, managed so that he was sent to meet Alfred, seemingly to do him honour, but in reality, because he was unwilling to trust another with the execution of his designs. Alfred's little train, composed of Normans, were at first charmed with the respect Goodwin paid to the Prince. But their satisfaction was quickly turned into a great consternation, when the Prince and all his attendants were stopped at Guilford castle, where they had been carried under colour of refreshing themselves. Alfred was immediately conducted to Ely, and, after his eyes were put out, shut up in the Monastery (1). The unhappy Prince had scarce time to be sensible of his misfortune, since he died a few days after, either out of grief, or by some more violent means. At least, Goodwin was afterwards charged with his murder (2). As soon as Edward was informed of his Brother's tragical death he speedily returned into Normandy, for fear of the like treatment. Shortly after, Emma, receiving orders to depart the kingdom, retired to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, who assigned her the city of Bruges to reside in. It seems somewhat strange, she should not go to Normandy to Duke William her Nephew; but probably, they who had the administration of affairs during the Duke's minority, did not think proper to receive her. And indeed, it was to be feared this intriguing Princess would increase the troubles of the Dukedom, where William was not yet firmly established.

1037.
Alfred's
death.

Edward
returns to Normandy.
Sax. Ann.
Malmib.

M. West.

Whilst these things were transacting, Hardicanute waking at length from his lethargy, formed a design of recovering by arms the kingdom of Wessex, usurped by his Brother. For that purpose he came to Bruges, to consult with the Queen his Mother. In all appearance, he would have found it very troublesome to execute this design, had not the death of Harold, which happened at that very time, removed all difficulties. This Prince died (3) in 1039 without issue, and without having done any thing memorable (4). He was surnamed Harefoot, because his Foot was all over hairy, or, as others affirm, because he was light and swift of Foot (5). His death happened in one of the hardest Winters that had ever been known in England (6).

1039.
Harold dies.
S. Dunelm.
Brompt.
Sax. Ann.

Knighten.

(1) His attendants were tortured in the most cruel manner, by Goodwin's order, and decimated, that is, nine were killed, and the tenth only saved; 6x hundred are said to have been put to death in that manner. S. Dunelm. p. 179. M. West. p. 410. Knighten and Brompton mention one hellish kind of Torture, which, it may be supposed, was only practised then, and in the Irish Massacre in 1641. They ript up some of the People's Bellies, and tying one end of their Bowels to a Post, made them turn round that Post till they were all wound up upon it. Brompton, p. 935. Knighten, p. 2326. Rushworth, Hist. Col. Vol. IV. p. 411.

(2) This account of Alfred's death, Malmibury says, was built on common Report, and not being recorded, refuses to vouch the Fact. But Matthew Westminster, and others, relate it without diffidence. Most of the ancient Manuscript Annals in the Cottonian Library, as also a Treatise called Encomium Emmae, (which, 'tis plain, Malmibury never saw) being a Panegyric wrote on that Queen, by a Monk of her own time, relate the matter thus. Harold seeking by treachery to get these two young Princes into his power, forged a Letter in the Name of Emma their Mother, earnestly inviting them into England, wherein, (personating her) "She gently chides them for their delay, in not coming over to inspect their own affairs, since they could not but know that it daily confirmed the Usurper in his power, who omitted no artifice to gain the chief Nobility over to his party: Yet assured them the English had much rather have one of them to reign over them; and therefore urged them to come as speedily and as privately as they could, to consult what Measures were most proper to be taken." This Letter was sent to Normandy by an express Messenger, and received by the Princes with joy, who sent word by the same Hand, That one of them would be with her shortly, naming both the time and place. Accordingly Alfred the youngest, (by others said to be the eldest) at the appointed time, with a few ships, and a small number of Normans, sailed for England; where they were no sooner landed, but they fell into the hands of Goodwin, who served them as Rapun has above related. What makes this account the more probable, is, that had both the Princes come over in the manner above-mentioned, Harold would certainly have put them both to death, since it would have been in his power. The Saxon Annals say nothing of Alfred's death, and some place it after Harold's decease. Such is the uncertainty of this Matter; which makes it appear, how little traditional accounts are to be depended upon, though of no long standing, since this Story, transacted but a few years before the Compiler, is told in many ways. Malmib. Knighten, Brompt.

(3) He died at Oxford, in the fourth year of his reign, and was buried at Winchester; or, according to Brompton, at Westminster.

(4) He laid a Tax of eight Marks on every Port, towards fitting out sixteen Ships. He made but one Law, mentioned by Selden, which was, that if any Welshman coming into England, without leave, was taken on this side Offa's Dyke, he should have his Right Hand cut off by the King's Officer.

(5) Brompton says, he had his Surname for refusing to ride on Horie-back, and chusing always to walk on foot, which, say they, was very unbecoming his Royal State.

(6) The Saxon Annals MXXXIX, say, that this year a Sesher, or Horie-load of Wheat, was sold for fifty-five Pence, and more.

19. CANUTE II, or HARDICANUTE, the fourth Danish King of England.

1039.
Hardicanute is a Danish
King of England.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.
S. Dunelm.

AFTER the death of Harold, the great Men of both Nations unanimously made an offer of the crown to Canute, surnamed the Hardy, not to denote his courage, but his strong constitution (1). He was then at Bruges, concerting measures with the Queen his Mother, for the recovery of the kingdom of Wessex, by means of a powerful aid promised him by the Earl of Flanders. The news of Harold's death putting an end to their consultations, he came to England with forty Ships, he had brought from Denmark (2). He was received with great demonstrations of joy, both by the English and Danes. Earl Godwin himself, though he had no reason to rejoice at his arrival, after what he had acted against him, was the foremost to do him homage.

He digress-
his Brother's Corps.
Malmsh.
J. 2. c. 12.
S. Dunelm.
Brompt.

The new king began his reign with an uncommon act of cruelty. The ceremony of his coronation was hardly over, when out of impatience to be revenged on his Brother, though dead, he commanded his body to be dug up and throw'd into the Thames (3). But all his care to prevent the Body from being buried again, proved ineffectual. Some Fishermen finding the corps floating on the water (4), delivered it to the Danes, who interred it in the burying-place of their Nation in London (5). It is further added, the King being informed of it, ordered the Body to be thrown once more into the River; but, being found again, it was privately buried at Weyminster.

1040.
He imposes a heavy tax.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.
Sedition at Worcester
on that account.
Camden in Worcester.

Shortly after, Hardicanute impos'd an exorbitant tax on the kingdom (6), for the payment of the fleet sent back to Denmark. Though the English had often paid the like tax, term'd Danegeld, they were dissatisfied to have it renewed on this occasion, when there appeared no necessity for it. The inhabitants of Worcester oppos'd the levying this tax with the greatest heat. They even proceeded so far as to kill two of the Collectors (7). Whereupon the King immediately ordered Goodwin Duke of Wessex, Leofric Duke of Mercia, and Siward Earl of Northumberland, to draw their forces together, march to Worcester, and destroy the City with fire and sword. These Lords excuted in part the King's orders, though with great reluctance. The City was burnt, after having been plunder'd four days together. But the inhabitants had leave to retire into a small Island in the Severn, nam'd Beverly, till the King was appeas'd (8).

Not long after Prince Edward, Son of Ethelred II, and Brother of the King by the same Mother, appear'd at court. He met with a very civil reception, and presently demanded justice against Godwin, charging him with the murder of his Brother Alfred (9). The King was well enough pleas'd with having an opportunity to punish the Earl, not so much perhaps for the death of Prince Alfred, as for what he had done in favour of the late King. He was cited therefore to appear and answer to what was alleged against him. But Godwin, who knew the covetous temper of the King, wisely diverted the storm by a magnificent present before his trial. This present was a Galley, with a gilt Stern, mann'd with fourscore choice soldiers, every one of whom had upon his arm a gold Bracelet weighing sixteen ounces, with Helmets and Swords all gilded, and a Danish Battle-ax adorn'd with Gold and Silver, hanging on his left shoulder, and a Lance of the same in his Right-hand. Every thing in the Galley was answerable to this magnificence. By means of this noble present, the Earl was acquitted, upon taking his oath, he had no hand in the death of Prince Alfred (10).

Hardicanute did not long enjoy a crown he was unworthy to wear. He died suddenly in the third year of his reign (11), at the nuptial feast of a Danish Lord at Lambeth (12). Perhaps his death was hasten'd by poison (13): but his excessive cruelty and gluttony rendered him so odious, that he died unlamented, neither was any inquiry made into the manner of his death. All Historians unanimously agree, he spent whole days and nights in feasting and carousing (14). There is one however that praises him for keeping open table four times a day, and exclaims against the niggardliness of the Kings his successors who abolish'd so laudable a custom.

20. EDWARD III. the Confessor.

EDWARD
III.
Difficulties
concerning the Succession.

HARDICANUTE leaving no issue, Edward, Son of Ethelred II. and Emma of Normandy, was the only Prince then in England that had any pretensions to the crown. It was but reasonable the race of the Saxon Kings should be restor'd to the throne of which they were unjustly dispossest. But then it was no less right to recall out of Hungary Prince Edward, Son of Edmond Ironside, and place him on the throne preferably to his uncle, who was one degree farther remov'd. On the other hand, the uninterrupted succession of four Danish Kings, who had possessed the throne for the space of twenty-eight years (15), with the consent of the English, bred another difficulty, seeing Sweyn, Son of Canute the Great, was still alive. It is true, he was reckon'd by some as a Bastard. But besides that the King his Father had not treated him as such in the partition of his dominions, it might be said in his favour, he ought to have the same privilege with his Brother Harold, to whom his being born of the same Mother was no obstacle to his mounting the throne. It was therefore no easy thing to settle the succession to the satisfaction of all parties. On the contrary, it was to be feared that, on this occasion, the old animosities between the two nations would be re-

- (1) The Word Hardy, is rendered by those that wrote in Latin, by Durus, and not by Audax. See Pontanus. Hist. Dan. Rapin.
- (2) And Landed at Sandwich, seven days before Midsummer. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 365. S. Dunelm. p. 110.
- (3) The Persons employed in this Affair, were Alfric Archbishop of York, Earl Godwin, Styr the Steward, Edric the Seneschal, and Tosoth the Executioner: They cut the Head off, and flung the Body at first into a Sink, and afterwards into the Thames. Malmsh. p. 76. S. Dunelm. p. 180. M. West. Brompt.
- (4) They pulled it up in their Nets. S. Dunelm. Malmsh. p. 76.
- (5) Which constant Tradition affirms to be the Church and Church-yard of St. Clement Danes. Brompt. p. 933.
- (6) Of twenty-one thousand and ninety-nine Pounds, for the Army; and eleven thousand forty-eight Pounds, for his thirty-two Ships. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 365. Malmsh. says, he gave twenty Marks to every Sailor; and others affirm, it was eight Marks to every Sailor, and ten or twelve Marks to each of the Captains. S. Dunelm. p. 180. M. West. p. 412.
- (7) Who were so busy and exacting. Malmsh. p. 76.
- (8) This City, the Bracemans of Antoninus, and Brancogenum of Ptolemy, whence called by the Welshmen this day, Carr-Brangan, was named by the Saxons, Wogar-Cesler, Wegana-Cesler, and Wine-Cesler, perhaps from the Forest Wine hard by. It was built by the Romans, as a Frontier Town against the Britons or Welsh. It was fence'd formerly with high Roman Walls, and has now a strong Wall. It was made an Episcopal See by Severus Bishop of the Mercians, in 980. It was soon rebuilt after being burnt here by the Danes. Camden.
- (9) Simon of Durham says, it was Alfric Archbishop of York that accus'd Godwin and Livingus Bishop of Worcester of this murder. S. Dunelm. p. 180.
- (10) This Year also, as Brompton tells us, Hardicanute sent over his Sister Gunilda to the Emperor Henry, to whom she had been betroth'd in her Father's time; before she went, the King kept her nuptial Feast with that magnificence, in Cloaths, Equipage, and Feasting, that Maurus Westminster says, it was remembered in his days, and sung by Musicians at all great Entertainments. After the Princess had been some time in Germany, she was accus'd of Adultery, and could find, it seems, no better Champion than Municon, a little Page she had brought with her from England, to vindicate her Honour. She took it so heinously to be accus'd, that she forsook her Husband, and retired to a Monastery, where she ended her days. M. West. and Brompton.
- (11) Or rather in the Second; for he reigned but two years wanting ten days. Sax. Ann.
- (12) (i. e.) A duty Station. Baldwyn Archbishop of Canterbury, exchanging a Manor with the Bishop of Rockester, began here a Palace in 1135.
- (13) Most probably he died in a drunken Fit. S. Dunelm. p. 179. He was buried in the old Monastery in Winchester by his Father Canute.
- (14) He allowed his Court four Meals a day. Huntingd. p. 365. Knighton. p. 2329. John Rous relates, that the day of King Hardicanute's death was kept by the English as a Holy-Day in his time, four hundred years afterwards, and was call'd Hop's-Tide, or Hock-Wednesday. De Regib. Anglor. 4.
- (15) Rapin says forty-four, which is a mistake, for from Sweyn's being proclaimed in 1014, to Hardicanute's death in 1043, was but twenty-seven or twenty-eight years at most.

1041.

viv'd, and the kingdom plunged into its former calamities. Edward, Son of Edward II, having spent most part of his days in Normandy, was little known in England. Besides, his merit, which was not very conspicuous, was incapable of adding any thing to his right. However, a fortunate advice, which necessity constrain'd him to follow, procur'd him a support, by which alone he was enabled to maintain his pretension: I mean, Earl Godwin. Though it was but a few months since, that Edward had prosecuted this Lord as the murderer of his Brother, he was advis'd to court his protection, which he obtained with greater ease than he durst have expected. Godwin was so powerful, and of so superior a Genius to the rest of the Nobility, that it would have been almost impossible for Edward to succeed in his designs, if he had not gained him to his interest. He was already distinguished as well by his merit, as birth, when Canute the Great intrusted him with the command of the English troops, in the war against the Vandals. After that expedition, wherein he gloriously signalized himself, Canute made him Earl of Kent, Suffex, and Surrey, and gave him in marriage Thyra, Sister of Earl Ulphon, to whom Canute had given his own Sister Esrith, widow of the Duke of Normandy (1). Godwin had by his wife a Son, drown'd in the Thames by an unruly horie. His second wife was Gith, Sister of Sweyn, who was King of Denmark after the death of Hardicanute. By this wife he had seven Sons, Harold, Toston, Swane, Ulnoth, Gurth, Elfgar, Lewin, and a daughter nam'd Editba. His credit with Canute the Great; the superiority of his genius; his noble alliances; his dignities of Earl of Kent, Duke of Wessex, and High-Treasurer, conferred on him by King Harold; and lastly the government of the counties of Oxford and Hereford, in the hands of his eldest Son, had rais'd his fortune to such a degree, that it would hardly admit of any addition. His interest was somewhat eclips'd in the reign of Hardicanute; but he had the address to divert the danger he was threatn'd with. How great a grudge soever the late King bore Goodwin, he was such an enemy to business, that he could not resolve to undergo the necessary fatigue of governing a large kingdom, but left all to his management, as knowing him to be the most able of his subjects. Godwin knew so well how to improve these favourable junctures to ingratiate himself with the Nobles and People, that his power far exceeded that of all the other English Lords. From what has been said, it plainly appears how necessary Goodwin's assistance was, in order to Edward's mounting the throne, though his pretensions had been still better grounded. However, Goodwin was not one that neglected his own, in promoting the interest of others. Before he engaged in Edward's cause, he required certain conditions, and made him swear to marry his daughter Editba. The Prince complied with these terms, notwithstanding his inward reluctance to espouse the daughter of a Man, whom he looked upon as the murderer of his Brother Alfred.

As soon as Goodwin had received from Edward the assurances he demanded, he conven'd a general-assembly (2), where, by his management, that Prince was acknowledged (3) and proclaimed King (4), with unanimous consent (5). It was happy for the English, there was then in the kingdom never a Prince of the family of Canute the Great, whom the Danes might have set up in opposition to Edward. If Sweyn King of Norway had been on the spot to head the Danes, it may reasonably be presum'd, either that his pretensions would have caus'd a civil war, or England been once more divided into two kingdoms. Without doubt, the Danes would never have suffer'd the rights of the royal family of Denmark, four Princes whereof had successively sat on the throne, to be thus destroy'd. On the other hand, the English were so averse to a Danish government, that probably they would have ventured all to free themselves from that yoke. But the present juncture proving favourable to the English, they not only place on the throne a Prince of their own Nation, but also deliver themselves from the fear of falling again under the dominion of the foreigners.

In the general-assembly above-mention'd, to which, in all likelihood, the Danes being then without a Leader, were not call'd, Godwin strenuously harangu'd, to demonstrate to the English, "that a favourable opportunity " now offer'd, to free themselves from the oppressions " under which they had groan'd for so many years. He " defend'd with his natural eloquence, the calamities " their country was overwhelm'd with, whilst in subjection to foreigners. He displayed the extreme pride " of the Danes, who, not content with sharing the kingdom with the English, treated them like so many slaves. " He call'd to their remembrance the sad times, when " an Englishman and a Dane meeting on a Bridge, the " former durst not stir a step till the latter was pass'd " over. That if an Englishman did not make a low reverence to a Dane, he was sure to be soundly cudgel'd. " To all these miseries he added that of the excessive " taxes they had been oblig'd to pay, particularly Dane-Gelt (6), which was impos'd for no other end but to " satisfy the insatiable avarice of their greedy Masters." In fine, he omitted nothing that could inflame the rage of the English. This harangue wrought so upon the Hearers, that it was resolv'd, no Dane for the future should ever sit on the throne of England. Some add, the enumeration of the calamities, they had so long groan'd under, made such an impression on their minds, that with one consent, they came to a resolution to drive all the Danes out of the kingdom, and accordingly put it in execution forthwith.

This is one of the most difficult passages in the whole English History; which way soever it is view'd, insurmountable difficulties occur. In the first place it is hard to conceive, how in a general-assembly of the kingdom, it was possible to come to a resolution to destroy all the Danes, and much more, how it came to be in the power of the English to put it in practice. The Danes alone were in a manner possess'd of all the eastern and northern Counties, and in Mercia, that is, in the heart of the kingdom, were as numerous as the English. Four Kings of their nation had successively reign'd, who far from humbling them, had no doubt shown them great favour, and given them the superiority. And yet, without any extraordinary event, except the death of Hardicanute, a Prince of little merit and reputation, the English are said to become on a sudden superior. But this is not all, 'tis affirm'd, this superiority was so great as to enable them to expel all the Danes out of the kingdom. How is it possible to believe, the Danes should suffer themselves to be thus master'd, without making the least resistance? For it does not appear, there was any war or commotion in the kingdom on this occasion. The Danish Historians make the matter still more improbable. They say, all the Danes in England were massacred in one night by the treachery of Harold Son of Goodwin, who order'd all the Danish soldiers to march out of the garisons, under pretence of solemnizing the funeral of the late King (7). But this account has not the least appearance of truth: for, in the first place, Harold, who was then very young, had no share in the government, and consequently could give no such orders to the Danish officers. In the next place, how was it possible that all the English Historians, Brompton only excepted, who however says much less of the matter, should agree to pass over in silence so remarkable an event? Nay, how could they write their Histories without ever making the least allusion to it. 'Tis objected, they were silent, as aham'd of their Nation for so barbarous an action, what is the reason they had not the same scruple with regard to the Massacre in the reign of Ethelred? These are difficulties that are not easily to be clear'd. There seems, at first sight, to be a plausible way

(1) Mr. Tyrol, and others say, that Godwin's first Wife was Canute's Sister; but according to Pentanus, she was only Sister to Ulphon, Brother-in-law to Canute, which is most probable. Rapin. See Malmsh.

(2) At Gillingham, or London. Malmsh. p. 80.

(3) And chosen by the Clergy and People. Inglulph. p. 62. Sax. Ann. M. Westm. p. 412, &c. He was advanced to the Throne, chiefly through the Interest of Leofric Earl of Wessex, or Godwin Earl of Wessex, and Living Bishop of Worcester. Inglulph. ibid. Kingdon.

(4) He was crown'd at Winton, in 1042. on Easter-day. Malmsh. p. 80. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm.

(5) Brompton and some others relate this Matter otherwise: Upon Hardicanute's death, Alfred, (whom some affirm to be slain in Harold's time, in Hardicanute's reign) being invited into England, Godwin represented to the Lords that he was coming with great Numbers of Angles, to whom he had promised to give Estates. Upon which Godwin was sent to meet him at Southampton, where, in order to make way to the Crown for his own Son by Canute's daughter, he sav'd him in the barbarous manner before related in the reign of Harold. The English Nobles, who had just arriv'd of this Treachery of Godwin's, aveng'd revenge, which Godwin being inform'd of, fled into Denmark, and his Estate in England was confisc'd. After this, the English sent over to Edward, to desire him to come and take possession of the Crown. Shortly after his coronation, Godwin being of King Edward's gracious temper, return'd into England, to petition for his Pardon and Estate again, and was accus'd by the King before him for the murder of his Brother Alfred's murder. But with much ado, by the Intercession of Leofric and other Peers, the matter was made up, and he was restored to all his Lands. Brompton Chron. p. 934, &c. Huntingdon agrees in the main with this relation, but says, that Godwin married Edith, because he thought him of too high a Spirit to marry his daughter, whom he aimed to make Queen of England, by marrying her to Edward, a young and simple Prince. But this, Malmsh. believes, is contrary to all records.

(6) This Tax amount'd to forty thousand Pounds a year. King Edward releas'd the Nation of this heavy burden in the year 1041. The occasion of his so doing, though related by Inglulph, with licence is credited. At the King was one day brought to see the huge heap of Money collected by this Tax, he started back as in a great Fright, and being ask'd the Reason, he said he saw the Danes capering and dancing over the Money. Upon which he order'd it to be all paid back to the People, and Dane-Gelt to be abolished for ever, after it had been paid thirty-eight years. Inglulph. p. 65. Fdr. Gult.

(7) Equo non, exiguâ temporis momento, vetustam Danorum dominationem, ac longo multaque Maiorum furore & sanguine partem in peum ita peritiam, ut vix unquam ea Danos fortuna repperisset. Pont. in c. Mag. Ben. l. vi. An. 1045. Rapin.

Edward
Canute
Malmsh.
1041
Winton.

Godwin's
R.

Edward
1041 Goodwin's daughter.

He is proclaimed
King
Malmsh.

Sax. Ann.
1041
S. Dunelm.
Inglulph.

Pentanus.
Meurhus.

p. 934

to resolve them, namely, to accuse the Historians, as well English as Danish, of not telling the whole truth, or aggravating the facts they relate. But by this course, we run into still greater difficulties. It is most certain, since the beginning of the reign of Edward the Confessor, the Danes have been so far from making any figure in England, that they are not mentioned in history any more than if they had never been known, though just before they were masters of the whole kingdom. But whence could proceed so sudden a fall, or rather, how could they all vanish in a moment, if neither expelled nor massacred? Historians do not say, war was made against them, their strong-holds taken, and they brought under new laws. But, all on a sudden, these so powerful and formidable Danes are reduc'd to nothing, in the reign of a Prince the most unwarlike that had ever sat on the throne. These are historical difficulties, the solution whereof I am forc'd to leave to others. But to return to Edward.

King Edward's Character.

He was a Prince of a weak constitution, and a narrow genius, not at all qualified to rule a large kingdom. His unsteadiness on important occasions, his inability in public affairs, and his continual attachment to trifles, gave the Nobles opportunity of assuming an almost sovereign power. As soon as they perceived the weakness of this Prince, they became so arbitrary in their governments, that they obeyed the King's orders no farther than was consistent with their own interest. Earl Goodwin especially usurp'd by degrees so great an authority, that he had almost the same deference paid him as the King himself. Perhaps the meanness of Edward's genius was the principal motive of his procuring him the crown, to the end he might govern in his name. Nevertheless, how fair soever the King carried it towards him, in his heart he utterly hated him and his whole family. This was the true reason of his deferring his marriage with Edithe as long as he could. But as he stood in fear of the Earl, he durst not break his word with him; and therefore after staying two years on several pretences, he espoused his daughter, according to his promise. However, he did not consummate the marriage, so great was his aversion to all that belong'd to Goodwin. The Queen, who was a person of strict virtue, and endow'd with a greatness of Soul, bore this usage with a wonderful patience. Instead of complaining of her hard treatment, she never open'd her mouth about it; but finding it was not in her power to gain the affection of the King her Husband, diverted her thoughts with study and acts of devotion (1). The author of the life of Edward pretends, this Prince made a vow of chastity, long before his marriage, and persuaded the Queen to do the like. But Malmesbury does not know what to think of this strange proceeding, and shews a strong inclination to believe, Edward's hatred to Goodwin was the real cause of his abstaining from his daughter. He durst not venture however to divorce her, for fear the Earl, by whose Interest he had mounted the throne, might still have it in his power to depose him, or at least create him a great deal of trouble. For this reason he continued to conceal, in all other respects, his aversion to him, and even to heap favours on him, in expectation of a favourable opportunity to shew his resentment. But he did not consider his dissimulation increased the Earl's credit with the people, who imagining he was in great favour with the King, more firmly adher'd to him. Goodwin wisely improved these advantages, and became every day more formidable to the King, by the great number of friends he acquir'd. In all probability, he would have grown in time, as powerful as the Mayors of the Palace were formerly in France, if he had not met with a counter-weight, which prevented his rising to that degree of power, so fatal to the royal authority; I mean, Siward Earl of Northumberland, and Leofric Duke of Mercia. Siward had the reputation of the bravest and most worthy Peer in the kingdom. His excellent qualities gave him great authority at court, and among the Northumbrians, who were under his government. Leofric was universally esteemed and respected for his merit. His power was so great in Mercia, that he was more a King there than Ed-

Ailred.

p. 50.

The State of the Court.

ward himself. These two Lords uniting together, to prevent Goodwin from soaring too high, firmly adher'd to the person of the King, and endeavour'd to the utmost of their power, to support his authority. Without their assistance, Edward, who was naturally weak, would have found it very difficult to secure himself against the artifices of so able and powerful a subject as Goodwin. Thus matters stood at the court of England, during the first years of this reign. It was necessary to premise this, for the better understanding the sequel.

Edward, to whom is given the glorious titles of Saint and Confessor, mounted the throne with dispositions repugnant to sanctity. Besides his hatred to Goodwin and his own wife, he cherish'd in his breast against his Mother a desire of revenge, which agreed no better with the maxims of the gospel. It is true, his Mother who had never any great affection for him, had done enough to exasperate her Son in marrying Canute the Great, mortal enemy of her first Husband. She had moreover given her consent, that the children of her second marriage should succeed to the crown of England, which shew'd but little friendship for those of the first. This thing made so deep an impression on Edward's mind, that all her endeavours afterwards to procure him the throne, were not able to efface it. As soon as he found it in his power to make her feel the effects of his resentment, he delay'd not to satisfy his passion. On a sudden, when she least expected it, he came to Winchester, where her treasures lay, and without shewing the least regard for her, stript her of All, leaving her only a moderate pension for her subsistence (2). Thus this Prince's, widow of two Kings, Mother of two more, and daughter of a Duke of Normandy little inferior to a King, saw herself in the latter end of her days, reduced to extreme poverty by the rigour of her own Son (3).

Edward takes from the Queen her Mother all her Estates. Sax. Ann. Dunelm.

Sax. Ann. 1042.

But Edward was not content with shewing, by this act of violence, the little regard and affection he had for his Mother. Several Historians assure us, he moreover caus'd her to be accus'd of Incontinence with Alwin Bishop of Winchester. They even say, that, regardless of her quality, he was so hard-hearted as to make her undergo the Ordeal trial. This trial consisted in obliging the party accus'd to walk bare-foot and hood-wink'd over nine red-hot Plough-shares. It is pretended, Emma came off unhurt, and gave in memory of this deliverance nine Manors to the next monastery (4). But, we have just observ'd, she had none left to give. However this be, she pass'd ten years in the sad condition she was reduced to by the King her Son, living in Winchester as a sort of prison, from whence she was delivered by her death in 1052 (5).

And makes her go thro' the Ordeal Trial. Brompt. Knighton. Camden.

Whilst Edward was thus venting his resentment upon his Mother, he received certain advice, that a great storm was gathering in the North. Sweyn King of Norway, Son of Canute the Great, designing to prosecute his claim to the crown of England, was preparing for an invasion with all expedition, which put the English in dread of the like miseries, they had so long experienced, and from which for some time they had been happily freed. Edward, who was no less terrified than his subjects, made some preparations to repulse an attack which he was extremely alarmed at (6). Gunilda, niece of Canute the Great, fell a sacrifice to his fears. She was constrained to abandon the kingdom and her family, to prevent her contriving some plot in favour of the Danes. But by an unexpected happiness, a war, which suddenly arose between the Kings of Norway and Denmark, broke the measures of the latter, and brought peace to the English contrary to their expectation. Some time after, Sweyn was depose'd by Magnus Son of Olafus the Martyr, whom Canute the Great had dispossest of Norway. Magnus was no sooner master of that kingdom, but he carried the war into Denmark; with intent to dethrone the King, whose name was also Sweyn. This last demanding assistance of England, Goodwin was of opinion, that to keep up the war between these two Princes, an aid of fifty sail should be sent him. But Siward and Leofric, for reasons unknown, prevented the Sweyn King of Norway prepares to invade England. S. Dunelm. Hoved.

Gunilda banished.

1043. Denmark at wars.

S. Dunelm.

(1) Ingulphus says, she was not only the most beautiful, chaste, humble and modest Lady of her time, but also very learned, inasmuch that he tells us, when he was but a Boy, and lived at court with his father, she was used to meet him coming from school, and took delight in posing him not only in Grammar, but in Logic also. And when she had done, would order her servant to give him some pieces of Money. He farther says, she had nothing but her Father in her. Whence it was become a saying, Sicut Spina Refam, genuit Goodwinus Editham. Ingul. p. 62. Edit. Gale. See Ailred's Recueil, p. 377.

(2) - - - - Præcepit sufficienter ei necessaria ministrari. M. Westm. p. 415.

(3) This, Edward did by the advice of the Earls Leofric, Goodwin, and Siward. S. Dunelm. p. 182. Hoved.

(4) In Winchester.

(5) This trial of Emma is related by Brompton and Knighton, and embellish'd with some trivial circumstances by Harpsfield. They tell us, Robert Archbishop of Canterbury, a Norman, (whom Edward had brought over with him) accus'd the Queen of consenting to the death of her Son Alfred, endeavouring to poison her Son Edward, and of maintaining an infamous commerce with Bishop Alwin. For which she was condemn'd by a Council held on purpose to purge herself by the trial of Fire Ordeal, as she had offer'd to do, and as it is related above. But this whole matter admits of great Disputes, for Malmesbury, Florence of Worcester, Huntingdon, Hoveden, and Westminster, who lived nearest the time, say not a word of this miraculous purgation. Then again Brompton says, Robert immediately fled the kingdom; whereas he went not off, as Malmesbury assures us, till several years after upon another occasion, as we shall see: Moreover he could not be Archbishop then, since Edjus lived till 1050, which was three years after Alwin's death, according to Flor. West. Hoved. Chron. Mailt. whom Brompton supposes to be alive at the trial, for he says, he also gave nine Manors to the Church of Winchester. The Saxon Annals say, Edjus died in 1047, and Alwin in 1045; and therefore Robert could not be Archbishop till two years after his death, according to the Annals. Thus this whole story seems to be a mere fiction.

(6) He went to Sandwich with thirty-five Ships. Sax. Ann.

council from coming to this resolution. For want of this assistance, Swegn was dethroned, but restored to his kingdom, after the death of his enemy.

The Danish Pirates make a Depredation on England.
Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.

The troubles in Denmark hindered not the Danish Pirates from putting to Sea, and carrying terror to the English coasts. In the year 1046, twenty-five Sail of Danes arrived unexpectedly at Sandwich, from whence they carried off a great booty. Then failing for Essex, they carried away great numbers of Slaves of both Sexes, and all conditions. The English were extremely terrified; but Goodwin, Siward, and Leofric took so just measures that the Danes, alarm'd in their turn, hastily retired, and carried their ravages elsewhere.

Swegn, the Son of Goodwin
banished.
Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.
S. Dunelm.

The retreat of the Danish Pirates did not entirely restore peace to the kingdom, the coasts being that same year infested by a new enemy. Swane, Son of Goodwin, having deflowered an Abbess (1), with whom he was in love, and not daring to stay in England after such an act, retired into Denmark, where he in vain expected his pardon, by the mediation of the Earl his Father. But whether Goodwin was willing he should be chastised, or found the King inexorable, Swane was not able to procure a pardon so soon as he imagined. When he saw, contrary to his expectation, he was made to wait for it a long while, he mann'd eight Ships, and made open war upon the English, plundering the Merchants, and committing such barbarities on the inhabitants of the Sea-coasts, as exceeded those of the most cruel enemies. His insolence gave Goodwin's enemies a great advantage, who took occasion from thence to exasperate the King more and more against the Earl and his Family. He himself was in great perplexity about this affair. He was not willing to appear openly for his Son, lest he should be charged with abetting his rebellion. On the other hand, he could not but be extremely concerned at Swane's being considered as an enemy to the Publick. To free himself from this situation, he desired Earl Beorn, Son of Ulphon and Eftrith, Sister of Canute the Great, to use his interest with the King in behalf of his rebellious Son. Though Beorn had openly declared against Swane, he was prevailed with by Goodwin to speak to the King, who complied with his request upon certain conditions. The matter being thus in a fair way, Beorn went to Swane, to persuade him to submit to the King's mercy; but Beorn was ill rewarded for his pains. Swane imagining the Earl was come to betray him, slew him with his own hand, and ordered his body to be thrown into the Sea (2). This brutal action prevented a reconciliation for the present. But the King forgave him afterwards, notwithstanding the complication of his crimes: So much did this weak Prince stand in fear of Goodwin's revenging himself, in case he continued inflexible. Thus Goodwin, tho' hated by the King, obtain'd as many favours as if he had been really beloved by him. But these favours, instead of producing a mutual affection, served only to foment their disunion. The Earl did not think himself at all obliged to the King for Benefits proceeding from the sole motive of Fear; and the King increased his hatred, in proportion as he was forc'd to conceal it.

He infests
the English Coasts.

He kills Earl Beorn.

1048.
Great Interest of the Normans
with the King.
Malmb.
Ingulph.

Besides the private resentment of the King towards Goodwin, the Earl had also to deal with other enemies, who were continually stirring up that Prince against him. I mean the Normans, who were very numerous at court, and in great credit there. These looked upon Goodwin as a profess'd enemy, because he loudly complained of the great regard the King had for them, and made no scruple to say, they would soon become as troublesome as the Danes. His complaints were not altogether groundless. Edward, who was educated among the Normans, went into all their manners, and express'd such an affection for them, as rais'd the jealousy of the English. The Norman language was more generally spoken at court than the Saxon. The King's favour to the Normans rendering them insolent, they would have all the World cringe to them. They who could not bring themselves to this, seldom fail'd of feeling the effects of their resentment. Goodwin was of this number. He believed he was powerful enough to support himself without their assistance. Instead of seeking their protection, he affected by his continual raileries to shew, he thought it not in their power to hurt him. Robert, Archbishop of Canterbury, of all the Normans, was in greatest credit at court. The King had taken him from a Monastery in Normandy (3) to promote him to the Bishoprick of London, and afterwards to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, to the great regret of several English Bishops, who aspired to that dignity. This Prelate, who was naturally haughty, and whom the royal favour made still more arrogant, kept no measures with Goodwin, who, on his part, shewed the utmost contempt for him. The Archbishop, incens'd to see himself thus treated, made use of all his address to have a wrong interpretation put on all the Earl's actions, and to inflame the King's hatred to him to a higher degree.

Matters standing thus at court, an accident happen'd when least expected, which brought Earl Goodwin to the brink of destruction, and gave the King room at last to discover his enmity to him. Eustace, Earl of Boulogne (4), being come to visit the King his Brother-in-law, was honourably and kindly received, Edward having a particular affection for him. Some time after, as he was on the road, in his return to France, one of his people, who was sent before to provide lodgings at Dover, pick'd a quarrel with a townsman and killed him (5). This accident making a great noise among the inhabitants, they ran to arms, to seize the Murderer, who stood upon his defence, with some of the Earl's domesticks that were with him. Eustace, entering the town in the midst of this tumult, and seeing his people attacked, was obliged to take their part, without having time to enquire into the occasion of the quarrel. But being overpowered with numbers, twenty of his retinue were killed on the spot, and himself narrowly escaped with his life. Inrag'd at this affront, he returned to the King at Gloucester, where the court then resided, and loudly demanded satisfaction. Edward, willing to do him justice, ordered Goodwin to march immediately with some forces, and chastise the rioters that were under his government. But instead of obeying the King's order, the Earl warmly replied, "It was not the custom in England to punish people un-
"heard, and the rights and privileges of the subjects
"ought not to be violated; that the accused should be "summoned, and make satisfaction with their bodies or "estates if guilty, or if innocent, should be discharged.
"Adding, in a very haughty tone, that being Earl of Kent,
"twas his business to protect those that were under his go"vernment, against the insults of foreigners." Some say, he even charged the King to deliver up the Earl of Boulogne into his hands, that he might be punished upon the place, if found guilty of this riot. Edward was extremely provok'd with this bold answer, which was not only a refusal to obey his commands, but also a stinging reproach for his partiality to foreigners. The Archbishop and the rest of the Normans eagerly improv'd this occasion to exasperate him against the Earl, and to blow up a flame, which was already but too much kindled.

How angry soever the King might be, he was forc'd to conceal it, not being in condition to punish on the spot a Lord who rival'd him in power. Siward and Leofric being absent, there was no appearance of succeeding, should he attempt any thing against Goodwin, without being first assured of their concurrence. Mean while, as he was in the utmost impatience to be reveng'd, he dispatch'd trusty messengers to these two Lords, to inform them of his resolution to chastise Goodwin, and to order, or rather desire them, to repair to him immediately. How privately soever this matter was transacted, Goodwin had notice of his design, and took his measures accordingly. As he was very sensible he should be infallibly ruin'd, was he not beforehand with his enemies, he drew together some troops, which were soon reinforced with others from his Son's government (6). An incursion of the Welsh at the same time into Herefordshire, furnished him with a pretence to levy this army. He pretended these forces were designed to drive the enemy out of the kingdom, though he had received no orders to that purpose. In the mean time, the King causing him to be summoned before a general assembly conven'd at Gloucester (7), he came with his Sons, but so well attended, that he had nothing to fear. Thus guarded as he was, it would have been so dangerous

(1) The Abbess of Leen (or Leominster in Herefordshire). He left England because he could not obtain leave to marry her. S. Dunelm. p. 183.

(2) The Annals say, they buried his Body in a certain Church; but that afterwards his Relations and the Mariners of London dug up his Body and buried it at Winchester by King Canute. Sax. Ann. 1066.

(3) Juniege. Gemeticum. Malmb. p. 80.

(4) He was Father to the famous Godfrey of Boulogne, who won Jerusalem from the Saracens.

(5) Eustace, Man inlisted upon having Lodgings in the Dover-man's House, in spite of his teeth, and wounded him in the Struggle; whereupon the Townsman killed the other upon the spot. In this Fray were nineteen Dover People slain, and twenty-one of Eustace's, many others being wounded. Sax. Ann. Malmb. p. 81. S. Dunelm. p. 184. Bront. 942.

(6) He drew together some Troops out of Kent, Essex, and Wessex; as his eldest Son Swane did out of his Essex, i. e. out of Osset, Gilling, Hereford, Shropshire, and Berkshire; and Harold out of his, i. e. out of Essex, East-Anglia, Cambridge, and Huntingdonshire. All these Forces met at Bicester in Gloucestershire. King Edward hearing of Goodwin's great preparations, sent orders to Siward and Leofric to raise likewise an army, which they did out of Merca and Northumbria. Sax. Ann. Bront.

(7) And to come attended only with ecclesiastical Persons, but he refused to appear. In the mean time finding his army had deserted, he fled in the Night to Jeany-Island, and from thence went and embark'd at Bosham in Suffex, with his Son Swane. Harold and Leofric came to England, and finding there a Ship got ready by Swane, they went over to Ireland. S. Dunelm. p. 185. Bront.

to call him to an account, that the King was advised by the most prudent to hide his resentments. They represented to him, if the Earl stood on his defence, as he seem'd resolv'd, it was to be feared, he would draw to his side the majority of the people, whose interests he seem'd to espouse; and therefore the affording him a pretence to carry his audaciousness any farther, could not be done without danger. In pursuance of this advice, such a peace was patch'd up as Goodwin desired, that is, he was cleared for some excuses which related more to his manner of acting, than the thing in question.

Is reconcil'd
to the King.

He is profes-sion'd again
and banish'd.
Sax. Ann.
G. Malmfb.

This reconciliation was of no long continuance. Edward, who could not digest the affront he had received, took new measures against Goodwin, in gaining some of his principal friends by presents and promises. As soon as matters were ordered to his mind, he conven'd a general assembly, where Goodwin and his Sons were summoned to appear. But being informed a design was laid to apprehend them, they refused to come, without a safe-conduct, and hostages for their security. Upon which, they were banish'd the kingdom, and the combination against them was so strong, that they saw themselves abandoned on a sudden by their principal adherents, and forc'd to submit to the sentence pass'd upon them. Edward not content with being thus freed from Goodwin, shut up the Queen in the nunnery of Wharvel (1), with design, in all appearance, never to take to her again. Goodwin retired to the Earl of Flanders, Father-in-law of his Son Toston, and Harold sail'd for Ireland, where he hoped to meet with assistance. To deprive the Earl and his Sons of all hopes of returning, the King dispos'd of all their Posts, the chief whereof were conferr'd on Alfgar Son of Leofric.

Edward
sends away
the Queen.

1052.

Goodwin takes measures to restore himself to his former State.
Sax. Ann.
G. Malmfb.

In the mean time, Goodwin, who thought himself unjustly oppress'd, took measures to right himself by arms, there being no other remedy, as matters stood between the King and him. The Earl of Flanders furnishing him with some Ships, he infest'd the Eastern Coasts of England, whilst Harold his eldest Son did the same to the Western. But these faint attempts were to little purpose, seeing their forces were not very considerable. Wherefore Goodwin returned to Flanders, where for two years together, he left no stone unturn'd to persuade the Earl his protector, it was for his interest to lend him a powerful assistance, and to have such a friend as he in England. Baldwin being at length prevail'd with, granted him an aid capable of rendering him formidable, whilst on the other hand, Harold equip'd a good number of Ships in Ireland. Edward having intelligence of these proceedings, fitted out a fleet with all expedition, the command of which was given to Randolph of Mantes his nephew (2), and another Lord named Odda. These two admirals hearing Goodwin had been seen off Rumney point, resolv'd to go and attack him, but he had time to retire elsewhere. His measures being thus broken by the King's expedition, he steer'd his course again for Flanders, and sent back Harold into Ireland. His view was to make the King believe, he gave over his undertaking, by reason of the obstacles he met with. Mean while, he kept his fleet always ready, that he might improve any occasions that should offer. Shortly after one presented itself, which he did not fail to make advantage of. Whether the two admirals were wanting in point of duty or conduct, or through court-intrigues, which history has not taken care to discover, Edward on a sudden removed these two Lords from the command of the fleet. This alteration, and the breaking some of the inferior officers, rais'd such discontents among the Sailors, that they deserted in crowds. Thus the King's Ships not being in condition to keep the Sea, were brought up the Thames in order to be new-mann'd. Goodwin by his spies being informed of this disorder, puts to Sea immediately, and makes a descent on the Isle of Wight, where he extorted great sums from the inhabitants, whilst he waited for his Son Harold to join him. After their junction, they sail'd up the Thames, and advanc'd towards London, where the King's fleet lay. Edward giving way to his passion, would have gone himself with such Ships as were ready (3), and tried the fortune of a battle; but his council oppos'd it. They represented to him, that instead of hazarding his person in an action, the consequences whereof might prepares to repulse him.

Edward

Goodwin enters the Thames, and comes up to Lon- don.

prove very fatal, it would be more for his own and the kingdom's advantage, to try to make Goodwin return to his obedience, by gentler methods. This was wholesome advice; but the King would hardly have followed it, had not Goodwin, who was informed of what was transacting at court, smooch'd the way, by saving him the shame of making the first advances. He sent the King word, that he was not come to fight against his Sovereign, but most humbly to intreat him to hear his justification: That his coming thus arm'd was only to defend himself against the insults of his enemies, and he should always glory in being the most faithful of his subjects. How respectful soever this message might be, Edward, looking upon it as a sort of banter, flatly refused to hearken to any accommodation; affirming, he could not resolve to pardon his Brother's murderer. His obstinacy had like to have produced a fatal effect. Goodwin's army, entirely consisting of foreigners, who were in hopes of enriching themselves with the plunder of London, they were for engaging the King's fleet without delay. But the Earl, who was perfectly inform'd how the council stood dispos'd, check'd the ardour of his soldiers, and behaved in a very submissive manner with regard to the King. His moderation was attended at last with the success he expected. Edward was prevail'd with by the principal Lords, and especially Stigand Bishop of Winchester, a great friend of Goodwin's, to receive the Earl into favour again, at least, as to outward appearance. He even agreed, he should be acquitted, by the general assembly of the kingdom, of the murder of Prince Alfred, which he was charged with afresh, but on condition he should give hostages for his good behaviour for the future (4). Goodwin submitting to the King's terms, put into his hands his Son Ulnoth, and his Grandson Hacune, who were immediately sent into Normandy, Edward not thinking he could secure them in England. Goodwin and his Sons were restored to their estates and dignities, and the King honourably took again the Queen his wife, whom he thought he had been rid of for life.

Goodwin
takes his Peace with the King;
and gives him hostages.
Sax. Ann.
Kn'ghton.
Brompt.

Upon the first news of the agreement between the King and the Earl, the Archbishop of Canterbury retired to the monastery of Jumiege in Normandy. Shortly after his departure, he was banish'd the kingdom by an assembly general, as an incendiary and fomentor of divisions between the King and his Subjects (5). Stigand was made Archbishop in his room, on supposition the See was become vacant by his banishment, a supposition that the court of Rome would by no means allow. Thus ended the affair of Goodwin. This Lord seemingly was very like to have been undone for ever; but, contrary to the expectation of his enemies, his disgrace tended only to render him more powerful and formidable. This same year he lost his third Son Swane, who going in pilgrimage to Jerusalem, died on the road in some place in Syria, where he fell into the hands of robbers (6).

The Archbishop of Canterbury
banish'd.
Sax. Ann.
Malmfb.
S. Dunelm.
Stigand is made Archbishop.

Malmfb.

The court of England enjoying a profound quiet after Goodwin's return, William the Bastard, Duke of Normandy, took this opportunity to pay a visit to Edward (7). Some say, Edward sent him word by Archbishop Robert, that he design'd to make him his heir, and that his aim in this visit was to get a confirmation of this promise. But this is only conjecture. However that be, during William's stay in England, the King took a pleasure in showing his gratitude for all the civilities he had received, both from him and the Duke his father. It is pretended, after having thus publicly testified his gratitude, he privately gave him a more substantial mark of his affection, by making his will, and nominating him his heir and successor (8). If it be true that Edward made such a will, which however no body ever saw, it is more probable he did it at this time, than when he was in Normandy. Whilst the throne of England was fill'd by the Danes; whilst Alfred his eldest Brother, and also the children of Edmund Ironside were alive; how could Edward foresee he should ever be King of England? But at the time William the Bastard was in England, Edward, bearing still a mortal hatred to Goodwin in his heart, notwithstanding their feigned reconciliation, might suspect the Earl of aspiring to the crown, and hope by this settlement to break his measures. But after all, it is much more probable he made no will, but contented himself with giving the Duke of Normandy some verbal promise.

The Duke of
Normandy visits Ed- ward.
Ingulph.
S. Dunelm.
Brompt.
R. Higden.

Edward's pretended Will in his favour.

(1) In Hampshire; of which his Sister was Abbess. Sax. Ann. Malmfb. p. 82.

(2) He was Son to Goda Sister of Edward, and the Earl of Mantes. Rupin.---In 1052. Emma, King Edward's Mother, died at Winchester, where she was buried. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 366. Ingulph. p. 65. M. Weilm.

(3) Which was fifty. Sax. Ann.

(4) Mr. Selden in his Titles of Honour, p. 525, refers that Relation in Brompton's Chronicle, taken notice of in Note (9) p. 129. to this Assembly General. See more of it in the Dissertation on the Government of the Anglo-Saxons, under the Article of their Laws.

(5) And the rest of the Frenchmen that were in England, fled, and were also banished. Sax. Ann. See the Names of such Normans as staid in England, in S. Dunelm. p. 186, 187. Brompt. p. 944.

(6) Simon of Durham says, being prick'd in Conscience for the murder of Earl Besn, he went from Flanders bare-foot as far as Jerusalem, and in his return homeward died of a Cold he got in Lycia. S. Dunelm. p. 186. Brompt. p. 944.

(7) Brompton says, he came in 1050. and S. Dunelm. 1051. (p. 944, 185.) They all agree, that it was during Goodwin's banishment. See Higden. p. 279.

(8) Ingulph expressly says, that William had then no hopes of succeeding to the Crown, neither was there the least mention made of it between them at this time.---De successione autem regni spes adhuc, aut mentio nulla facta inter eos fuit. p. 65.

However this be, it was this Will, real or forg'd, or this verbal promise, that furnished the Duke with a pretence of becoming master of England after the death of Edward. But it is very likely, Goodwin knew nothing of this Will, or verbal promise; which may be plainly inferred from his taking no measures to prevent a Norman Prince from reigning over the English, though he was a sworn enemy to the Norman nation. By the way, the situation of affairs then in England, where Goodwin almost equalled the King himself in power, renders incredible what some have ventured to advance, that Edward got his Will in favour of Duke William confirmed by a general assembly.

Edward in vain used all sorts of means to obstruct Goodwin's advancement. This Earl's power was grown to such a height, that it might have proved of dangerous consequence, had not death freed the King from this hated, and then most formidable, Subject. If we believe certain Historians, Goodwin's death was attended with extraordinary circumstances, deserving a serious regard, were they better attested. They say, as the King was one day sitting at table with the Earl, he let fall some words, which plainly showed, the murder of the Prince his Brother was not yet thoroughly blotted out of his mind. They add, Goodwin taking it as a reflection upon him, rose up, and addressing himself to the King, I perceive, my Lord, (says he with great emotion) by what you just now said, you still think me guilty of the death of the Prince your Brother, though I have been publickly acquitted of it. But to give you a fresh proof of my innocence, I pray God that this morsel I am going to eat may choke me this moment, if I had any hand in the death of that Prince. It is pretended, that upon saying these words, he went to swallow the fatal morsel, but it stuck in his throat and choked him immediately, to the great astonishment of the Standers-by. But this circumstance, had it been true, was too remarkable to be omitted by the Historians of the best credit, who make no mention at all of it. They agree, Goodwin died suddenly, as he sat at table with the King, but say not a word of the above-mentioned circumstances, which probably were invented to blacken the memory of the Earl and his Family (1). Harold his eldest Son succeeded him in all his Post, those he had himself before his Father's death being given to Alfgar, Son of Leofric Duke of Mercia.

The death of Goodwin caused no great alteration. Harold had the same friends, the same creatures, and the same interest as the Earl his Father when alive. All the difference to be observed between the Father and Son, was, that the Son was of a temper more courteous and pliable, carried himself with much less pride, and behaved in a more respectful and submissive manner to the King. He was in hopes, by this carriage, to remove the King's inveterate hatred to his family; but it was to no purpose. Edward perhaps had not so great an aversion for him as he had for his Father; but he feared him as much, and indeed, very justly. Harold, of as great parts and abilities as his Father, but withal of more honour and conscience, firmly gain'd to his interest both the Nobles and People, by his civil and obliging behaviour; whereas Goodwin's haughtiness and pride frequently lost him many friends. Mean while the same reasons that constrained the King to carry it fair with the Father, obliged him to do the same with the Son. Though he lov'd him not, he durst not show his ill-will, lest it should prove the occasion of a rupture, which must have been of very bad consequence, considering Harold's great credit at court and with the people.

If the overgrown power of the Goodwin family created uneasiness in the King, it was in some measure alleviated by the satisfaction he had to see his kingdom exempt from war, ever since his accession to the throne. But this tranquillity, which could not but be very grateful to a Prince of so unwarlike a temper, was a little disturbed by a quarrel with Mackbeth King of Scotland, who had made himself master of Cumberland. This little kingdom, which had been long under the protection of the crown of England, was contended for between Mackbeth and Malcolm, a Lord of the royal family of Cumberland. Edward espousing the cause of Malcolm, commissioned Siward to restore him to his kingdom. This war was of short duration. Siward by one decisive battle obliged Mackbeth to abandon Cumberland, and leave his rival in possession (2). Siward had scarce finished this affair, when he was seized with a distemper (3) that laid him in his grave. When he found he was near his end, he got upon his legs, and causing his armour to be put on, expired in that posture, declaring it dishonourable for a brave Man to die in his bed (4).

After the death of Siward, the government of Northumberland was conferred on Toston, Brother of Harold (5). Edward not having resolution enough to refuse him that favour, though he dreaded nothing more than the advancement of that family. Some will have it, this was done out of policy. They pretend, the King, by feigning to gratify Harold, filled the vacant post with the properest person to give a check to his ambition, by reason of the mutual jealousy between the two Brothers. But it does not appear Harold and Toston were then at variance, tho' it be true, they became enemies afterwards. 'Twas therefore great imprudence to trust any one family with two such important posts as Duke of Wessex, and Earl of Northumberland, which put one moiety of the kingdom in the power of the two Brothers. Thus the King, tho' he stood in the greatest dread of the Goodwin Family, either out of weakness, or ill policy, did every thing to render them more powerful.

It was not only by the King's favours that Earl Harold daily got ground. His personal merit and liberal temper daily procured him such friends, as were able to support him against the attempts of the King himself. Though he had married the Duke of Mercia's daughter, Alfgar his Brother-in-law carried it very coldly towards him, purely out of envy at his greatness. This Lord, being of a restless and turbulent spirit, entered into a dangerous conspiracy, and privately held intelligence with Griffin King of Wales, to the detriment of the publick. Edward being informed of it, caused him to be accused of treason, and condemned to banishment. Alfgar retired to his friend Griffin, who received him with open arms, and cherished his discontent to the utmost of his power (6). Some time after they made an inroad together into Herefordshire and defeated Radulph of Mantes Earl of that County, who had attempted to drive them thence. Encouraged by this success, they began to make farther advances (7), when they met Earl Harold, who stop'd their career. He had of his own accord levied an army in his governments, and boldly marched towards them, to give them battle. They quickly found the difference between him and Radulph. Harold, superior in valour and conduct, put them to rout, and compelled them to retire into Wales, from whence they durst not come forth any more. A peace being the consequence of this victory, Harold made use of all his interest to obtain a pardon for Alfgar, and got him at length restored to his estate and honours. By this uncommon act of generosity, he gained the friendship of Alfgar, and exceedingly increased the esteem people already had for him.

The reputation acquir'd by Harold in his last expedition, his generosity to Alfgar, his affable and obliging behaviour, his beneficent temper, entirely gained him the hearts of the people. It began to be the publick discourse, that 1053.

Goodwin's
Death.
Brompt.
R. v. Allen-
fic.
M. West
Huntingd.
Ingulph.

Sax. Ann.
S. Dunelm.

Harold his Son succeeds him.
Sax. Ann.

Harold's
prudent Conduct.

1055.
Death of Siward.
Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.
Brompt.

Toston.
Harold's
Brother made Earl of Northumberland.
Sax. Ann.
Ingulph.
Brompt.

Harold's
Credit increases.

Alfgar
Leofric's
Son banish'd.
Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.
S. Dunelm.

Retires to Wales, and joins King
Griffin.

They are defeated by Harold.

Alfgar restored.

1054.
War for Cumber-
land.
S. Dunelm.
Huntingd.
Brompt.
Ingulph.

(1) The Saxon Annals say only, This year Earl Goodwin deceased the 17th of the Kalends of May, and was buried in the old Monastery of Winchester, Anno MLIII. Almost all our Historians say, King Edward celebrating the Feast of Easter at Winchester (some say Windsor) Earl Goodwin was taken speechless as he sat at table; and being carried into the King's chamber by his Sons, he lay in a languishing condition four days, and died the fifth. This is the account of his death, but the Norman Monks, and such as write in favour of them, add the above-circumstances, which show either his Guilt or their Malice. He was a Man of an active turbulent Spirit, not over conscientious in getting or keeping what he could. But had he not been so great a Lover of his Country, and an Enemy to Foreigners, those who wrote in the Norman times would have given him a fairer character. S. Dunelm. p. 187. Chr. Mailles. p. 188.

(2) Matthew Westminister says, but without any authority, that King Edward conquer'd all Scotland, and bestowed it on Malcolm to hold it of him. Others seem to say he destroyed Mackbeth, and made Malcolm King of Scotland. S. Dunelm. But most probably it was only of Cumberland.

(3) A bloody Flux. He was buried in the Cloyster of St. Mary's Monastery, without the Walls of York, which he had built. Brompt. p. 946. Ingulph. p. 66.

(4) Simon of Durham says, Earl Siward's Son was slain in the battle with Mackbeth; and Huntingdon adds, that when the News was brought him, he asked, whether he had received the Wound before or behind? and being told, Before; he only replied, I am glad to bear it. Brompton says, he was a Man of almost a gigantick Stature, and gives us this strange account of his Grandmother the Daughter of a certain Danish Earl. As she was one day walking in a Wood near her Father's House, accompanied only with her Women, a huge Bear rushing from among the Trees, and frightening away her Attendants, carried off the young Lady alone; and getting her with Child, he had a Son by him, named Bernus, who was born with Bear's Ears, however by his Mother's right he succeeded to her Father's Earldom. In proofs of time he proved a valiant Soldier, and marrying, begot the brave Earl Siward, who came and settled in England. Brompt. p. 945.

(5) Because Waltheof, Siward's Son, was too young; but to make some amends, Edward gave him the government of the Counties of Northampton, Huntingdon, &c. Brompt. Hunting. p. 366. Ingulph. p. 66.

(6) Historians are divided in their opinions, whether this Earl was banished justly or not. The Sax. Ann. and Huntingd. (p. 366.) say, that he was convicted of treason: But S. Dunelm. (p. 187.) Brompton and Ingulph affirm, he was unjustly banished. Simon of Durham and Brompton say, he went to Ireland first, and procuring eighteen Ships, went and joined Griffin. He was banished again in 1058, but, by the Assistance of Griffin, and of a Norwegian Fleet, was restored. S. Dunelm. p. 189. Ingulph. p. 66.

(7) They took and sacked Hereford, burning the Church and Monastery with the Relicks of King Ethelbert treacherously slain by King Osfa. Hereford &c. the Ford of the Army, was built as a Frontier in the time of the Heptarchy. This was the only Misfortune that ever happened to this City. Since since the King had no heirs, no one was more worthy to succeed him than Harold. The affection of the English for the Earl, very sensibly touched Edward, who had all along lived in expectation of an occasion to ruin him. Hitherto this Prince seems to have intended to leave the crown to the Duke of Normandy, since he was not ignorant he had a Nephew in Hungary, and yet had never once thought of recalling him home, and securing him the succession. But the moment he found Earl Harold aspired to the crown, or at least, that the people marked him out for his successor, he judged it would be very difficult to set up a foreign Prince, against an English Earl of so great power and credit. This consideration probably induced him at last to send for his Nephew Edward, Son of Edmund Ironside, out of Hungary (1). He should have done this long before, had he not designed to dispose of the crown in favour of another. Prince Edward came into England in 1057, bringing with him his young Son Edgar, with Margaret and Christiana his Daughters, who were all three born in Hungary. The arrival of this Prince, Son of a King of England, whose memory was dear to the Nation, could not but be very agreeable to the English; and therefore, without hesitation, they considered him as the King's presumptive heir, their esteem for Harold giving place to their affection for the royal family. Indeed, there was no contesting this young Prince's right to succeed his Uncle, since, had he not been absent when it was debated who should sit on the throne after Hardicanute, he would have been unquestionably preferred even to King Edward himself. Which consideration was probably the reason of his Uncle's leaving him so long in Hungary, lest his presence might occasion some dangerous commotions. But this Prince, who seemed designed for the crown, died soon after his arrival in England, leaving his just, though empty title to Edgar his Son, surnamed Atheling (2).

Leofric, Duke of Mercia, quickly followed him, this same year (3). Historians give this Lord a great character; but especially they extol Godiva his wife, above all the Women of her time. It is related of this Lady, that in order to free the inhabitants of Coventry from a heavy tax laid on them by her Husband, she readily consented to a very extraordinary condition, on which the Earl promised to ease them of their burden, namely, that she should ride stark naked from one end of the town to the other. This condition gave the Burgbers little hopes of being relieved. But Godiva perform'd it, covering her Body with her hair, and commanding all persons to keep within doors, and from their windows, on pain of death. Notwithstanding this severe penalty, there was one, who could not forbear giving a look, out of curiosity, but it cost him his life. In memory of this event, there is a Statue of a Man looking out of a window, always kept in a certain house at Coventry (4). Alfgar succeeded to his Father's Earldom, by Harold's interest, who earnestly interceded for him (5).

Harold's ambition and hopes were revived by Prince Edward's death. That Prince indeed had left a Son who inherited all his rights, but so young, that it seem'd very easy to supplant him. Besides, he might possibly die before the King. Accordingly, Harold resolv'd to improve the present favourable conjuncture. But before he openly discovered his designs, he thought it requisite to get out of the hands of the Duke of Normandy, Ulnoth his Brother, and Hacune his Nephew, whom the Earl his Father had given for hostages to the King. But tho' he demanded them very urgently, alledging, since Goodevin was dead, there was no reason to detain them, and unjustly deprive them of the benefit of an English education, yet he could not prevail with the King. Edward always put him off with saying, they were not in his power, but the Duke of Normandy's, and therefore to that Prince he must make application. In fine, Harold perceiving he could obtain no other answer from the King, desired leave to go into Normandy, and solicit the Duke for their deliverance. His request was readily granted. Nothing could be more agreeable to the King, than the Earl's resolution of going to Normandy, where he did not question but the Duke would detain him. At least, he hoped Duke William would take such measures as would free him from all obstacles the Earl might lay in his way.

Harold having obtained the King's consent, embarked for Roan, without the least suspicion of the danger he was running into, being ignorant of the King's intention concerning the succession (6). Hardly was he at Sea, when a tempest arose, which drove him into Picardy, and compelled him to put in at one of the Ports of the Earl of Ponthieu, where he was immediately seized. As soon as he was known, he was carried to the Earl of Ponthieu, who, glad to find himself master of so rich a prize, resolv'd to set a round price on his head. It would have been difficult for Harold to get off, had he not, whilst he pretended to treat about his ransom, found means to inform the Duke of Normandy of the accident befallen him. As soon as the Duke received the news, he sent and demanded the prisoner of the Earl of Ponthieu, telling him he had no right to detain a stranger that was coming to Roan, and by a tempest cast on his coasts. The Earl not daring to dispute with the Duke, set the prisoner at liberty, who immediately went on to Roan. Duke William not being ignorant of Harold's design with respect to the crown of England, was at a loss how to behave. He had but two ways to take, both equally dangerous. Harold was either to be detained by force, or gained by fair means. If he took the first method, he was apprehensive of declaring too soon, since it was not for his interest the English should yet know, he had any thoughts of the crown. Besides, Harold had so many friends in the kingdom, that it was to be feared, his detention would occasion a rupture between England and Normandy, which would break all the measures the King should take in his favour. And indeed, in case Edward died during the war, how was it possible for him to leave the crown to a Prince actually in arms against the English Nation? Moreover, Harold being Duke of Wessex and Earl of Kent, all the strong places in the southern parts were in the hands of his creatures, and it was this chiefly that could most obstruct the Duke's designs. In fine, the Duke had not perfect information what steps Harold had made to pave his way to the crown; as on his part, Harold was ignorant of the designs of the King and Duke. The Duke considered further, that by detaining Harold, he should break the most sacred rights of hospitality, which a great Soul cannot be guilty of without offering extreme violence to it self. These considerations induced him to take the other course, tho' it was no less dangerous. By discovering his intentions to Harold, he put it in his power to prevent their execution. However, believing he should gain him by this proof of his confidence, he plainly told him his hopes, of one day mounting the throne of England, founded on the Good-will the King bore him (7). This discovery was followed with promises, in case he would support his pretensions, and the assurance of a reward proportionable to so important a service. He let him know moreover, that his ambition to aspire to the crown, tho' not of the royal family, was no secret to him, and endeavour'd to make him sensible, how difficult it would be to attain his ends. To divert him from his purpose, he represented to him all the obstacles he was of course to expect, as well from Edgar, as the other English Lords, who would look on his ambition with a jealous eye. To these considerations he added another that was no less urgent. He plainly told him, tho' he should be so fortunate, as to surmount all other obstacles,

(1) Aldred Bishop of Worcester was sent to fetch him. Brompt. p. 945.

(2) (i. e.) Truly noble, to denote his being of Royal Blood. His Father, Prince Edward, surnamed the Out-law, was buried at St. Paul's London. Sax. Ann. MLVII.

(3) He was buried in Coventry-Monastery which he and Godiva built; and to which they gave so much Gold, Silver, and precious Stones, that it was reckoned the richest in England. Huntingd. p. 266. S. Dunelm. p. 189.

(4) But whether this be so or no, there is a Procession or Cavalcade still made there every year, in memory of Godiva, with a Figure representing a naked Woman riding through the City. The Pictures of Leofric and Godiva were also set up in the Windows of Trinity Church, with this inscription:

I Luric, for the Love of thee,
Do set Coventry Toll-free.

This City had its Name either from the Convent new-built and richly endowed by Leofric, or as some will have it from a Rivulet running through, now called Sherburn, but in an old Charter of the Priory, Cuenstford. This City was famous for its Walls, which were demolished in Charles the 11th time, and the Gates only left standing. In one of which named Geffard, is to be seen the vast Shield-bone of a Boar, which they tell you was slain by Gay Earl of Warwick, after he had with his Sword tun'd up the Pool or Pond now called Saunderswell Pool, but in ancient Charters, Saunderswell. Here is also a fine Church built (33 Hen. VIII.) by Sir William Holmes Lord-Mayor of London. Camd.

(5) He died in 1059, and was buried at Coventry, by his Father. Inghulph. p. 66.

(6) Harold's going to Normandy is variously related as to the Time, Manner, and Occasion of it. With our Author agree Simeon of Durham, Brompton, and Eadmer, only with this addition, that King Edward foretold him what would happen to him. Malmesbury says the occasion of it was this. Harold being at his House at Bosham in Wessex, had a mind to go out in a Fisher-boat for his diversion, but failing further than he was aware, a tempest arose and drove him as is here related by Rapin. Matthew Paris believes also he was driven by a tempest to Normandy, where to gain his liberty he was forced to do as is here related. So uncertain are traditional Accounts! Our Author's conduct through this whole affair seems to be the most natural and likely.

(7) Simeon of Durham says, the Duke told Harold that Edward, whilst at his Court, promised to settle the Crown of England on him, p. 196.

Edward
sent for his Nephew from Hungary.
Sax. Ann.
Knigh-ton.
S. Dunelm.
Brompt.

Death of Prince Edward,

and of Leofric, Duke of Mercia.
Sax. Ann.
Godiva's
Adventure.
Brompt.
M. West.

Sax. Ann.

1062.
Harold aspires to the Crown, and demands the Hostages given the King
by Goodevin.
Eadmer.

but can't obtain them.

He set out for Nor- mandy.
Malmesb.
Brompt.
S. Dunelm.

Is seized by the Earl of Ponthieu.

Is set at liberty, and goes to Roan.
The Duke at a loss how to act.

He endeavours to gain him, by disclosing to him his Designs.

he would still find in him an enemy, who wanted neither money, nor arms, nor friends to support a right he was resolved to defend to the last drop of his blood. In short, he represented to him, that if he was bent to pursue his first project, instead of securing, as it was in his power, a grandeur, second to none but the supreme, he hazarded a certain good, for a very uncertain prospect.

Harold
dissembles
the Matter, and seems to stand by the Duke.

Harold was too wise not to see, that, on this occasion, he had but one course to take; which was, to pretend to be convinced by the reasons the Duke had alledged. He returned him therefore in answer, that indeed, before the arrival of Prince Edward, he had believed if the King died without heirs, he was as worthy to ascend the throne as any other nobleman of the kingdom. He even owned, he had begun to take some measures, which inspired him with hopes of success; but had dropt his design since the coming of Edward, being sensible there was no room to pretend to the crown, as long as there were Princes of the royal family in England. He added, since he was acquainted with his pretensions, and the King's pleasure, which till then he had been ignorant of, he had much rather the kingdom should be governed by so great a Prince as the Duke, than by Edgar Atheling, who scarce knew how to govern himself. To convince him the more of his sincerity, he required certain conditions, and among others, demanded one of his daughters in marriage, as a reward for his future service. Whatever Harold required was immediately and gladly complied with. But as the Princess, the Duke designed for him, was too young, the intended marriage was deferred till a more convenient time. Mean while, Duke William not trusting wholly to Harold's bare word, made him swear on the Gospels, that he would punctually perform his promises, especially, that he would never attempt to mount the throne of England. This agreement being made, they parted both of them extremely well satisfied in outward appearance, and Harold returned into England (1).

Harold
takes no Measures to secure the Succession to himself.

He was no sooner at liberty, but he looked upon his oath as extorted, and consequently not binding. He could not understand upon what foundation the Duke of Normandy pretended to the crown of England, or by what right Edward could transfer it to a foreigner. And therefore, so far was he from any thoughts of standing to his engagements, that he resolved to take advantage of the Duke's confidence, and contrive juster measures to frustrate his designs. From thence-forward he used a double diligence to strengthen his party in such a manner, as should put it out of the power of the King or Duke to lay any obstacles in his way. If hitherto he had entertained any scruple with regard to Prince Edgar, it entirely vanished upon consideration that in mounting the throne himself he should do no injury to that Prince, since the crown would be otherwise disposed of even by his uncle the King. He laboured therefore more and more to secure an interest in all the great Lords of the kingdom, to which he found the way very open. The Duke of Normandy was absent, and but little known in England, where moreover the Normans were extremely odious. Prince Edgar, by reason of his youth, was in no condition to oppose designs so detrimental to him. As for the King, he was so unresolved in the affair of the succession, that he promoted the interest neither of the Prince his nephew, nor of the Duke. He was no doubt at a loss how to reconcile his promise to the Duke of Normandy, with his recalling his nephew from Hungary. He thought only of passing his days in peace, without troubling himself about what should happen after his death. Thus every thing concurring to favour Harold's designs, he neglected nothing that might serve to confirm the good opinion conceived of him by the English. Two opportunities that offered themselves presently after, were extremely favourable to him.

1063.
Harold subdues the Welsh.
S. Dunelm.
Flor. Wig.
Sax. Ann.
Malmib.
S. Dunelm.

The Welsh renewing their incursions under the conduct of Griffin their King, Harold and his Brother Toston joined their forces to repulse them. They were so fortunate in their expedition, that, after several advantages gained upon the Welsh, they compelled them to dethrone Griffin, and become tributary to England. Griffin being afterwards restored, and renewing the war with the English, Harold marched to the frontiers, and struck such a terror into the Welsh, that they sent him the head of their King (2). This event which showed how formidable Harold was to the enemies of the State, confirmed the English in their opinion, that he, who knew so well how to defend it, deserved to wear the crown.

Harold had another opportunity to add new lustre to his glory, as it enabled him to give proofs of his moderation and equity, as he had lately done of his valour and conduct. Toston his Brother, Earl of Northumberland, treated the Northumbrians with such severity, and committed so many acts of injustice, that at last, the people not being able to bear his oppressions any longer, took up arms against him, and expelled him Northumberland. This action being of a dangerous consequence, Harold was ordered to chastise them, and restore his Brother. As soon as he approached the borders, the Northumbrians sent deputies to inform him of the reasons of their insurrection. They told him, they had no design of withdrawing their obedience from the King, but only from an unjust and cruel governor, who exercised over them a tyrannical power, to which neither they nor their forefathers had Malmib. ever been subject. Intimating withal, they were resolved to hazard their lives, rather than submit to the like power again. However, they solemnly protested, provided the King would set over them one that would govern them according to the laws and customs of their country, nothing should be able to shake their fidelity. To these remonstrances they added a long list of the grievances they had suffered under Toston, intreating Harold to prefer the Good of the publick before the interests of his own family. Harold finding this affair related chiefly to Toston, and that the King was not directly concerned in it, sent an impartial account of the whole matter to the court. At the same time he interceded for the Northumbrians, and not content with obtaining their pardon, procured them Morkard, Son of Alfgar Duke of Mercia, for their governor (3). By this equitable proceeding, he entirely gained the affection of the northern people, and contracted a stricter friendship with Alfgar than before. This union was absolutely necessary for the execution of his projects.

But if this action strengthened the people's esteem and affection for him, it exasperated to the last degree his Brother Toston, who never forgave him. But as it was not in his power to vent his fury on Harold's person, he turned his rage upon some of his domesticks (4), whom he caused to be cut in pieces, barrell'd up, and sent to his Brother for a present. After so barbarous a deed, not daring to stay any longer in England, he retired into Flanders to Earl Baldwin his Father-in-law (5).

Whilst Harold was thus paving his way to the crown, Edward never concerned himself about the succession, which he had exceedingly embroiled by his engagement with the Duke of Normandy. His thoughts were wholly employed about the structure of the Church and Monastery of Westminster, on which he laid out the money he had vowed to expend on a journey to Rome, which was dispensed with by the Pope upon that condition. There was formerly in the same place, called Thorney by the Saxons, a famous temple sacred to Apollo. Sebert, King of Essex, embracing the Gospel, converted this Pagan temple into a Christian Church, which was destroyed by the Danes. This Church having been long buried in its ruins, Edward undertook to rebuild it, with an adjoining Monastery, which from its lying West of London, was called Westminster (6). In process of time a City was built here by degrees, which almost rivals London itself, and keeps the name of the Monastery. These two Cities separated only by a Gate, have distinct magistrates and privileges, though they are often confounded under the name of London. The Church and Monastery being finished about the latter end of the year 1065,

Toston
drove out of Northumberland.
Sax. Ann.
Malmib.
S. Dunelm.
Brompton.

Harold sent to restore him; but disapproves of his being driven out.

Malmib.

A barbarous act of Tos-
ton's.
Huntingd.
M. Weist.

1065.
Edward prepares for the dedication of the Church of Westminster.
Ailred Rie-val.

Camden in Middlesex.

(1) The Duke made Harold swear to deliver up Dover as soon as King Edward was dead. Then loading him with presents, dismissed him with his Nephew Haecne, promising to bring over Ulnoth his Brother when he himself should come into England. Sim. Dunelm. p. 196.

(2) He was beheaded Aug. 7, 1064. This was the End of Griffin ap Ithorvelyn, to whom the Welsh Chronicles give the Character of a valiant and generous Prince, and for the most part victorious, till now he perished by the treachery of his own people. Harold sent the Head with the sword stuck in Griffin's Ship, which the Welsh had brought with the Head, to the King at Gloucester. Florence of Worcester adds, that the Brothers of Gwent were sent to Harold as well as to the King.

(3) Whom they themselves earnestly desired to have. The occasion of their insurrection at this time was this: One Gispatrik, a great Officer in Northumberland, having been murdered at Court by Queen Editha's Order, (though this seems contrary to her meek and pious temper) on account of a quarrel between him and her Brother Toston, and he likewise killing in his own lodgings two of Gispatrik's friends, and besides having had intolerable impositions, or tribute, on all Northumberland, the People incensed at it, and at his other Grievances above-mentioned, rose to a Man, and were not appeased till he was banished the Land. Flor. Wig. Sim. Dun.

(4) In a House of his at Hereford, where he had prepared a great Feast. Huntingd. p. 367. M. Weistm. p. 430.
(5) Huntingd. (who had heard many Tales about the hatred of Goodwin's Sons to one another) tells us another story of this matter. The King as he was at dinner ordering Harold to serve him with the Cup, Toston was so enraged at his being preferred before him, that he flew in his Face in the King's presence, and pulled him down to the ground by his hair. But the Soldiers coming in and parting them, Toston in a rage left the court, and going to his Brother's Country-House, served his domesticks as is above related. Upon which the King commanded him to be banished, and the Northumbrians expelled him their country. But this does not seem probable; for what occasion had the Northumbrians to rise against him, being he was banished before by the King?

(6) It was dedicated to St. Peter. This fabric of Edward's was demolished by Henry III. about one hundred and sixty years after, who erected a new one, which was fifty years in building. The Abbots very much enlarged it on the West-side, and Henry VII. added to the East a Chapel, which Ieland calls the Miracle of the World. Edward was buried the next day after his death, in his newly dedicated Church.

Knigh-
ton.

Harold's
Cabals.
The Nobles
send a deputation to the King, who leaves it to them to chuse
a Sovereign.

Edward's
Death.

His Character.

Alfred
Malmst.

Alfred
Rievallst.

Malmst.

Union of three sorts of Laws under Edward.
Brompt.
Knights.

Edward was desirous the dedication should be performed in a very solemn manner (1). To this end he summoned to meet at London a general assembly, at which were present all the Bishops and great Men of the kingdom, to be witnesses of this ceremony. At this very time it was, that the King was seized with a sudden illness, of which he died in a few days. As soon as he found the time of his dissolution approaching, his principal care was to finish the ceremony for which the great Men were assembled (2). As for the succession, he would not meddle with it, surrounded as it was with so many difficulties. In his own mind he was for the Duke of Normandy: The right was manifestly in Prince Edgar his Nephew: but Harold had the hearts and hands of the English. So many difficulties, upon which he could never determine whilst in health, becoming insurmountable in his present condition, he resolved to leave the decision to God alone.

Mean while, Harold was not idle. Almost all the Lords of the kingdom, both spiritual and temporal, being then assembled at London, he found means to induce them to act in his favour, and come to a resolution of sending deputies to the dying King to intreat him to name a successor. But withal, these deputies had orders to insinuate to the King, that in case he nominated any but Harold, he would infallibly involve the kingdom in endless troubles, which would be inconsistent with his wisdom, and the affection he had all along expressed for his people. Edward, not being then in a condition to examine a proposal of this nature, replied, That since they were met in a body, he left it to them to chuse the person they judged most worthy to rule over them. He died a few moments after (3), leaving the succession as unsettled at his death as it was during his life.

This Prince, who was born at Gifstip (4) near Oxford, reigned twenty-four years, without ever suffering any misfortune from foreign enemies. However, he cannot be said to have reigned happily, since he lived in continual fears, occasioned by the overgrown power of Earl Godwin and his family. His mild and peaceable temper were a great means however to procure him some tranquillity. Had he attempted to humble Godwin's pride, and lessen Harold's power, he would certainly have been involved in troubles, from whence he would have found it difficult to extricate himself. But by shutting his eyes at their secret practices, and feigning to know nothing of their designs, he prevented them from acting more openly, caused them to lay more distant schemes, and thereby gained time to arrive at the end of his days. He was remarkable neither for his Virtues nor Vices; and his natural parts were but mean. His piety has been exceedingly cried up, and has acquired him the glorious title of Confessor; and yet we do not find he was any sufferer on account of religion, unless we consider as a sort of Martyrdom, the mortifications he privately laid upon himself from a religious motive. It is certain he was very charitable, and expended in alms the Sums vainly lavished away by other Princes upon their pleasures. This joined to his Good-nature, of which he gave from time to time uncommon instances, made him pass for a Saint among the people, and particularly among the Monks, who reaped great advantages from his liberal disposition. They have not been satisfied with extolling his Virtues to the Skies, but have even, if I may so say, canoniz'd his very faults, and endeavoured to represent them as so many proofs of his Sanctity. Of this we need no other witnesses but his own Historian or rather Panegyrist, who attributes his voluntary chastity to a vow made before his marriage. This Writer assures us, Edward espoused Editha, daughter of Godwin, purely to exercise his Virtue by a continual temptation. But it is easy to see he acted from a very different motive, since he parted with his wife the moment he thought he could do it with safety. However, the opinion of his sanctity taking by degrees deep root in the minds of the people, he was canonized by Pope Alexander III, under the name of Edward the Confessor (5).

It was not thought sufficient to allow this Prince all the Virtue necessary to carry him to Heaven, unless he had a place given him also among the Saints of the first class. We are told he was favoured with several revelations, with the gift of prophecy, and many other miraculous powers, in proof of which such weak and trifling instances are produced, as are not worth mentioning. However, I can't pass over in silence one special privilege he is said to receive from Heaven, of curing the King's Evil. Nay, it is affirm'd, this privilege has descended to the Kings of England his successors. Hence the custom in England of the King's Touching for the Evil at a certain time of the year (6). But the late King William III. of glorious memory, was so persuaded he should do no injury to persons afflicted with this distemper, by not touching them, that he refrained from it all his reign. The Kings of France also have claimed the same privilege ever since the time of Clovis, the first Christian King of that kingdom (7).

What has been most commended in King Edward, was his Good-nature, the excessiveness whereof has been carefully insinuated by several circumstances of his Life, of which I shall content my self with producing two as a specimen of the rest. One day being laid down upon the bed, one of his domesticks, who did not know he was in the room, stole some money out of a chest he found open, which the King let him carry off without saying a word. Quickly after, the Boy returning to make a second attempt, the King call'd to him without the least passion, Sirrah, you'd best be satisfied with what you've got, for if my Chamberlain comes and catches you, he'll not only take away all you have stol'n, but whip you severely (8). Another time, as he was hunting, a countryman maliciously spoiling his sport, he gallop'd up to him, and said to him in anger, By our Lady, I would be revenged on thee if it was in my power. These are the incontestable proofs of his extraordinary Good-nature, which, according to his Panegyrist, advanc'd him so far above all other Men.

Edward was the last King of Egbert's race, though not the last Saxon King, as some have affirmed, since his successor was of that nation. Had not this weak Prince preposterously abstain'd from conversing with his Queen, a very beautiful and virtuous Lady, he might perhaps have had children, and thereby prevented a revolution, which involv'd the English in Slavery.

Before the reign of Edward, the West-Saxon, Mercian and Danish Laws were observed in England, namely, the first in Wesssex, the second in Mercia, and the last in Northumberland. This Prince reduced them all into one body; and from that time they became common to all England, under the name of the Laws of Edward, to distinguish them from those of the Normans, introduced afterwards (9).

(1) The dedication was performed December 28. Sax. Ann. M. Westm. p. 431.
(2) The Great Men also signed the Charter of the Privileges and Immunities granted to the Church, to which was annexed, as is said, the first Great Seal used in England. Though Tyrell thinks other Kings might have Seals to their Charters, though they are now defaced. B. VI. p. 99.
(3) On January 5, 1066. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 193.
(4) Now Islip. In the Chapel here, called the King's Chapel, not many years since stood a Font, the same, as tradition has constantly delivered it down, wherein Edward the Confessor was baptized. But being put to an indecent use, was at last removed to the Garden of Sir Henry Broun, Bart. of Nether Riddington in Oxfordshire. Add. to Camd.
(5) About two hundred years after his death. There was likewise a Bull of Pope Innocent IV. to fix the Anniversary, and order the solemnity of the Festival. Martyrol. Rom. Baronius, Jan. 5.
(6) It will not be amiss to relate the first Instance of this Hereditary Miracle, as Mr. Collier calls it. A young married Woman having the misfortune to be barren, and troubled at the same time with the distemper since called the King's Evil, was, after all human means had been tried in vain, admonished in a Vision to go to the King, by whose merits she should be cured upon his Washing, Touching, and Signing with the Cross, the Parts affected. The Woman runs to Court next Morning overjoyed, and tells the King the whole matter; who thereupon disdains not to Wash, Touch and Cure her purrified Sores, which immediately breaking, and Corruption and Worms bursting out, the Parts were in a few days healed without the least Scar remaining; and moreover, her barrenness was removed, and she soon became the joyful Mother of Children. This is the first Act, as it is given us by Alired in his History of the Life and Miracles of Edward the Confessor, of that Supernatural Power, enjoyed by the Kings of England ever since. But though Mr. Collier says, to dispute this Matter is to go to the Excellencies of Superstition, yet there are some, who doubt of it on the following accounts.
I. This Power is generally fixed to the Lineal Succession; whereas it is plain, there was no such thing in those days, neither was Edward himself the next Heir.
II. It is plain from Alired, that this privilege was given him not as a King, but as a Saint; and Malmstrey says, they are to be blamed that attribute it to his Royalty and not to his Sanctity. Consequently there is no Reason his Successors, who were certainly no Saints, should be so highly favoured of Heaven.
III. Alired reckons up many other Miracles which he performed; as the restoring to their Sight six or seven Blind Men, &c. but does not say a word of his Power of curing the Evil descended to his Successors, any more than his Power of restoring the Blind to their Sight, or of his removing Barrenness, which one would think should be joined to the other, since they were cured both by the same Touch.
IV. As there is no evident Reason why the Kings of England should have this privilege above any other Christian Prince, so if Heaven had granted such a Power to our Kings, one would think they should have it in such a degree as to render it visible to all, and that the Cure should immediately follow the Touch: Whereas Multitudes are not cured at all, and those that are pretended to be so, not till a considerable time after they have been Touch'd.
(7) This Miracle is appropriated by Laurentius, Physician to Henry IV, to the Crown of France; but Dr. Tucker is even with him, for he makes the Kings of France to do it by virtue of their Alliance to the Royal Family of England. And Mr. Collier will have the antiquity of this Power to be on the side of England, since he says, Lewis the Godly was the first that Touch'd for the Evil two hundred years after our Edward. Eccl. Hist.
(8) The Story goes on, that the Chamberlain coming in after the Boy was gone, and missing the Money, fell into a great rage; but the King calmly said to him, Be contented, it may be the poor Rogue that has it wants it more than we do; there's enough left for us. Alired. Vit. Ed. p. 376. X. Scrip.
(9) Concerning this threefold distinction of the Laws, see what has been said above, and also in the following Dissertation, under the Head of the Laws of the Anglo-Saxons.

21. HAROLD II.

HAROLD
II.
1066.
Elected by the Assembly-
General.
Sax. Ann.
S. Dunelm.

IF the great Men assembled to appoint a successor to Edward, had been swayed only by justice, equity, and the antient customs of the kingdom, they would not have long debated, to know to whom the crown was devolved. Edgar Atheling was the only Prince of the family of their antient Kings, and consequently, the only person who had a right to lay claim to the crown. But Harold had so well laid his measures, that he was unanimously elected, without any regard to the right of the lawful heir. As for the Duke of Normandy, his pretensions grounded on the late King's promise, do not seem to have been considered at all. It is certain this Prince had never publicly declared his design of aspiring to the crown of England. Accordingly, the English Lords might be ignorant of the matter, or at least pretend to be so. But supposing they had been informed of his pretensions, it would have served only to furnish them with a fresh motive, to place on the throne a King more capable than Edgar Atheling, of defending the kingdom against the attacks of a foreign Prince.

Various opinions about Harold's
succeeding to the Crown.
Sax. Ann.
S. Dunelm.
Malmsh.
M. West.
Brompt.

The manner of Harold's succeeding to the crown is variously related by Historians: Several affirm (1), he was elected with one common voice, and without any constraint, by the Witten-Gemot then assembled, and crown'd the day after his election by the Archbishop of York. Others say, he usurped the crown by compelling the great council to elect him, after extorting his nomination from the late King just as he was dying (2). There are some, who look upon this election as a fiction, affirming, Harold, without troubling himself about the consent of the Nobles or People, put the Crown on his head himself without any formality (3). The reason of this diversity among the Historians, proceeds from their espousing either the right of Harold, or of the Duke of Normandy, as if Prince Edgar's claim was to be reckoned as nothing; whereas in truth he alone had a right to succeed to the crown. But as among this variety of opinions, a Man is in danger of being swayed by the passions and prejudices of the Historians, rather than by justice and equity, it will not be amiss to explain this matter, by laying before the reader, what might be alledged for and against each of the three competitors.

Edgar's title.

As for Prince Edgar, it suffices to say for him, he was the sole Prince of the royal race. It is true, his being born out of the kingdom might be objected against him. But as Prince Edward his Father was not legally banished, his being forced by Canute to live in exile, ought not to have prejudic'd his Son's right.

The Duke of Normandy's
Right enquired into.
Knighton.
Brompt.
Ann. Mar-
gari.

As for the Duke of Normandy, he can hardly be imagined to aspire to the crown of England without some foundation, and yet it cannot be conceived upon what title he supported his pretension; so great is the diversity of opinions upon this subject. Some tell us, he was invited over by the English to free them from the tyranny of Harold (4). Others say, Edward, when in Normandy, promised him, if ever he came to the crown, to make him his heir. In fine, several affirm, that Edward appointed him his successor by his last Will; and some even assure us, this Will was confirmed in Edward's life-time by the general assembly of the Nation; but this pretended Will was never produced. Neither does it appear that Duke William ever founded his claim upon any such thing, as if it were known, or he had it in his hands. In all probability therefore the foundation he went upon, was some verbal promise made him by Edward, when he was in England. It was doubtless in consequence of this promise, that he required Harold not to rise up in competition against him. Had the English done Edgar justice, and placed him on the throne, it is not likely Duke William would have attempted, upon so trifling a pretension, to wrest the crown from a Prince to whom of right it belonged. But he had to deal with Harold, who, being only a private Man, had procured himself the crown by indirect practices, and without any manner of right. Accordingly, setting aside Prince Edgar, he compared his right only with that of the reigning King. His interest induced him to think, that Edward's promise was equivalent to an election, since it was thought proper to exclude the lawful heir. To this may be added, that he looked upon the crown of England as what he could not miss of, especially after binding Harold by an oath. And therefore, the indignation at being deceived, the desire of Revenge, and chiefly his Ambition the root of the quarrel, all concurred to inspire him with a resolution to make an attempt upon the English crown, in spite of all opposition. Persuaded as he was, that he had no less right than Harold, he thought he might use force to wrest the crown from a Prince, who had naturally no title to it. These, probably, were the motives that engaged Duke William in so great an undertaking, the success whereof seemed however very doubtful.

As for Harold's right it ought also to be considered under a double view, with regard to the Duke of Normandy, and with regard to Prince Edgar. If we examine the election of this King, in opposition to the Duke, we find nothing but what was regular and according to form, and against which the Duke could have any just reason to object. It is certain, supposing Edward had nominated Duke William his successor, either by Will, or otherwise, the nomination would have been of no force, unless confirmed by the assembly of States (5). Accordingly this is what some affirm, being sensible the Duke's title without this approbation was little worth. And in truth, where is the nation, that, without being forced to it, would suffer their King, by his own bare nomination, to subject them to a Foreigner, in exclusion of the Princes of the royal Blood, or even of the most worthy Lords of the kingdom? If this were ever the case, it was done by surprise, before the people had time to oppose it. The election therefore of Harold was very lawful, at least with regard to the Duke of Normandy, since it was made by the assembly-general, whose power Duke William had no right to dispute.

But in comparing Harold's title with Prince Edgar's, it is hard to give it so favourable a construction. It may indeed be supported by the opinion of those who maintain, that during the Saxon government, the crown was elective, and the Nobles and People had a power of giving it to whom they pleased. But besides the difficulties attending this opinion, supposing that were so, this argument would not be sufficient to justify Harold's election. How extensive soever some would make the privileges of the assembly-general in the time of the Saxon Kings, yet no one, I believe, will affirm they had a power of bestowing the crown on a private person, in prejudice of the Princes of the royal family. At least it would be exceeding difficult to produce any instances from the history of the Anglo-Saxons, to establish this opinion. The question then amounts to this, whether the Nation had a right to elect Harold on exclusion of Edgar, or whether, on this occasion, they did not stretch their power beyond its natural bounds. As I design to treat of this matter in another place (6), I shall not undertake to decide the question at present, but only remark, that supposing the Nation had such a power, yet it must be owned it was abused at this juncture, and that Edgar had great injustice done him. But notwithstanding all its defects, this election gave Harold an incomparably better title than the bare nomination of King Edward gave Duke William, granting the fore-mentioned Will was as real, as it appears to be imaginary. From what has been said, it is easy to see, the Duke of Normandy's claim was built on a weak foundation. But to return to our history.

After Harold was crown'd, there was not a person in the kingdom, but what owned him for sovereign, and paid him obedience. But tho' he found no opposition at home, it was otherwise abroad. Not to mention the Duke of Normandy, who, before he discovered, put himself in a condition to execute his designs, Earl Tostig was preparing to disturb the King his Brother in the possession of his new dignity. He could not forgive him his impartial proceedings, when, in favour of the Northumbrians, he dispossest him of his government. Though Harold's accession to the crown should have rendered him more formidable to him, this consideration serv'd only to inflame his hatred the more, and put him upon devising all possible means to dethrone him. As he was not ignorant of the Duke of Normandy's intentions, with whom he had contracted a strict friendship, on account of their marrying two Sisters, Daughters of the Earl of Flanders, he

The examination of Harold's
title.

T. Angre-
p. 106.
1066.
1067.

S. Dunelm.
Malmsh.

(1) Saxon Annals, and Hoveden, with some other of the English Writers. The Bishops were all for Harold to a Man.

(2) William of Malmshury, and such as reputed the title of the Duke of Normandy.

(3) Harold denied this opinion, and adds several were for setting up Edgar Atheling. Ingulphus more cautiously says, Harold forgetting his oath made Duke William intend himself into the throne.

(4) I believe Harold to be the only one that said this. Rapin.

(5) See more of this matter in the following dissertation under the head of the Succession to the Crown.

(6) In the place mentioned in the Note before this.

went to him to concert measures with him against the King his Brother. There is no doubt but Duke William encouraged him to execute his designs (1). But it does not appear that he furnished him with any Money, Troops, or Ships, of all which he had himself so great need against his intended invasion. Probably therefore it was the Earl of Flanders, his Father-in-law, that supplied Tofton with Ships, by means of which he infested the English coasts, and plundered the Isle of Wight. After which, he landed some troops at Sandwich. But being informed the King was marching towards him, he set sail for the North, and entering the Humber with his little fleet (2), made a descent on Yorkshire, and committed ravages as if he had been in an enemy's country. Harold, not thinking it advisable to leave the southern parts, commissioned Earl Morcard to go against his Brother; who, having been made governor of Northumberland in the room of Tofton, was particularly concerned to put a stop to his incursions. As for the King, he remained at London, that he might have an eye to Edgar's party, and prevent them from exciting any troubles upon that young Prince's account. This seem'd to him, at that time, to be what he had most to fear; being sensible, the injustice done Edgar sat heavy upon the minds of those who were well-affected to the ancient royal family. Accordingly, to prevent their discontents from breaking out into action, he caref'd the Prince as well as those of his party. He even insinuated from time to time, that he had accepted the crown purely on account of Edgar's youth, willing they should understand, as if he meant to restore it to the Prince when he was of age to govern. With this view, he created him Earl of Oxford, and seem'd to take a very particular care of his education, as it were to qualify him for the government of the kingdom.

Mean while Morcard, accompanied with his Brother Edwin, Earl of Chester, march'd with all expedition against Tofton, who was now on the south-side of the Humber. He came upon him unawares in Lincolnshire, and put his little army to flight, compelling him to betake himself to his Ships. Tofton finding he could do nothing considerable with so small a number of forces, steered towards Scotland, in expectation of assistance from thence (3). But perceiving the King of Scotland was not dispos'd to support him, he puts to Sea again, with design to make another descent on England. Prevented by contrary winds, he was driven on the coast of Norway, where he accidentally stumbled upon what he had been seeking so industriously.

Harold Harfager King of Norway, had lately taken some of the Orcades (4), which belonged to Scotland, and was fitting out a more numerous fleet in order to carry on his conquests. Tofton being informed of this Prince's designs, went directly to him, pretending he was come on purpose to propose to him a more noble undertaking. He represented to him, that a favourable opportunity offered to conquer England, if he would but turn his arms that way. The better to persuade him, he told him, there were in the kingdom two powerful factions, both enemies to the King, the one for Prince Edgar, the other for the Duke of Normandy, and therefore, the English being thus divided, it would not be difficult to subdue them. Adding, that he himself had a strong party in Northumberland, which would very much promote the execution of this design. In fine, he made him believe the King his Brother was extremely odious to the English, and would be certainly deserted by them, as soon as there appeared in England a foreign army strong enough to support his enemies. Harfager, greedy of fame, and already devouring in his imagination so noble a prize, wanted not much sollicitation to engage in this project. Preposess'd by Tofton of the practicableness of the thing, he resolv'd to employ all his forces in making so glorious a conquest.

Whilst the King of Norway was making his preparations, the Duke of Normandy was no less seriously thinking of means to wrest from Harold a crown, he had so long been in expectation of, and which he could not bear to see on his Head without extreme regret. Though his Rival, in all appearance, was firmly seated in his throne, the Duke imagined he was able to pull him down, since the way by arms was still open, when all other methods fail'd. However, to proceed regularly, he sent ambassadors to Harold, to require him to deliver him up the crown, and in case of refusal, to charge him with the breach of his oath, and declare war against him. Harold told the ambassadors, "Their master had no manner of right to the crown of England: That supposing the late King had dispos'd of it in his favour, a thing the English knew nothing of, it was contrary to the laws of the Land, which allow not the King to give away the crown according to his fancy, much less to a Foreigner. As for his part, he had been elected by those, who had the power of placing the Kings on the throne, and therefore could not resign it, without the breach of that trust reposed in him by the English. As for the oath, the violation whereof he was charged with, it having been extorted from him at a time when he had not the power to help himself, it was null and void, by the laws of all the Nations in the World. In fine, he added, that he knew how to defend his right against any person that durst dispute it with him." This quarrel being of too great consequence to be decided without coming to blows, each party took such measures as he judg'd most likely to prove successful (5).

The Duke's vexation to be deceived, the desire of revenge, the shame of renouncing his pretensions, and the pleasing hopes of being master of England, spur'd him on to use all possible endeavours to succeed in his designs. On the other side, Harold finding he was like to have so formidable an adversary, thought nothing would be of more service to him, than gaining the people to his interests. To this purpose, he made himself more popular than ever. He lessened the taxes, and caus'd justice to be duly and impartially administred. In fine, he forgot nothing that might serve to confirm his Subjects in the esteem and affection they already had for him. His labour was not in vain. The English, charm'd with his first proceedings, which afforded them so pleasant a prospect, resolv'd to sacrifice their lives and fortunes to support him on the throne to which they had rais'd him. Duke William, for his part, not being ignorant of the resolution of the English, perceived he had no other way to attain his ends, but by setting on foot forces proportionable to those of the enemies he was resolv'd to attack.

The main difficulty was, to raise a sum of money sufficient for the charge of so great an undertaking. His first method was, to convene an assembly of the States of Normandy, to obtain their concurrence. But he found them very backward to comply with his desires. They told him, that "Normandy having been drained of Men and money by the late wars, they were so far from being in a condition to think of making new conquests, that they were hardly able to defend their own territories against the attacks of a powerful Invader. Besides, how just soever the Duke's claim to England might be, they could not see that any advantage would accrue to their country from this expedition. In fine, that they were not obliged by their allegiance to serve in foreign wars, wherein the State had no concern." This stout answer destroying the Duke's hopes of raising money in a publick way, he bethought himself of an expedient, which succeeded to his wish. This was to borrow money of private persons; and gaining some of the chief Men, the rest were inspir'd with an emulation who should be most zealous in assisting their Prince. William Fitz-osbern undertook to fit out forty Ships at his own expence. The most wealthy, every one according to his ability, subscribed very large Sums: So that the Duke by this method rais'd more money than he could have done by a pub-

He plunders the Isle of Wight, and lands at Sandwich, and then in the North.

Harold's behaviour to Edgar.

Morcard drives Tofton to his Ships. Sax. Ann. Malmib.

He is driven to Norway. Sax. Ann.

The Duke of Normandy prepares for the Invasion of England. Dunelm. Camden. M. West. Ingulph.

Duke William's preparations. Harold gains the Affections of the People. Dunelm. Brompton.

Duke William endeavours to raise Money.

The States refuse to contribute. Camd. Brit. Normans. Brompton.

(1) See Wil. Gemeticen. p. 665. and Daniel Hist. de France. Vol. III. p. 90.

(2) It consist'd of sixty Ships. Malmib. p. 94. Sax. Ann. Others say of forty. Brompt. p. 958. M. West. p. 433.

(3) He sail'd to Scotland, with twelve Ships, the rest having forsaken him; and there staid all the Summer. Sax. Ann. Malmib. p. 94. S. Dunelm. p. 194.

(4) They are now called the Isles of Orkney. Whatever the Ancients have said of their Number, there are but twenty-six inhabited, the rest are used only for Pasturage, and are called Holmes. Orkney lies North of Cathness, in the Latitude of fifty-nine and sixty Degrees. Eagles are in such plenty here, and do so much mischief, that whoever kills one, is entitled to a Hen from every House in the Parish. The largest of these Isles is Mannaw, anciently Pomonia, twenty-four Miles long, whereon stands the only remarkable Town, called Kirkwall, famous for St. Magnus's Church, and the Bishop of Orkney's Palace. The Isles were first inhabited by the Picts, who kept possession of them till destroyed in 830, by Kereth II. of Scotland, from which time they were subject to the Scots, till delivered up by Donald Ban the Usurper in 1099, to Magnus King of Norway, who is said to build the stately Cathedral at Kirkwall. They have since remained annex'd to the Crown of Scotland. In Hoy, one of these Isles, lies a Stone called Dwarfie Stone, thirty-six Foot long, eighteen broad, and nine thick, hollow'd by Art with a square Hole of two Foot high for the Entry. Within, at one end, is a Bed big enough for two Men, excellently hewn out of the Stone, with a Pillow; at the other end is a Couch, and in the middle a Hearth for a Fire, with a Hole over it for the Chimney. Orkney gives title to an Earl.

(5) Brompton says, Duke William sent a second Message to King Harold, offering to desist from his Claims, provided he would marry his daughter. But this is very improbable; for besides that our best Historians tell us the young Lady was dead, it is not likely the Duke's ambition would be so easily satisfied.

lick tax. But as this was not sufficient, he engaged several of the neighbouring (1) Princes to furnish him with troops and transports, on condition of their having Lands assigned them in England after the conquest. He even demanded the assistance of France; but it was not the interest of that crown that the Duke of Normandy should become more powerful. Very fortunately, King Philip, who was then a Minor under the care of the Earl of Flanders, obstructed not his proceedings, which a Prince that had been old enough to have known his own interests, would infallibly have done. It is true indeed, the court of France endeavoured to dissuade the Duke from this enterprise, but to no purpose (2).

Mean time Duke William, who was too wise not to be sensible of the weakness of his title, omitted nothing that might serve to give it some colour of justice. With this view he bethought himself of an expedient very proper to blind the eyes of the world; which was, to procure the Pope's approbation of his undertaking, to whom, it is said, he made a promise of holding the kingdom of England of the Apostolick See. However this be, the Pope very heartily espoused his cause, and sent him a consecrated Banner (3), as a mark of his approbation. Moreover, willing that all Christians should know that religion was concerned in this affair, he solemnly excommunicated all that should dare oppose the Duke in the execution of this project. This approbation was of great service to the Duke, as it furnished him with means to justify his intended expedition, and at the same time removed the scruples of such, as he was endeavouring to engage in his quarrel. But it had not the same effect in England. Whether the English knew nothing of the Pope's excommunication, or looked upon it as a great piece of partiality, it prevented not Harold from equipping a large fleet, and raising a numerous army, with which he resolutely expected his enemy.

The charge of keeping so considerable an armament, could not but be very burthensome to the people, a thing the King would have been glad to avoid. After he had in vain expected some months the arrival of Duke William, finding he did not appear, and the autumnal Equinox approached, he imagined, pursuant to some false informations he had received, that the Duke had deferred his expedition till the Spring. Accordingly, he thought he might safely lay up his Ships for the Winter, and disband his troops (4), to save an unnecessary expence.

But as he was returning to London out of Kent, where he had given his last orders for disbanding the army, news was brought him that the King of Norway, accompanied with Earl Toston, was entered the Tyne, with a fleet of five hundred sail (5). Surpriz'd at this unexpected invasion, he hastily drew his army together again, which were dispersing themselves. But before they were ready to march, the Norwegians had made a great progress. Having sack'd the Counties on both sides the Tyne, they put to Sea, and entering the Humber, landed their forces on the North side (6), and ravag'd the country with inexpressible cruelties. Morcard and Edwin, who were upon the spot, endeavour'd to stop their career, with some troops levied in haste; but were so beaten, that their whole army was destroyed (7). Flust with this success, the Norwegians advanc'd towards York, and laid siege to the City, which they quickly became masters of; the inhabitants, who were unprovided with all things necessary for their defence, chusing rather to surrender upon terms, than expose themselves to certain ruin. Mean while, Harold having drawn his army together, advanc'd with all expedition, to give the Norwegians battle, who having left their fleet in the Humber, were marching towards the North, to compleat the reduction of Northumberland, before they proceeded to other conquests. As they marched but slowly, and as Harold made all possible haste, he came up with them at Stanford Bridge, on the River Derwent, a little below York (8). The Norwegians, upon his approach, intrench'd themselves in so advantageous a post, that it seem'd impossible to force them. They were posted on the other side of the river, where there was no attacking them but by the bridge, of which they were masters. Notwithstanding this, Harold, who was very sensible how much it behoved him to come to an engagement, ordered the bridge to be attacked without delay. The Norwegians stoutly defended it, but could not withstand the efforts of the English, though animated by the astonishing valour of one of their own Men, who defended the bridge alone against the English army for a considerable time. At length, the brave Norwegian being slain (9), Harold became master of the bridge, and pass'd his army over. Then furiously falling upon the enemy, after an obstinate fight, entirely routed them. There had never been seen in England an engagement between two so numerous armies, each having no less than threescore thousand Men. The battle, which was very bloody, lasted from seven in the morning till three in the afternoon. Harfager and Toston were both slain, and Harold obtained a compleat victory. Of the whole army that came from Norway in five hundred Ships, the remains were carried off by Olaf, Son of Harfager, in twenty Vessels, with the Conqueror's leave. The booty which was taken upon this occasion was very great, since there was found in the camp all that the Norwegians had brought from home, and all they had plundered in the kingdom (10). But Harold having been so impolitick as to retain the spoil to himself, rais'd such discontents in his army, as proved of very ill consequence to him afterwards (11). One would think this Prince, who was naturally generous, should have secured the hearts of his Soldiers, by a liberality which would have cost him nothing, especially at a time when he stood in so great need of their service. But he considered, the expending this booty in the war against the Duke of Normandy, would very much ease the people, whose affection he was desirous to preserve at any rate. Nevertheless, he should have considered the gaining the hearts of his soldiers was no less necessary. Doubtless it would have been better for him to cultivate their affection, as he too plainly discovered to his cost on another occasion. It has been often observed, that soldiers are never so little regarded, as when by their bravery they have procur'd their Masters some signal advantages, because their own victories serve to render them useless. But 'tis no less certain, that sooner or later a discontented army give their Prince or their General cause to repent of using them ill.

Whilst Harold was busied in the North, in rectifying the disorders occasioned by the Norwegian invasion, the Duke of Normandy, who had long waited for a wind at St. Valery, set sail about the end of September, and had a speedy passage to Pevensey (12) in Suffex. 'Tis affirmed, that in leaping ashore, he fell all along on his face; at which one of the soldiers said merrily, See, our Duke is taking possession of England; which the Duke took as a good omen. No body appearing to oppose his landing, his first care was to run up a Fort near the place where he disembarked (13), to favour his retreat in case of necessity. Some however will have it, that he sent his Ships back to Normandy, to let his army see they had nothing to trust to but their valour (14). After some days stay at Pevensey, he marched along the shore as far as Hastings (15), where he built a stronger Fort than the former, resolving there to expect his enemy of whom he had no intelligence. 'Twas here he published a Manifesto, showing the reasons of his coming into England; namely, first, to revenge the death of Prince Alfred, Brother of King Edward. This, if ever any, was a frivolous pretence, since Earl Godwin, the contriver of that murder, was dead, and Harold never charged with it. Secondly, To restore Robert Archbishop of Canterbury to his See. This was no better reason than the first, for Robert was banished by the general assembly in Edward's reign, and consequently the present King could not be blamed for it. 'Tis very likely this article was inserted in the Manifesto on the Pope's account, to serve as a cover for his partiality to the Duke. Thirdly, and principally, to offer the English his assistance to punish Harold for pre-

(1) The Earls of Anjou, Paris, Maine, Beaune, and Alan Earl of Bretagne. Camd. Introd. p. clviii. Conan Earl of Bretagne, Alan's father, demanded, and threaten'd to invade Normandy, in order to divert William from his attempt on England; but William had him poisoned. Wid. Germanicus, l. 6. c. 33. P. Daniel, Vol. III. p. 91, 92. Which shews what a terrible Monster is an ambitious Prince.

(2) William, and the Emperor Henry, entered into a League, by which Henry bound himself to march with all the German forces, against any one that should attack Normandy, during William's expedition into England. P. Daniel, Vol. III. p. 93.

(3) With a Golden Agnus Dei, and one of St. Peter's Hairs.

(4) This was about September 8. R. de Diceto, p. 479. Brompt.

(5) Malmsh. Huntingd. and Sax. Ann. say it consisted only of three hundred; and Ingulph says of two hundred, p. 69.

(6) At a Place called Ribba in the East-Riding of Yorkshire. S. Dunelm. p. 194. Camden.

(7) The Place was Fulford near York. S. Dunelm. p. 194.

(8) Which Camden says, is also called Battle-Bridge, from this engagement between Harold and the Norwegians. In Latin, Pont. bell.

(9) He is said to have killed forty Men with his own hand. Brompt.

(10) Adam Bremenfis says, they took so much Gold among the Spoil, that twelve young Men could hardly bear it on their shoulders. This battle was fought nine days before William the Conqueror landed.

(11) It was the custom in those days for all the Spoils to be fairly divided among the Officers and Soldiers.

(12) Now Pevensey. He landed September 29, after having been near a Month upon passage. Sax. Ann. Malmsh. p. 100. Kingston says, that he landed part of his Forces at Pevensey, and the other part at Sandwich. p. 234.

(13) In which he lay still ten fifteen days, and kept his Soldiers from plundering the neighbouring parts. Malmsh. p. 100.

(14) Camden says, he ordered his Ships to be burnt.

(15) The chief of the Conqueror's Party, whose Burgesses retain the old title of Barons.

suming to seize the Crown, without any right, and directly contrary to his Oath. It is to be observed, he made no mention either of Edward's Will, or verbal Promise, and that his Silence on that head renders this third motive very trifling. For indeed, without such a Will or Promise, what pretence could the Duke of Normandy have to concern himself with the affairs of England? Some affirm he founded his right on his Kindred to Edward; but he was no way related to the late King, only by Emma of Normandy, who had never any title to the Crown; and besides, he was himself a Bastard. But he did not so much build his hopes on his Manifesto, as on the strength of his Army. He was very sensible, if he obtained the Victory, his reasons would be readily admitted. Mean while, not to terrify the English, he charged his Army to injure none, but such as were actually in Arms against him. But neither this precaution, nor his Manifesto gained him any Friends. The English could not conceive upon what Foundation he had entered the Kingdom with an Army, or what advantage any one could have by taking his Part.

Harold comes to London. S. Dunelm.

The Nobility come in to him.

Ambassadors from the Duke, and from Harold to the Duke.

Harold encamps near the Norman's. Malm. M. Weit.

Gurth's Speech to his Brethren. Malmib. W. Weit.

Harold's answer.

he was bent to give him Battle, advance'd a little to seize an advantageous Post, where he could conveniently draw up his Army.

Whilst they were preparing for a Battle, which was to decide the fate of both Princes, Duke William seem'd to abate something of his haughtiness. 'Tis to be presum'd, the thoughts of a Battle in an Enemy's Country, where his loss would be irretrievable, inspir'd him with some dread of the Issue. On the other hand, he could not well forbear reflecting beforehand on the blood that was going to be spilt in a quarrel, the Justice whereof he could not be thoroughly convinced of, how much sooner he seem'd to be so. Be this as it will, before they engag'd, he sent the King by the hands of a certain Monk these four Proposals, for him to take his choice. The first was, to resign the Crown, as he was bound by Oath. By the second, he offered to return into Normandy, provided Harold would do him Homage for the Kingdom of England. By the third, he was ready to refer the differences to the Judgment of the Apostolick See. Lastly, he propos'd the deciding of their quarrel by single Combat. 'Tis no wonder, Harold reject'd these four Proposals, seeing they were all so advantageous to the Duke. As for the two first, 'tis visible, how detrimental they were to Harold. The third seem'd at first sight something fairer; but the Pope having already declared in favour of the Duke, what Justice could Harold expect from him? As for the fourth, the advantage plainly lay on the Duke's side, since in a single Combat, he hazarded only his Person, whereas Harold ventured his Crown with his Life. The Victory would have procur'd the Duke of Normandy a noble Kingdom, whereas it would have only acquir'd the King the bare glory of conquering. Besides, Harold was of opinion, the decision of an Affair, where the whole Nation was concerned, ought not to depend on the strength and skill of a single Arm. His answer therefore was, God should determine on the morrow the Justice of their Rights.

The English spent the whole night in carousing and singing, as if they were sure of the Victory. The Normans, on the contrary, were employed in preparing for the Battle, and offering up Prayers to God for Success. At length, on the 14th of October, Harold's Birth-day, but much more memorable for one of the greatest Events that ever happened, in England, the two Armies engag'd. In the Front of the English stood the Kentish Men, a Privilege they had enjoyed ever since the time of the Heptarchy. Harold placed himself in the Center, and would fight on foot, that his Men might be the more encouraged, by seeing their King expos'd to equal danger with the meanest Soldier. The Normans were drawn up in three Bodies: Montgomery and Fitz-osbern conducted the first. Geoffrey Martel commanded the second, and the Duke himself headed the Body of Reserve, to succour those who should most want it (3). The Normans began the fight with a volley of Arrows, which being shot upward, were like a thick Cloud over the heads of the foremost Body of the English. As their Ranks were very close, the Arrows did great execution. The English not being us'd to this way of fighting, were at first put into some little disorder. The Normans willing to take advantage of it, vigorously attack'd them. But the English immediately falling into good order again, gave them so warm a reception, that they were obliged to draw back and take breath. Quickly after, they renewed the attack, but met with as brave a resistance as before, neither was it in their power to break their Enemy's Ranks. The English chusing rather to die than give way, and the Normans asham'd to retreat, both sides fought stoutly for a considerable time, without either gaining ground. The presence of their Leaders animating the Soldiers, they every where fought with equal Bravery, without the least signs of advantage on either side. We may judge of the valour of the Troops in both Armies by the length of the Fight, which began at seven in the Morning, and lasted till Night.

I shall not take upon me fully to describe this bloody Battle. I find so much confusion in the accounts of the Historians, that I dare not flatter my self with being able to give a clear and distinct Notion of the thing. I shall content my self therefore with the mention of two Circumstances, which, all Historians unanimously agree, gave the Normans the Victory. The Fight had lasted all day, and the Success was yet very uncertain; when Duke William bethought himself of a Stratagem, which made Victory incline to his side. This Prince, who was very experienc'd, perceiving there was no breaking the Malm. M. Weit.

The Battle of Hastings. Malmib. M. Weit.

The Victory a long time doubtful.

The Duke's Stratagem.

Hastings.

(1.) All the Historians say, None. See Dunelm. p. 194. Brompt. Sec.

(2.) Some of the Spies took the Normans to be an Army of Priests, because they were shaven, it being the Custom then among the English to wear long Beards. Mat. West. p. 436. Malmib. p. 100.

(3.) The chief of William's General were, Fuflace Earl of Bugene, William Fitz-Richard Earl of Ferreux, Geoffrey Son of Roger Earl of Montreuil, Roger Son of Roger Earl of Beaumont, Admiral de Tuaris, Hugh Earl of Etaples, Walter Giffard, Hugh de Caen, and William de Warenne. P. Dunelm. History of France, Vol. III. p. 94.

ranks of the English, ordered his Troops to retreat as they fought, as if they were discouraged, but withal, to be very careful to keep their Ranks. This order being executed, the English looked upon the Enemies Retreat as the Beginning of their Victory. Possessed with this notion, they encouraged one another with reiterated shouts, to press the retiring Enemies. Their eagerness made them break their Ranks, that they might push them with the greater Impetuosity, imagining they were upon the point of taking to flight. Then it was, that the Normans, finding their Stratagem had taken effect, stood their ground, and by a Discipline they had long been used to, closed their Ranks, and falling on the disordered English, made a terrible Slaughter of them. Harold, enraged to see the Victory, which a moment before he thought himself sure of, snatched out of his hands, used his utmost endeavours to rally his Troops that were in extreme Disorder. His labour was not altogether in vain, for at last he drew up, on a rising ground at a little distance from the field of Battle, a good Body of Foot, which became at length very considerable, by being continually joined by the flying Troops. The Duke of Normandy's Victory being yet far from complete, whilst so strong a Body of the English kept together, he ordered them to be attacked with great Fury. But the English received them with that Bravery, and the Normans lost such numbers of their Men, that the fortune of the Day seemed still very doubtful. The approach of the night, and the resolution of the English, making the Duke despair of penetrating their Ranks, he began to think himself conquered since he was not entirely victorious. Probably, the English Army might have retreated in good order, by favour of the Night, if Harold could have resolved to leave his Enemy in possession of the Field of Battle, at a time when the loss on both Sides was pretty equal. But apprehending his retreat might be prejudicial to his Affairs, and derogatory to his Reputation, he would maintain his Post, and not give the enemy that advantage. Besides, he was in hopes of rallying his whole Army during the Night, and renewing the fight the next Morning.

Mean time, the Duke perceiving the Night was like to rob him of the glory of a complete Victory, made one effort more to drive the English from their Post.

In this last onset, Harold was slain by an Arrow shot into his Brains (1.) His Troops disheartened at this fatal accident, began to give ground, and betake themselves to flight. Thus Harold's death was the second thing that procured the Normans the Victory, and put the English entirely to rout. They were pursued as long as day lasted; and in this Pursuit it was, that a terrible slaughter was made of the Fugitives; the Conquerors killing without mercy all they could overtake, to save the trouble of guarding the Prisoners. The darkness of the Night however saved a good part of the English Army, who retreated under the Conduct of Morcard and Edwin. These two Lords, who had all along firmly adhered to Harold, seeing he was slain, as well as Gurth and Lewin his Brothers, submitted at length to Providence, having given, the whole day, visible marks of their Valour. This long and bloody Battle cost the Duke of Normandy six thousand Men (2); but the English lost a much greater number (3).

Duke William, at the height of his Wishes, gave orders for the whole Army to fall on their Knees, and return God Thanks for so signal a Victory. After discharging so just a duty, he caused his Tent to be pitched in the Field of Battle, and spent the residue of the Night among the slain. On the morrow, he ordered his own dead to be buried; and gave the English Peasants leave to do the same office for the others. The Bodies of the King and his Brothers being found, he sent them to Gith their Mother, who gave them as honourable a burial as the circumstance of the time would permit, in Waltham-Abbey, founded by the King her Son (4).

Thus fell Harold, with his Sword in his Hand, in defence not only of his own; but of his Country's Cause, against the ambition of the Duke of Normandy. The Historians, who wrote in the Reigns of the Conqueror and his Sons, have endeavoured to blacken the memory of Harold, thereby to justify, in some measure, the ambition of the Duke. But all they have said against this last Saxon King, tends only to the imputation of breach of Oath, on which we have seen what he alledged in his own vindication. He might have been much more justly blamed for his secret practices, in procuring Prince Edgar to be excluded from the Throne, who alone had a Right to aspire to it. But the Sticklers for the Duke took care not to dwell on that head, since their Reproaches against Harold would have touched the Duke no less than his Adversaries. However this be, Harold may be said to have been more worthy of the Crown, had he been less forward to obtain it. He gained the love and esteem of the English whilst he was but a private Man, and acted nothing during his short Reign (5); which tended to lessen their affection. He fought within the space of a few days, two great Battles; with very different Success. In the first; his conduct and valour procured him a signal Victory over the King of Norway; and his unhappy Success in the last must be wholly ascribed to his ill Fortune. As for his other personal Qualities, he was Honest; Obliging, Affable, exceeding Generous, in a word, he was endowed with all the Virtues which form a great Prince.

Harold was twice married. By his first Wife, whose name is unknown, he had three Sons, Edmund, Godwin, and Magnus, who retired into Ireland after the death of their Father. By his second Wife, Aligtha, Sister of Morcard and Edwin, he had a Son called Wolf, who was but a Child at the time of the Battle of Hastings, and was afterwards knighted by William Rufus. By this second Marriage, he had also two Daughters; of whom Gunilda, the eldest, falling blind, passed her days in a Nunnery. The youngest was married to Waldemar King of Russia, by whom she had a Daughter, who was Wife to Waldemar King of Denmark (6).

Thus ended in England the Empire of the Anglo-Saxons, which began above six hundred years before in the Person of Hengist the first King of Kent. We shall see in the following Book how England fell under the dominion of the Normans.

(1) R. de Diceto (p. 480.) and Huntingd. (p. 369.) say, that Harold was not killed outright, but the Multitude rushing on made an end of him.

(2) He had three Horses killed that Day under him, without losing one drop of his Blood. Malmsh. p. 101.

(3) This Battle was fought near Heathfield in Sussex, in the place where the Town of Battle now stands, so called from this Day's Action, wherein our modern Historians say were slain above threehore Thousand English Men.

(4) An ancient Manuscript in the Cottonian Library relates, that the King's Body was hard to be known by reason of its being covered with Wounds, but was at last discovered by one who had been his Mistress, by the means of certain private Marks known only to herself. The Duke sent the Body to his Mother Giraldus Cambrensis asserts he was not slain, but escaping retired to a Cell near St. John's Church in Chester, and died there an Anchorite, as was owned by himself in his last Confession when he lay a dying. In memory whereof they shewed his Tomb when Knighen wrote.

(5) Of nine Months and nine Days.

(6) Tyrol says, (from Speed) she was Mother to Waldemar the first King of Denmark of that Name. From whom the Danish Kings for many Ages after succeeded.

THE STATE of the CHURCH,

FROM THE

Reign of ÆTHELRED II, to the Norman Conquest; that is, from 979, to 1066.

State of the Church.

AFTER seeing what passed in England from the beginning of the Reign of Æthelred II, to the end of the Empire of the Saxons, it is not to be expected that this period should afford much matter for an Ecclesiastical History: In general, this Century may be termed the Age of ignorance, with respect to all Europe, but more especially with regard to England. If there was occasion, it would be very difficult to assign the causes of this universal ignorance, not only in this Kingdom, but in all other Christian States. But it will suffice to alledge one, peculiar to England; I mean the Wars the Kingdom was incessantly troubled with. The Arms of the Pagans, which triumphed throughout the whole Kingdom, scarce left the English the liberty of professing their religion; and consequently, our knowledge of the affairs of the Church in those days must be very imperfect. Accordingly, I shall confine what I have to say on this subject to a few Heads, concerning the Doctrines, Councils, some particulars relating to certain Sees, and the Persons that were most distinguished among the Clergy.

The Sense of the Church of England relating to the Eucharist

What attempts soever have been made at sundry times to prove the antiquity of Transubstantiation, it could never be shewn to be the Doctrine of the Church of England, before the time I am speaking of. On the contrary, it evidently appears from the Homilies or Sermons which were read in Churches for the instruction of the People, that the Church in those days was very far from believing any such Thing. There is still extant a Translation of those Homilies (1), attributed to Elfric, who lived under Æthelred II; from whence any Man may be convinced, that the Church of England was then of a quite contrary Opinion. But that the Reader may judge for himself, it will not be amiss to lay before him an Extract of one of these Homilies relating to this Subject.

Extract of a Saxon Homily on this Subject.

“ There is a great difference between the invisible virtue of this Sacrament, and what it appears to us in the qualities of its own Nature. In its own Nature ’tis corruptible Bread and Wine, but by virtue of the divine institution, ’tis truly the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; after consecration, not in a Corporeal but Spiritual Manner. The Body in which Jesus Christ suffered, and the Eucharistical Body are widely different. The first was born of the Blessed Virgin, and consisted of Blood, Bones, Nerves, Limbs, animated with a rational Soul. But the Body which we call Eucharistical, is made up of several grains of Wheat. It has neither Blood, Bone, Nerve, Limb, nor Soul in it. We are therefore not to form any Corporeal Idea of it, but to understand it wholly in a spiritual Sense. In the Eucharist, whatever repairs our Nature, and forms us to a better Life, proceeds entirely from a mystick virtue, and spiritual Operation. For this reason the Eucharist is called a Sacrament, because one thing appears to our Senses, and another to our Understanding. What in the Sacrament is the object of Sight, has a corporeal Figure: But what is represented to our Understanding has a spiritual force and efficacy. Moreover the Body of Christ, which suffered and rose from the dead, is eternal and impassible, and no more subject to decay or death; whereas the Eucharist is not eternal, but corruptible, subject to the force of time, and divisible into many Parts. ’Tis ground by the Teeth, and passes through the common Channels of the Body; but notwithstanding, the spiritual efficacy of it remains in every Part. A great many Persons receive this Holy Body

“ or Eucharist, and yet the multitude of receivers weakens not the force of the Operation, the virtue of the Sacrament being lodged in every part of what is consecrated, the least part having as much Efficacy as the greatest. The reason is, because the virtue does not operate in proportion to the corporeal magnitude, but by means of the Divine Institution.

“ The Sacrament is a Type and Pledge, but the Body of our Lord Jesus Christ is the Truth and Reality of the representation. God has vouchsafed to give us this Pledge or Earnest, till we come to the Truth itself, and then the Pledge will disappear. For, as hath been observed, the Holy Eucharist is the Body of Jesus Christ not corporeally but spiritually (2). The Apostle St. Paul, speaking of the Israelites, has these Words: I would not that you should be ignorant, how that all our Fathers were under the Cloud, and passed through the Sea; and were all baptized unto Moses, in the Cloud and in the Sea; and did all eat the same spiritual Meat; and did all drink the same spiritual Drink: For they drank of the spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ. That Rock, from whence the water flow’d, was not Christ in reality, but a type and representation of Jesus Christ, who made this gracious Declaration to all the faithful; If any Man thirst let him come to me and drink; and out of his Belly shall flow Rivers of living Water. By this he understood the Holy Ghost, which those that believ’d on him should receive. The Apostle declares, that the Children of Israel, who were in the Wilderness, eat the same spiritual Meat, and drank the same spiritual Drink; because the Manna, with which they were supported forty years together, and the water which flow’d from the Rock, were types of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, which are daily offered in the Church. That Manna and that Water were the same which we now offer, not corporeally, but spiritually. To understand this, observe that our Lord Jesus Christ, before his Passion, consecrated the Bread and Wine into the Sacrament of the Eucharist, and said, This is my Body; This is my Blood: Although his Passion was not over when he pronounced these words, yet by a mystical Operation, he changed the Bread into his Body, and the Wine into his Blood, just as he had done in the Wilderness before his Incarnation, when he turned the Manna into his Flesh, and the Water that flow’d from the Rock, into his own Blood.”

As this Explanation is a clear evidence, that at the time this Homily was penn’d, the Church of England believed not Transubstantiation, so it is no less manifest that Elfric, who translated it into Latin, was of the same opinion with the Author. ’Tis true, there is some dispute about the Person of the Translator. Some believe him to be Elfric Archbishop of Canterbury. Others say it was Elfric the Grammarian, surnam’d Putta, who was Archbishop of York. But which ever of the two it was, they both liv’d in the reign of Æthelred II, and neither of them was ever accus’d of Heterodoxy. But as it might be objected, that Elfric was not of the same opinion with the Author, whom he translated, tho’ that is not very likely, the contrary is evident from the following words of the same Elfric, in one of his Letters to the Clergy. The Sacrifice of the Eucharist is not the Body in which our Saviour suffered for us, nor the Blood he shed for other sakes; but ’tis the same Body and the same Blood spiritually, just as the Manna was which fell from Heaven, and the Water which flow’d from the Rock. ’Tis therefore most certain, from the Testimony of a Prelate, who was at the head of the Church of Eng-

*Anglic Sa-
cra. Vol. 5.
p. 125.*

(1) These Homilies are in Latin titled Sermones Catholici: The Translation of them into Old English is preserved in the Bedford Library, and in that of Bodleian in Canterbury.

(2) Non Corporaliter sed Spiritually.

land, that the Doctrine of Transubstantiation was not introduced into that Church in the time of Ethelred II., who ascended the Throne in 979. There is no way to evade the force of this proof, but by asserting the Homily before-mentioned to be spurious. But this is much easier said than prov'd.

It is not the same with regard to the Invocation of the Blessed Virgin, and of the Saints in Glory, since, on the contrary, we find it was practised in England in this very Century. This is manifest from Canute the Great's Charter to the Abbey of Glaffenbury, where there is mention of the Blessed Virgin, and all the other Saints. But as the Authority of the Charters of those days are not equally admitted by all, the same thing may be proved from a public Litany then read in the Church. Here we see that after the Invocation of the Holy Trinity, these words are thrice repeated, O Holy Mary, pray for us: After which the Angels and Saints were addressed to [by name]. It is to be observed, when this Practice was first introduced, the Application to the Blessed Virgin and Saints was not so direct; May the Holy Virgin the Mother of God, and all the Saints intercede for us. These are the words in the public Office of canonical hours used by the Anglo-Saxons (1). This Office, which is in Latin, affords this remark, that although the Lessons, Prayers, Psalms, Lord's Prayer and Creed, are in the same Tongue, yet at the end of each Article of Verse, there follows a Saxon Translation in a paraphractical way, that the people might understand what was said.

Among the Canons, which go under the name of Elfric, of whom I have already spoken, and who lived in the reign of Ethelred II., the XXXIII^d obliges Priests to have by them two sorts of consecrated Oil, one for Children, and another for the sick; and enjoins that the sick should be always anointed upon their beds, and should confess themselves before the Ceremony of anointing passed upon them, which no Priest was to presume to perform till desired by the sick person. Whence it may be inferred, they did not stay till the sick were in their last Agonies, before they administered the extreme Unction (2).

In the XXXIII^d Canon, the four first General Councils (3) are put upon the same foot with the four Gospels; but those of later Ages are not of so great Authority. Hence 'tis evident that the Author of these Canons did not think all the general Councils were infallible. Had he been of this opinion, he would not have given a greater Authority to the four first than to the other Councils (4).

From the beginning of the Reign of Ethelred II., to the Norman Conquest, we find in the Ecclesiastical History of England but two Councils. In all appearance, the wars with the Danes prevented the Bishops from assembling more frequently, or rather were the reason that the acts of these Conventions are lost. Both these Councils (5), one at Engsham, and the other at Haba, were held, whilst Elphegus was Archbishop. The most remarkable Canons are as follow.

In the Council of Engsham, the II^d Canon enjoins the Celibacy of the Clergy.

The IXth forbids all Persons to do any wrong to the Church, or eject a Clergyman out of his Benefice without the Consent of the Bishop.

By the XVIIth, every Friday was to be a Fast, unless it fell upon a Holiday (6).

The XXth enjoins frequent Confessions, and the People are ordered to receive the Sacrament three times, at least, in a year (7).

The Council of Haba has but one Canon worth notice. By the second, every Christian was obliged to fast three days with Bread and Water, before the Feast of St. Michael, and to distribute among the poor what he should have eaten in these three days.

This is all worth remarking in these two Synods. But to supply the want of Councils, we have the Ecclesiastical Laws of Canute the Great, and Edward the Confessor; some of which I shall insert, to shew the great regard these two Princes had for the Clergy. The following ones are Canute's (8).

The IVth enjoins all Christians to pay great respect to the Clergy, because their Sacerdotal Functions are extremely beneficial to the People.

By the Vth, if a Priest was accused of any crime, he had the liberty of purging himself by saying Mass, and receiving the Eucharist.

The XIIth recommends Celibacy to the Clergy, and ranks them among the Thanes of the second Class, that is, among the Gentry (9).

The XXth ordains, that at Funerals the Dues shall be paid upon the breaking up of the ground; and that the Dues shall be paid to the parish the deceased belonged to, tho' he was buried elsewhere.

The XXII^d enjoins the observance of Sunday from Saturday three a-Clock in the afternoon, till Monday break of Day.

The XXIII^d determines the times of Fasting, and places the Vigils of the Festivals of the Blessed Virgin, and of the Apostles among the Fasts.

There are several others, relating to the payment of Tythes and Peter-Pence, the Violators of the Privileges of the Clergy, and the like, in favour of the Church.

It is likewise decreed by these Laws, that every Christian should learn the Lord's-Prayer, and the Apostles Creed; otherwise, they were allowed neither to stand God-father, nor receive the Communion, nor have Christian Burial.

The Ecclesiastical Laws of Edward the Confessor run chiefly upon the protection of the Church and Clergy.

The Ist forbids the molesting a Clergyman, contrary to the tenour of the Privileges of the Church.

The II^d appoints certain Days, whereon all proceedings in the Courts of Justice were to cease.

By the III^d, the Church's Causes are to be tried first.

The IVth firmly establishes the immunities of those who in any wise depend on the Church, and ordains that they shall not be obliged to answer any Plea, &c. except in the Ecclesiastical Court.

The Vth confirms the Privilege of Sanctuary to Churches, and extends it even to Priests Houses.

By the VIth, if any Person broke in upon the Privileges of the Church, he had no way to get off, but by submitting to the sentence of the Bishop.

The VIth orders the punctual payment of Tythes, and sets forth what is to be paid.

The IXth determines the circumstances relating to the Ordeal Tryal.

The XIIth settles the fine of Manbote, or the sum to be paid to the Lord for killing any of his Vassals or Slaves: The King's and the Archbishop's Manbote is fixed at the same Sum.

By the XIIIth all found treasure belongs to the King, unless it be found in a Church or Church-yard; then the Gold is the King's, and the Silver the Church's (10).

It is visible throughout these Laws, that the Clergy took care of themselves, when they met with devout and easy Princes, or such as stood in need of their Interest.

But notwithstanding the great condescension of the Saxon Kings for the Clergy, they could not retain the privilege of chusing their Bishops and Abbots. Whilst the Prelates confined themselves within the bounds of their pastoral Functions, and meddled not with civil Matters, the power of electing was freely left to the Chapters. But when the Bishops were become rich and popular, and began to interpose in State-Affairs, by reason of the Fiefs they were possessed of, it was of great consequence to the Kings, to have such Bishops and Abbots as were in their Interest, or at least, were obliged to them for their Preferments. Accordingly, the Kings began to interpose in Elections, by way of canvassing, or recommendation, and very often by refusing to put in possession of the Fiefs belonging to the Church or Abbey, such Prelates and Abbots

(1) Santo De Genetrix Virgo Maria & omnes Sancti Dei intercedant pro nobis peccatoribus ad Dominum, ut mereamur ab exaduari & salvari. per Mr. Elfric Deo. Now this amounts to no more than a Wish for their Intercession, and is far from a direct Invocation. This Office is translated by Mr. Elfric. Immediate Address, as far as we can discover, did not prevail in England till the tenth Century: At which time, in the Homily of the Apocryphal Book of the Blessed Virgin, there is a direct Prayer to the Blessed Virgin to intercede for them. Coll. Eccl. Hist. p. 214.

(2) The XXIII^d orders the Priest to read, on Sundays and Holydays, the Gospel, the Lord's Prayer, and Creed, in English.

(3) Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon.

(4) This is directly opposite to the Doctrine of the Modern Church of Rome, which pays the same submission to the Decrees of the Council of Trent as of Nice, and reckons the Church in all Ages alike infallible.

(5) They were made up of Seculars as well as Ecclesiastics, and the Constitutions passed there related both to Church and State. Coll. Eccl. Hist. p. 208.

(6) The XIXth enjoins Widows to stay twelve Months after the Death of their Husbands, before they marry again.

(7) The XXII^d orders, that the yearly naval Expedition be performed sooner after Easter.

(8) In the Preamble, it is said these Laws were drawn up at the Advice of the Wise Men of the Nation, that is, the Prelates and Nobles.

(9) The De Winton is the VIth. The Law says, if a Priest abstains from a Woman, may God have mercy upon him, and let him have the Winton. Historia de Winton, p. 129. c. 6.

(10) The original Law in De Winton, p. 199. c. 14. says, the Gold is all the King's, and half the Silver, and the other half goes to the Church.

as they did not like. In fine, the authority of the Court by Degrees prevailed so, that in the time of Ethelred II, the Monks had entirely lost the privilege of chusing their Abbots, as appears from Ingulphus. In those days, says he, the Monks and Abbots seldom resorted to Court. But ever since the Kings have disposed of the Abbies, the Monks have made interst with the Courtiers, which sometimes cost them very dear. This Historian loudly complains of this abuse, though he himself was installed in the Abbey of Croyland by the same method, that is, by the sole will and pleasure of William the Conqueror.

There were but two removals of Bishops Sees within the Period I am going over. The See of Kinton in Wessex (1) was removed to Exeter (2), and the See of Lindisfarne in Northumberland to Durham. Aldhun Bishop of Lindisfarne, being disturbed in that little Island by the Incursions of the Danes, resided at Durham, carrying with him the Relicks of St. Cuthbert. He built a Cathedral, and fixed his See there, where it has remained to this day (3).

In 981, the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury acquired a new Jurisdiction in Wales. Gucan, a Welsh Priest, being chosen Bishop of Landaff, and consecrated by Archbishop Dunstan, this Precedent was followed by his Successors, who like him owned the Archbishop of Canterbury for their Metropolitan. Some infer from hence, that all the British Bishops at the same time owned the Superiority of the Church of Rome. But this consequence cannot be admitted. It is certain, the Bishops of St. Davids all along exercised the Archiepiscopal Functions in Wales, till the time of Henry I, and that without the ornament of the Pall, the mark of submission to the Pope (4).

As the Archbishops of Canterbury and York made the greatest Figure among the English Prelates, during the last Period of the Saxon Monarchy, it will not be amiss briefly to carry down the Succession of each of these Sees. This will be of service towards clearing what has been already, or shall be hereafter, related of the Affairs of the Church.

Ethelgar, Dunstan's Successor, was Archbishop but one year and three months, and was succeeded by Siricius. This Prelate is blamed by all the Historians, for advising Ethelred to give Money to the Danes, which served only to allure them hither, instead of keeping them away. But perhaps they who exclaim against him most, would have given the same advice, had they been in his place. Elfric, Translator of the Saxon Homilies, whom I mentioned elsewhere, succeeded him in 995, and was followed in 1006, by Elphegus, who was murdered by the hands of the Danes. Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury in the Conqueror's time, very much questioned whether Elphegus might properly be called a Martyr, since he was not massacred on account of Religion, but only because he would not consent the People of his Diocese should be taxed to pay his Ransom. Anselm, Abbot of Bec, whom he consulted on this occasion, told him, he who chose to die rather than to do an unjust thing, received by his death the Crown of Martyrdom. Livingus succeeded Elphegus in 1013. He was kept Prisoner some time by the Danes, and after the recovery of his Liberty, retired into France, till the Storm was over. Afterwards, he returned to his See, and died in 1020. Egelnoth, called the Good, was his Successor. In the time of these two Archbishops, St. Augustin's Monastery was much degenerated, by the licentious Lives of the Monks, who indeed wore the religious Habit, but with little observance of the rule. The cause of this alteration was, the massacring of all the Monks, except four, when Canterbury was taken by the Danes. The secular Clergy, who afterwards supplied the place of the dead Monks, were willing to enjoy the Revenues and Privileges of the Monastery, but not to be ty'd to the rule observ'd there before. They took greater liberties than the old Monks, and gave the Title of Dean to their superior, instead of that of Abbot, which remained till the time of Archbishop Lanfranc, who changed it into Prior. But to return to Ethelred: This Prelate raised the See of Canterbury to its former Lustre, being supported by Canute the Great, with whom he was much in favour. He was succeeded by Edsius, who had been King Harald's Chaplain (6). He governed the Church till the year 1050, either by himself, whilst his Health permitted, or by a Chorepiscopus, when disabled by sickness. This Chorepiscopus, who exercised all the Archiepiscopal Functions, resided at St. Martins in the Felds (7). Robert, a Norman Monk, made Bishop of London by Edward the Confessor, was by the same Prince promoted to the See of Canterbury after Edsius. He was driven from thence, in the manner before related, and banish'd the Kingdom by an Assembly General, and Stigand Bishop of Helmstedt placed in his room. Robert appealed to the Pope against these Proceedings; but Stigand, notwithstanding the Appeal, and without staying for the Pope's determination, who for that reason suspended him, got himself consecrated. But, notwithstanding his Suspension, and tho' he had never applied to Rome for the Pall, he exercised all the Metropolitan Functions, till he was depos'd in William the Conqueror's time (8). Very probably, in those days, the English were not of opinion, that the Archbishops elect could not exercise their Functions till the Pope was pleas'd to empower them, or that the Pope's bare suspension was sufficient to put a stop to their acting as Primates.

The Succession of the Archbishops of York was as follows. After the death of Ofwald (9), mentioned in the foregoing Book, Adulph succeeded him in 993, and governed his Church till 1002, when by his death he made room for Wulfstan II, who, after twenty one years, was succeeded by Elfric Puta, surnamed the Grammarian, thought by some to be the Author of the Translation of the Saxon Homilies. To him succeeded Kinsius (10), in 1050, after whom came Aldred, who was alive at the Conquest.

Among the Bishops of note in those days, Wulfstan Bishop of Worcester was a Person of an extraordinary Character in some Mens opinion, tho' Lanfranc thought him unqualified for the Office of a Bishop, for his stupidity and want of Learning. But this is not the first time that weak Men have been made to pass for Saints. This Prelate being consecrated by Aldred Archbishop of York, made his profession of canonical obedience to Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury, though suspended by the Pope. To account for this disregard of the Pope's suspension, 'tis pretended, the submission was made to the See of Canterbury, and not to the Person of Stigand: But when such like Assertions are advanc'd; they should be supported with some Authorities, whereas this here is destitute of all.

Edmund Bishop of Durham was remarkable for the manner of his Election. The Chapter of Durham being met to elect a Bishop, and not being able to agree upon their Man, Edmund, a Priest of that Church, said jestingly, that since they were at a loss whom to choose, they had as good take him and make him a Bishop. As Miracles were then much in vogue, the Chapter looked upon this motion as a divine impulse, and so unanimously agreed to elect him. Edmund became famous for his courage and boldness in reprimanding Vice, even in Persons of the highest birth and stations.

We must also reckon in the number of illustrious Persons of that Age, certain English Ecclesiasticks, who flourish'd in Sweden and Norway. Olaus Scot-Kunung, King of Sweden, desirous to turn Christian, desired Ethelred to send him some Missionaries to instruct him in the Gospel. Sigefrid, Archdeacon of York, (and not Archbishop, as a Swedish writer will have it,) Esquil, Gumchild, Rudolf, and Bernard, or David, undertook this Mission. Sigefrid was made Bishop of Wexia, a City in the Province of Smaland in Sweden, and baptiz'd Olaus. Some say however, he received Baptism at the Hands of Bernard; but

(1) Crediton or Kinton stands on the Creden in Devonshire; there are now no Footsteps of its having been a Bishop's See, but a great Meadow, called My Lord's Meadow.

(2) This City stands on the River called Ifc by the Britons, and Ex by the Saxons, whence the Names Isc and Exan-cesster. The Welsh call it to this Day Caerise. It was made a Bishop's See by Edward the Confessor, in 1048. Leofric a Burgundian was the first Bishop. Here are fifteen Churches. The Organ in the Cathedral is the largest in England, the greatest Pipe being fifteen Inches Diameter. The City is about a Mile and half in Compass.

(3) Durham being almost surrounded with the River Wear, was called by the Saxons, Dunholme, Dun signifying a Hill (the City being seated on one) and Holme, that is, a River Island; it was built about the Year 995.

(4) See Giraldus Cambrensis de Jure & Statu Menevensis Ecclesie, p. 518, &c. Anglia Sacra P. II. Marca de Concord, &c. l. 1. c. 7. Ann. 983.

(5) Egelnoth, who was Archbishop seventeen Years, refused to Crown King Harold, telling him he was enjoined by Canute his Father to set the Crown upon none but the Issue of Queen Emma. Then laying the Crown on the Altar, he denounced an Imprecation against any Bishop that should venture to perform the Ceremony. Harpfield. Hist. Eccl. Sec. X. c. 10. This, if true, is another Argument against Canute's Will. See p. 127. Not. (4).

(6) Edsius crowned and anointed King Edward the Confessor, on Easter-Day, and then preached upon the Occasion. Sax. Ann. MLXII. This is the first Coronation-Sermon we meet with.

(7) Near Canterbury. Gervas. Aët. Pontif. p. 1650. The Archbishops formerly had a Chorepiscopus, or Assistant; but this Office was extinguished by Lanfranc. Coll. Eccl. Hist. p. 213.

(8) Malmfbury says, he procured a Pall five Years after from Bennet the Antipope. De Gest. Pontif. l. 3. He was imprisoned at Winchester by William I, where he died. Malmfb. ibid.

(9) He was buried at St. Mary's in Worcester, which he built. Stubbs.

(10) Chaplain to Edward the Confessor: Stubbs says, he ordained one Maguer Bishop of Glasgow, and John his Successor, and received an Acknowledgment of his Metropolitan Jurisdiction in writing, which was lost with many other Instruments, when York was set on Fire by the Normans soon after the Conquest. Stubbs, Aët. Pontif. Eborac. p. 1700.

this is not very material. The greatest part of these Missionaries were martyr'd by the Pagans, to whom they preached (1).

I have spoken elsewhere, though in a very general manner, of the division of the Kingdom into Parishes. But since I am arrived at the end of the Saxon Empire, it will not be foreign to the purpose to conclude what I have to say of the Anglo-Saxon Church, with a more particular account of this matter.

*The Division of Parishes
when settled.
Coll. Eccl.
Hist.*

Augustin, the first Bishop of the Saxons, receiving from the King of Kent some Lands, for the maintenance of himself and the Monks he brought with him, disposed of the Profits of these Lands, and the offerings of Christians as he thought fit. But because he wanted Instructions in this matter, he consulted Gregory I, who told him, it was the custom in the Church of Rome, to divide the Offerings into four Portions, and distribute one of them for the maintenance of the inferior Clergy. However, as Augustin and his Companions were Monks of the same Order, the Pope exhorted them to live together as Brethren. Thus also lived Aidan and Finan Bishops of the Northumbrians, who were Monks as well as Austin, though of a different Order. But it cannot be inferred from hence, that in all the Churches, the Bishop and his Clergy lived in common, as some pretend. On the contrary, it seems to follow, from the Bishop's being obliged to distribute the fourth part of the Church's Revenues among the Clergy, that they did not live in common. Be this as it will, the Bishop and Clergy were maintained as well out of the profits of the Lands given to the Church, as by the daily offerings of the People.

The number of Christians encreasing every day, and there being at first in each Diocese, which contained a whole Kingdom, but one Church, it could not but be very inconvenient to many of the new Converts to resort thither. It was necessary therefore that others should be built, and Priests sent to officiate in them. These Priests were not however fixed upon any particular Church, but kept with the Bishop, who sent out sometimes one, sometimes another, to minister in the remote Churches, after which they returned to him. In proportion therefore as Christians encreas'd, new Churches were erected for the convenience of those who lived at a distance from the Cathedral. These Churches were no more than Chapels of ease to the principal Church, to which belonged all the Offerings that were made in the others. Accordingly the Priests at their return, put the Offerings they had received into the Bishop's hands, which served for the maintenance of the Bishops, and the Clergy that were about him. The Priests then at first had no other Titles, but that of belonging to a certain Diocese: for these first rural Churches are not to be considered as distinct Parishes, but as Chapels belonging to the Cathedral.

Stillingfleet.

These rural Churches were not at first very numerous. The reason is, because the Lords who had large Estates, were the only Persons that founded them, and generally were contented with building one single Church for the use of their Vassals. The number of Christians being exceedingly encreased, it was become necessary to provide for the constant residence of a Priest in each of these Churches. But as the great Men, as well as the People, did not care to have a new Priest at every turn, the Bishops were willing to continue the same to them; and from this time, Parishes may properly be said to commence. However, lest the Priests, thus fixed to one Cure, should be unmindful of their dependance on the Cathedral, the Bishops reserved in their own hands the Revenues and Oblations these Churches were endowed with. This gave the Founders some uneasiness. They could not bear to see the Priest, who did all the duty, have so small a share of their Donations. Wherefore, the zeal of erecting new Churches beginning to cool, at a time when there was most need of them, the Bishops thought fit to yield a little. To this purpose, they compounded with those who had a mind to build Churches, and were satisfied with reserving to the Cathedral, a third or fourth part of the Incomes, with the right of Baptism and Burial. This obstacle being removed, these private Oratories became very numerous, almost every great Man building one for the convenience of himself and Vassals. Moreover, when any Lord alienated part of his Estate, the Purchaser seldom failed of erecting a Church in his new Purchase. On the other hand, the Bishops being greatly enriched by the Grants made to their Churches, built likewise Churches on their Lands, as well for the convenience of their Tenants, as to imitate the Nobles, among whom they themselves began to be ranked. By all these means the rural Churches abounding every where, there was no necessity of sending Priests from place to place, since each Church, as was before observed, had one of its own. And thus by degrees the Parochial Division was settled. However, the Bishops were long in possession of the Tithes and Oblations, till at length, in order to quicken more and more the zeal of Christians, they removed this difficulty which obstructed the building and endowing of Churches. They not only left to the Parochial Priests the Revenues the Founders were pleased to assign, or at least, the much greater part, but also granted them the power of administering the Sacraments in their respective Churches. This is the rise and progress of the Parochial Division, which was almost quite settled in the Reign of Edgar, or perhaps of Canute the Great. Between that time and the Reign of Edward the Confessor, there were some farther Subdivisions; but, in all appearance, there were few new Parishes after the Norman Conquest. At least, we find by several Charters of the latter Saxon Kings, that the Parishes of Cambridgeshire, Huntingtonshire and Lincolnshire, were the same as at present. Whence it may be presumed the Parishes of the other Counties agreed with our modern Division (2).

*Wharton's Defence of Pluralities.
p. 81.*

*Monast.
Angl. under Ely, Croyland, &c.*

(1) Through the Laziness or Ignorance of the Monks, the only Writers in those Days, we have but few Historians from Aster to the Norman Conquest. Next to Aster was Etchewerd, who wrote in the Reign of Edgar, and lived till 1090, though he did not continue his Chronicle so far. He was (as he himself says) descended of the Blood Royal. His Works consist of four Books, which were published by Sir H. Savil. Bishop Nicolson says, the whole is an imperfect Translation of the Saxon Annals. His Style is boisterous and obscure, and in some Places hardly Sense; and therefore but of little use, unless in settling the Reigns and Deaths of some of our Saxon Kings, who lived about his Time, concerning which the Copies of the Saxon Annals differ. From him to the Conquest we meet with no Historians, except Osburn, who has wrote the Lives of St. Dunstan and St. Alphege, which are published in the first Volume of Anglia Sacra; and the Author of a Treatise called Encomium Emmae, being a short Account of the Times immediately preceding the Reign of Edward the Confessor.

(2) As may be farther seen from Dooms-Day Book, where the Parishes are very near the same as at this Day.

A DISSERTATION
 ON THE
Government, Laws, Manners, Customs, and Language
 OF THE ANGLO-SAXONS.

The greatest Part of the Laws in Europe from the North.

THE Revolution that happened in Europe, about the beginning of the fifth Century, is one of the most remarkable events in History. The Roman Empire, which was almost of equal extent with the known World, was then divided into two Empires, one containing the eastern, the other the western Provinces.

The western Empire was so harraffed by the continual Invasions of the northern Nations, that losing by degrees all its Provinces, it was reduced to nothing, and the very name of Emperor of the West vanished with that Empire. This great Revolution quite altered the State of Europe, by introducing new Inhabitants, who raising new Kingdoms upon the ruins of the Roman Empire, brought at the same time new Laws and Customs into the conquered Countries. Spain was peopled with Colonies of Wifigoths, Catti, Alani, and Suevi. Gallia was overwhelmed with a deluge of Wifigoths, Burgundians, and Franks. Italy was so expos'd to the successive Invasions of the Heruli, Ostrogoths, and Lombards, that the antient Inhabitants, instead of preserving the superiority of Number, made no figure at all. The Saxons, Suevi, and Bavarians, spread themselves over all Germany, and became Masters of that vast tract of Land. In a word, Great-Britain was so over-run with Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, that hardly could any remains of the antient Britons be discovered. It was very natural for these Conquerors to establish in their new erected Kingdoms their own Country Customs. And therefore it may be advanc'd for certain, that the Laws now in force, throughout the greatest part of Europe, are derived from the Laws these antient Conquerors brought with them from the North. This might be easily proved with respect to all the Countries concerned in this great Revolution. But at present I shall confine myself to England alone. By what I am going to say, whoever has any knowledge of the English Constitution, will easily be convinced, that the Customs now practis'd in that Kingdom, are, for the most part, the same the Anglo-Saxons brought with them from the northern Countries, and lastly from Germany.

The Laws of England derived from the Saxons.

In the second Book of this History we have seen how the Saxons were no sooner arrived in Great-Britain, but they formed a design of settling there, and at length succeeded after a War of 150 years. This long War bred such Enmity between them and the Britons, that there is no probability the Saxons, who in the end proved victorious, should borrow from the vanquished the Form of Government, established in their Conquests. If therefore we would trace the Origin of the Laws and Customs of the Anglo-Saxons, we must search for it in Germany and the northern Countries, rather than among the antient Britons. And indeed, such is the resemblance between the Laws of the Saxons, Franks, Suevi, Lombards, and the other northern Nations, that it must necessarily be concluded, they had all the same origin, of an older date than the separation of these People. This resemblance is still much stronger between the Laws of the Anglo-Saxons in Great-Britain, and those of the Saxons in Germany, since they were both the same Nation, part whereof settled in England. An English Historian, by comparing the Laws and Customs of the Germans with those of the English, has plainly shown, the English introduced into Great-Britain the same Laws that were in use in their own Country. Nay, he affirms, that till the Norman conquest, there was not so much as one Law in England, but what, in the main, the Germans had the same. 'Tis true, as the Anglo-Saxons consisted of three several Nations, who had also their separate quarters in England, there might be some difference, upon that account, amongst the seven Kingdoms of the Heptarchy. But this difference could not be very great, since the three Nations were united in Germany, before their coming into England, and made but one and the same People under the general Name of Saxons. All that can be inferred from hence, is, that the Laws established by the Anglo-Saxons in England, were composed of those of the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes. But to look for the Origin of the English Constitution among the antient Britons, would be without Foundation, though 'tis not impossible impossible but their forms of Government might in some respects be alike. The Laws and Customs therefore, introduced into Great-Britain by the Anglo-Saxons, are to be considered, as composed of the Laws their Ancestors brought into Germany, and of those they found among the antient Germans. And indeed, what Tacitus says of the German Customs, corresponds so exactly with several of the Saxon ones, that it can hardly be doubted that the Saxons borrowed many things from the Germans, unless we should chuse to say, the customs of both Nations flowed from the same Fountain. But to trace back these matters to their first original, would be a work of infinite Labour. It suffices to give a general Idea of them. And therefore, without carrying this inquiry any further, let us be satisfied with seeing what was the form of Government, established by those Conquerors in England.

The Title of King among the Saxons.

The Saxons had no Kings in Germany, when they sent their first Troops to the assistance of the Britons under the conduct of Hengist (1.) Their Territories were divided into twelve Provinces, over each of which a Head or Governor was appointed by the Assembly-General of the Nation, wherein the supreme Power was lodged. This Assembly was called Wittena-Gemot, that is to say, the Assembly of the Wise-Men (2); and also, the Mycel-Synod, that is, the Great Assembly. Besides the Governors of the Provinces, there were others also set over the Cities and Boroughs. In time of war, the Assembly elected a General to command the Army, and to be the Chief or Head of the Commonwealth (3). Doubtless this General had great Prerogatives; but we are ignorant of their number and extent. It even appears, by the perpetual contests in England, between the Princes invested with this high dignity and the other Kings, that these Prerogatives had no fixed and settled Bounds.

Though the Title of King was not in use among the Saxons, it was however assumed by Hengist as soon as he was in possession of Kent. Indeed, it would have been difficult for him to have found any other so proper to express his Sovereignty over that Province. 'Tis true, the titles of Duke and Earl, or, their equivalents Heretogh and Ealdorman, were not then unknown. But they were not yet used to signify Sovereigns. 'Twas not till long after, that certain Dukes and Earls being invested with Sovereign power, these titles were made use of to denote the supreme Authority. The other Saxon Leaders, who settled in Great-Britain after Hengist, followed his example, in assuming the title of King. Thus, whereas in Germany, the Saxon Territories were divided into twelve Governments, their conquests in England were parted into seven Kingdoms; but with this difference, that in Germany, each Governor depended on the Assembly-General of the Nation, whereas in England, each King was Sovereign in his petty Kingdom. However this did not exempt him from all dependance on the Wittena-Gemot of his own State, which in conjunction with him regulated all important Affairs. Moreover, by mutual consent, there was established a General Assembly of the whole seven Kingdoms, where matters relating to all in common were settled. Hence this form of Government, which considered the seven Kingdoms as united in one Body, was called the Heptarchy, that is, the Government of seven.

The form of Government established by the Saxons in England.

These first Kings having scarce any other Subjects but their own Countrymen, durst not think of assuming a despotick Power. Perhaps they had never any such thoughts, having been accustomed to the contrary in their own Country. They established therefore, or rather continued, each in his own Kingdom, a Wittena-Gemot, where the same affairs were determined, as were wont to be in the like Assemblies in Germany. As for what concerned the common Interest of the seven Kingdoms, it was debated in a General Assembly of the Kings and great Men of the Heptarchy. 'Tis not precisely known what were the Rights and Privileges of the General Wittena-Gemot. Probably, they were much the same the States-General of the United Provinces enjoy at this day. Each King was Sovereign, but executed the determinations agreed upon in common, to which he had given his consent, either in Person or by Proxy. Be this as it will, the common opinion is, that there was a Wittena-Gemot for each Kingdom in particular, and a General one for all the seven (4).

Upon this supposition it is easy to define the nature of the Anglo-Saxons Government. 'Twas Monarchical, as each Kingdom had its King; but then it was also Aristocratical, as the King had not the power of making Laws without the consent of the Assembly General, consisting of the chief Lords of the Nation. Several believe too, it was partly Democratical, and that the People sent their Representatives to the Wittena-Gemot, as they now do to the Parliament. This opinion shall be fully examined hereafter. Mean time, it will be necessary to take a view first of the several ranks and degrees of Men among the Anglo-Saxons, since otherwise there is no having a distinct Knowledge of the nature of their Government.

I shall say nothing here of the King, because I shall have occasion elsewhere to speak of his Power and Prerogatives.

The Queen was the second Person in the State; tho' only with regard to the respect that was paid her, for she had no share in the Government. If sometimes the Queens sign'd the Charters with the Kings, it was not because it was necessary, but on account of their Rank. During the whole time of the Saxon Government, we find but one Queen invested with the Sovereignty; I mean, Sexburga, Queen of Wessex. However some Historians assure us, she was depos'd by the West-Saxons purely because she was a Woman. Nay, we have seen that on occasion of Brithric's death, Egbert's immediate Predecessor, the West-Saxons depriv'd their Queens of the Prerogatives they had till then enjoy'd. The Title of Queen, which was, and still is, given to the King's Wife, means no more, originally, than a Companion, in Latin, Comes. In process of Time, this Term was made use of to denote more particularly those who were nearest the King's Person; from whence it came to have a more general signification, and to mean the great Lords. Thus we find in the old French Romances, and Poets, Li Queen de Flandre, Li Queen de Leicester, instead of, the Earls of Flanders and Leicester. The word Queen then was common to Men and Women, just as Comes in Latin. At length, the Term Count or Earl being substituted in its room, when applied to Men, Queen was appropriated to

The several Degrees and Orders of Men among the Anglo-Saxons. The King.

Remark on the Word Queen.

(1) It is observable, that in France, Spain and Italy, they have no Word that signifies King, but what is borrowed from the Latin, a Language these Invaders were Strangers to, when they settled in their Conquests.

(2) In like Manner our Parliament is sometimes styled, The Wisdom of the Nation.

(3) This General was chosen out of the Twelve Governors.

(4) In order to have a clear Notion of the Gothic Model of Government established in the several Kingdoms of Europe, it will be necessary to consider the Nature of their Armies that were sent out in quest of new Habitations. As their whole Nation was divided, like the Israelites, into so many distinct Tribes with each its own Judges, without any common Superior, unless in time of War, like the Roman Dictators: So in like manner the Armies or Colonies, sent out, upon their Counties being overstocked with Inhabitant, were not Armies of Hindings, who conquered for the Benefit of their Paymasters, but voluntary Societies or Partners in the Expedition, consisting of so many distinct Armies, out of every Tribe, conducted each by their own Leaders, and united under one common General or Superior chosen by consent, who was also Head or Captain of his own Tribe. This then being the Nature of the confederate Army, it is evident that upon their conquering a Country, the Property of the Land was in the whole Collective Body, and that every Individual had a Right to share in what he had helped to conquer. Accordingly to fix this undetermined Right, the conquered Country was divided into as many Shares (called afterwards Staves, Counties, &c.) as the General or King had Companions, or as the Army was composed of Tribes, that each Tribe, as they had lived together in their own Country, might do the same in their new Settlement. After this general Division, the Lands were portioned out among the Leaders and Officers, who subdivided them among their Followers. These Allotments, whilst annual, or for life, were called in Latin, Beneficia (a Word appropriated since to Church Preferments) and afterwards Ferda, that is, a Gift of Possessions; from the Teutonic, Fee a Gift, and Od a Possession; in our Language they are still called Fees. As it was necessary upon their settling in a newly inhabited Country, to continue their General, he may be considered in two respects; first, as Lord of a private District divided among his own particular Followers, and as Lord or Head of the great Seignior of the Kingdom. Thus we may frame an Idea of the Nature of the Governments settled in Europe by the Northern Nations. Over each District or County presided an Ealdorman or Earl, who with an Assembly of the Landholders or Vassals, (so called from Goyell, the Name they went by in their own Country) regulated all Affairs relating to the Country. And over the great Seignior of the Kingdom presided the General or King, who with a general Assembly of the Wittes or Vassals of the Crown, regulated the Affairs relating to the whole Community. How this was done in England, and who were the Members of the Court-Courts or Assemblies, as well as of the Great Court of the Kingdom, will be shown under the next Head of the Courts of Justice. From what has been said, many useful Remarks may be made. Hence we see the Origin of the Principalties, Duchies, Counties, and the like, that the several European Kingdoms are divided into. From hence we may also observe that the Property or direction of the Land was in the Collective Body or the Publick, and that the Tenants in Fee were only invested with the Dominium utile; and therefore that the Great Lords held their Seigniories of the Publick or Kingdom, and not of the King. Thus the German Princes hold of the Empire, not of the Emperor; and this is the Reason of the English Lords being called Peers of the Realm, though they are now commonly thought to have held of the King. After the Fees from being annual became Estates of Inheritance, many Differences arose between the two Superiors and the Vassals, and between the Vassals themselves, upon which their reciprocal Rights and Duties were inquired into and settled. The Rules collected from such Decisions by Degrees, were termed the Feudal Laws, and prevailed over Europe for many Ages. This Law is distinguished by Bishop Nicolas into three Periods; its Birth from the Inruption of the Northern Nations to 600; its Infancy, from thence to 800; its Youth, from thence to 1027; And lastly, its State of Perfection soon after that Time. The Prince of Europe and their People being linked together by Feudal Tenures (which it duly considered will effectually show the true Nature of the Royal Power, and the Measures of the Peoples Obedience) remained for a long Time in a happy State, there having been no Prince in Europe that ever imagined he had a Title to arbitrary Power, till the Civil Law, which had been buried in oblivion for some Time after the settling of the Northern Nations in the western Empire, was brought to Light. Then some Princes made Lex Regia a handle to assume a despotick Power, and introduced the Civil Law purely upon that Account into their Kingdoms. This was unsuccessfully attempted in England; but it prevails in other Parts of Europe, even in Spain itself, where the Reading it purely for this Cause, was once forbidden Pain of Death. See St. Amant's Essay on the Legislative Power of England. p. 46.

the Women only. Afterwards coming to have a more restrain'd signification, it was used only to denote the Companion of the King, or the Queen. But it must be observed, this appellation is common to all Queens, whether they hold their Dignity of their Husbands, or of their own Right.

The Princes. The King's Sons and the Princes of the Royal Family held the third rank. They were distinguished by the Title of Clyto, taken from a Greek word, signifying, Illustrious. 'Tis something difficult to know the reason why the Saxon Princes affected a Greek Title. One would be apt to think the word Clyto came from some old Saxon term, if Edgar's Title of Totius Angliæ Basileus (1), were not a demonstration that they had a view to the Greek. As this Title was peculiar to the Princes, the word Clyto alone came by degrees to denote a Prince of the Royal Blood. Accordingly nothing is more common with the ancient English Historians than to use the Terms Clytones, Clytonculi, for the King's Sons. In process of time, the Saxon Term Atheling, from Athel, that is, Noble, was substituted in its place. As for the termination Ing, it denotes the extraction or descent, as Malsbury informs us. The Sons of the Kings of England, says he, were wont to assume Names which shew'd their Extraction. Thus, the Son of Edgar named himself Edgaring, the Son of Edmund, Edmunding, and so of the others. But they had all one common Title, namely, that of Atheling. As the French, which settled in Gaul, came from Germany, probably the termination Ing, in the words, Merovingians, and Carolingians, that is, the descendants of Meroveus and Charles, is derived from the same original.

Ealdorman. Next to the Princes, the first degree of the Nobility was that of Ealdorman (2). This word, which in its primary Signification means only an aged Man, came by degrees to stand for Persons of the greatest Distinction; apparently because such were chosen to discharge the highest Offices, whose long experience had rendered them most capable. 'Tis not only among the Saxons that this word is used in these two different Senses. We find in Scripture, that the Elders of Israel, of Moab, and of Midian were taken for the chief Men of their respective Nations. The word, Senator, Senor, Signor, Seigneur, in Latin, Spanish, Italian and French, signify the same thing. The Ealdormen therefore in England were the most considerable of the Nobility, discharged the highest Offices, and consequently had the largest Estates. As they were generally intrusted with the Government of the Counties, instead of saying the Governor, it was said, the Ealdorman, of such a County. Hence by degrees this word came to signify the Governor of a County or even a single City. Whilst the Heptarchy lasted, these Officers were only during the King's Pleasure, who turn'd out the Ealdormen when he thought proper, and placed others in their room. At length, they became during Life, at least for the most part. But however, this did not hinder the Ealdormen from being displaced upon several accounts. We have seen Instances of this in the Reigns of Canute the Great, and Edward the Confessor. After the Danes were settled in England, the Title of Ealdorman was by degrees changed into that of Earl, a Danish word of the same import (3). Afterwards, the Normans introduced that of Count, which, though different in its original Signification, meant however the same Dignity. But for reasons too long to be explained, the Danish Term Earl, is still used to denote the same Person, expressed by the word Count in other Countries.

Several sorts of Ealdormen. There were several sorts of Ealdormen. Some were properly only Governors of a Province or County. Others were Owners of their Province, holding it as a Fee of the Crown, so that it was always considered as Parcel of the State. The History of Alfred the Great, affords an Instance of this last sort of Ealdormen, which were very rare in England. We find this Prince gave the Property of Mercia to Earl Ethelred, and that Elseda his Widow kept possession in the reign of Edward the Elder. Nay, it was by force that Edward dispossessed his Niece Alfwina after the death of Elseda. Malsbury, speaking of Edward the Elder, expresses himself thus: He united the two Kingdoms of Mercia and Wesssex; but as to the first, he *was only titular King, because it was given to a Lord named Ethelred. And to shew in what manner this Lord held Mercia, the same Historian speaking of Alfred the Great, says, He gave London, the Capital of Mercia, to a Lord, called Ethelred, who had married Elseda his Daughter, to hold it of him by Fealty and Homage. Hence, 'tis plain, Ethelred held Mercia as a Fee, in the same manner that Oeta and Ebuza had formerly held Northumberland of the Crown of Kent, as this Historian assures us. Thus also in France, about the beginning of the third Race of their Kings, the Dukedoms, and Earldoms, which before were only bare Governments, were made hereditary, on condition of Homage. These Ealdormen or Earls were honoured with the Titles of Roguli, Subroguli, Principes, Patricii. Nay, there are Instances of their having the Title of Rex (4). As for the others, who were only Governors, they had the Title of Ealdorman of such a County, expressed sometimes in Latin by the Term Consul. The first administered Justice in their own name, and appropriated to their own use all the Profits and Revenues of their respective Counties. The last administered Justice in the King's name, and had only a certain share of the Profits assigned them. Earl Goodwin, how great a Lord soever he might be in other respects, was of this rank. To these may be added a third order of Ealdormen, who had the Title, though without a Government, on account of their high Birth, and out of these the Governors were usually chosen. Thus the Title of Ealdorman denoted sometimes only a Person of Quality.*

There were also inferior Ealdormen in Cities and Burroughs. But these were only subordinate Magistrates, who administered Justice in the King's name, and were dependent on the great Ealdormen or Earls. The name of Ealdorman or Alderman is still given to these inferior Offices, whilst the others have the Title of Earl or Count.

The Office of an Ealdorman was wholly Civil, and had nothing to do with Military Affairs. There was in each Province a Duke, who commanded the Militia. The name of Duke, taken from the Latin Dux, is a modern Term. The Saxons called this Officer Heretog (5). He had no right to meddle with civil Matters. His business was of a quite different nature from that of an Earl, as he was also independent of him. Hengist and Horsa are called in the Saxon Annals, Heretogan, or Dukes, because they were sent into Great-Britain, not to govern the Country, but to command in the War. On the contrary, Oeta and Ebuza have always in the same Annals the title of Ealdormen, because they were Governors of Northumberland, under the Kings of Kent. It is true, they might also be stiled Dukes, as they had the command of the Army. Accordingly we find in our Histories, sometimes the title of Duke, sometimes of Earl, given to the same Person, when these two Offices were united into one, as they frequently were about the end of the Heptarchy. Thus the Governors of Wesssex, Mercia, and East-Anglia, are indifferently called Dukes or Earls. But I don't know the reason why Historians never give the title of Duke to the Governor of Northumberland. And yet some of these Governors had the command of the Armies, as is plain from the example of Siward, to whom Edward the Confessor committed the management of the War with Cumberland. (6).

There was moreover among the Saxons three very considerable Offices, two whereof were Civil, and the third Military. The first, which very few Subjects were ever invested with, was that of Ealdorman of all England. This Office answers to that of Chief Justiciary of England, the King's Lieutenant, Viceroy or Guardian of the Realm. This was so high a Dignity, that the Person invested with it was honoured with the Title of Half-Kyning, or Demi-King. We find in the History of the Anglo-Saxons, but two Lords who were raised to this Post, namely Abelstan Earl of East-Anglia, and Alwin his Son, who were stiled Totius Angliæ Aldermannus (7).

The second great Office was that of Chancellor (8). He finally determined all Causes that were brought to the King's Court, and from him lay no Appeal. It was his business also to draw up, and sign all the King's Charters,

(1) King Edgar stiles himself thus in his Charter to Glasbury-Abbey, as it stands in Malsbury's Antiquities of that Monastery.

(2) Our Author calls them Ealdormen; but I cannot find the Word is so used in any Writer. The Saxon Annals, &c. stile them Ealdmen.

(3) From ar or ear, i. e. Honour, and atic, or atic, Honourable. In the Danish Language to this Day, erlig signifies Noble, or Honourable, as Erlig radman for Nobilis Decanus in St. Mark, cap. 15. v. 43. Selden, Titles of Honour, p. 638.

(4) Ethelred, Ealdorman of Mercia under King Alfred, is so called by Ethelward, and his Earldom is, in Flower of Worcester, called Regnan and Ric, (which is the same) in the Saxon Annals. See Ethelw. l. 4. c. 3.

(5) That is, publick Leader, or Captain. In the Saxon Psalms, both Ealdorman and Heretoga thus occur, Aldermannum Juda, Heretogan Hears, i. e. the Princes of Juda, their Captains. Psal. lxxvii. 27.

(6) The Union of these two Offices in one Person was no more than what was practised among the Romans in the Person of their Consul. The Art of War in the Saxons Time was not arrived to that Degree of Nicety as it is at present. You have at large the Duty of the Heretog, and the manner of his being elected by the County-Assembly at a full Folk-mote, in the Laws of Edward the Confessor. See Dr. Wilkins, p. 205. De Heretogis.

(7) Selden thinks this Alwin to be the same that subscribes a Charter of Edgar's in Ingalbus, with Ego Alwinus Dux censerfi. At Ramsay Abbey was formerly this old Inscription.

HIC REQUIESCIT AILWINUS INCLYTI REGIS ÆDGARI COGNATUS, TOTIUS ANGLIÆ ALDERMANNUS, ET HUJUS SACRI COENOBII MIRACULOSUS FUNDATOR. He died in the Year 992. Cod. Ramsfieri in Arch. Scaccari.

(8) So called from the barbarous Latin Word Cancellare, from his Cancelling or Striking out what he pleased in Mens Grants and Petitions. Tyrol. Trad. p. 73.

otherwise they would have wanted a necessary Formality. The first Chancellor, mentioned in the Saxon History, was Turketule, Cousin to Edward the Elder, who was afterwards Abbot of Croyland. However, I am apt to think this Office was of a more modern Institution (1).

Kyning's Hold, Or Generalissi-
mus

The third considerable Officer was the General of the Army, in Saxon Kyning's Hold, that is, the King's General. He was chief of the Dukes, or the Generalissimo, like the High-Constable of France. This Office lasted only during war. In time of peace, or when the King did not think fit to have a Generalissimo, the Holds or Dukes of each County had the Care of the Militia.

High-Sherriffs or Viscounts.

Next to the Earls and Dukes were the High-Sheriffs of the Counties. These were Officers sent by the King into such Counties as had no Earls, to administer Justice in his name and stead. They were called in Latin, Summi Præpositi, Custodes Provinciarum, and afterwards, Viccomites (2), not that they were under the Earls or Counts, but because they performed the Office of Earl in the Counties where there was no Earl. It is very true, there were sometimes High-Sheriffs in those Counties, where there were also Earls; but Selden supposes it was because such Counties were by some peculiar Privilege under the immediate Jurisdiction of the King. But however this be, hence came the title of Viscount, the next in order to that of Earl or Count. As for the name of Sheriff (3), it is continued to inferior Officers, who, in each County, perform the Office of the antient Viscounts: These last having been long since ranked among the Peers of the Realm.

Thanes.

After the High-Sheriffs came the Thanes, a name in Saxon signifying Minister or Servant. There were two sorts: Majors-Thanes, that is, Ecclesiastical Thanes; and Werold-Thanes, that is, Lay-Thanes. The Thanes in general were divided into three Classes. The first were the King's Thanes, the immediate Tenants of the Crown, who did Homage to the King only. These were properly what were afterwards called Peers of the Realm, and made the Body of the greater Nobility. Consequently, Dukes, Ealdormen, and Viscounts, were ranked among the Thanes of the first Class, as well as they who, having no Offices, were the immediate Tenants of the Crown. The Normans changed the Term Thane into Baron, and stiled the Lands Baronies, which the Saxons called Thanelands. Hence it has been the custom for a long while in England, to rank all the greater Nobility under the general title of Barons, because all the great Men were Thanes (4). The second Class of Thanes were what they called Middle-Thanes, because there being others of an inferior degree, these were in the middle Class. If they held Lands of the King himself, they were inconsiderable, and generally, what they possessed was held of the Earls or Barons. The Normans gave them the name of Vavassors, and their Lands Vavassories. The Signification of this word, may, I think, be expressed by that of Under-Tenants (5). The third Class of Thanes were such as held their Lands of the Middle-Thanes, or Vavassors. These were not ranked among the lesser Nobility. They were properly such as lived upon their own Estates, and being of no profession, were distinguished from the meaner sort of People. If I am not mistaken, to these belonged particularly the title of Gentlemen; whereas the Middle-Thanes were in the same rank with the present Knights and Squires. I am very sensible, several are of opinion, Selden.

the title of Gentleman is equivalent to that of Nobilis, and consequently, they were a part of the Nobility. The affinity between the words Gentleman and Gentilhomme seems to countenance this Opinion. I intend not to dispute this pretension with them. I shall only observe a remarkable difference between a Gentilhomme of France, and a Gentleman of England. In France there being but one body of Nobility, every Gentilhomme is a member of that Body, and no less noble than a Duke. But a Gentleman in England can at best be ranked but in the second order of Nobles, that is, among the lesser Nobility or Gentry. Besides, in England abundance of People of very mean Birth are called Gentlemen, who most certainly in France would have no right to be stiled Gentilshommes.

The lowest order among the Saxons, I mean of Freemen, was that of the Ceorles, that is, Merchants, Artificers, Countrymen and others. Hence no doubt is derived the word Churle or Carle, a name given by way of contempt to People of mean condition. The Ceorles were equally free as to their Persons, with the Thanes of the third Class; however with this difference; the Thanes held such Estates as were called Boc-Land, conveyable by Deed or otherwise, upon paying a certain Sum to the Lord: But the Ceorles were possessed only of what they called Socland, or Lands of the Plow, which they could not alienate, because they were properly but Farmers. Among the Ceorles, those that held this sort of Lands were distinguished from the rest that were poor, and had none of these possessions, or exercised some Trade for their livelihood, by the honourable name of Socmen. In general, all under Thanes and above Slaves were in the rank of Ceorles, who [as to their Persons, though not Lands] were as free as the Ealdormen and Thanes themselves. They might even arrive at the Dignity of a Thane of the third Class, if they so thriv'd as to be in possession of five Hydes of Land, a House with an enclos'd Court, a Kitchen, a Hall, and a Bell to call their domesticks together (6). Selden thinks a Hyde of Land was such a quantity as could be managed with one Plow (7).

The lowest order of Men were the Slaves or Bond-men, of whom there were two sorts; such as were really Slaves, who, possessing nothing of their own, worked only for their Lords, by whom for that reason they were maintained. The others, who were properly Servants, had small Holdings at the Will of their Lords, for which they did all the servile Country Works that were set them. As for the Original of these Slaves, some think they were the descendants of the meaner sort of Britons, who submitted to become Slaves, to save their lives during the fury of the first Saxons in England. Others are of opinion, they came from the Slaves brought into the Island by the Saxons. However this be, these [Prædial] Bondmen, not quite so much Slaves as the others, managed their Lords Lands, from whence they reaped some advantage themselves, without having the Liberty of quitting the Place of their abode, and settling elsewhere, unless with their Lord's Consent. They were afterwards called Villains, that is, Villagers, from the Villages where they lived and worked. We still meet in several parts of Germany, with such sort of Peasants, who are subject to great Drudgery, and generally are treated very harshly by their Lords. When a Slave had his freedom, he was immediately rank'd among the Ceorles, the freedmen not constituting, as some pretend, a new order of Men. 'Tis

Of Bond-men two Sorts.

(1) Lambard affirms the use of the Great Seal, and with it the name of Chancellor was brought out of Normandy by Edward the Confessor. See his Archæologia.

(2) Vice does not denote here a Subordination to any Comes. As in that of Horace, utur vice cotis, and as in Vice-Cancellarius in the Court of Rome, where there is no Chancellor. Viccomes therefore means here, one appointed Supplere Vicem Comitum. See Selden Tit. of Hon. p. 646.

(3) Sheriff, as it Shire-Rex (i. e. i. Prefect of the Shire, from the Saxon, Gerefa contracted into Grefa, and Greve, and by the Normans, into Reve; thus Portugali is Præfatus Postus, from the German Word Grave, which signifies a Judge. Whence the old Words Cent-Grave, Tun-grave, &c. for the chief Magistrates in the Hundreds and Tythings. Thus in Germany the Judges of the Boroughs and Marches were called Bur-Graves and Mark-Graves, and Grave is still used there to signify the Sovereign Princes of the Territories it is applied to. The Saxon Sheriffs were chosen by the Assembly of the County. See Dr. Wilkins, p. 205.

(4) It is the common Opinion that the Barons after the Conquest, were the same with the Thanes in the Saxon Times; but upon Examination it will appear otherwise. The word Thane occurs not in the oldest Saxon Monuments, and their Original seems to be this. When time had polish'd the Anglo-Saxons, many Office that the great Men discharged at first in their own Persons, were for Ease and Grandeur by them devolved on others. And, as in those Days there was but little Money, such Persons were rewarded for their Services, by having Land given them. Such Lands were called Tain-Land, which paid no Rent, the Supplier having the Tenant's Service in lieu of it. Thus a great Lord's Chamberlain, Hawker, Hunter, were called his Thanes. These Thanes were divided into greater or lesser, only differing in this, that the greater held of the King, and the lesser of some Subject. Hence it appears, that the Thanes were no other Persons than those the Normans called Tenants by Serjeanty; when the Service was of a publick Nature, that is, if Land were given for the Service of High-Steward, or Marshal of England, such Gift and Service was called grand Serjeanty; but if for Service of Steward of the Household, Master of the Horse, then respecting only the Person of the King, such Services made only a Tenure of Petit-Serjeanty. Now the first of these only, as holding on the Publick, were ranked among the Barons. Serjeanty is French for Servitium, so that Thanes and Serjeants mean the same thing, viz. Minister or Servants. See St. Amand, p. 112.

(5) The Vavassors in Lowlands, from whence they seem originally to come, were inferior to the Capitani, these last comprehended Dukes, Marquesses, Counts, and other great Titles; but the Vavassors were such as were invested, either by the Sovereign or some Duke, Count, &c. with some Territory of feudal Command, without any of these Titles. So that Vavassor means as it, Validus Possessus or powerful sort of Feudalis. See Selden Tit. of Hon. p. 488.

(6) The Land among the Saxons were distinguished into Beckland and Foleland, (and not Socland, as Rapin says.) The Beckland, or Hereditary Lands, were possessed by the nobler Sort, free of all Services. These were divided into two sorts, Inland and Outland. The Inland was that which lay next or most convenient for the Lord's Mansion House, and therefore was kept in their Hands for support of their Family. This was managed by the Bondmen and Slaves, and was afterwards called by the Normans, Terras Domicales, the Demens, or Lord's Land. Outland was that which lay beyond the Inlands or Demens, and was granted out to any Tenant Hereditarily, but at the Pleasure of the Lord. Part was disposed among such as attended their Lords either in War or Peace, (called Thengens, or lesser Thanes), after the manner of Knights-Fees. The other Part was allotted to Husbandmen, who were termed Ceorles, and were to pay their Lord a certain Portion of Victuals and things necessary for Hospitality. This Rent was called Færm or Farm, (a Saxon word signifying Meat or Victuals) which ever since Henry III's Time, has been changed into Money, though we still retain the word Farmers. These Outlands were what they called Foldland. The word Lord is a Contraction of the Saxon Hlæford, i. e. a Grace of Bread, a Maintenance, because they granted to their Ceorles or Socmen, Land sufficient to supply themselves and Families with Bread and Necessaries. Soc signifies in Saxon a Liberty of judging and determining Causes within the Precinct of the Soc, or Manor. Hence Socmen were those that owed suit to the Lord's Court, or Hall-mote, where the Lord determined all differences between his Men in their Civil Rights, and also punished Criminals with the Advice and Consent of his Freeman. Life and Death were at first within the Jurisdiction of the Hall-mote.

(7) See p. 129. Note (3).

true they were called Froelatan, that is, Freedmen; but it was only to distinguish them from those that were Free-born, who however had no peculiar Privilege. Among the Anglo-Saxons, the Lords had not the power of Life and Death over their Slaves. Nay, the Laws provided, they should not cripple or maim them without incurring a Penalty. They who made such Laws, imitated in some measure the Law of God, without knowing it (1).

Freeholders.

All the King's Subjects, except Slaves and Villains, were Freedmen and Freeholders. But though Earls and Barons, or Thanes might be included under this general Appellation, yet by Freeholders is commonly meant the Thanes of the second and third Classes, with the Georles.

Burghers and Aldermen.

The Inhabitants of Towns, who were call'd Burghwitan or Burghers, had the Privilege of being governed by Magistrates chosen out of their own Body, to whom was given the Title of Aldermen; and of forming a Society, from whence is derived what is called in England a Corporation (2). This Privilege was granted them for the Encouragement of Arts, and especially of Trade and Commerce, which was justly deem'd of very great advantage to the State. For the farther encouragement of Trade, it was also enacted by Law, that if a Merchant cross'd the wide Sea three times, he should be honoured with the Title of Thane, and admitted to all the Privileges of that Order. I don't know what is meant here by the wide Sea, unless it be the German Ocean, since in those days, America was not discovered. From the time of the Saxons Merchants have been in great repute in England, since we find such as distinguish themselves in Trade, are frequently honoured with Knighthood by the King.

Having now gone through the several Orders and Degrees of Men among the Anglo-Saxons, I shall in the next place, consider how they were governed, and chiefly the method of administering Justice. To this end, it will be necessary to speak of the different Courts they erected in England, whereby will be seen the Origin of the several Courts of Justice now in that Kingdom.

The COURTS of JUSTICE.

I Have already observed in the Life of Alfred the Great, that this Prince divided England into Shires, the Shires into Trythings, Laths, or Wapentakes, these into Hundreds, and the Hundreds into Tythings. However it must not be imagined that in this division, he introduced something entirely new to the English. He only settled the bounds of the former divisions, making some alterations for convenience's sake. At least, as to the Division of the Kingdom into Shires, 'tis certain he only proportioned it in a better manner than before. This is evident from there being Earls of Somersetshire and Devonshire in the reign of Ethelwulf, as Affer relates, who lived about that time. But Alfred uniting all England into one Monarchy, made a more exact and extensive division of his dominions. The Shires contained a whole Province subject to the Jurisdiction of an Earl or Count, and therefore were also called Counties. Some of these Shires being divided into Trythings, others into Laths, and others into Wapentakes, each of these divisions, which were the same thing under different names (3), consisted of three or four hundreds of Families, and each Hundred was subdivided into Tythings. The Courts of Justice were formed with respect to these several divisions, that is, there was a Court for each Tything, Hundred, &c. to the end Justice might be administered with less charge, greater dispatch, and more exactness.

The Tything Court.

The lowest of these Courts was the Tything Court. It consisted of ten heads of Families, who were mutual Sureties for one another, as each of them in particular was for all that were under him (4). Every Subject in the Kingdom was registered in some Tything. Only Persons of the first rank had the Privilege that their single Family should compose a Tything, for which they were responsible. Each Tything had a President, call'd Tything-Man, or Burg-holder, who took care to hold a Court, when occasion required. The method of proceeding was as follows.

If any Person accused of a Crime, refused to appear, the other nine Sureties were bound to see him forth-coming to Justice. If he ran away, he was not suffered to settle in any other Town, Burrough or Village; because no one could change Habitation, without a Testimonial from his Tything, for want of which they that received him were punished. By the Laws of King Edward, the Tything had thirty Days (5) allowed them to search for the Criminal. If he was not to be found, the Tything-Man, taking with him two of his own, and nine of the three next Tythings (6), these twelve purged themselves by Oath of the offence and flight of the Malefactor. If they refused to swear, the Tything the offender belonged to, was obliged to make satisfaction in his stead.

This Court frequently met, as well to decide the Differences among the Members of the Tything, as to concert measures against such, whose behaviour created a suspicion of their committing some crime, for which the rest might be in danger of incurring the Penalty. In this case, the suspected Person was obliged to find particular security for his good Behaviour, without which he was confined. This Court was a terror to People of mean Condition, as they saw they could not commit any offence with impunity. Before this Order was established, the meaner sort of People might easily shift their quarters by reason of their obscurity, which prevented them from being taken notice of. But it was impossible for them to change their Habitation, after they were obliged to bring a Testimonial from their Tything, to enable them to settle or be registered in another.

These ten heads of Families, of whom the Tything consisted, were called Free-Burghs, that is, Free-Pledges, Burgh signifying, Surety or Pledge. Hence the word Neighbour, which originally signifies a near Pledge. In all appearance Burman, which signifies a Neighbour among the Dutch, is derived from the same source, I mean, from the same custom which was observed in Germany, and served for a model to King Alfred. We find in the History of the Customs of China, written in Spanish by John Gonzalez de Mendoza, an Augustin Monk, that the like Custom is now in use in that Empire. The likeness is so perfect between what is practised by the Chinese and the Anglo-Saxons, with respect to these Tythings or mutual Pledges, that it is wonderful, how two Nations so remote from each other, and between whom there was never any communication, could thus have the same Thoughts.

The next Court was that of the Hundred. It was held once a Month, and had for President one of the most noted Aldermen of the Hundred. The Bishop or Archdeacon was obliged to sit with him, to determine with the other Judges, all matters Ecclesiastical and Civil relating to the Hundred.

The third Court was that of the Trythings (7), Laths, or Wapentakes, according to the Name given these divisions in the several Counties. Here were decided the Causes between private Persons, belonging to different Hundreds of the same Tything or Lath. Besides this Court, each Thane of the first rank, or Baron, held one like it, wherein he determined the Controversies between his Vassals. From whence the present Court-Baron takes its Original.

But when a Suit commenced between Persons of different Trythings, it was brought to the County-Court, called in Saxon, Shire-gemot, or Folcmote, which was held twice a year, or oftner, upon occasion. Herein presided Hist. de los Ritos y Costumbres de la China, l. 3. c. 10.

The Hundred Court.

Trything Court.

Lamland Dugdale.

The Shire-gemot or Folcmote.

(1) There were in England two Sorts of Villains, a Villain in Gross, who was immediately bound to the Person of his Lord, and his Heirs. The other, a Villain regardant to a Manor, that is, belonging and being annexed to a Manor. There are not truly any Villains now, though the Law concerning them stands unrepealed. The Successors of the Bond-Men or Villains are the Copy-holders, who, though Time has dealt favourably with them in other respects, yet they still retain one Mark of their original Servitude. For as of old Villains were not reckoned as Members of the Commonwealth, but Part and Parcel of their Owner's Substante, so were they therefore excluded from any share in the Legislature, and their Successors still continue without any Right to vote at Elections, by virtue of their Copy-holds.

(2) After Lands were appropriated and become Estates of Inheritance, Necessity obliged many People to devise Ways and Means for maintaining the Occupations, Ease and Pleasures of the Rich, to obtain by such Services a Maintenance to themselves. Hence arose the Invention and Encouragement of Arts and Sciences. This laid the Foundation of the many Cities or Burroughs which were formed throughout Europe, which formerly in other Kingdoms, as well as in England, by being necessary and useful became considerable. St. Amand. p. 132.

(3) The Wapentakes are the same as the Hundreds, and not as the Laths, or Trythings, as Mr. Rapin seems to think here and elsewhere. This word is still in use North of the Trent.

(4) By Ten Families we are not to understand Ten House-keepers, but Ten Lords of Manors, with all their Vassals, Tenants, Labourers, and Slaves, who, though they did not all live under their Lord's Roof, were all counted part of his Family. As there were no little Free-holders in those early Times, nor for long after, Ten such Families must occupy a large Space of Ground, and might well constitute a rural Tything. In like manner the Town Tythings or Burroughs consisted not of Ten Shop-keepers or Traders, but of Ten Companies or Fraternities, called in Saxon, Guilds: Perhaps some more eminent than the rest might employ great Numbers of Artificers, Hirelings or Slaves; and if we understand by Ten Families, Ten such, we may well conceive they constituted Towns or Burroughs. Every Tything was as it were a little Republick which exercised a judicial Power within the Precincts of its own Territory, and differed from a Shire in nothing but extent of Ground and Number of Inhabitants. For as the Earl presided in the general Assembly of every County, so there was one chosen annually out of the Ten to preside in the Tything-Court. These Presidents were called Sapientes, and by the Saxons, Witan. After the Conquest, these presiding Officers were made for Life, for the sake of the Normans, who would not otherwise be chosen, and instead of Wites were called Barons, and the Ten Manors, or Tything they presided over, an Honour or Barony. But the Toten-Tythings or Burroughs remained on their ancient foot, and chose their President yearly. Vide St. Amand. Essay on Legislative Power of England.

(5) One and Thirty Days.

(6) That is, of each the chief Tything-Man and two others.

(7) The Tything was a third Part of the County, some Footsteps of which ancient Division still remain in the Ridings of Yorkshire: For East-Riding, West-Riding, and North-Riding, are manifest Corruptions of East-Tything, West-Tything, and North-Tything.

the Bishop and the Earl or Ealdorman; but in the absence of the Earl, the High-Sheriff, or Viscount supplied his place. In this Court were registred all the Tythings of the County, with the Names of the Members. Ecclesiastical Causes were tried generally in the first place; next those the King was concerned in; and lastly, such as related to private Persons. William the Conqueror dispensed with the Bishops sitting in this Court, and granted them the Privilege of holding Courts of their own for the determining Ecclesiastical Matters. Appeals lay from the Tything, Hundred, or Trything Courts, to the Shire-gemot. Here also all Persons of what rank soever were to take the Oath of Allegiance to the King.

The King's Court.

How great soever the Power of this Court was, there was one above it, which they called the Kings-Court, because the King himself presided there in person, or in his absence, the High-Chancellor. In this Court were examined the Judgments of the inferior Courts; and it was apparently this Court that condemned the four and forty Judges put to death by Alfred's order, as has been related in his Life. From this Court the Common-Pleas and King's-Bench derive their Original.

The Wittena-Gemot.

I come now to the Great Court, or Assembly General of the Kingdom, called in Saxon, Wittena-Gemot, or Mycel Synod. As there are great disputes about the Existence, Origin, Nature, and Authority of this Assembly General, it will be proper in this place, to set forth the various Sentiments concerning these Matters, with the Reasons and Answers of such as maintain the contrary Opinions. For my part, as I am wholly unconcerned in the decision of the Questions formed upon this Subject, I shall content myself with stating fairly and impartially the reasons alleged on both Sides. To proceed regularly, I shall divide this matter into four heads, which will comprize whatever has been said of moment on this point. First, The Origin of the Wittena-Gemot. Secondly, Who were the Members of this great Council. Thirdly, Their Authority, and the Affairs there debated and concluded. Fourthly, Their Power in Ecclesiastical Matters.

I. The ORIGIN of the WITTENA-GEMOT.

I. Opinion that the Wittena-Gemot is owing to the Concession of our Kings.

THERE are who believe, the Wittena-Gemot or Parliament, to be of later date in England than the Royal Power, and to owe its original to the condescension of the Kings. They pretend, the Sovereign having from time to time, freely summoned the chief Men of the Nation, to consult with them about important Affairs, this at last was turned into Custom: That in process of time, the People improving some favourable Junctures, claimed, as their Privilege, the right of having a Parliament; though at first it depended entirely on the King's Pleasure, whether he would consult it or not. The main reason they ground their Assertion upon, is, that till Edward the Confessor, England was hardly ever, or but for a little while, united into one State. During the Heptarchy, it was divided into several Kingdoms, which made so many distinct States. Of these Kingdoms, Egbert united but four, whilst the other three remained separate. Afterwards, the Danes became Masters of Northumberland, Mercia, and East-Anglia, and shared the Lands amongst them. So that from the Saxon Conquest to the second Danish Invasion, we do not find, England was united into one Body, but during the short Reigns of Edwy, Edgar, and Edward the Martyr. However the Government did not long continue in this posture. The Danes renewing their ravages in the Reign of Ethelred II, England was quickly divided into two Parts, whereof one was subject to the Danes, the other to the English. It is true indeed, after the Death of Edmund Ironside, the Kingdom was re-united under Canute the Great; but this Union ended with his Reign, and the Kingdom was once more divided amongst his Sons. In a word, it is maintained, that England was never thoroughly united into one Kingdom till the time of Edward the Confessor. It is moreover pretended to be shewn, from the several sorts of Laws, namely, the West-Saxon, Mercian, and Danish, that this Heparchial Government is all a Chimæra, and consequently the present Parliament cannot take its rise from an Assembly-General of all England, which never had a being during the dominion of the Saxon Kings.

To this it is answered, they who talk thus confound two things which ought carefully to be distinguished, namely, the Wittena-Gemot or particular Parliament of each of the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, and that of the seven Kingdoms together, as making but one Body and one State. Though this last never existed, yet might the present Parliament derive its Original from the other. On supposition that each Kingdom had its own Wittena-Gemot, those of Suffex and Wessex became one, when these two Kingdoms were united under Ina. Afterwards, when Egbert annexed to his own Kingdom those of Kent and Essex, the four Kingdoms of Wessex, Suffex, Kent and Essex, made but one State, and consequently had but one Parliament. In proportion as this Kingdom was enlarged by the Conquests of Alfred the Great, Edward and Athelstan, the Wittena-Gemot increased in its Members, and at length comprised all England in the Reigns of Edwy, Edgar, and Edward the Martyr. Indeed, in the Reign of Ethelred II, the Wars with the Danes broke in upon this Regulation, and England was divided into two Parts. But under Canute the Great the Kingdom was once more united, and consequently there was but one and the same Wittena-Gemot, which was again divided into two, though but for a short space, under Harold and Hardicanute. In fine, after Harold, by the interest of Earl Godwin, was put in possession of the Kingdom of Wessex, there was but one Wittena-Gemot in all England, till the Norman Conquest.

To prove therefore that the present Parliament derives not its Origin from the Wittena-Gemot of the Saxons, either the time must be assigned when Parliaments first began after the Conquest, or it must be denied, there was ever any such thing as a Wittena-Gemot in each of the seven Kingdoms of the Heptarchy. The former of these is hardly possible, unless bare Conjectures are allowed instead of solid Arguments. As for the latter, the Assertors of the antiquity of Parliaments produce, against such as deny the being of the Saxon Wittena-gemot, several proofs which they look upon as demonstrative. The first is taken from the Title of the Laws of Ina King of Wessex, wherein are these Words: I Ina, by the Grace of God, King of the West-Saxons, with the Advice of Cenred, my Father, Hedda, my Bishop, with all my Ealdormen, Seniors, and wise Men of my Nation, willing to establish good order in the State, have ordained, &c. Hence it is plain, that Ina in making his Laws had the advice of the Assembly-General of Wessex. That the same method was established in Mercia, is shewn from Bertulph's Charter to the Abbey of Croyland, wherein are these Words, with the unanimous Consent of the present Council assembled at Kingsbury, to debate on the Affairs of the Nation.

Proofs for a Wittena-Gemot in each Kingdom.

In this Charter, after the Bishops and Lords had set their Hands, the King subscribed in this Manner: I Bertulph, in the Presence of all the Bishops and great Men of my Kingdom. This is a clear evidence that the Charter was granted in the Assembly-General or Wittena-Gemot of Mercia. The same might be shewn, with regard to each of the other Kingdoms; but, say they, the Case is so evident, as not to admit of dispute.

They pretend likewise to prove, there was a general Wittena-Gemot of the seven Kingdoms, from the very name of Heptarchy, which implies that the seven Kingdoms had something in common, and consequently, there was an Assembly, where their common Affairs were considered. For instance, how could the Monarchs or Generals for the seven Kingdoms be elected, if there was not an Assembly for that purpose? Moreover, they pretend to have more direct proofs, of the holding from time to time such Assemblies for the common affairs of the seven Kingdoms. Several Historians assure us, there was a general Assembly held in Gloucestershire, where Ina King of Wessex was chosen Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, by the Interest of Sebba King of Essex, who was present with all the other Kings. They produce also from Ingulphus, Witglaph King of Mercia's Charter, where are these Words: In the Presence of Egbert King of the West-Saxons, of Ethelwulph his Son, and of the Bishops and great Lords of England, assembled at London. Hence it is plain, this Assembly convened at London, and composed of all the Bishops and great Men of England, was a general Wittena-Gemot of the Nation.

The Proofs of a general Wittena-Gemot of the seven Kingdoms.

In answer to the objection taken from the diversity of the Laws then in England, it is said, It is not at all strange, that Mercia and Wessex, being two distinct States, should have different Laws; much less, that the Danes should establish their own Laws in their Conquests (1). But it is maintained, it cannot be reasonably inferred, from this Diversity, that there was no such thing as a Wittena-Gemot in each Kingdom, or a general one for all the Seven. This Inference would be as absurd, as if a Man, from the different Laws and Customs in the United Provinces of the Low-Countries, should conclude there was neither a Convention of the States in each Province, nor an Assembly of the States-General.

The Answer to the Objection from the Diversity
of the Laws.

(1) See Note in the Reign of Canute the Great concerning this threefold Distinction of the Laws.

To strengthen all these Proofs, moreover is urged the Conformity in this respect between England and the other European Kingdoms. The Saxons had the like Assemblies in Germany; the Ostrogots, and after them, the Lombards in Italy: The Franks had their Fields of Mars or of May (1), their Sanes, their Parliaments, and the Spaniards, their Cortez.

This Conformity plainly shews, there was no other form of Government then in Europe. It is further added, that to deny with any foundation these Assemblies to be as ancient as kingly Power, it must be shown who are the Sovereigns that first established them in each Kingdom. But how came it to pass, that all the Kings in Europe should agree together at the same time, to become so very gracious and condescending to their Subjects? There is doubtless more reason to suppose they would have all joined in abolishing, rather than in granting a Privilege of this Nature.

II. The Constituent Parts or Members of the WITTENA-GEMOT.

ALL agree, the greater Nobility were Members of the Wittena-Gemot: By the greater Nobility I mean the Ealdormen and Thanes of the first Rank, afterwards still'd Earls and Barons. But the difficulty is to know, whether the Thanes of the second and third Class, and the Georles, of whom the House of Commons at present consists, had a Right to sit there by their Representatives or not. Tho' this Inquiry seems to be of little moment, at a time when the Commons incontestably enjoy this Privilege, yet it is not entirely needless to know, whether they usurp'd it; whether it was given them by the concession of the Kings; or whether it is of the same standing with the Monarchy. How undeniable soever the Right of the Commons may be at present, there are some who are persuaded 'twould be of dangerous consequence to acknowledge it to flow from the Condescension of the Sovereigns, lest the same Power that is supposed to have granted it, should think of revoking it when a favorable opportunity offered (2). And indeed this is the true motive of all the attempts to prove, the Commons have not been all along in possession of this Privilege. 'Tis but too apparent, this question has been started only to gratify such of the Kings as have endeavoured to stretch the Royal Prerogative beyond its due bounds.

First Argument against the Commons.

Be this as it will, they who maintain the Commons had no right to sit in the Wittena-Gemot, in the time of the Saxon Kings, alledge for their first reason, that the under Thanes and Georles were not Proprietors of Lands. From whence they infer, it would have been of no use to the Commons to have a place in these Assemblies, whose sole Business was to regulate the Affairs of a Country which properly belonged to the King and the Nobility. They add, 'tis incredible that the Nobles of the first rank, should agree to make their Vassals their Companions: That since in the distribution of their Lands they were at liberty to give them on what Conditions they pleased, 'tis not at all probable they should place the Tenants in the same Rank with the Lords. To render this opinion more probable, they say further, it is not to be imagined, that in those days the People were upon the same foot as at present; that although they were free, their Freedom was confin'd within narrow bounds; that the Superiority of the Nobles over them was vastly greater than at this day, and for that reason the People were little regarded: They served in the Wars for foot Soldiers, who were looked upon as Servants. Accordingly they had the name of Knechten [that is Servants] given them.

Answer to the first Argument.

To this the Assertors of the Rights of the Commons reply, That since the Nobles, who held their Lands of the King, had a right to a place in the Wittena-Gemot, the Commons, who held their Lands of the Nobles, might very well have the same Privilege too. The reason alledged in the Objection not holding good against the Lords, ought not to be of more force against the Commons. They add, that the main Business of the general Council was the making Laws as well for the People as for the Nobility; the settling the Rights of the Subjects; the preserving Peace in the State; and the raising Taxes, whereof the People paid the largest share. Hence they infer, it was very natural, and extremely consonant to the Custom of the Saxons, that the People should give their consent to all those things that concerned them no less than the Nobles. In a word, they say, if the People assisted not at the Debates of the great Council, 'tis not to be conceived whence should proceed the great care of securing their Rights and Liberties, and preventing their being oppressed by the Great. 'Tis well known that Men, especially the Great, are not wont to labour so heartily to lessen their Power, but rather endeavour to increase their Authority as much as possible.

But as this point, being a matter of Fact and not of Right, can't be decided by bare Reasonings, both Parties endeavour to support their Opinions with more suitable Proofs, namely, Authorities. To this end, each Side lays great stress upon certain Terms in the Charters of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, and upon certain Expressions in the Historians who speak of the Government of those days. 'Twill be necessary therefore to produce some of these Proofs, for the Reader's better understanding the Question, and to enable him the better to judge of the Reasons alledged on both Sides. I shall begin with what is urged against the Commons, or their Representatives, being Members of the General Assembly.

In the first place it is said, the very name of Wittena-Gemot plainly implies, that the great Council consisted only of such as were stiled Wittan. Now 'tis pretended, the precise meaning of that Word is Majores Natu, Seniores, Ealdormen, by which are understood only the Earls and Barons, or in the Language of the Saxons, the Ealdormen and King's Thanes, Spiritual and Temporal. To make this appear, a Passage is cited out of Bede's Ecclesiastical History as translated by King Alfred. Bede says, King Ofwald applied to the Majores Natu of Scotland for a Bishop; and Alfred has rendered the Terms, Majores Natu by Ealdormen. The same Historian saying in the same place, that Ofwald made use of Suis Ducibus & Ministri for Interpreters, Alfred has translated these Words by, his Ealdormen and Thanes. Hence it is inferred, that the Term Wittan is to be understood only of Ealdormen and Barons, or in general, of the chief Men of the Nation. And accordingly it is concluded, the Wittena-Gemot, or Assembly of wise Men, consisted only of such. This Explanation of the Word Wittan is farther confirmed, by the Historians rendering it in Latin by Principes, Optimates, Proceres, Magnates, Duces, Comites, Præpositi, Ministri Regis, Nobiles, Milites, which can by no means be understood of the People, or their Representatives.

They who are of the contrary Opinion, alledge, in their turn, the same Authorities to prove the greater Nobility were not alone summoned to the national Council. They pretend, these very Expressions, on which their Adversaries ground their Opinion, are not to be so restrained to the Nobility, as to be unapplicable to the Magistrates and chief Men among the People. To prove what they advance, they cite numberless Passages from the Latin Authors, where the Words Principes, Nobiles, Milites, are to be taken in that Sense.

Answer to this Proof.

To this the others reply, the Word People may be understood in two different Senses; first, as it signifies a Nation in general, in which sense they own that by Magnates, Proceres, Nobiles, &c. may be meant the chief Men of the People, or of the whole Nation. The other sense of the Word People is more restrained, and signifies only a part of the People, as separate or different from the Nobility, as when one says, the Nobles and People. This is the meaning in question, to which it should be proved that the cited Passages can be applied. Now this is what they think impossible, affirming, there is no such thing to be met with in the Latin Authors, as Optimates Plebis, but always Populi, that is, of the People in general. But supposing it were true, that these Expressions did sometimes denote the chief Men among the People, as distinguished from the Nobles, it would still remain to prove, that, in the alledged Passages, the Word People must be taken in that Sense, unless the very thing in dispute be supposed.

But to this the Assertors of the Rights of the Commons answer, They readily agree these Expressions are principally to be understood of Noble Persons; but affirm withal, their meaning is not to be confined to the Nobles of the first rank. They say, that although in England, the greater Nobility, or Peers of the Realm, are a distinct Order from the lesser, who are rank'd with the Commons; it does not follow that the Latin Terms are to be explain'd by a distinction no where else to be found. For instance, in France, the lowest Gentilhomme belongs as much to the Nobility, as the highest Lord; the greater and lesser Nobility making but one and the same Body.

It is a sad thing to see an Inquiry of this Nature reduced to a Grammatical Dispute. But since I have undertaken to relate the Arguments of both Sides, I thought my self obliged not to pass over in silence those taken from the fore-mentioned Terms. However, in what has been said, the one side seems to me plainly to prove that the Remark on the foregoing dispute.

(1) Campus Martii, et Madri vel Magi, Comitia publica, seu generales Conventus quos solebant primi Francorum Reges quotannis circa anni principium et Martio mense indicere, qui in patenti campo et sub dio peragebantur, ex quo Campi Martii vulgo appellantur, a Scrip'toribus. Greg. Turon. l. 2. Hist. Fran. c. 27.

(2) This is what happened in the Reign of King James I. this Prince having often given the Commons to understand, that he thought it in his Power to revoke their Privileges, which, in his Opinion, had no other Foundation than the Concessions of his Predecessors. Rapin.

great Lord, had a right to sit in the Wittena-Gemot, which no body ever denied. But I can't say it necessarily follows from what they alledge, that the Commons were excluded, which is the point in question. On the other hand, what is urged on the other side tends rather to show, that the Reasons for the Exclusion of the Commons are not satisfactory, than to prove directly, they had a Place in the Wittena-Gemot. Let us therefore proceed to another sort of Arguments, alledg'd in favour of the Commons.

Another Argument for the Commons. The first is taken from Henry of Huntingdon the Historian, who, speaking of the deposing of Sigebert King of Wessex, expresses himself thus: King Sigebert growing incorrigible, the great Men and People of Wessex assembled together in the beginning of the second Year of his Reign, and depos'd him with unanimous Consent. In this Passage it is pretended, the People being put in opposition to the great Men, can mean only the Commons, and consequently they gave their Votes in the General Assembly.

This Explanation is supported by a Passage of another Historian, who says: In the Reign of Edward the Elder, were assembled the Bishops, Abbots, the faithful Subjects or Vassals, the great Men and the People, in the Kingdom of Wessex. It is maintained, that by the Fideles, or faithful Subjects, which may be explained by Vassals or Liege-Men, are to be understood the People, as distinct from the Nobles, since in this place the Fideles and the People are distinguished from the great Men.

To these Authorities they add another from Ethelwulf's Charter of Tythes, where it is said, These things were granted by the King, Barons, and People.

These Proofs are confirmed by two Charters; the first whereof is King Ethelred's, in favour of the Abbey of Wolverhampton, which concludes with these Words: These are the Decrees of Sigeric Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Court held before King Ethelred, the Archbishop of York, the Bishops, Abbots, Senators, the Chiefs and People of the whole Country.

The other granted by Edward the Confessor to the Abbot of Westminster, runs thus: I have ordered therefore this Charter of my Donation to be read on the day of the Dedication of the said Church, in the presence of the Bishops, Abbots, Earls and great Men of England, and in the Sight and Hearing of all the People.

Another Argument against the Commons. But the Opposers of the Commons pretend to invalidate the force of all the Arguments drawn from Passages of Historians and Charters several ways. In the first place, they observe, the greatest part of these Historians lived when the Commons sat in Parliament, and therefore it is no wonder when they speak of the Anglo-Saxon Affairs, they should represent things as they were in their own Times. In the second place, they say, nothing can be inferred from any Expressions in these Charters, because they were not originally writ in Latin, but in Saxon. Consequently, the Latin Quotations from thence are only Translations, the faithfulness whereof cannot be judged of, without confronting them with the Originals, which it is impossible, seeing they are all lost. For instance, it is certain, the Saxons never made use of the term Baron, which was brought in by the Normans, and yet we find it in one of the above-mentioned Charters. In the third place, they say, some of the Passages alledged do but show at most, that the Resolutions of the Wittena-Gemot were taken in the sight of the People, who perhaps expressed their satisfaction by Shouts and Acclamations. But they maintain this to be no proof of the People's giving their Votes, or that their Consent was necessary, since they were present only as Witnesses. This manifestly appears, say they, in the forementioned Charter of Ethelwulf, which runs thus: There were present the Archbishops and Bishops of England, Euthred King of Mercia, Edmund King of East-Anglia, and of Abbots, Abbesses, Dukes, Earls, and great Men of the whole Kingdom, and other faithful Subjects, a great Multitude, who all approved of this royal Act, to which the dignified Persons subscribed their Names. It is pretended, since the great Men only signed the Charter, their approbation alone was necessary. Besides, what can be the meaning of a great Multitude of faithful Subjects? Was it the whole Body of the People? This they won't say, who maintain that the Commons sat in the Wittena-Gemot by their Representatives, as they do at this day. And indeed, this great Multitude cannot well be applied to a very limited number of Representatives, but may very aptly be used to denote Crowds of People, got together to make Acclamations. In fine, it is observed, that in all the forecited Passages, a fixed meaning is given to the Term, Fideles, to make it signify the Representatives of the Commons, since that Word is applicable to all Subjects in general, as well to the Body of the Nobles as of the People.

To come therefore to more direct Proofs, the favourers of the Commons alledge other Passages, where they pretend the meaning of these Terms is fixed to the Representatives of the People, by the Word Procuratores. In a Charter (1) dated 811, it is said, Cenulph King of Mercia assembled, for the Dedication of the Monastery of Winchelcomb, the great Men of the Kingdom, the Bishops, Procurators, &c.

To this it is answered, That the dedication of a Church and Monastery was the only Business in hand, for which purpose Cenulph had assembled a multitude of People, and particularly such as were distinguished by their Birth or Offices. But supposing it to have been a real Wittena-Gemot, the Term, Procuratores, is too undeterminate to denote the Representatives of the Commons, unless it be joined with some other Word that fixes its signification.

To refute this Objection, a Charter is produced by the other Side, where they maintain, The Term Procuratores, must be understood of the Representatives of the People. This Charter, granted by King Athelstan (2), concludes thus: Granted at the Royal Vill Aetwelope, in the Presence of the Bishops, Abbots, Dukes, Earls, and Patriæ Procuratoribus. Now, say they, who can these Patriæ Procuratores be, but the Representatives of the People? But they who are of the contrary Opinion, say, this is only a bare conjecture, which can be of no force, unless this Expression be shown to be common at that time.

Lastly, a Proof is alledged in Favour of the Commons, that seems to be stronger than any of the former. It is said, there are now several Hamlets (3), that send Representatives to Parliament, which Right must have been received in the time of the Saxon Kings, when they were considerable Cities or Burroughs. Indeed, it is very improbable this Privilege should be granted them after they made so despicable a figure in the Kingdom.

To evade this Argument, it is replied, It cannot take place, unless it be proved that these Burroughs, now become Hamlets, were gone to decay before the Conquest. They add, that even this would not be sufficient, because very possibly they might have been rebuilt and destroyed again during the Civil Wars England was so often troubled with, after the Commons were in possession of the right of sending Representatives to Parliament.

To all these Arguments alledged in behalf of the Commons, it is added as a favourable Precedent, that in all the other States in Europe, the People were summoned to the General Assemblies. Though hitherto I have only related the Reasons of both Parties, I can't help remarking upon this last, that it is groundlessly alledged, without pretending however thereby to weaken the rest. And this I shall plainly show, at least with regard to France, by the Authority of three Writers, who are looked upon as thoroughly vers'd in the customs of that Kingdom.

The first is Mezerai, who discoursing of this Subject, says, "I meet with three sorts of Assemblies in those Days; the General Courts of the Provinces; the Champs de Mai, at which were present the Seniores and Majores Natu of the People, where military Affairs were chiefly debated; and the Conventus, Colloquia, Parliamentum, where the Bishops, Abbots, and other great Men met to make Laws, and regulate matters relating to the administration of Justice, the Civil Government, and the Publick Revenues, &c. These two last Assemblies were confounded in one". In the Opinion therefore of this Historian, none but the great Men were Members of the Parliaments. But since it may be objected, that by the Seniores and Majores Natu that assisted at the Champs de Mai, are to be understood the Representatives of the People, let us see what President Fauchet says upon this head.

This learned Historian mentions a certain Speech, shown him as made by Boniface Archbishop of Mentz, where that Prelate told Pepin, that the Gauls, omnium Ordinum, of all Orders and Degrees, had given him the Crown. "This Speech, says the Author, is most certainly spurious. First, because the Franks never called themselves Gauls. Secondly and principally, because of the Words omnium Ordinum; for at that time there was no talk either of Orders or Degrees, none but Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Nobles having a place in the Sanes, General Courts, or Parliaments, and the Earls, Commissioners or Church-advocates, to report the Complaints of the People of their respective Territories".

Pasquier, the third Writer, whose Authority I would alledge, expresses himself still more plainly and fully in this matter. His Words are: "Although some, who

(1) In the Annals of Woodstock in the Cottonian Library.

(2) In the Abbs of Abbingham in 931, which Charter is entered in the great Register that belonged to that Abbey, and is now in the Cottonian Library.

(3) Of which Sort are Gatton in Surrey, and several Burroughs in Devonshire and Cornwall, and other Counties.

“pretend to be well vers’d in the History of France, believe the Assembly of the States-General is of a very long standing, may found the Liberties of the People upon it, yet is neither the one nor the other true. I am sensible, and ready to own, that formerly in Gaul, before the Conquest of Julius Cæsar, there were General Assemblies, which were continued by him under a pretence, familiar to the Romans, of leaving us in possession of our ancient Rights and Liberties. But in all these Assemblies you’ll find none of the common People, whom they looked upon as so many Cyphers. In like manner, you’ll find, under the first and second Race of our Kings, solemn Conventions which were called Parliaments, the principal Sinew of our Monarchy. But to these were summoned only the Princes, Great Lords, Nobles and Dignified Churchmen. Now in our Assemblies of the three Estates, not only the common People have a place with the Clergy and Nobility, but what is more, make the greatest and best Part. Whence it is then that within some Centuries of Years the Commons have had a Right to sit in our Conventions, where are debated the Affairs relating to the good of the Nation in general: This is what I shall account for”. Then he shows the Reasons of the Common People, or Third Estate, being first called to the Parliaments, and fixes the Original of it to the time of Philip le Bel, who began his Reign in 1286. These are the Testimonies of three very judicious Writers, thoroughly vers’d in the History of France. So far therefore is the antient practice of France from being a proof of the Antiquity of the right of the Commons of England, that it rather serves to weaken the same.

Remark on this Dispute.

After seeing the Arguments made use of For and Against the Antiquity of the Commons Right to sit in Parliament, it is doubtless very surprizing that both Sides should be forc’d to dispute upon bare Conjectures, and the meaning of certain Terms in the Translations of Charters. One would think, in a matter of this nature, each Side should produce more substantial Arguments. However this be, the Reader may now form his Judgment upon what has been said, wherein I believe nothing material is omitted, of what has been alledged Pro and Con, tho’ I have done it very compendiously.

Observation concerning the Charters.

But as the greatest part of the Arguments used by both Parties, are taken from the Charters of the Anglo-Saxon

Kings, I shall make one remark, which ought to be considered before Judgment is given upon this dispute. And that is, the Authority of all these Charters is questioned by such as are most versed in the English History. The reason they alledge for it, is, that in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, the use of Charters was unknown in England. When the King made a Grant to the Church, or to any private Person, he put them in possession by the delivery of a Green Turf, Bough, or the like. Formerly, says In-gulphus, Possession of Lands was given by bare Words without any Charters or other Writings. They only delivered to the Donor or Purchaser, a Helmet, Sword, Horn, Cup, sometimes a Spur, Bow, Arrow, &c. From this Custom it is inferred, that the Charters, alledged as granted by the Anglo-Saxon Kings, were all forg’d long after their Time. But as it may seem strange, there should be now so many Charters bearing date before there was any such thing in use, a matter of Fact is advanc’d, which, if true, shows the reason of such numbers being forged. ’Tis affirm’d, William the Conqueror finding great part of the Crown Lands to be alienated, particularly to the Monasteries, summoned the Abbots to appear at his Court, and produce the Titles by which they held their Estates. Some, who had nothing to plead but long possession, being dispossessed, because the King would allow no Title good, but what was in form, great numbers of Monks set about forging Charters, to which they gave all the appearance of Truth that was possible. In this manner they deceived that Prince, and his Norman Council, who were unacquainted with the History, Language, and Customs of the Saxons. Some produced their Charters in Latin, but these were rejected, on account of the Improbability the Saxon Kings should make use of a Language, little understood, and still much less used in their Time. But whether this be true or not, ’tis however certain, several of those Charters, which are by some thought authentick, were forg’d, and that long after their date. At least it was very difficult to be convinc’d by good Arguments, that those from whence the Testimonies to decide the present question are taken, are so antient as the time of the Anglo-Saxons.

From what has been said, this appears to be a very intricate Case. Neither is there any likelihood of its being ever set in a clearer light. Almost all the antient Monuments which might serve to unfold the Difficulties were buried in the Ruins of the Monasteries, either before, or after the Norman Conquest (1).

(1) As there are no Saxon Monuments older than the Establishment of Christianity, and but little Light to be had from those that are after, recourse must be had to Inference from those few Truths that are known, in order to discover who were the Members of the Saxon Legislature. Now the most probable Hypothesis seems to be this. Power results from and is the natural Consequence of Property or Estates, and in all Places where Tyranny does not prevail, the Persons who compose the Legislature, derive that Power from the Interest they have in some Lands, or else from some Distinction of Rank and Order, which discriminate the Members of a Society. As therefore our Saxon Ancestors in their own Country, did all personally meet for the enacting Laws; so after their coming into England all to whom the Land was apportioned personally assisted in the Saxon Parliaments, which were held at first, during the Heptarchy in open Places capable of receiving all that had a Right to be there, because there were no Manor Freeholders in those early Days. By the Feudal Law all Land-holders were obliged to attend at the Feudal Courts, and had a Right to give their Assent or Dissent to any Laws or Orders there proposed: Whence we yet retain the Expression of the Convention of the Estates. After the Union of the seven Kingdoms, when the Exercise of the Legislative Power in the Person of every Individual became impracticable by reason of their Remoteness and Number, some Change in the outward form was necessary in order to preserve the Common-wealth on the same Principles it was at first established; and as the whole Kingdom was divided into so many little Republics or Tythings, some Person out of every Tything or Burrough came to the Witena-Gemot, to take care of the Concerns of the Society he belonged to: These were called Witen or Wise-men, and were no other than the presiding Judge or Gerefa of every Tything, who was annually chosen, both in the Rural and Town Tythings. As therefore the Earls, Bishops, and Abbots (who were the presiding Judges in the Communities both Ecclesiastical and Civil), that the People were originally divided into) were undoubtedly Members of the Witena-Gemot, so it is reasonable to think that the Witan (who were the presiding Judges in the lesser Communities that were afterwards made) were so too. For it was but natural when every Individual could not appear in Person, that the Delegate or Representative of each Community should be the Person, to whom they had by their own free Choice given the Precedency amongst themselves. Hence it is plain that the Commons or Land-holders were ever a Part of the Legislature; because though the Earls perhaps might not be Elective or annual Officers, after the Dissolution of the Heptarchy, as they were before, yet the Gerefas of the Tythings, who were Elective, being Members of the Saxon Witena-Gemot, the Commons remained a constituent Part of the Saxon Legislature. Hence the Georles (who were the same as our Farmers, only paying their Rent in Corn, Hay, &c. instead of Money) and also the Tenants (who had Lands assigned them by the King or great Men in recompence for their Service, and in lieu of Wages, and consequently were no more than Part of the Family of him they had their Lands of) were not Members of the Witena-Gemot, except such Tenants who held their Lands of the Crown for their Service which related to the Publick. (See p. 150, 151. note 4.) A Witena-Gemot then was no other than an Assembly of all the presiding Judges of the Nation, Earls, Bishops and Wites, or the annual Magistrates of the Tythings and Burroughs, who represented all the Proprietors of Land in their respective Tythings. Thus Matters stood till the Conquest. King William I. having assumed the regal State as his own by Right, treated all that had opposed him as Rebels, and dispossessing them of their Lands, distributed them amongst his own Confederates, who held them of the Crown by a Service of a determined Number of Soldiers, in case of an Invasion or a Rebellion, and they bestowed their own immediate Followers with some Portions of what was assigned to them under reservation of such Service. These Lands were called Knights Fees, (each Fee was about twenty Pounds a Year then, which is equal to four or five hundred Pounds now.) As the Normans were much inferior to the English in Numbers, their Business was to secure all the Power they could in their own hands. Accordingly, over most of the Tythings was placed a Norman Chief, whose Power was to be the same as the Saxon Gerefa, with this Difference, that it was to be Hereditary. These Chiefs were called Barons, and their Estates Baronies or Honours. The Conqueror to undermine the Power of the Saxon Earls, which he could not safely destroy, dismembered the Barons Estates in a manner from the Counties, and made them recognize no Superior but the Crown. By which means there was no difference between an Earl and a Baron, but only in Extent, the Power of both (which was exceeding great) being the same over their Vassals. As for the Burroughs they were left in the same Condition as in the Saxon Times, and governed by annual Magistrates of their own choosing. The Conformity then between the Saxon Witena-Gemot and Norman Parliaments, stood thus: The Ecclesiasticks and Earls were the same in both; the Burroughs were represented in both by one of their own choosing, who was styled Burgess, instead of Wite, probably because the Magistrate was not always chosen Representative; and as the Saxon Wites or presiding Judges of the Tything, were Members of the Legislature, so were the Norman Chiefs or Barons, with this Difference only, that as the first had their Right by Election and for a Time, the others had theirs in Succession. And as the Saxon Wites served for their Tythings, so the Barons were intended by Law to serve for the Tenants of their Baronies, which is the Reason why they were exempted from contributing to the Wages of the Knights of the Shire. Thus every Spot of Land was still represented; for as every Part was within some Tything in the Saxon Time, so in the Norman every Part of the whole Kingdom was within some Barony or some Burrough. Things continued upon this solid Foundation during the Reigns of William Rufus and Henry I. But the Barons, who were so many petty Princes, being divided in the Civil War betwixt Stephen, Maud and Henry II. each Party treated those of the other Side as Rebels, which brought the Possession of much Land to the contending Princes. And as each Side had experienced the Power of the Barons over their Vassals, and having besides many Friends to remunerate, they split the Baronies into smaller Tenancies in Chief, who all held immediately of the Crown. Hence arose the Distinction of Fees of the old Feoffment and Fees of the New, and also of the greater and lesser Barons. By granting thus small Fees in the Reigns of Stephen, Henry II. and King John, Tenants in Capite or Barons, were so multiplied, that a very unequal Representation of the Kingdom arose, these lesser Barons having an equal Share in the Legislature with the most Potent. This Grievance being grown to the greatest Height, when King John was reduced to Reason, there was a Clause inserted in his Magna Charta, whereby all the greater Barons were to be severally summoned to Parliament, and the lesser in general, by which means these last were excluded from sitting in Parliament singly and in Person; but however the being summoned in General, gave them a Right to do this as a Community, and by Representation; and as these lesser Barons were co-ordinate in Rank, the Right of representing them naturally devolved on such of their Body as the rest conferred it on. The Persons so chosen, were called from the Tenure of their Land, and from their representing the respective Counties for which they served Knights of the Shire. These were to be chosen at the County Courts, where none but the immediate Tenants of the Crown (the lesser Barons) came, and none other had Votes till the eighth of Henry VI. all Free-holders of forty Shillings per Annum had a Right to Vote at the Election of Knights of the Shire. Thus we find both before and after the Conquest all Proprietors of Land had a Share in the Legislature. The Reader may see these Things more at large in St. Amand’s Essay on the Legislative Power, &c.

III. The Authority of the WITTENA-GEMOT, and the Affairs there debated.

THERE is no treating this Subject with any clearness, without examining three Questions, which are as warmly controverted as the former.

I. In whom was lodged the Legislative Power? Whether in the King, in the great Council, or in both together?

II. Whether the King had a Power to tax the People without the Consent of the Wittena-Gemot?

III. Whether the General Assembly had a Right to elect and depose the Kings?

1. In such manner as is said in the Legistation Pieces.

They who most stretch the Prerogative Royal, pretend, the Legislative Power was wholly lodg'd in the King. In proof whereof, they urge the Terms made use of by the Saxon Kings in their Laws, by which they seem to declare themselves the sole Enactors, without giving room to believe the General Assembly had any hand in the matter. To this it is answered, Though there is no mention in these Laws of the Consent of the great Council, it does not follow, that their Concurrence was not necessary; no more than it can be inferred at this day from our saying the Statutes of King Charles I. or of King Charles II. that these Statutes were enacted without the Consent and Authority of Parliament. If we were literally to understand all the Expressions used in speaking of, and to the King, we should doubtless ascribe greater Power to him than he is actually invested with. But to give more direct Proofs, that the Authority of the Wittena-Gemot was necessary in making new Laws, several Testimonies are produced, shewing that the Kings acted nothing in this respect without the Consent of the Estates. Among the many that are alledged, I shall only chuse a few, and insert the substance of them.

In the title of the West-Saxon Laws published by King Ina, it is said, They were made with the Advice and Consent of the Bishops, Great Men, Earls, Wise-men, Seniors, and People of the whole Kingdom.

Egbert says in one of his Charters; I Egbert, King of the West-Saxons, with the Permission and Consent (1) of our whole Nation, and unanimous Advice of all the Great Men, &c.

But seeing it may be objected, that this is a Charter and not a Law, the testimony of King Alfred is alledged, who, in the Title of his Laws, speaking as if he acted by his sole Authority, concludes with these Words; I Alfred, King of the West-Saxons, shewed these Laws to my Wise-men, and They said, they all lik'd, or, were pleas'd, they should be observed.

At the end of Athelstan's Laws we have these Words: All these things were confirmed and ordained by a General Assembly, or Synod, held at Grately, at which was present Archbishop Elfin, with all the great Men King Athelstan could assemble.

The Title of some other Laws made by this King runs in this manner: These are the Laws that were instituted by the Wise-men at Exeter.

Much the same Expression is prefixed before the Laws of Edgar, and Ethelred II.

In a Charter of Canute the Great, we have these Words: I Canute, King of the whole Island of Albion, and many other Nations, by the Advice and Decree of the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, and all my other faithful Subjects, have ordain'd, &c. This Authority is of the greater force, as Canute, ascending the Throne by right of Conquest, would not probably have sought the Concurrence of the Estates, had he not found it customary so to do.

In a word, it is pretended, if some of the Kings express themselves in such a manner, as would induce one to believe they acted by their sole Authority in the Promulgation of the Laws, their Words are not to be taken in the literal Sense. The reason is, these Expressions are explained and limited by those of some other Kings, who own'd, they acted in concert with the Wittena-Gemot. Now there is no likelihood, Sovereign Princes would ever acknowledge their Power to be limited, if it was not so in reality. If any one will insist upon this sort of Expressions, which seem to imply that the Kings make Laws without the Consent and Approbation of Parliament, it may by the same method be proved, that the King at this very day is invested with an absolute Power in this respect. And indeed, in some certain Acts, which are presented to him by the Parliament, he says, that he wills and requires, though it is well known, his Will would be of no force, unless preceded by the Consent of the two Houses.

The same Reasonings and Reflections occur with regard to the second Question, or the Imposition of Taxes. If the Saxon Kings seem in some Passages to levy Taxes by their own Authority, we are to understand it was not till after the previous Consent of the Estates, as we find upon other Occasions.

I shall not insist here on the third Question, concerning the electing and deposing of the Kings, because I intend to treat of these Points under the Article of the Succession.

IV. The Authority of the WITTENA-GEMOT in Ecclesiastical Matters.

BEFORE the Anglo-Saxons embraced the Christian Religion, one of their fundamental Maxims (ascribed also by Tacitus to the antient Germans) was, that all important Affairs relating to the whole Nation, were brought to the General-Assembly, where they were debated in common, that they might be settled with the unanimous consent of all that had a Right to vote. 'Tis no wonder therefore that Religious Affairs were regulated in the Wittena-Gemots, as I have elsewhere observed, since they are of the greatest importance to Mankind. Accordingly, Edwin King of Northumberland, being desirous, after his Conversion, to establish the Christian Religion in his Dominions, did not undertake it till he had consulted his Wise-men, that is, his Wittena-Gemot, as Bede relates it. The Maxim, that no Laws are binding but what the whole Nation has consented to, has all along been looked upon in England as the Foundation of Liberty, and the Basis of Government.

Ecclesiastical Affairs may be ranked in two Classes. First, such as relate to the Clergy alone, as making a distinct Body from the Laity. These were left, as they now are, to the sole management of the Ecclesiasticks, who held their Councils or Synods, where the Laity had nothing to do. Secondly, such as concerned the Body of the People, as Christians. These were regulated in the mixt Councils, consisting of the chief Men of the Clergy and the Nobility. Herein, the Rules of Equity were perfectly followed. It was not thought just to enact civil Laws, that were obligatory to the Clergy as Members of the State, without their concurrence. On the other hand, it was deemed unreasonable, that the Clergy should have a power of making Ecclesiastical Laws that were binding to the Laity, as Christians, without the Consent of the Wittena-Gemot, or Representative of the Nation. Thus, in both these respects, the same Principles were followed, namely, that no Man was bound by any Laws, to which he had not given his Consent, either by himself or his Representative. Hence it is, that the Wittena-Gemots were for the most part mixt Assemblies, where all important Affairs, as well Ecclesiastical as Civil, were treated, and that these Assemblies had no less Authority in Spirituals than in Temporals.

To be convinc'd of this, we need only cast an eye on the Laws of the Anglo-Saxons, where we find a perpetual mixture of Ecclesiastical and Civil Matters. I shall produce a few instances, which seem to be incontestable. In the Year 673, a Council was convened, where Theodore Archbishop of Canterbury presided, and ten Canons of the ancient general Councils were assented to, as hath been related in the History of the Church of that time. But this Assembly was not purely an Ecclesiastical Synod; for besides the Bishops, all the Kings and great Men of England were present, as an Historian relates it. And therefore 'twas a mixt Council, a mycel Synod, a real Wittena-Gemot. We must take care not to be led into error by the Words Council or Synod, which at present denote an Assembly of Ecclesiasticks; whereas in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, these Terms were not understood in so limited a Sense, but served to express all sorts of great Assemblies. Whoever carefully examines the nature of these antient Assemblies, which by Historians are called Councils, he will find, they were mixt Conventions; since they were subscribed, approved, and assented to, by the Kings, Princes, and great Men there present. In the reign of Edward the Elder, an Assembly was held, where the Articles of a Treaty were settled between that Prince and Guthurm, to whom Alfred had given East-Anglia, a State Affair, if ever there was any. And yet, in this very Assembly were enacted several Ecclesiastical Laws, which in the Preamble are called Senatus Consulta, because made by the Witan, that is, by the great Men of Wessex and East-Anglia. Among these Laws, besides several that were purely political, there are some with these titles, Of Apostates, Of the Punishment of such as are in Orders, Of Incests, Of Fasts, &c. From whence it is manifest, these Political Assemblies made Laws concerning Religion. An Historian says, King Althelstan convened a Council, in which many Laws both Ecclesiastical and Civil were enacted: Consequently this was not an Assembly of Churchmen, since it was never pretended, the Clergy had a power to make Secular Laws.

(1) Cum Literis & Consensu. Great Register of Abingdon, before-mentioned.

(2) To the Abbey of St. Edmundsbury, now in the Office of the King's Remembrancer of the Exchequer.

But this is not all. It is shewn by several instances, that the Wittena-Gemot elected and deprived the Bishops. Wilfrid Bishop of York, whom I have had frequent occasion to mention, was elected by the two Kings of Northumberland, and the General Council of that Kingdom, as the Author of his Life relates. Erkenwald Bishop of London was elected with the Consent of King Sebba and the Advice of all the People. Wulfstan was made Bishop of Worcester in Curia, that is, in the great Assembly, which was called the Court, or the King's Court. Ingulphus, Abbot of Croyland speaks in this manner of the Elections of the Bishops and Abbots: For many Years, there was no Election absolutely free and canonical: But all Ecclesiastical Dignities were conferred by the King's Court, according to their good pleasure (1).

As the Wittena-Gemot was concerned in the Election, so was it also in the Deprivation of Bishops. Of which I shall give the following instances. Brithelm, Bishop of Dorchester, being promoted to the See of Canterbury, Edgar, who had a mind Dunstan should be Archbishop, caused Brithelm to be sent back to his former Bishoprick. How this was done we are informed by Osbern the Monk, who wrote the Life of Dunstan: Within a few days after Brithelm was made Archbishop, not thinking himself fit for so great a charge, he departed to the Church he had lately left, by the Command of the King and People. Another Historian relates this matter in the manner following: Edgar made Brithelm descend the same way he was raised: For a Council being convened for this very purpose, he objected several Articles against Brithelm, and by the Order and Consent of his Barons, sent him back to the Cure of his former Church of Dorchester. Brithelm therefore was both elected and deprived by the Authority of the Wittena-Gemot. In the Reign of Edward the Confessor, Robert Archbishop of Canterbury was removed from his See by a Decree of the Wittena-Gemot, and Stigand being elected in his place, the papal power could neither procure this Election to be annulled, as long as the Dominion of the Saxons lasted, nor prevent the English from acknowledging Stigand as lawful Archbishop, tho' suspended by the Pope.

These Instances shew, the Wittena-Gemot, or Mycel-Synod was an Ecclesiastical and Political Assembly at the same time, and that all Affairs relating to the Church and State were indifferently treated there. 'Twas not till long after, when the Papal Authority was grown to a great height, under the Norman and Angevin Kings, that the Clergy claimed the Privilege of debating apart all matters any ways relating to Religion, in Ecclesiastical Assemblies or Synods.

It is time now to speak of the King in particular, his Prerogatives, Revenues, and Succession to the Crown.

Of the KING.

I Have already observed in another place, that the Saxon Government in Germany was Aristocratical, and that they had only a General who commanded their Armies in time of War. The Saxon Leaders themselves erected their several Conquests in Great-Britain into Kingdoms, and assumed the title of King. But with this new title, they were however considered at first by their Subjects upon the same foot only with their Governors in Germany, whose power was far from being Despotic. Nevertheless, some pretend, the right of Conquest gave these first Kings an unlimited power, from whence it would follow, that the Privileges of the English Subjects were either Concessions of the Kings, or Usurpations of the People. This Argument, drawn from the right of Conquest, might have some weight if the Privileges of the Britons, who were subdued, was the point in question. But the Business in hand is the Privileges of the Saxons or English, who were themselves the Conquerors, and over whom Conquest gave no power to their Kings. I say, we are to consider here the Saxons only, since there remained in the Country they became masters of, but very few Britons, who were looked upon but as so many Slaves. As therefore the Anglo-Saxons can't be said to lose their Rights by making Conquests, they are to be considered upon the same foot as in Germany, that is, as a free People under the conduct of a Head or Chief, whose power was limited by Law.

There is no doubt, that in England, as in all other Kingdoms, the Royal Authority by degrees exceeded the Bounds at first prescribed. But, the History of the Anglo-Saxons being very imperfect, there is no given account of this matter. I must therefore content myself with showing in general some of the chief Prerogatives enjoyed by the Anglo-Saxon Kings during their Dominion, which lasted above 600 Years, without being able so much as to observe the alterations that may have been in this respect in so long an Interval.

One of the most considerable of the King's Prerogatives was the Power of appointing the Earls, Viscounts, Judges, and other Officers as well Civil as Military. Some however assert, that the military Post of the Dukes or Holds of each County was conferred by the Shire-Gemot. Very probably, it was in the King's power to change these Officers according to his pleasure, of which we meet with several instances in History. But after all, it can't be positively affirmed; because when such an Officer is found to be turned out by the King, it does not necessarily follow, it was done without the Consent or previous Sentence of the Wittena-Gemot (2).

Another great Prerogative of the Crown, was that the Laws made in the Wittena-Gemot were of no force without the Assent of the King, to whom was committed the Executive Power.

The King had also power to pardon Malefactors. But as Offences may be considered in a doubleview, namely, as they concern the publick, or as being prejudicial to some private Person, the King could only pardon them in the first respect. The King's pardon prevented not the offended Party from demanding satisfaction for the wrongs he had received. This satisfaction was called in Saxon, Wergeld, that is, a Reparation, made to the injured party or his friends and relations. Hence doubtless came the Custom in England at this day, of the Wife's or Son's appealing in cases of Murders. For the same reason also this Clause is usually inserted in Pardons: Ita tamen ut sit recte in curia nostra, si quis versus eum loqui voluerit.

The power of coining Money was another of the King's Prerogatives, which he could grant by Charter to whom he pleased, as we find several of the Saxon Kings granted the same to the two Archbishops and others. But the King had not the power of enhancing or debasing the Coin. The Mirror of Justice recites it as an old Law, that the King could not change the Money, or make other Coin than of Silver, without the Consent of all the Counties.

It is uncertain, whether it was absolutely in the Power of the Saxon Kings, to make War or Peace, without the Consent of the Wittena-Gemot. It is true, indeed, the Power of making War was, as it is now, of little consequence; since the King not being able to raise Money without the Consent of the Estates, could not bear the expence, if his Subjects refused to assist him. But as to making Peace, the case is quite different, since on a good or bad Peace, depends the welfare of a whole Kingdom, as hath been too often experienced. And therefore, these two Prerogatives, which are commonly joined together, widely differ in their Consequences. It lies in the People's Breast to contribute to the Wars the King is pleased to undertake of his own accord, and, by retaining their Concurrence, have it in their power to prevent the mischief that an unjust or unnecessary War may occasion. But how shall they hinder the effects of a pernicious Peace, concluded without their Knowledge?

The King's Revenue were of three sorts. The first consisted in certain things, furnished him by the State, for the maintenance of his Household, as Corn, Hay, Cattle, and the like, which were usually paid in kind. The second Branch was the produce of certain Demesnes or Lands annexed to the Crown, and destined to serve for publick Uses, it not being in the power of the King to grant any part of them, not even to the Church, without the Consent of the Estates. Hence it is that we find the antient Charters of the Saxon Kings to the Churches or Monasteries, confirmed by the principal Members of the General Assembly, who signed them in this manner, I. N-----have subscribed, confirmed, approved, corroborated, or other the like Expressions. It cannot be doubted

(1) After which the Person so elected being first consecrated, the King invested him with the Temporalities, by the Delivery Breath and Awards, as you may see in the same Author.

(2) As the Earls in those Days held their Earldoms of the Community and not of the King, there is no doubt but they were both made and turned out with the Consent of the Great Council. But as a Body Politick cannot act itself, when any particular Act is to be done, the Election thereof naturally devolves on the King as Lord or Head of the great Senory of the Kingdom. And therefore when he is said to make or put out an Earl, the Assent of the Wittena-Gemot is always to be supposed. For Feudal Earls (and all were so in those Days) could not be made without the Consent of the Peers.

but this Branch of the King's Revenue was applied to publick Uses, when it is considered, that so late as the end of the XIVth Century, in the Reign of Richard II. the Parliament order'd, that for the future the Revenues of the King's Demefnes should go towards defraying the charge of the Wars he should be engaged in. The third Branch consisted, as at this day, of certain Taxes or Imposts, which were laid from time to time on the People upon urgent occasions, by the Authority of the Witten-Gemot.

We don't find, during the Heptarchy, the Kings affected any swelling Titles, as some did afterwards. They were all contented with the Title of King of their respective Kingdoms; and the Prince who was elected Monarch did not imagine he had a Right to distinguish himself upon that account. Egbert himself, after acquiring the Sovereignty of the Seven Kingdoms, made no Alteration in his usual Title of King of the West-Saxons. Athelstan was the first that stiled himself, Imperator. Edmund was satisfied with, Restor & Gubernator Angliæ. Edgar called himself, King of the whole Island of Albion. Canute the Great assumed the Title of King of Albion and many other Nations. Some affected a Greek Title, as Edgar, who stiled himself, Totius Angliæ Basileus.

As for the Coronation of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, there was no time fixed for this Ceremony, either during the Heptarchy, or after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms. Each was crowned when he thought it most convenient. Before Egbert, the Kings of Kent were crowned by the Archbishops of Canterbury: The Kings of Northumberland, by the Archbishops of York; and the rest commonly by the Bishop of their Capital. After Egbert united the Heptarchy, or at least four of the Kingdoms into one, the Archbishop of Canterbury claimed the Privilege of crowning the Kings; but this pretension was founded only on a Custom, which, tho' usual, was not however necessary. And indeed we find, after the Union, several Kings were crowned by the Archbishops of York, or even by other Bishops. Some say, Harold put the Crown on his own head himself. Sweyn, the first Danish King, was not crowned at all, and yet was owned for King. Edgar reigned several years in Wessex before he was solemnly crowned. Edward the Confessor's Coronation was not performed till six Months after he was proclaimed. This neglect is a clear Evidence this Ceremony was not then deemed absolutely necessary. And therefore they who date the beginnings of the Reigns from the Coronation-days, only breed confusion in Chronology, from a mistaken nicety. This way of reckoning is so much the more liable to Error, as there were several Kings who repeated the Solemnity of their Coronation several times; for instance, Cerdic first King of Wessex. This Ceremony was not at first performed in a Church, but in the open Air. Thus it is expressly said by the Historians, that Athelstan, Edmund and Edred were crowned in an open Place (1.)

As for the Form of the Crown, it was not over-curious, at least it was not uniform, as may be seen from many Impressions of Heads of the Saxon Kings, given us by Camden and Spelman (2). Some have only a Diadem of Pearls. Others a Coronet with six Rays or Points, with Flower de Lucies between, or Pearls upon them. Edward the Confessor has an Imperial Crown. This variety shows, that in England, as well as in other places, there was not then any settled Form for the Crowns, but that each Prince pleased his own fancy (3).

The SUCCESSION to the CROWN in the Time of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

THERE are three different Opinions upon this Subject. The first is, that the Crown was all along Hereditary, as well during the Heptarchy as afterwards. The second, that the Crown was always Elective, and in the disposal of the People; so that, although the Son succeeded the Father, it was however by Election. The third, that the Crown was neither Hereditary nor Elective, but the Kings had power to give it by Will to any one of their Sons or Relations, whom they thought most worthy. But how confidently soever each asserts his Opinion, it is easily perceived that to establish any one of the three, is more difficult than to combat the other two. This difficulty arises from our imperfect Knowledge of the History of the Anglo-Saxons, and perhaps from their not proceeding regularly themselves in this matter. The Arguments used by each Party in defence of his own, and against the Opinions of his Adversaries, are as follows.

The first say, we need only run over the History of the Heptarchy, to be convinced that in each of the seven Kingdoms, the Crown remained in the Family of the first Kings, as long as there were any Male Heirs in being. And that after the Union of the seven Kingdoms, there was no alteration in this respect, the Race of Egbert fitting on the Throne down to Edward the Confessor. 'Tis true indeed the Danish Kings are to be excepted: but as they intruded themselves by force of Arms, nothing can be inferred from thence against the Crown's being Hereditary.

They who believe the Crown was Elective, ground their Opinion upon the same History, by showing that the Lineal Succession from Father to Son was not always preserved. And indeed, they demonstrate, by undeniable Proofs, that the King's Brother often succeeded before the King's Sons, and distant Branches of the Royal Family were preferred before the nearest; whence they conclude, this was occasioned by the right of Election residing in the People. They further add, that although the Son succeeded the Father, sometimes even for several Generations, it does not necessarily follow, that the Crown was Hereditary; as the Imperial Crown of Germany can't be said to be so, though it has now continued two hundred and fifty years in the House of Austria. To support their Opinion concerning the Right of Election, they alledge several Passages of the Historians, who, speaking of the Kings that succeeded their Fathers, use this Expression, electus est in Regem, He was elected King.

To this the others reply, That indeed upon certain occasions, Fraud and Violence took place: But however, the Lineal Succession, tho' broken for some time, preserved its Rights, since quickly after we find things were restored to their former State. I think it needless to produce the Instances alledged by both Parties. Besides their having been related in the History, the Reader may easily refresh his Memory by casting his Eye on the Genealogical Tables of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, where the Order of the Succession is set down. As for the Expression of the Historians, He was elected, they say, these Words are to be found only in Authors who wrote long after, and made use of them without considering the Consequences, as not treating expressly of this matter. Besides, 'tis pretended, these Authors have not rightly translated the original Terms in the Saxon Annals, Feng to Rice, which properly signify Regnum capessit, he took upon him the Kingdom.

They who are of the third Opinion, alledge against the first, that the Crown was not therefore Hereditary, because it continued long in one Family, as appears from the example of the House of Austria. To the second they object, that after proving the Crown not to be Hereditary, their Inference, that it was therefore Elective, is not just, for there is another way, which excluded the other two, namely, the Kings dispos'd of the Crown as they thought fit. To confirm their Opinion, they alledge the example of France, where they pretend, the Kings, even as low down as some of the second Race (4), enjoyed the Privilege of disposing of their Dominions, which occasioned the so frequent division of that Kingdom. For, say they, had it been the eldest Son's Right always to succeed his Father, 'tis inconceivable that the younger Brothers should so frequently rise in Arms to compel their elder to share the Kingdom with them. On the other hand, they observe, if the Crown of France had been Elective, 'tis not likely the French would have always elected as many Sovereigns, as the former Kings had left Sons. From all which they conclude, that the frequent Partitions during the first and second Race, were solely owing to the testamentary disposition of the Kings. Agreeable to this, is, what Mezerai says, speaking of Aribert King Dagobert's Brother. His words are: But as Aribert was young, and the King his Father perhaps had left him no Part of the Kingdom in his Will, it was to no purpose that Bernulph, his Mother's Brother, endeavoured to persuade the Neustrians to rise in his favour. This Custom established among the French from the beginning of their Monarchy, as it is pretended to be proved, is doubtless a strong Presumption that the Anglo-Saxons did the like, seeing they lived at the same time, and came, as well as the Franks, from Germany, in the same Proof of the Crown's being Hereditary.

Proof that it was Elective.

Answer.

That the Crown was disposed of by the Kings.

Form of the Crown.

Three Opinions concerning the Succession.

(1) They were crowned in the Market-Place of Kingsdon upon Thames.

(2) These Impressions were taken from old Saxon Coins.

(3) Yggis looks upon it as Fiction in them who needs have it that Alfred was crowned with a Crown wrought with Flower de Lucies, because the Crown was kept among the Relics at Winton before our late Civil Wars. (See Note 9) p. 95.) The Inscription, Hæc est, &c. being in all probability upon the Box wherein it was kept by some Monk of After-Times, to give the greater Air of Antiquity to the Crown.

(4) The Crown of France has been enjoyed by three Royal Families: First, the Merovingians, begun by Pharamond, and ended in Childeric III. twenty one Kings: Second, the Carolingians from Charles Martell to Lothar V. fourteen Kings: Third, begun in Hugh Capet, of which there have been thirty one Kings.

Century. But if it be objected, there are no Instances to be found then in England of the like Partitions, in the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, it is replied, there were some, tho' not many. The Kings of the Heptarchy, who were but petty Princes in comparison of the Kings of France, took care not to divide their Dominions, otherwise there would quickly have been as many Sovereigns as Cities. However there were some that did so: For Instance, Penda King of Mercia, placed in his Life-time, his eldest Son Peda on the Throne of Leicester, having erected that City, and the adjoining Country into a Kingdom. Ethelred his Son and Successor, gave his Brother Merwald part of his Dominions, with the Title of King of Hereford, which little Kingdom was left by Merwald, to his Brother Mercein. Ojot King of Northumberland, gave the Kingdom of Deira to Alfred his Natural Son, as Ethelwulf did the Kingdom of Kent in his Life-time to Athelstan. For a farther Confirmation of this Opinion, Ethelwulf's Will is produced, who disposed of his Dominions in so absolute a manner, that his four Sons were to succeed one after another, whether the first had Children or not; which was accordingly done. These are the Arguments alledged in Proof of the third Opinion; but they have not remained unanswered.

Answer. It is said first, those Princes, who were crowned in their Father's Life-time, were properly but so many Viceroys: and they, who, contrary to the established order, succeeded by virtue of a Will, were admitted to the Throne by the Authority, or at least, not without the Consent of the Estates, which implies a Right of Election in the Subjects.

Another Proof in favour of the Kings. But it is more difficult to answer the Arguments drawn from the Proceedings of Canute the Great, who, towards the latter end of his Life, very carefully avoided every thing that might make the English apprehensive of his intending to alter the form of Government. 'Tis well known, this Prince annulled his Marriage Articles with Emma of Normandy, by making his Will, and appointing Harold his Successor, instead of Hardicanute, who by the Marriage-Contract was Heir to the Crown. This seems to demonstrate, the King was entirely free to chuse his Successor. It is true, after his death Disputes arose; but however that be, it appears at least, this Prince thought he might dispose of the Crown by Will. The same thing may be said of Edward the Confessor. Whether this Prince made a Will in favour of the Duke of Normandy, or designed it only, or even gave him but a bare verbal Promise, it may be inferred from thence, that he imagined he had a Right to settle the Succession that way.

These are the Reasons alledged to support the three Opinions, in this important Inquiry. I call it important with regard to those who really think it so. For my part, I can hardly be persuaded there is any occasion to recur to the Customs of the Anglo-Saxons, to establish those that are to be followed at this day.

The three Opinions may be united. It would not, perhaps, be impossible to form an Idea of the Anglo-Saxon Government, with regard to the Succession, by uniting the three foregoing Opinions. It seems to me that from all the reasons alledged, it may be inferred in favour of the rest, that the Crown was Hereditary in the Family of the Saxon Kings, as well during the Heptarchy, as after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms. In favour of the second, it may be granted, that upon extraordinary occasions, the Wittena-Gemot, considering it self as Supreme Legislator, assumed an absolute Authority, and went beyond the usual Bounds. With the third it may be said, the Kings had power of nominating their Successor, provided, when they deviated from the common Practice, which was to prefer the next in Blood, they took care to have their Choice confirmed by the Great Council of the Kingdom. This is the Reason why those Kings who were not the next in Blood, never failed of making use of the Consent of the Estates, thereby to rectify the Irregularity of their accession to the Throne. This we see also in Alfred's Will, at the end of his Life published by Spelman (1). By uniting thus the three Opinions, the Rules for the Succession in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, will be found to be much the same with those at present. It is confessed, the Crown is Hereditary. But however, this prevents not the Parliament in extraordinary cases, from claiming a Power to over-rule Custom, and settle the Succession on a more distant, in prejudice of a nearer Relation. Of this the History of England since the Conquest affords many Instances and Precedents, without insisting on those of our own Times. If it is objected, all do not allow the King and Parliament to have a right to such a Power; it may be replied, till the contrary is determined by a lawful Authority, it is reasonable to presume this Power is rightfully lodged in the Nation. According to these Principles, they, who labour to prove the Crown was Elective in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, don't seem to do much in favour of the Parliament, which claims a Power to alter the Succession but on certain occasions. On the other hand, they, who undertake to prove the Crown was Hereditary at that time, do no great prejudice to the Authority assumed by this August Body; only in extraordinary Cases. In fine, as they, who pretend to prove the Saxon Kings had an absolute Power to dispose of the Crown, probably do not mean that the present Kings have the same Power, they seem to me to debate a Question of more Curiosity than Importance.

Of the LAWS of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

DURING the Heptarchy, there were no Laws common to all the seven Kingdoms; but each had its own in particular. It is very likely however, these Laws were not very different, since the Inhabitants of the seven Kingdoms had the same original. But there is nothing certain in this matter. The first Laws, we have any Knowledge of, are those published by Ethelbert King of Kent, about the time of the Conversion of the Saxons. We have likewise Ina's King of Wessex, and Offa's King of Mercia; and there is no doubt but some of the other Kings made Laws, though they are not transmitted to us.

After the Union of the seven Kingdoms, Egbert's Successors explained or extended the Laws already established, or made new ones. The most famous are those of Alfred the Great, taken, as he himself says, from the best he could find, and particularly from Ina's and Offa's above-mentioned. Edgar, with such Additions and Emendations as he thought fit, caused the Laws of Alfred to be strictly observed. But it must be remembered, when England was divided into two Kingdoms, namely, Wessex and Mercia, each had their Laws apart, and Canute the Great caused those that were introduced by the Danes into Northumberland and East-Anglia, to be approved by the General Assembly. There were therefore in England three sorts of Laws, the West-Saxon, Mercian, and Danish, till Edward the Confessor united them all in one Body (2). As I proposed only to give a general Notion of the Government of the Anglo-Saxons, my design is not to enter into a particular Account of all these Laws. I shall content my self with relating some Circumstances, which seem to me to merit the Curiosity of such as are Strangers to the English Constitution, and are intelligible to all the World.

The Laws were divided into Civil and Criminal. The first concerned the Lands or Estates, which were of two sorts, Boeland and Socland. Boeland was much of the same Nature with the Lands we call Allodial (3). It was Free and Hereditary, and might be alienated by the Owner, though he held in Fee of a superior Lord. This is properly what is elsewhere called, Feudum honorarium. This sort of Land was possessed by the Nobles and most considerable among the People. Socland was possessed by the Ceorles, and held of the Lord by payment of a certain annual Rent, and performance of certain personal Services. This sort of Land is the same what is called

(1) Ego Ælfredus — tribus West-Saxonie Nobilibus Consensu pariter & Assensu, Occidentaliū Saxonum Rex, &c. Whence it is manifest, that though he was nominated in his Father's Will to succeed his Brothers, yet he was elected or at least confirmed by the Great Council in the Possession of the Crown, to bequeath it to him by his Father. And therefore it is plain, that though the King had the Power to dispose of the Crown by Will, yet it could not be done without the Consent and Assent of the Estates.

(2) See what Bishop Nicholas says of this threefold Distinction of the Laws in p. 126. Note (3). To which may be added here the Opinion of Spelman: "Our Saxons, though divided into many Kingdoms, yet were they all one in Effect, in Manners, Laws, and Language; so that the breaking of their Government into many Kingdoms, or the re-uniting of their Kingdoms into a Monarchy, wrought little or no change amongst them touching Laws. For though we talk of the West-Saxon-Laws, Mercian-Laws, and Dane-Laws, whereby the several Parts of England were governed; yet they all held an Uniformity in Substance, differing rather in their Mulets than in their Canon; that is, in the Quantity of Fines and Amerciaments, than in the Course and Frame of Justice." Reliq. Spel. p. 49.

(3) The Northern Nation, neither incorporating nor destroying the Inhabitants in their Conquests, divided the Land into three Parts; one they left to the old Possessors, the other two they took themselves. These Divisions are called by the Writers of those Ages, Sortes Geticae, and Sortes Romanae, in Italy. The Franks practiced in the same manner in Gaul. What they took to themselves was termed Terra Salica, the rest was called Allodium, from the negative Particle Ad and Leud, which signifies in Teutonic, Persons linked by feudal Tenures, who only had a Share in the Legislature. So that Allodial Lands were such as were not subject to feudal Duties; yet before Tenants were oppressed, the Term Allodium was a Term of Reproach, as it denominated the Vanquished from the Victors. Though their Land was at first free from all Service, many Possessors for their better Security gave their Allodial Lands to the Chief of great Lordships to take them back under feudal Tenures. Others, without divesting themselves at all of their ancient Possession, placed themselves under such Superiors, and then came in use the Phrase tenere in Allodio, frequent enough in our Doomsday Book, and in foreign Writers; for all Protection and Subjection was supposed then to be founded on Tenure. St. Amand, p. 26, 27.

a Rural Fief. I don't think it necessary to enquire here into the original of Fees, which would lead me too far, and besides would contain nothing peculiar to England. I shall only say, in Selden's opinion, Fees derive their origin from the North, and from thence passed into Germany, Italy, France, Spain, England, where the northern Nations settled. It would also be too long a Digression from my purpose, to recite all the Laws concerning the possession of the two sorts of Lands before-mentioned, especially as these things are understood by few People. 'Tis sufficient to have given a general Idea of them, and therefore I shall proceed to what is much more intelligible, the Criminal Laws.

From the Laws of the Peers.

Manner of the Trial Peers.

By the regulations of Alfred the Great, all Persons accused of any Crime were to be tried by their Peers. This Privilege which the English have preserved to this day, is one of the greatest a Nation can enjoy. It screens the small from the Oppression of the great, and from the Caprice or Passion of the King himself, of which there have been several Instances in England. But as the Term Peers may not be rightly understood by many Readers, it will be proper briefly to explain the meaning of the Word. It is to be observed, that in England there are but two Degrees or Orders of Men, namely, the Peers of the Realm, and the Commons. Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Viscounts, Barons, Archbishops and Bishops, are Peers of the Realm, and Peers among themselves; inasmuch that the lowest of the Barons is the Peer of the highest Duke. All the rest of the People are ranked with the Commons. So that in this respect, the meanest Artificer is Peer of all below the rank of a Baron. When therefore it is said, every one is tried by his Peers; the meaning is, the Peers of the Realm are judged by those of their own Order, that is, by the other Lords; who, like them, are Peers of the Realm. In the same manner, one of the Commonalty is tried by such as are of the order of the Commons, who, in this respect, are his Peers or equals, how much soever they may differ with regard to Birth or Fortune. There is however this difference between the Peers of the Realm and the Commons; every Peer of the Realm has a right to vote at the Trial of another Peer, whereas the Commons are tried but by twelve Persons of their Order, whose Verdict concerns only Fact. These twelve Persons, after hearing the public Examination of the Witnesses for and against the Party accused, only bring him in Guilty or not Guilty of the Crime laid to his Charge; after which, the Judge condemns or acquits him according to Law. Such is the Privilege enjoyed by the English ever since the Time of King Alfred. And perhaps this Prince only revived and rectified a Custom established by the Saxons Time out of Mind (1).

Manner of determining the Truth.

By Oath.

When the Crime was not clearly proved, or sufficient Evidence found to condemn or acquit the Accused, two Methods were used, by which, it was thought, the Truth might be discovered. The first was the Oath of the Party accused, to purge himself of the Crime he was charged with. But his single Oath was not sufficient: He was to bring with him a certain Number of Persons who were [and still are] called Compurgators, who also swore to his Innocence.

Ordeal
by Fire.

The second Method was by Ordeal (2), that is, Trial by Fire or Water. The Trial by Fire was performed two ways. The Person accused held in his Hand a red-hot piece of Iron of one, two, or three Pounds weight, according to his Crime, or according to the Evidence against him; or else he was made to walk barefoot and blindfold over nine red-hot Pow-shares placed at a stated distance. If he had the good fortune to come off unhurt, he was declared Innocent: But in case he was burnt, he was pronounced Guilty. Persons of Quality were tried by Fire-Ordeal, of which Emma, Mother to Edward the Confessor, is an Instance. Trial by Water-Ordeal was made either by cold or scalding Water. Peasants and Slaves were put upon this Trial. In the Trial by cold Water, the Party suspected had his Hands and Feet tied together, and so was thrown into a Pond or River. If he sunk, he was adjudged Innocent; but if he floated on the Surface of the Water, he was declared Guilty (3). When scalding Water was the Test, the Person accused was to plunge his Arm into it as far as the Wrist, and sometimes up to the Elbow. The Trial by cold Water was introduced by Lewis le Debonnaire, and by Pope Eugenius II, instead of an Oath, which was but too often the occasion of the guilty Persons perjuring themselves; and the English followed their Example.

Single Combat.

The third way of Trial was by single Combat. When the Evidences of the Accusation were not strong, the Party was allowed to vindicate his Innocence by challenging his Accuser to single Combat. If a Woman was accused, she had the Privilege of substituting one in her room, who was called her Champion. This Custom was not introduced into England till towards the End of the Empire of the Saxons: But it continued a long time in being.

Corfned.

A fourth way of Trial was by giving the Party suspected a bit of Bread or Cheefe (4), consecrated with abundance of Ceremonies. If he was guilty, it was believed the Bread or the Cheefe would stick in his Throat and choak him; but if innocent, he would readily swallow it. Part of the Imprecation used upon delivering him the Bread, (after receiving the Communion) was as follows: May this Bread [or this Cheefe] which is given him in order to bring the Truth to light, stick in his Throat and find no Passage if he is guilty (5). But if innocent of the Crime laid to his Charge, may he easily swallow this Bread [or this Cheefe] consecrated in thy Name, to the end all may know, &c. This way of Trial was evidently in Imitation of the Waters of Jealousy among the Jews. They who forged the Circumstances of Earl Godwin's death, as related in the reign of King Edward, had probably an eye to this Custom. This consecrated Bread or Cheefe was called Corfned, from the word Snide or Snidan, which signifies to cut a bit off, and Corse, that is, to curse, because 'twas believed it brought a Curse on the guilty Person. The Church not only approved of all these ways of Trial, but prescribed the Ceremonies and Form of Prayers to be used on these occasions, and even consented that the Bishops and Priests should officiate. There is a Law of Canute the Great concerning the Corfned, to this effect: If a Man be accused of Murder, or of having any hand in it, let him clear himself to the Relations and Friends of the murdered Person, and, if necessary, let him be put to the Trial of the Corfned. It is very wonderful, the Saxons and other Nations, among whom these Trials were common, could for so long together fancy they were infallible ways of discovering the Truth. On the contrary, one would think the numberless Experiments, they must needs have had of their uncertainty, should have opened their Eyes and made them see their Error.

Numb. vi.

When the Charge was fully proved, the Law ordained several sorts of Punishments, according to the Quality of the Offence: The greatest part whereof consisted in Fines, which the guilty Person was condemned to pay to the injured Party, to the King, to the Earl or to his Lord. There were some Crimes however, that were looked upon as Capital, and punished with Death. Such were Treason against the King, or Lord, wilful Murder and Theft. Though Treason was Death by the Law, yet the guilty Person had the Liberty of redeeming his Life by paying the Valuation of the King's or Lord's Head: I shall explain this hereafter. Coining of Money was not originally a Capital Crime; but the Consequences made the Penalty very great. The first Law that made it Death was in the Reign of Ethelred II, though it was left in the King's Power to commute the Punishment for a Fine. As for Murder, the Laws distinguished killing a Man in a sudden and unforeseen Quarrel, from wilful and premeditated Murder. The Punishment of the former was only pecuniary, the latter was Death. This Distinction still subsists in the Laws of England, where the first is called, Manlaughter, and the other, Murder. Theft or Robbery was not till after some time punish-

Treason.

Coining.

Murder and Man-laughter.

Theft.

(1) Sir William Temple says, Traces are not wanting of this Custom, from the very Institutions of Odin, the first Leader of the Asiatick Goths or Gaeta into Europe, and Founder of that mighty Kingdom round the Baltick Sea, from whence all the Gothick Governments in these North-West Parts of the World were derived. This is the Reason that it is known to have been as ancient in Sweden as any Records, or Traditions of that Kingdom, and still remains in some Provinces. The Normans introduced the Terms of Jury and Verdict as well as many other Law-Terms; but the Trials by Twelve Men are expressly mentioned in Alfred's and Edward the First's Laws.

(2) Saxons in his Calvary derives this Word Or, a Privative, and Dal, that is, Distinction or Difference, as much as to say, an impartial Judgment, without any Distinction.

(3) Rapin, by mistake, says Swimming was a Sign of Guilt, and Swimming of Innocence. The Custom among the Country-People of trying Witches, by throwing them into the Water with their Thumbs and Toes tied together, is perhaps a Relict of Water Ordeal. These Trials were made with great Solemnity, and were always managed by the Clergy. The Person accused was obliged to swear to his Innocence, and innocence, especially if in Orders, to receive the Sacrament. After the Charge was legally brought in, the Person impeached was to spend three Days in Fasting and Prayer. At the Day of Trial, which in the Fire Ordeal was made in the Church, the Priest in his Habit took up the Iron which lay before the Altar, and repeating the Hymn of the Three Children, put it into the Fire: Then using some Forms of Benediction over the Fire and Iron, he sprinkled the Iron with Holy Water, and made the Sign of the Cross in the Name of the Trinity: Which done, the Party accused passed through the Test. The Ceremony of the Scalding Water-Ordeal was much the same. But when the Trial was by Cold Water, the three Days Fast and other Circumstances being premised, the Person suspected drank a Draught of Holy Water, to which the Priest added an Imprecation, in case he was Guilty: Then the Water into which he was to be thrown, had a sort of consecrating Form of Prayers said over it: All these ways of Trial continued long after the Conquest. The first publick Discontinuation from the State was in the third Year of Henry III.

(4) He was to take an Ounce of either fasting.

(5) The Imprecations go on thus: May his Face turn pale, his Limbs be convulsed, and an horrible Alteration appear in his ruble Body.

able by death, and even the first Laws that made it so, permitted the Thief to redeem his Head with a sum of Money.

Fines for other Crimes.

All other Offences were punished only by Mulcts or Fines, 'till the Reign of Canute the Great, who ordered in the case of Adultery, that a Woman should have her Nose and Ears cut off, and the Man be banished the Realm. These Fines were not left to the Will of the Judge, but were settled by Law, according to the Quality of the injured Party, from the King to the Peasant; and with regard to the Malefactors, from the Ealdorman to the Slave. Upon some certain occasions, they who had incurred the Penalty of Death, might buy off their Punishment by giving the King part of their Estates. But this seldom happened, except where the Quality, or Power of the guilty Party, rendered the execution of the Laws difficult or dangerous. We have a remarkable instance of this in the Trial of Earl Goodwin in the Reign of Edward the Confessor. This Lord, as was said in the Life of King Edward, entering the Thames with a Fleet, the King was forced to restore him to his Honours. But having been banished by the Wittena-Gemot, he was to be recalled by the same Authority. It was necessary therefore to use some Formality, which should screen him from all future enquiry; and the method taken was this. The Earl being come to London, where the great Council was assembled, the King himself turned his Accuser, and said, "Thou Traitor Goodwin, I charge thee with the death of Alfred my Brother, whom thou hast traitorously murdered." "My Lord (answered the Earl) saving the Reverence I owe you, I have neither murdered, nor betrayed your Brother, and am ready to refer myself to the Judgment of your Court." Upon which the Witnesses were produced and examined, and then Leofric Duke of Mercia spoke thus: "It seems evident to me that Prince Alfred was put to death by the Advice of Earl Goodwin. But as he is one of the greatest Lords in the Kingdom, it is my opinion, that twelve of us Earls, who are his Relations and Friends, should take as much Gold as we can carry in our hands, and humbly presenting it to the King, supplicate for his Pardon and Restoration to his Honours, upon his taking the Oath of Allegiance." This being agreed to, twelve of the Lords offered a certain sum to the King, which he accepting, pardoned the Earl. But this whole Proceeding was all a Farce. Goodwin knew before-hand how matters would go, otherwise he would never have ventured to stand a Trial.

Before I conclude this Head, it will be proper to remark, that several, upon reading the Saxon Laws, preposterously imagine, the Murder, as well of the King, as of any other Subject, was punishable only by Fine. But this mistake proceeds purely from not attending to the fore-mentioned distinction between wilful Murder and Manslaughter. Of this last, we are to understand Athelstan's Law (1), which settles the Fines to be paid for the killing any Person from the King to the Slave.

The Customs and Manners of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

THE Anglo-Saxons brought with them from Germany their own Country's Virtues and Vices, and transmitted them to their Posterity. Their Valour, to which they were indebted for their Conquests, as well in England as Germany, was what they valued themselves most upon. They were bred up to Arms from their Infancy, and War may be said to be their only Profession. They came to their general Assemblies armed; and shewed their Approbation of what was proposed by striking their Javelins one against another. Their usual Arms were the Sword, Club, Battle-Ax, or Bill, and Javelin. As they had no Bows and Arrows, their Battles were the more bloody. After darting their Javelins, they came to close Fight, where their dexterity in handling their Arms, gave them a great advantage. Indeed, towards the end of their Empire, they were frequently worsted by the Danes, and at length vanquished by the Normans. But where is the Nation, how famous soever for Bravery, that has not experienced the like turns of Fortune? Among the Saxons, a Man without Courage was looked upon with the utmost Contempt. This high Conceit of martial Valour was the cause of their being very hardly reconciled after a quarrel. Every one dreading the name of Coward, should he make the first advances, the Quarrel was perpetuated from Father to Son, and very seldom ended but with the Extinction of one of the Families (2). It is easy to imagine, that people of this Temper, accustomed from their Childhood to fear neither Blows nor Wounds, and continually encouraged by the example of their Relations and Friends, encountered Dangers with great resolution. Accordingly there never was any Nation that looked death in the face with greater Intrepidity than the Saxons. And all the World knows this is the Character of the English at this very day.

The Saxons were extremely addicted to Religion, even before they had the happiness of becoming Christians. When they settled in Great-Britain, they were not only Idolaters, but of all the Heathens were the most attached to the Service of their Gods; even to the sacrificing of the Prisoners of War on their Altars. As soon as they embraced the Gospel, the same Inclination caused them to receive and practise, with equal zeal, the Duties of the Christian Religion, and whatever the Monks, their first Teachers, were pleased to inculcate upon them. It was their unhappiness not to come to the Knowledge of God, 'till the Monks began by degrees to disfigure Religion by superstitious Practices. As the Saxons were Men of no Learning and consequently incomplete Judges of what they were taught, they entirely gave themselves up to the management of their Guides. Hence their great zeal in founding and endowing Monasteries. They were made to believe, that enriching the Monks was the main of Religion, or at least would supply all defects. This is also the reason that in the two first Centuries after their Conversion we find among them so many Saints of distinguished Birth and Fortune. Indeed, since a Saintship might be purchased by liberal Benefactions to the Monasteries, it was an easy way for the Rich and the Powerful to attain it. But although they were attached to many unnecessary things, yet even in that may be seen their Bias to Religion. This natural Inclination, no doubt, was the reason so many of their Kings voluntarily exchange their worldly Grandeur for a Cloister. They who are acquainted with the Temper of the English at this day, will readily own, no Nation can produce more Instances of fervent and solid Piety. My long abode in England makes me affirm this the more boldly. Indeed, God has permitted Libertinism in point of Religion to make some progress there of late Years. But it would be very unjust to judge of a whole Nation by a few that are infected with it, and of whom one single Person makes more noise in the world by his pernicious Maxims, than many thousands of pious and sincere Christians.

The Anglo-Saxons were so little accustomed to Swearing and Blaspheming, which are grown so common now-a-days in Conversation, that among all their Laws there is not one against this Vice. This cannot be said to be owing to the negligence of the Legislators, since we see in those very Laws great Penalties laid upon such as violated the Sabbath, or a Fast.

Drunkennes was their reigning Vice. They were used to drink out of large Cups, and take great Draughts, 'till Edgar, willing to reform this Abuse, ordered certain Marks to be made in their Cups at such a height, above which they were forbid to fill under such a Penalty. But this Regulation was not long in force.

Although the English in general, before the Norman Conquest, were not very famous for Learning, it is not to be ascribed to their want of Genius, but rather to their Education, which was entirely turned to Arms. Besides, the time of the Dominion of the Saxons, especially after the Union of the seven Kingdoms, was not a time wherein the Sciences greatly flourished.

I have but two Observations more to make on the Customs of the Anglo-Saxons. The first is, they reckoned the time by Nights, which is still observable in some English Expressions. For instance, instead of two Weeks they say a Fortnight, or fourteen Nights. Mezerai ob-

(1) In this Law we have the Valuation of Men's Heads of all Orders and Degrees. This Valuation was called in Saxon, Wergild. The King's Head was valued at thirty thousand Thrimfa's (that is, in our Money, three hundred and sixty Pounds, each Thrimfa being supposed worth about our three Pence, the same as their Peninga or Sceat) half of which was to be paid to his Relations, and half to the State. An Atheling or Prince's was valued at fifteen thousand Thrimfa's: A Bishop's and Ealdorman's, at eight thousand: A General's, at four thousand: A Spiritual and Temporal Thane's, at two thousand: (Hence it is evident, that a Thane was far from being the same with a Baron, whose Valuation would have been at least as much as a Bishop's) the Ceorl's Head was valued at two hundred sixty seven, but if he was so rich as to possess five Hides of Land, at two thousand, the same as a Thane's. The Saxon Money is thus calculated by Mr. Carleton: a Peninga, three of our Pence. A Shilling, three Peninga's, or fifteen Pence; a Pound, forty eight Shillings, or three of our Pounds; Manna, Mancwa, or Manca, twelve of our Pence. Manca of Gold, thirty Peninga's, or seven Shillings and Six-pence.

(2) These are what we call deadly Feuds, that is, Quarrels which end not but in Death. The thirty eighth Law of Alfred is concerning these deadly Feuds, and gives a strange License for Men to take Satisfaction on their Enemies, even without the Presence of any Officer. Nay, so far did they proceed, that if one Man killed another, his Kindred revenged his Death upon any of the Murderer's Relations (as they do among the Indians) 'till King Edmund ordered by a Law, that the Murderer alone should bear the deadly Feud or Enmity of the Kindred of the Party slain.

serve the same thing of the ancient Franks. This, with several other Customs common to the Franks and Saxons, is a strong Presumption, these two Nations had the same Original, as Sir William Temple asserts in his Introduction to the History of England.

77. Saxons
Dikes.

My second Observation is, that the Anglo-Saxons were wont to separate their Lands by large and deep Ditches. This was not only practised by private Persons; but the Kings themselves took care to raise Ramparts with large Ditches on the Frontiers of their Dominions, to part them from the neighbouring States, when there was no Mountains or Rivers to serve for Boundaries. Offa's Dike made to divide Mercia from Wales, was twenty four miles long. There was another between the Thames and the Severn, separating Mercia from Wessex. It was called Woden's Dike, but contracted now into Wansditch. Mercia and East-Anglia were parted by a like Ditch. Afterwards, the East-Angles making Conquests upon the Mercians, made another Ditch seven Miles further into the conquered Country. The first was called, but for what reason I know not, the Devil's Dike, and the other the Seven Mile Dike. They had this Custom from the ancient Saxons, who practised the same thing in Germany. We are informed by some Historian, that the Saxons of Sleswick threw up a large Rampart from Sea to Sea, to defend themselves against the Incurfions of the Danes, who were in possession of the Cimbriick Chersonesus or Jutland. Pepin King of France was long prevented from entering Saxony, by one of these Ramparts, and it was with great difficulty that he made his way over it at last.

The Language of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

The several Dialects of the Anglo-Saxon Language.

TO say in general, the Anglo-Saxons spoke English or Saxon, would not be shewing with sufficient exactness what their Language was. To give a fuller Idea of it, it will be necessary to distinguish the several Tongues used in England after the arrival of the first Saxons. The English Tongue originally differed but little from the Danish, since the ancient Writers call them indifferently Cimbriick, Scandinavian, Gothic: But this Language was not the same with the Saxon. In the parts lying North of the Thames, was spoken pure English or Danish, and South of the Thames pure Saxon. Though these two Languages were different, they so far agreed however, as to be understood by both Nations. In process of time, and especially after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms, Saxon prevailed in all England, because the Kings were of that Nation. Thus pure English, [or the Language of the Angles] was by degrees disused, or at least banished from common Conversation. Afterwards the Danes settling in England, brought their Language, which was not the ancient Danish or English abovementioned, but a modern Danish, mixt with the Language of several neighbouring Nations of Denmark. This modern Danish was chiefly used in Northumberland, Mercia, and East-Anglia, wherein the Danes were Masters. Though, out of complaisance to the English, Canute the Great published his Laws in Saxon, yet the Danish Tongue was still retained in the North, where the People were mostly Danes. As it was also the Court Language during the Reigns of Canute the Great and his two Sons, it became necessary for the West-Saxons, who adopted several Words and Idioms of it into their own Language. But upon Edward the Confessor's accession to the Throne, Saxon prevailed again at Court. Hence the Inhabitants of the North were under some necessity of learning it, just as the Gascons in France are obliged to learn French.

In the Reign of King Edward I. the Norman Language began also to be introduced into England. As his Mother was a Norman, and he had lived many Years in that Court, he was very fond of the Norman Language. Moreover, the great number of Normans that flocked into England, very much helped to introduce this Language among the persons of Quality, who took a pride in speaking it well: The Norman Tongue being at that time a mixture of Danish and French, the last began to prevail, so that the ancient Danish brought by the Normans into Normandy, daily lost ground. As soon as William the Conqueror was seated in the Throne of England, he used all possible means to bring his native Tongue in vogue throughout the Kingdom. He published his Laws in Norman, which, with the settlement of multitudes of Norman Families in England, made that Language as common as the Saxon.

The Language then of the Anglo-Saxons just before the Conquest was a mixture of the following Dialects. 1. Of British or Celtic, from whence no doubt the Saxons borrowed some Words and Phrases. 2. Of Latin, which was common in Great Britain when the Saxons arrived. 3. Of the ancient English or Danish. 4. Of the modern Danish. 5. Of pure Saxon. 6. Of Norman mixed with Danish and French. They who have carefully studied this matter, distinguish three principal Dialects in the Anglo-Saxon Language. The first was compounded of British, Latin and Saxon, but in such manner that the Saxon was predominant. The only remains of this Dialect, which was in use above three hundred years, is a Fragment of the Writings of Cedmon the Monk, inserted by Alfred the Great in his Translation of Bede's Ecclesiastical History. The second Dialect, which may be termed Dano-Saxon, was used in the northern Parts, from the first Invasions of the Danes, to the Norman Conquest. There are still preserved in some Libraries, two Manuscript Versions of the Gospels in this Language. The third Dialect was composed of the other two and the Norman. This Dialect, which was introduced chiefly in the Reigns of Edward the Confessor and William the Conqueror, has admitted of great alterations, by the addition of many French words, particularly, after Henry II's Accession to the Crown of England. They who are ignorant of the English Tongue, hardly believe, that a mixture of so many Languages can have any extraordinary Beauties. But the English pretend, their Language, for that very reason, must be more Beautiful and Expressive, since they have adopted only the more refined part of other Tongues, and rejected what is rude and unpolished. Be this as it will, they have a great value for their Language, and, if a Foreigner may be allowed to give his Opinion, I think, very justly.

I shall conclude this Article with a word or two concerning the Name of Sterling, given to the English Money. Some believe this word comes from the Town of Striveling or Sterling in Scotland, where they pretend, but without any ground, that the best and purest Money was formerly coined. Others say, with much greater probability, that Sterling is derived from the Saxon Word Steore, which signifies Rule or Standard: So that according to this opinion, Sterling Money means no more than Money made according to a settled Standard. Camden and some others imagined this word was of a more modern date, and taken from certain Flemish Workmen, who in the Reign of King John were invited into England to reduce the Money to its due fineness, in which they were more expert than the English. As the People of that Country were generally called Easterlings, on account of their Situation Eastward of England, 'tis pretended, the Money they coined, was called Easterling or Sterling; that is, made by the Easterlings, or Flemish, and consequently purer than what had been hitherto coined (1).

(1) It is believed, that in the most ancient Times, when Money was first coined in this Island, it was made of pure Gold and Silver, like Moneys now current in Hungary and Batavia: And that afterwards, in making the Moneys, it being found convenient to have a certain Quantity of base Metal to be mixed with the Gold and Silver, the word Sterling was introduced, and hath ever since been used, to denote the certain Proportion or Degree of Fineness which ought to be contained in the respective Coins, and full of such Mixtures. Sterling and Standard are therefore synonymous Terms. It is probable the word Sterling was unknown in the time of the Conqueror, as there is no mention of it in Domesday, which values every Manor in Money, as Namum, ad Penjam, ad Podas, but not in Sterling. But however this Term was soon after introduced, because the Statute of the twenty fifth of Edward III. refers to ancient Sterling. Some imagine the Word is derived from Star, which they suppose to have been imprinted on the Money.

A New Map of ENGLAND SCOTLAND and IRELAND

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK VI.

The Norman Line: From the Reign of WILLIAM the Conqueror, to the Death of King STEPHEN, containing the Space of about Eighty Eight Years. With the State of the CHURCH during the said Space.

I. WILLIAM I. Surnamed the BASTARD, or CONQUEROR.

Reflections on the Duke of Normandy's
Attempt upon
England.

WHEN a Man impartially considers the Attempt formed by the Duke of Normandy upon England, he is at a loss which to admire most, either the Ground, or the Boldness, or the Success. In the first place, it must be very surprizing, he should build his Right upon so sandy a foundation as the bare Will of King Edward; of which too it does not appear in History, he ever offered to give the least Proof, or produce any Evidence. In the next place, it is as hard to conceive, how this Prince, who passed for one of the most politick of his time, could form a Design to support his pretended Right by Arms, notwithstanding all the Obstacles that seemed to conspire to divert him from it. Never Project seemed more rashly form'd, or with less appearance of Success. The Forces of Normandy were not comparable to those of England, neither had Duke William, in the Country he undertook to conquer, any strong Holds, or Friends, or Correspondence, whereon to ground the hopes of succeeding. Even after he had landed a powerful Army, not a single Lord declared in his favour. Far from reasonably expecting any Assistance from the English, he could not possibly be ignorant how well they stood affected to Harold. Indeed some among them, from a Sense of Justice and Equity, might be displeased with the new King's usurping the Crown upon Edgar. But they were far enough from blaming him for supplanting the Duke of Normandy, whose very Pretensions were unknown to them. They were so little inclined to reject the King they had chosen, that, on the contrary, they had just given him sensible marks of their Fidelity, by their zeal and readiness in his defence against the King of Norway. On the other hand, the Obstacles Duke William was naturally to expect from the neighbouring Princes, were no less apt to deter him from his purpose. Their Interest required, that instead of promoting his Enterprize, they should oppose his growing Power. The French in particular could not, without running counter to the most obvious Maxims of Policy, forbear endeavouring to blast a Design, the Success whereof would infallibly be very prejudicial to them. But supposing he could have been sure, the Princes his Neighbours would voluntarily shut their eyes against their own Interest, how could he expect to succeed, since the States of Normandy refused to assist him in an Undertaking, which to them seemed equally unjust and rash? Lastly, in the execution of this Design, it is surprizing to see, contrary to all expectation, the greatest Difficulties insensibly vanish before him, and the very things which seemed most opposite to his Designs, help to accomplish them. The States of Normandy refusing him the Assistance he wants, private Persons voluntarily drain their Purfes, and supply him more plentifully than he could have expected from the States. The Court of France lets him act unmolested, and even suffers the French to aid him in procuring a Crown which might one day render him equal to his Sovereign, or at least enable him to dispute his Superiority. All the rest of the neighbouring Princes strive with emulation to forward a Design, the success whereof must be fatal to them. He is assisted by the Earls of Bostagne (1) and Arjau, who a little before were his mortal Enemies. In a word, with-

(1) As an Additional Note (1), p. 170. The Reader is desired to observe, that it was Count H who was assisted by his Chamberlain that had been taken by Harold. His Son and a number of his Men went to assist H in his attempt. Count H was taken by Harold. He was rewarded with the Title of Earl of Arjau, and was the first Baron of Arjau in England, which term he bore till the reign of Richard. After William's Victory, in 1066, Arjau was taken into their own Country. See a list of the names of the nobles who assisted William in England, p. 173-174. Idem 1700.

in the space of a few Months, he had a numerous Army (1), a great number of Ships, and Money in abundance. Even Harold's late Victory over the King of Norway contributed as much as any one thing to the Duke of Normandy's Success, though seemingly it should have destroyed all his hopes. In that action, Harold lost his best Troops, displeased the rest by with-holding the Spoils, and by his Victory was inspired with a fatal contempt of the Normans, that proved his ruin. Had it not been for this Contempt, he would have avoided coming to battle, according to his Brother's advice; and suffered the Norman Army to dwindle away in an Enemy's Country, where no Assistance could be found. And if afterwards, Duke William, constrained to fight with disadvantage, had been vanquished, what could he have urged to vindicate the Injustice and Rashness of his Attempt? But the event has dispell'd all these Reflections, and determined the Historians to extol an Action they would infallibly have blamed, had it proved unsuccessful. Thus, the Foundation on which the Duke of Normandy built his Pretensions, the little reason he had to flatter himself with the happy Issue, and the Ease wherewith he accomplished his Enterprize, equally deserve our Admiration. Add to all these Considerations, that, by one single Battle he became master of a Country, which neither the Danes, or the Saxons, nor the Romans themselves, could subdue till after numberless Engagements, and in the space of several Ages. All this obliges us to own, he was guided by the hand of the Almighty, the only Giver of Victory, and who exalts and humbles Nations according to his good pleasure. God, no doubt, was pleas'd to make use of this Conqueror, to render the English Nation more illustrious than ever. The English, hitherto almost unknown to the rest of the World, began after this Revolution to make a considerable figure in Europe. This may be said to be the first Step by which England is arriv'd to that height of Grandeur and Glory we behold it in at present. This will evidently appear in the whole course of the History, the principal Events of which I am going to describe. But since I am to begin with the Reign of William the Conqueror, it will not be improper to give some farther account of this Prince, who was two and forty years old at the time of the Battle of Hastings, and had now been three and thirty years Duke of Normandy. It will be necessary therefore, before we enter upon his Reign, to consider by what degrees Divine Providence rais'd him to the Throne of England, of which his Birth seem'd to give him no manner of prospect.

The Affairs
of Normandy from Rollo to William the Bastard.
Gul. Gerni-
tice.
Walsing.
Upodig.
Neustr.

Normandy, one of the largest and most considerable Provinces of France, was possess'd by the Normans ever since the forced Grant made by Charles the Simple to Rollo the Dane, the first Duke. Rollo and his immediate Successors, content with this noble Acquisition, were less solicitous about enlarging their Bounds, than securing the Possession to their Posterity. By means of numerous Colonies of their own Nation, who by reciprocal Marriages were incorporated with the Natives, they soon caus'd the two Nations to become one People under the common Name of Normans; for so the French call'd the Foreigners lately settled in Neustria, which from them took also the Name of Normandy. The first Dukes made it their principal care to gain the affection of their Subjects, by causing them to enjoy as much as possible, the sweets of Peace, and governing them with Justice and Equity. By this prudent conduct they not only destroyed the seeds of Rebellion, which might lurk in the hearts of the ancient Inhabitants; but also screen'd themselves from the secret Practices of the Kings of France, who griev'd to see so noble a Province torn from their Monarchy. Accordingly, when the French, at any favorable Juncture, attempted to recover it, they always found the Dukes of Normandy able to defend themselves with their own Forces, because they were assur'd of the People's affection.

From Rollo to William the Bastard there were seven Dukes, among whom Richard II, who was the fourth, was one of the most illustrious. His first Wife was Judith of Bretagne, by whom he had three Sons, Richard, Robert and William. After the Death of Judith, he made a double Alliance with Canute the Great, giving him his Sister Emma, Widow of Ethelred II, King of England, and taking himself Estrith Sister to that Prince. How honorable soever this Match might be, his Love of a young Damsel call'd Pavia, caus'd him to divorce Estrith and marry his Mistress. By this second Wife he had William Earl of Arques, and Mauger Archbishop of Roan.

After the death of this Prince, his Son Richard III succeeded him, notwithstanding the Endeavours of his younger Brother Robert to supplant him. Robert, not being able to accomplish his designs, was forced to desist; or rather, as some affirm, went a surer and more ready way to work. 'Tis said, he procur'd his Brother to be poisoned, who, after a Reign of two years, left him the possession of the Dukedom he had so ardently wish'd for. Whether Duke Robert's crime was never fully proved, or his just Government blotted out the remembrance of it, he found means to gain the affection of his People at home, by his Justice and Liberality, whilst his Valour made him respected abroad. By his aid it was that Henry I, King of France, took possession of the Throne, notwithstanding the Pretensions of Robert's younger Brother, who was supported by a powerful party. The Princess of Queen Constance their Mother, who espous'd the Interest of her youngest Son, obliging Henry to implore the assistance of the Duke of Normandy, he came to him at Roan, and obtained an Aid of five hundred Spear-Men. This first Aid was soon followed by a more considerable Supply, led by the Duke himself into France, where he plac'd Henry on the Throne, compelling the younger Brother to be satisfied with Burgundy. Henry, in a grateful sense of so great a Service, protest'd, he would have it in eternal remembrance: And to give him an effectual Proof of his Sincerity, annex'd to the Duchy of Normandy the Cities of Chamont and Pontijé, then in possession of the Crown of France.

It will not be proper here to enter into the particulars of Duke Robert's Wars with some rebellious Norman Lords, and with the Duke of Bretagne for refusing Homage. 'Tis sufficient to say in a word, he was successful in taming the Rebels, and reducing the Duke of Bretagne to his Duty. I have already mentioned his design of causing Justice to be done to his Cousins, Sons of Ethelred II, and how his Enterprize miscarried; wherefore it is needless to say any more of it.

It is hard to conceive why this Prince who was a Lover of his People, should never think of marrying, though he might plainly foresee, in case he died without Heirs, great Confusion and Troubles would ensue. There were in Normandy several Branches of the Ducal Family, who might pretend to the Succession if he died without Children. Consequently their several Pretensions would, very probably, occasion a Civil War, which Robert might prevent by marrying. Notwithstanding this, he was resolv'd to live single. One would be apt to think, this resolution was owing to his Insensibility for the fair Sex, had we not a proof to the contrary, in his passion for a young Damsel, with whose graceful Mein he was charmed as he saw her dancing. The Damsel, who was call'd Arlotta (2), a Skinner's Daughter of Falaise, thinking herself extremely honored by the Duke's Addresses, readily yielded to his Solicitations. 'Tis said the first night the Duke took her to his Bed, she dreamt her Bowels were extended over all Normandy and England. This Dream was very naturally interpreted afterwards, if it be true that it was not forged after the Event.

Malmsb.
Brompt.

Robert had by this Mistress a Son call'd William, of whom 'tis related, that, the Moment he was born, laying hold of some Straws, he held them so fast, that his Fift was forc'd to be unclinch'd before he would let them go. This made the good Women say, he would one day prove a great Acquirer, since he began so early. Robert educated his young Son with all imaginable care, designing him for his Successor. But whilst he was laying out his pains in his Education, the fancy took him to go in Pilgrimage to Jerusalem. This act of Devotion was look'd upon as the effect of his remorse for the murder of the Duke his Brother, and of his desire to atone for his Crime by this sort of Penance. Be this as it will, before he set out, he took all necessary measures to secure the Succession to his Bastard Son. He was very sensible how difficult it would be for young William to take possession, if the Normans were not prepar'd beforehand to acknowledge him. And therefore, he summon'd the States of Normandy, and communicating to them his design of going to the Holy Land, conjur'd them, in case he should never return, to receive, after his death, his young Son William for their Sovereign. The States did all that lay in their power to divert the Duke from his Journey; but finding, he was not to be prevail'd upon, gave him their Promise with an Oath, if any ill Accident befel him on the road, they would conform to his Will. To convince him of their Sincerity, they swore Fealty to William as the presumptive Heir of the Duke his Father. This Affair being settled to Robert's Satisfaction, he appointed Alain Duke of Bretagne, his Relation and Vassal, Senechal of Normandy, giving him power to govern, in his absence, with an absolute Authority. Then he carried his Son to Paris, and deliver'd him into the hands of the King of France, who took charge of his Education. Before he left the Court of France, he made young William do Homage to the King, as if he had been in actual possession of Normandy.

Chron. of Normandy.
Malmsb.

Robert prepares to go to Jerusalem.

Causes his Son William to be acknowledg'd his Successor.

Carries him to Paris.

(1) It consisted of fifty thousand Men, says P. Daniel, Hist. of France. Vol. III. p. 91, 92.

(2) From whence it is said came the Word Harlot. Malmsbury and Ingulphus say, Duke Robert took her to Wife. Malmsb. p. 95.

Troubles in Normandy.

The Absence of Duke Robert occasioned Troubles in his Dominions, which obliged the Duke of Bretagn to use some Severity, and exert the Authority he was intrusted with. But whilst he was earnestly endeavouring to restore Peace and Tranquillity, he was taken off by Poison. This Accident was soon followed with a Report of the Duke's being dead on the road. Notwithstanding the uncertainty of this News, it was the cause of Commotions so much the more dangerous, as there was no body in Normandy capable of appeasing them. They who had the Administration of Affairs in their hands, were themselves engaged in Factions, which had been forming ever since the Duke's departure, and thereby help'd to increase the Confusion.

Robert's
Death.

Whilst things were in this ill state, some of the Duke's Retinue arrived, and confirm'd the news of his death. Upon which several of the principal Lords, descended from the antient Dukes, began to cabal openly, to exclude the Bastard from the Succession. Plausible pretences were not wanting; but the States declared, they could not without Perjury violate the Oath they had bound themselves by. The Resolution being taken of acknowledging William for Sovereign, Ambassadors were dispatch'd to the King of France to demand the young Prince. After Henry was informed of the Duke of Normandy's Death, the Shame of doing an ill Action, and the desire of becoming master of Normandy, kept him in suspense. He was in hopes the Troubles of that Dukedom would turn to his advantage, and began to lay his Schemes accordingly. However, when he found the States of Normandy had declared in favour of William, he thought proper to defer the execution of his Designs, 'till a more convenient Season. He chose therefore to conceal his Intentions, and send home the young Prince. As soon as William came to Roan, the States swore Fealty to him, and gave him for Governor Raoul de Gace, Constable of Normandy.

William is acknowledged Duke of Normandy.

Great Troubles in Normandy.

Chron-
Norm.

The Troubles were not allay'd by the Arrival of the new Duke. The Lords who claimed the Ducal Crown, could not resolve to drop their Pretensions. They imagined the preferring a Bastard before them, was a manifest Injustice. But, as they who held the Reins of the Government, were Men of great prudence and interest, and thought to be supported by France, the Claimants durst not openly avow their designs. Mean time, King Henry burnt with desire to make an advantage of these dissensions. The death of Duke Robert made him forget the great Service received from that Prince. In fine, not being able to resist the Temptation any longer, he suddenly laid Siege to the Castle of Tilliers, to which he had some Pretensions. This Place being very strong and well provided with Ammunition, would have held out a long time, if the Duke's Ministers had not ordered the Governor to surrender it, on Condition the Castle should be demolished. Henry very readily agreed to these Terms, and commanded the Walls to be actually raz'd; but on some ambiguous Clause in the Capitulation, caused them to be immediately rebuilt. This good Success inspiring him with great hopes of his Enterprize, he seized also upon Argenton. Then marching to Falaise, he became master of the Town with the same ease. He would have made farther Progress, if Raoul de Gace, having drawn together a powerful Army, had not compelled him to retire. His retreat gave the Constable opportunity of retaking Falaise, the French not having time to lay in any Stores.

The King of France conquers Duke
William.

Revolt of Roger de Tiney.

As soon as the Claimants saw, the King of France, instead of protecting the young Duke, was making War against him, they began to stir again and prosecuted their respective Pretensions. The first that appeared, was Roger de Tresney, Standard-bearer of Normandy, descended from an Uncle of Rollo. This Lord, who had amass'd great Riches in Spain, where he had long bore Arms against the Saracens, returning home during Duke Robert's Absence, put himself at the head of one of the Factions that disturbed the State. As soon as he heard of that Prince's Death, he form'd the Project of seizing the Dukedom. But his Apprehension of the King of France's assisting Duke William prevented him then from pursuing his Designs. But this Apprehension being removed by the Proceedings of King Henry, he drew some Troops together, imagining the Duke's Forces would be sufficiently employed against France. But he was presently after defeated and slain by Roger de Beaumont, who commanded the Duke's Army.

Malm.

Revolt of the Earl of Arques.

William, Earl of Arques, Son of Richard II, by Pavia, was not discouraged by this Example. As he found himself supported by the King of France who put him upon action, he boldly sent a Defiance to the Duke. But the Duke, heading his Army in Person, push'd him so vigorously, that he compelled him to shut himself up in the City of Arques, where he besieged him. Henry, who had engaged the Earl in this Enterprize, thought himself obliged in Honour to raise the Siege. To this end he march'd into Normandy, where he received two Overthrows, and was constrained at last to abandon the Rebel, who, upon the City's being taken, was sent into Exile.

Guy of Burgundy, Son of a Daughter to Duke Richard II, was the next that appeared on the stage. He had concerted his measures so well, that he was like to have surpriz'd the Duke's Person, who was then at Albany without any Guard, ignorant of what was practising against him. But a certain Feal, whom the Conspirators did not mistrust, hearing their design, travel'd all night to give the Duke notice, who had but just time to put on his Cloaths, and ride full speed to Falaise. What haste ever he might make, he was so closely pursued, that he must have been taken, his Horse not being able to carry him thither, had he not been assisted by a Gentleman whom he accidentally met on the road. This Conspiracy seem'd to him so dangerous, that he applied to the King of France for Aid. Henry, either out of Generosity, or for some other unknown Reasons, being unwilling to suffer the young Prince to be oppress'd, brought him some Troops himself, which enabled him to give his Enemy Battle. Guy being vanquish'd and taken Prisoner, Duke William by an Act of Generosity, which redounded no less to his Honour than the Victory, freely gave him his Pardon.

William Guerland, Earl of Mertagne, and another William, Earl of Eu, Son to a natural Brother of Richard II, were likewise for attempting to dispossess the young Duke. But being prevented by his Diligence, they were sentenced to perpetual Banishment.

The Vigour and Conduct shown by Duke William during all these Troubles, made his Subjects conceive great Hopes of him. His Neighbours began also to consider him as a Prince of distinguished Merit, and capable in time of giving them trouble. The King of France, in particular, grew extremely jealous of him, and blamed himself exceedingly for assisting him against Guy of Burgundy; but to retrieve that Oversight, he raised him a fresh Enemy, the Earl of Anjou; whom however he only privately assisted at first. Afterwards he openly espoused his Quarrel, and made a fierce War upon the Duke, which lasted several Years, but in the end turned to the disadvantage of the two Allies. Duke William gaining two successive Battles, they sued for Peace, which the King of France could not obtain but by the Surrender of the Castle of Tilliers, taken by him during the Duke's Minority.

During this War, as the Duke was besieging Alençon, some of the Inhabitants came upon the Walls with Skins in their hands, by way of Reproach, for his Mother being a Skinner's Daughter. He was so provoked at this Insult, that he swore by the Splendor of God, his usual Oath, he would be reveng'd. Some time after, becoming master of the Town, he accomplish'd his Oath by putting out the Eyes, and cutting off the Hands and Feet of two and twenty of the insolent Burghers.

Henry died soon after this War. He was succeeded by Philip I. his Son, a Minor, under the Guardianship of Baldwin, the fifth Earl of Flanders; who had lately given his Daughter Matilda in Marriage to the Duke of Normandy. The relation the Regent stood in as well to the King his Pupil, as to the Duke his Son-in-law, made him take all necessary Precautions to keep up between the two Princes a good Understanding, which lasted many Years.

Duke William took this Opportunity to extinguish all remains of Rebellion among his Subjects. He banished great numbers, who, for the most part, retired into Apulia, to Robert Guiscard, a Norman Gentleman, who made then a great Figure in that Country (1). The Duke's Relations by his Father's Side giving him the most disturbance, he obliged almost all of them to quit Normandy. Their Estates being confiscated to his use, he enriched with them his Mother's Relations, who 'till then were but in mean Circumstances. Robert, his uterine Brother, had the Earldom of Mortagne, forfeited by William Guerland. Odo, his Brother, partook also of his Bounty, and moreover was made Bishop of Bayeux. Two of their Sisters were married to the Earls of Aumale and Albemarle.

Mauger his Uncle, Archbishop of Rouen, was not only concerned in all the Plots against the Duke, but had also the boldness to excommunicate him, on pretence of the too near Relation between him and Matilda his Wife (2). As soon as the Duke was in a state of Tranquillity, he resolved to be revenged on this Prelate. To that end, having assembled all the Bishops of Normandy at Lisieux, he caused him to be accused before them of several Misdemeanors, particularly, his selling the consecrated Chalice to supply his Luxury. Upon these Accusations, supported and Guy of Burgundy.

of the Normans.

and of the Earl of Eu.

League of the French King against the Duke of Anjou and Duke William.

The War
continued
many Years.

He chastises
the Insolence of the Men of Alençon.

Death of Henry I.
King of France.
Philip I. succeeded him.

Duke William banishes his Father's and enriches his Mother's Relations.

He deposes and excom-municates Mauger.

(1) The Normans made themselves Masters of Apulia, Calabria, Sicily, Normandy, and England, in less than two hundred Years.

(2) She was his first Cousin, being Daughter to Eleanor Duke William's Father's Sister.

with all the Duke's Interest, Mauger was solemnly deprived and Maorillus elected in his room.

Harold
Army Ed- ward.

After Duke William had thus humbled, or dispersed all that could create him any Disturbance, his Circumstances were such, that he might have spent his Days in profound Tranquillity, since he had nothing to fear either at Home or Abroad. But as he was of a covetous and ambitious Temper, this Tranquillity, which only procured him what he already enjoyed, was far from contenting him. It was probably with a view to new Acquisitions, that he went to visit King Edward his Cousin, who had no Children, and perhaps had given him some hopes of being his Heir. However this be, it is generally believed, Edward during the Duke's stay at the Court of England, promis'd him to make a Will in his favour. But though this Will never appeared, and no proof of it was ever produced by the Duke, it was however, according to all the Historians, the Pretence, used by him, to undertake the Conquest of England. Nevertheless, in the Manifesto published upon his Landing, he says not a Word of this same Will or Promise, of which he could not produce any Evidence. We have seen in the foregoing Book, what Duke William did to support his pretended Right 'till the Battle of Hastings. It is time now to see, how he improved the Success of that Day to mount the Throne of England, and the Methods he used to secure the possession in spite of all Opposition.

Harold
S. Dunelm.

It is easy to conceive the Consternation of the English, after the Loss of the Battle of Hastings, and the Death of their King. They were destitute of Men, Arms, and Ammunition; but chiefly of a Leader that had a Right to command them, and take Care of their present Wants. On the other hand, the victorious Normans were not far from London, the only place where necessary Measures could be taken to prevent the Calamities the Kingdom was threatened with. Harold's Sons were fled into Ireland. Edgar Atheling was too young, and besides of too narrow a Genius, to give them any prospect of Assistance in this their pressing Necessity. It is true, the Earls Morcar and Edwin were still alive, and retired to London with part of the fugitive Army. But to take proper Measures on such an occasion, more time was required than, probably, the Conqueror would afford them. Thus the Affairs of the English were in a terrible Confusion; all the Methods proposed to free them from Danger, being clogg'd with insurmountable Difficulties. On the other side, the Duke of Normandy, willing to make Advantage of the Terror of the English, was now marching towards London (1) to increase, by his approach, the Trouble and Confusion that prevailed in the Metropolis. But on a sudden he altered his Resolution: He considered, though the loss of a Battle had thrown the English into astonishment, yet there was no likelihood of their being entirely discouraged: That their Case not being yet desperate, they might easily bring into the Field fresh Armies, and try again more than once the fortune of War: That in such a case, should he chance to receive but one Overthrow, he had no-where to retreat to, nor any Opportunity of sending for supplies from Normandy. These Reflections made him resolve to besiege Dover, before he advanced any farther, to secure a Retreat in case of Necessity, and a Port, where his Convoys might easily come from Normandy. This Precaution, even after his Victory, is a clear Evidence of the Boldness, or rather Rashness of his Enterprize, since, had he been vanquished, he would not have had a single Spot in the Kingdom to retire to. He marched therefore directly to Dover, a Place naturally very strong, but that was become more so by the great Number of English Officers and Soldiers fled thither after the Battle. For this Reason it might have stood a long Siege; but the Consternation was so great, that it surrendered in a few Days. As soon as the Duke was in possession, he ordered the Town to be more strongly fortified, and spent eight Days there, to forward the Works. After which he marched for London (2).

W. Malms.

We find, in some Histories, that the Duke as he was marching at the Head of his Army, saw at a distance a great Multitude of People coming towards him with Boughs in their hands, who, looking like a moving Forest, at first somewhat alarmed him. But his Surprise ceased, when he found they were Deputies of the County of Kent, attended with great Crowds of People, who

Edgar's
Deputies to London.

were come to assure him of the Submission of the County, and withal to demand the Preservation of their ancient Privileges. They who relate this Adventure, add, the Duke received them very graciously, and granted their Request. But as William of Poitiers, who was then with the Duke, makes no mention of this Fact, there is reason to think it a Forgery (3).

Whilst the Duke was before Dover, or on his march towards the Thames, the Trouble and Confusion at London continually increased by the diversity of Opinions preventing them from coming to any Resolution. Some were for submitting to the Duke without loss of time: Others believed it more advisable to treat with him first, and procure some assurances for the Preservation of the Privileges, not only of the City, but the whole Kingdom. Some intimated, that things were not yet desperate; that the Winter, which was begun, might give them time to concert Measures for their Defence: and with this view laboured heartily to get Edgar Atheling placed on the Throne. Edwin and Morcar were at the head of this last Party. But, how great soever their Credit might be, it was not possible for them to carry their Point. All they could obtain of the Citizens, was, to shut the Gates against the Duke, 'till some Resolution was taken. Mean while, the Duke approaching the City, encamped in Southwark, separated from London by the Thames. He hoped his approach would oblige the Londoners to a voluntary Submission, and in that belief lay quiet some Days. This Proceeding had a quite contrary Effect to what he expected. Morcar and Edwin took this Opportunity to excite the People to take Arms and sally out to surprize the Normans, who were on the other side the Bridge. This sally, which was easily repulsed, convinced the Duke that other Measures were to be taken, and the City vigorously push'd, of which he could have but small hopes of being master, if he gave the Inhabitants time to recover out of their Consternation. However, he was under some Perplexity, as may well be thought, if it is considered, that although he had gained a Battle, he was still very far from his ends. He had but one single Castle, situated in the utmost Bounds of the Kingdom. All the rest of the Country was against him, and there were several remote Counties, where the English might draw an Army together without molestation. And indeed there was no advancing towards the middle of the Kingdom and leaving London behind him, without being exposed to manifest Danger, and losing the Communication with Dover, so absolutely necessary for him. On the other hand, it was hardly possible for him to undertake the Siege of London, during the Winter, besides that the situation of the City would have necessarily obliged him to leave a considerable Body of Troops on the South-side of the Thames, which would very much have weakened his Army. In fine, a Siege of that importance, which probably would have lasted several months, would have given the English time to recover, and raise Armies in other parts of the Kingdom. By which means he would have been obliged to conquer England inch by inch, as the Romans, Saxons, and Danes had done. But he was by no means in condition to maintain so tedious a War. He had therefore properly but one way to compass his ends; which was, to take Advantage of the Consternation of the Londoners, and oblige them, rather by terror than force, to submit to his Laws. With this view it was, that he posted himself at Wallingford, from whence he continually sent Detachments to ravage the Counties adjoining to London, in order to terrify the Citizens, cut off their Provisions, and prevent them from laying in Stores (4). At the same time, he caused Southwark to be reduced to Ashes, to let them see what they were to expect, if they obstinately persisted in the defence of the City. But perhaps all his Efforts would have been ineffectual, if the Clergy, who were at London, had not broken all the Measures Morcar and Edwin would have taken to crush his Designs.

Great Confusion at London
W. Pictav.

S. Dunelm.

The Duke approaches
London.

S. Dunelm.

Morcar and Edwin endeavour to place Edgar on the Throne.
Malmsb.

The Aim of these two Lords and some other zealous Assertors of their Country's Liberty, was to place Edgar Atheling on the Throne. They represented to the People, that the only way to avoid the present Danger, was first to come out of that state of Anarchy they were in: That, whilst there was nobody who had a right to command, it was impossible to take just measures to resist the Normans, now at their Gates: But as soon as there should be a King, he would send Orders into all Parts of the

(1) He marched in the first Place to Remsey, where he reposed himself on the Inhabitants for having killed some of his Men, who by mistake landed at that Place. W. Pictav.

(2) But lost in Dover his sick Men, who had many of them been taken with the bloody Flux, by reason of the too much fresh Meat they had eaten. W. Pictav. p. 204.

(3) This Story is repeated by William of Malmesbury (See X Scriptura) from a Manuscript History of the Monks of St. Augustine's Canterbury, written by Thomas Spot, who in all probability invented it to magnify the Value of their Abbey and of the Kingship. Tyler observes the improbability of it from the Green Boughs in the Beginning of Norman. But he also in his Treatise of Garrisons credits this Relation. However Pontassien says, That, not far from Dover, the People of Kent came, of their own accord, in to him, bore Fealty, and gave Homages; and the City of Canterbury sent Deputies to present him with her Submission.

(4) He reduced to his Obedience, and withal, the Counties of Suffolk, Hert, Hampshire, Surrey, Middlesex, and Hartfordshire, and did not cease burning Towns and killing Men, 'till he came to Bathampton. S. Dunelm. p. 123. Harold p. 25.

1066. Kingdom to levy Troops, and the Duke of Normandy would then find to his cost, the gaining a single Battle was not sufficient to render him Master of England; but in case they continued inactive, they could expect nothing but total Ruin, and to see the Kingdom fall under a foreign Yoke: In a word, that Prince Edgar had an uncontrollable Right to the Crown of England, and could not be refused possession without great Injustice. The Majority of the People approved the proposal of the two Earls; but the Clergy openly rejected it, not thinking proper to expose their Lands and Repose to the Chance of War. Edgar was little able to protect them. On the other hand, the Duke of Normandy had the name of a Religious Prince, well-disposed to the Church, and his Enterprize had received the Pope's Approbation. This was sufficient to oblige all the Clergy, who were then in London with the two Archbishops at their head, to cabal among the People in order to hinder Edgar's Election. They were in hopes, their Submission to the Duke of Normandy would turn to a better account than a War, which, in all appearance, would be of long continuance, in case a Resolution was taken to resist him. However this be, or whatever their Motive was, they made so strenuous an Opposition, that Edwin and Morcar despairing of success, retired into the North (1), imagining, it would be long before the Duke could follow them thither. They were no sooner gone, but Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, repaired to the Duke, then at Berkhamstead. He was quickly followed by Aldred Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Winchester (2), and at last by Prince Edgar, who suffered himself to be guided by their Counsels. The Duke received them in a very civil and courteous manner. He granted all their Requests, among which there were some that concerned the whole Nation: Nay, it is added, he confirmed his Promises by a solemn Oath. It is not known what were the Terms these Prelates obtained of the Duke; but it is to be presumed, the Church's Interest were not forgotten. Be this as it will, they swore Fealty to the Duke, as if he were already their Sovereign, and induced Prince Edgar to do the same. Their Example influencing many Persons of Distinction, in a few days the Londoners found themselves destitute of the assistance of those they could chiefly rely on, in case they resolved upon a vigorous Defence.

The Clergy oppose the Duke's claim.

The two Archbishops and Prince Edgar submit to the Duke.

The Duke approaches London.

The Keys are delivered to him.

The Crown is offered him.

He hesitates to take it.

He accepts of it.

sign of his being persuaded of that Right. And indeed, what Authority could the Magistrates of London and a few Bishops and Lay-Lords have to dispose of the Crown without the Concurrence of the Estates? Notwithstanding the essential Defect in this precipitate Election, the Duke appointed Christmas-Day following for the Ceremony of his Coronation. Mean while, as this Solemnity was to be performed at London, the Inhabitants whereof he suspected, he ordered a Fortress to be run up in haste, which he garrisoned with Normans.

Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, was then suspended by the Pope, as an Intruder into that See, in the room of Robert, who was never canonically deprived. But notwithstanding this Suspension, he exercised the Archiepiscopal Function, the English not being yet convinced, the Pope's Power was so extensive as he pretended. However, the Duke who was obliged to the Pope, and besides was willing to avoid the Objections that might be made to his Coronation, if performed by a suspending Bishop, would not receive the Crown from the hands of Stigand. Aldred therefore, Archbishop of York, performed the Ceremony. Before he set the Crown on his head, the Archbishop, addressing to the English, asked them, whether they would have the Duke of Normandy for their King? All the People consenting by their Acclamations, the Bishop of Constance put the same question to the Normans, who answered in the same manner as the English (3). This last Circumstance evidently shows the Duke had even then resolved to make the English and Normans but one and the same People. Otherwise, there was no occasion to ask the Consent of the Normans, to make him King of England. What followed, plainly discovered this to be his real intention. The Archbishop of York, continuing the Ceremony, placed the Duke on the Throne, and administered to him the Oath usually taken by the Saxon Kings. The Substance of the Oath, was, "That he would protect the Church and its Ministers; That he would govern the Nation with equity; That he would enact just Laws, and cause them to be strictly observed; and that he would forbid all Rapines and unjust Judgments." Malmshury adds, he promised to behave himself mercifully to his Subjects, and govern the English and Normans by the same Laws (4). If this Historian do not deceive us, it may be inferred from this last Article, that this Prince had already determined to settle the Normans in England. There are Writers however that affirm, King William took no Oath at all, as unwilling to be bound to receive Law from a conquered Nation. But very probably they are mistaken. King William accepted the Crown as a Gift, and consequently had no reason to dispense with the usual Oath. In the next place, only the Londoners can be said to have acknowledg'd him for Sovereign. All the rest of the Kingdom being still to conquer, what likelihood is there that a Prince of his Abilities should, at such a juncture, let the English see he intended to rule with an arbitrary Sway. In fine, tho' the Surname of Conqueror is given him, it is certain, he never openly pretended to possess the Crown by right of Conquest, but rather, took great care that this Title should never be clearly explained.

Among the things which, contrary to all appearance, promoted the execution of King William's Undertaking, That which I am now going to relate, is one of the most surprising. He had indeed gained a Battle, which gave him Opportunity of approaching London; and tho' he could scarce have taken that City, if the Citizens and the rest of the Kingdom would have done their Duty, the Gates were opened to him, and the Crown set on his head. But as he was crowned without the Advice and Consent of the rest of the Kingdom, he still seemed to have a great deal to do to compleat the Conquest of a Country that resisted whole Ages, the Arms of the Romans, Saxons and Danes. And yet, as soon as it was known that he was crowned at London, all the rest of England submitted to the new Sovereign, without any one offering to dispute with him the possession of a Crown, which no body knew by what Title he could claim. Probably, if the English had resolved to elect a King of their Nation, whether Edgar or any other, King William would have still found many difficulties to surmount. Let us suppose, for a moment, this King to have drawn together an Army in some remote place from London, what a Perplexity would King William have been under? He could not have removed from London and Dover, without a manifest Hazard of losing the capital City; nor have staid at London without giving the Enemies Army time to increase. The bare mention of this consideration sufficiently shows how fortunate King William was 1066.

He comes to W. Pictav.

Ingulph.

Taken from the original MSS. of the History of King William the First.

Malmsh. p. 271.

Brady.

(1) While the rest were preparing for Battle Edwin and Morcar withdrew with their Forces, and returned home. S. Dunelm. p. 195. Euseb. p. 901.

(2) The ancient Historians do not mention him; but only say, That William Bishop of Worcester, Walter Bishop of Hereford, and the most eminent Person in London, with several others, repaired to him; and giving Hosiage submitted, and were Fealty to him; and he entered into a Covenant with them, — cum quibus & prelatibus populo. — S. Lamb. p. 19. Harl. p. 450.

(3) Thus William was elected King. — electus in Regem. W. Pictav. p. 200. — Rex conclamatus — Malmsh. p. 102 M. Paris. p. 4.

(4) — Quod ille modestiora Subjectis gereret, & apud jure Angles qu. Francos tractaret. Malmsh. p. 271.

1066. to meet with no opposition. The Reader, of his own accord, may reflect on a thousand difficulties King William would have found in his way, if the English had determined, even after the Battle of Hastings, to make a vigorous stand. Most certainly, the more this Enterprize with all its consequences are considered, the more extraordinary and almost supernatural it appears.

1067. The new King's first care after his Coronation, was to seize on the Treasure laid up by Harold at Winchester. He distributed part among the principal Officers of his Army, and part to the Churches and Monasteries, to gain the reputation of a pious and religious Prince. The Pope had also a share, whether he had lent the King Money, or the King was willing to show his Gratitude for Favours received, when he embarked in this Enterprize. At the same time, he sent to Rome the late King's Standard, as a sort of Homage to the Holy See, and a Testimony that the Conquest of England was undertaken with the Pope's approbation. Harold's Treasures being thus distributed, ways and means were to be devised to fill the new King's Coffers. To this end, it was intimated to the Cities, Corporations, and most wealthy of the Subjects, that it would not be amiss to gain the Good-will of their new Master by some Presents. Every one cheerfully consenting, these Presents yielded the King a very considerable Sum.

The King's moderation to the English, in the beginning of his Reign, gave them room to hope they were going to enjoy a solid Happiness under the Government of a Prince who seemed to have their Interests at heart. Indeed he exhorted the principal Officers of his Army to treat the Vanquished with the Moderation due from one Christian to another. He entreated them to refrain from all kind of Insults to the English, lest by Injuries they should be provoked to revolt. As for the inferior Officers and Soldiers, he published severe Orders against such as should violate the Chastity of the Women, or give the least cause of complaint to the Natives. Then he confirmed by a publick Edict the People's Privileges, and all the Promises he had made in that respect. If we were to judge of Princes by their Manifestos, or the expressions in their Edicts, we should be apt to imagine, they always make Justice and Equity the sole Rule of their Conduct. But their Actions too frequently ill correspond with their Words. These sorts of publick Acts seldom fail however of producing a present Effect, which is generally the only end proposed. King William found the English disposed to trust to his magnificent Promises. They were so far from taking any measures for the Preservation of their Liberties, that they suffered themselves to be seduced by this seeming Indulgence. These happy beginnings made them believe, the Conqueror, in imitation of Canute the Great, who behaved in the same manner, would use his utmost endeavours to gain the People's Affection, that he might enjoy his Conquest in Peace.

How great a regard soever the King showed for the English, he could not forbear mistrusting them, persuaded as he was, that their Submission proceeded rather from fear than good-will. A few days after his Coronation he retired from London to Berking (1), not daring to stay in that great City, whose Fidelity he suspected. But as he was not more sure of the rest of the Nation, he placed strong Garrisons in Hastings, Dover, and Winchester, to take away from the English the desire of shaking off their new Yoke. Mean while, these Precautions had no ill effect on their Minds. They considered them as absolutely necessary, in the beginning of so great a Revolution, and were not at all alarmed at them. On the contrary, they who had hitherto refused to acknowledge the new King, came and submitted to him in Crowds. Edwin and Morcar, who had begun to concert measures for the Defence of their Country, altered all their Projects. As they were convinced of the King's Sincerity, like the rest of their Countrymen, they went and swore fealty to him at Berking (2). He forgot nothing that could help to keep them in his mind. He not only assured them of his Protection, but even in their presence bestowed on Prince Edgar large Possessions (3), who was the Idol of the English, and generally stiled England's Darling.

The Victory of Hastings was too glorious for the King to neglect to transmit the Memory of it to Posterity. For that purpose he laid the Foundations of a Church and Abbey, in the very place where Harold was slain (4), and ordered, when they should be finished, the Church to be dedicated to St. Martin (5), and the Monastery called Battle-Abbey (6). Though the desire of Prayers for his own and Harold's Soul was the Pretence he used to make this Foundation, probably Vain-Glory had no less a share in it than Devotion. The three first months of this new Reign passed in this manner to the mutual Satisfaction of the English and Normans. The former believed they were no great Losers by the great Revolution, and the latter liv'd in hopes the King would perform the Promises made them, when they engaged in his Service.

King William's Precautions procuring him an universal Submission, he thought his happiness incomplete, if he had not the pleasure to go to Normandy, and appear in his new Grandeur. This Journey was not only unnecessary, but seemingly very dangerous, in the beginning of an Empire established by Arms. He imagined however he could prevent all Revolts during his absence by two Precautions. First, by placing strong Norman Garrisons in all the Castles. Secondly, by carrying along with him such of the English Lords as were most suspected. Of this number were Prince Edgar, Stigand, Morcar, Edwin, Waltheof Son of Seward, formerly Earl of Northumberland, with several others of the prime Nobility. These Lords were not over-pleased with the Honour he did them, being sensible he carried them into Normandy but as so many Hostages, and to add to the Glory of his Triumph. However, they were forced to comply, for fear of giving him occasion to suspect them by an unreasonable Opposition to his Will. Before he left England, he committed the Government of the Kingdom to his Brother Odo Bishop of Bayeux, and William Fitz-Osbern (7). There was no end of the Rejoicings among his old Subjects upon his arrival in Normandy. He spent his Easter (8) at Fescamp, where the French Ambassador (9), attended with a numerous Retinue of Nobles, came to congratulate him in his Master's Name upon his new Dignity. On this occasion, the King affected to appear before the French with all the magnificence he thought capable of advancing the Lustre of his Glory. He passed all that Summer, and part of the following Winter in Normandy, where he seemed to forget his New, amidst the Acclamations of his Old Subjects.

Whilst he was giving the Normans marks of his Affection by his stay among them, his Absence proved fatal to England. Odo his Brother, and William Fitz-Osbern, who governed the Kingdom, abused their Authority without any discretion (10). Wholly taken up with enriching themselves by all manner of means, instead of protecting the English who made their complaints to them, they not only suffered them to be grieved with a thousand Injustices, but oppressed them by continual Acts of Tyranny themselves. To see these two Regents proceed with so little caution, one would have thought they had Orders to stir up the People to revolt, on purpose to make them incur the Punishment. The most prudent however preserved their Allegiance, in a belief that the King, at his return, would rectify these Disorders. But others, more impatient, were of opinion, they ought to take the advantage of his

(1) Where he spent his Time in rural Sports, until the Fortrefs he had begun in London was finished. W. Pictav.

(2) St. Dunelm and Harold say, That they swore Fealty to him at Berkhamsted, with Alfred and the rest. St. Dunelm p. 107. Hæd. p. 450. With Edwin and Morcar came many other Noblemen of great Estates, particularly Earl Gyff, to all of which he restored their Estates, and having taken their voluntary Oaths of Fidelity, received them into his Favour. After this he made a Progress into several Parts of the Kingdom, ordering every where such things as were not only profitable to himself, but for his People in general; looking upon the common People with a benign Aspect, pitying their Condition, and ordering his Men to treat them with Mercy. W. Pictav.

(3) And likewise gave Lands to many of the English, as a Token of his Royal Bounty: He also distributed great Rewards to many of his Followers; but however did not, for that purpose, take any thing unjustly from the English. Nulli tamen Gallo datum est quid Anglo eorum injuria fuerit ablatum. W. Pictav.

(4) The High-Altar was set upon that very spot of Ground, where Harold's Body was found; or, according to others, where his Standard was taken up. Tyrol. p. 13.

(5) To St. Mary and St. Martin. It was filled with Benedictin Monks from the greater Monastery of Winchester, and was exempted from all Episcopal Jurisdiction whatsover. Tyrol. p. 13. See William's Charter to it in Monach. Anglican. and Selden's Notes on Examen p. 105.

(6) In the Abbey was kept an ancient List of all the Noble Families that came over with King William, it was called Battle-Abbey Roll, at which St. Dunelm and Hillingford have given us Copies, tho' with some little Difference. The Authority of this Roll (tho' it hath been crept up by some People) is so very indifferent, that it cannot be depended upon. "There are, says the learned St. William Dugdale, great Errors or rather Falsifications in most of the Copies of it; by attributing the Derivation of many from the French, who were not at all of such Extraction, but merely English. For men hath been the Subtlety of some Monks of old, that, finding it acceptable unto men, to be reputed Descendants to those who were Companions with Duke William in his Expedition, therefore to gratify them, they inserted their Names into that ancient Catalogue." Preface to the first Volume of his Baronage.

(7) Odo was placed in Dover-Castle, and had the Government of Kent, with the adjoining South-Coast; and Fitz-Osbern at Winchester, in the Castle the King had built there, with Directions to look after the North-Parts.

(8) Regin. by mistake, says his Christmas; but that could not be, since he went over in March, and returned again to England in the beginning of the Winter following. Gu. Pictav.

(9) Rehob the Potent, Father-in-law to the King of France.

(10) Regin. here follows the account of Odo and Fitz-Osbern, which is the most probable. W. Pictav. lays the blame on the English, and says they could neither by fear or favour be kept quiet.

1067.
Gemet.

Absence to attempt the recovering of his Liberty. The Kentishmen led the way, and called to their assistance Eustace Earl of Boulogne, who endeavoured to surprize Dover-Castle (1). But not succeeding according to his expectation, he retired to his Ships, leaving the Kentishmen to the mercy of the Regents, who treated them very severely.

Edric's Revolt.
Flor. Wor.
Hoved.
The King
returns.

Notwithstanding this Example, Edric, an English Lord (2), to whom Historians give the Surname of Forester, took up Arms in the County of Hereford, and barbarously used all the Normans that fell into his hands. News being brought the King he immediately embarks for England (3), committing the Government of Normandy to Matilda his Wife, and Robert his eldest Son. His return appeased the Storm raised by his Absence. But these two Attempts filled him with so many Suspicions of all the English in general, that he began from that time to consider them as so many secret Enemies, who fought an occasion to revolt. This Opinion of his was not groundless. When one considers his Temper, and how the English stood affected towards him, it is easy to conceive, the mutual Confidence, necessary for their common Tranquillity, could hardly subsist. The King was naturally mistrustful and rigid. On the other hand, his great Armament had plung'd him deeply in debt. Besides, he was under a Promise of liberally rewarding the Officers who had engag'd in his Service, and all this must be done at the expence of the English. To this may be added, he was naturally covetous, greedy of money, not to expend but hoard it in his coffers. In fine, his Partiality to his own Nation was excessive, and prevented him often from giving ear to the complaints of the English against the Normans, who made a very ill use of the King's favour. On the other side the English were extremely prejudiced against the Normans. This Prejudice, begun in the reign of King Edward, and fomented by Earl Godwin and his Son Harold, was farther encreased since the late Revolution. How careful soever the King was to recommend Moderation to the Normans, there was no hindering them from abusing the Superiority, their Victory gave them over the English, and insulting them in their misfortunes. This was not very proper to maintain a good intelligence between the two Nations. Besides, the King had built his Right to the Crown upon so slight a foundation, that the English must have considered him as a greedy and ambitious Prince, who had formed the project of his enterprise upon England, from the sole motive of gratifying his Passions. In a word, the Administration of the two Regents during his Absence, gave occasion to think, they would not have carried their Excesses and Rapines to that height, had they not been assured of their Master's approbation. However, the consideration of the mildness of his Government for the three first months of his Reign, had in some measure caused these Reflections to vanish, and dissipated all their Fears. But when they found, after his return, he not only neglected to punish the Regents, but even approved of their conduct, they could not contain any longer. They every where spread their Complaints and Murmurs, and openly shewed their Discontent. Then it was, that the King's Suspicions daily increasing, made him resolve to be on his guard, and use all possible means to prevent the Discontent of the English from breaking out into a flame. As his Temper inclined him to Severity, his methods were rigorous. To which he was also prompted by the Normans, whose Interest it was that he should subdue the English by Force, rather than gain them by fair means. This is the most that can be said in his favour, though there are some, who charge him with a settled Design of reducing England to a state of Slavery, before ever he received any provocation. Be this as it will, the Confidence between the King and his new Subjects was soon broken (4), and from that time the King thought only of using all proper means to establish himself on the Throne, without nicely examining whether those means were consonant to Justice and Equity.

Brady.

Matilda is crowned.
Birth of Prince
Henry.
Flor. Wor.
S. Dunelm.

Not long after the King's return (5), Matilda his Queen came into England, and was crowned with great solemnity, this same year she brought into the world a Son, named Henry. Her other Sons were born in Normandy, namely,

Robert, Richard and William, the eldest of whom was about twelve years old.

The King had hitherto delayed to satisfy those who had voluntarily assisted him in his Expedition into England. Besides the Stipends due to them, they expected to be rewarded in proportion to their Services, and the Power he had acquired by their means. His ordinary Revenues not being sufficient for this, there was a necessity of having recourse to the English, whose misfortune it was to be vanquished. To this end, he bethought himself of an expedient, which could not but be very ungrateful to them. And that was, to revive Dane-gelt (6), abolished by the Confessor, which brought to their remembrance the Calamities they had suffered under a foreign Power. He plainly foresaw, the People would be extremely dissatisfied, and therefore endeavoured to prevent the ill Effects of their Discontent, by caressing the principal English Lords, as far as his reserved Temper would permit. He was most apprehensive of Earl Edwin, who by his Birth, Honours, and personal Merit was in great credit with his Countrymen. In order to prevent the Earl's using the present occasion to raise new Commotions, he thought proper to secure him to his Interest, by promising him one of his Daughters in marriage. Edwin was very well pleased with the Offer, and instead of fomenting the dissatisfaction of the English, did all he could to appease them. Aldred, Archbishop of York, was not so easily managed. This Prelate had entertained so great an Opinion of the King, that he was continually speaking in his praise. But when he saw him begin to pull off the mask, by renewing a Tax so odious to the Nation, he was quite of another mind. He sent one to represent to him in his name, the Injury he was doing the English, and the Inconveniences that might follow. The King was offended with this Remonstrance, and sharply rebuked the Person that dar'd to deliver it. 'Tis said, Aldred was so sensibly touch'd with this Proceeding, that he could not forbear cursing the King and all his Race. There was danger of the Archbishop's Resentment occasioning some Troubles in the North. At least the King seemed to be uneasy on that account, by his sending one of his Officers to endeavour to appease him. But the death of Aldred, which happened at that time, freed the King from his fears, and Dane-gelt was levied with all the rigour imaginable. From thence-forward nothing was heard but Murmurings and Complaints, which incensing the King, caused him to consider the English but as so many Rebels, as they, on their side, look'd upon him under the odious Idea of a Conqueror.

Before I enter upon the relation of the Troubles in this Reign, it will be proper to remark, the Historians are very much divided concerning the Causes that produced them. Some cast the blame on the English, and intimate the King used not Severity till he found milder means were ineffectual. Others maintain, the King's ill usage of the English was the sole cause of their Revolts. To decide this Question, it would be necessary to examine the Extent of a Prince's Power that had acquired the possession of the Crown in the manner we have seen, and how far the Obedience of a Nation was due, who had submitted partly by compulsion, partly of their own accord. But upon these very Points, there would be perhaps no less diversity of Opinions. 'Tis sufficient therefore to observe, that among the Historians who have writ of William the Conqueror, some have studiously displayed all his good Qualities, and but slightly touched upon his Faults. Others have endeavoured to misrepresent all his Actions, and aggravate even such as may be easily justified. So far is certain, the English were ill-treated in his Reign. This the greatest Sticklers for the Conqueror and his Race cannot deny, but alledge in his excuse, the necessity he was under of guarding against the English, ever prone to revolt. Others, on the contrary, ascribe the ill treatment of the English solely to the avaricious Temper of the King, and affirm, their Revolts were entirely owing to their Despair. Amidst these various Opinions, the course I shall take, will be, plainly to relate such Facts as are uncontested, without making any Reflections, that the Reader may be at liberty to judge as he shall think proper.

As matters stood between the King and the English, it was very hard for them to sit still and not endeavour to

(1) He came over in the Night, but the Garrison falling out, and driving most of his Men down the Precipices, he was forced to retire with a few Men. W. Gemetensj. p. 667. Walsingh. Ypodigma. p. 436.

(2) Son of Alfice, Edric Steven's Brother. Richard Fitz-Scearp, and the Norman Garrison at Hereford, wasted his Estate, because he would not submit to King William, but was always forced to retire with great Loss: Therefore the better to secure himself against the Normans for the future, he called in to his Assistance Eliethyn and Rywallan, Princes of Wales; and about the middle of August, invaded and pillaged the County of Hereford. Flor. Wigorn. p. 635. S. Dunelm. p. 197. M. West.

(3) About the beginning of Winter, and landed at Wimborne, from whence he went to London, where he was received with all Signs of Respect: He then treated the English Bishops and Nobility with great Affability and outward Kindness, granting them whatsoever they asked, and readily hearing what they offered to him; he also valed the Welsh. Ord. Vitalis. p. 509.

(4) William Gemetensj says, That after William's Return out of Normandy, there was discovered a Conspiracy of certain English, who had contrived to destroy him and his Followers, as they were to go to Church bare-foot on Asb-Wednesday; but the Conspirators being discovered, fled into the North. L. 7. c. 39. Walsingh. Ypodigma. p. 437.

(5) The next Year, after Easter. She was crowned on Whitsunday, 1068. by Alfred Archbishop of York. S. Dunelm. p. 197. M. West.

(6) The ancient Historians only say, that he imposed on his Subjects an intolerable Tribute—importabile tributum—Flor. Wigorn. p. 635. S. Dunelm. p. 197. Hoved. Brompt. p. 663.

1068.
Exeter revolved.

shake off a foreign Yoke, which to them seem'd insupportable. The Insurrections began in the Western Parts, where the Inhabitants of Exeter refused to take their Oath to the King and admit a Norman Garrison (1). William, sensible of what importance it was to put a stop to this Evil before it spread any farther, marched in the midst of Winter to reduce Exeter to obedience. Upon his Approach, he was met by some of the principal Citizens, to petition him for Pardon in the Name of the Corporation, and give him Hostages. But, whilst the Deputies were with the King, the ordinary sort of Townsmen being superior, disapproved of their Proceedings, and resolv'd to stand upon their defence. Githa, Mother to King Harold, who was then in the City, encouraged the Inhabitants in their resolution, and probably, was the Person that put them upon it. Mean time, the King being too far advanced to retire with Honour, found himself oblig'd to besiege the Town in form, notwithstanding the sharpness of the Winter. The Approaches being made, and the battering Engines beginning to play, the Citizens saw no other Remedy but to implore the King's mercy. How much soever the King was bent to make an Example of them, he yielded to the Intreaties of the Clergy, who were very urgent for their Pardon (2). Githa had the good Fortune to escape into Flanders with a great quantity of Money. To prevent a second Insurrection, William ordered a Castle to be built in the City, and left it to the care and management of Baldwin, Son of Earl Gilbert, with a Norman Garrison.

The King and are pardoned.The King builds a Castle.He takes care to pay his Debts.

W. Pictav.

The King could no longer delay the Payment of his Debts, and the Rewards so often promised to his Troops. The Sums rais'd by the late Tax of Dane-gelt, which at first were design'd for this Use, had been paid into the King's Treasury, and he could not bear the thoughts of parting with the Money again. He believ'd it absolutely necessary to have a Reserve upon any sudden occasion; especially as the Discontents of the English gave him room to dread a general Revolt. And therefore, without meddling with that Money, other means were to be us'd, which very much inflamed the Discontent of the English. Commissioners were sent into all the Counties, to enquire who sided with Harold, and confiscate their Estates. The English loudly exclaimed against this seemingly very unjust Enquiry. They alledg'd, when they took Arms for Harold, that Prince was in actual Possession of the Throne, having been elected at a time when William's Pretensions to the Crown were even unknown. That before the Battle of Hastings, they had never taken their Oath to the Duke of Normandy, and consequently their Estates could not be liable to Confiscation for bearing Arms against him. That beside, supposing they were guilty, they had made ample amends for their Fault by ready Submission, which the King had accepted of; and even promis'd to protect them in their Rights and Privileges. These Reasons were very strong. But on this occasion, the King acted with a view to Politicks rather than Justice. His intent was not to punish them for their pretended Crime, but to have a plausible pretence to raise Money, and withal to put it out of their Power to hurt him, by depriving them of their Estates, a thing, he judg'd absolutely necessary for his Safety and Quiet. Accordingly this Fact is slightly pass'd over by the King's Friends, and by way of Diversion, an Act of Justice done by the King on this occasion, is mightily extolled, namely, the restoring a confiscated Estate to an English Lord, who prov'd he was never in Arms for Harold (3). However, we may be assur'd, this was one of the most remarkable Events of this Reign, since the confiscated Lands pass'd into the hands of the Normans and other Foreigners, who thereby became more considerable in England than the English themselves. From these defended many noble Families now in being. However this be, these Confiscations were of great Service to the King upon two accounts. First, as they enabled him to pay his Debts, and reward his Followers. Secondly, as they gave him an opportunity of filling the Counties with such as were devoted to him, and whose Interest it was to support him in the Throne.

1068.

Whilst the King was thus guarding against the English, Edwin and Morcar revolt. he daily forfeited their esteem and affection, and naturally led them to devise means for the Recovery of their Estates. Edwin, Earl of Chester, one of the most considerable among them, thought it his duty to attempt the restoring of the almost desperate Affairs of his Country. The King had amus'd him with hopes of one of his Daughters; but there was no likelihood he intended to perform his word. On the contrary, the King seem'd to want only some pretence to involve him in the same Ruin with the rest. Morcar, his Brother, Earl of Northumberland, who was in much the same situation, very readily engaged in the Plot. As these two Lords had a very great interest in the Kingdom, they soon rais'd an Army which was reinforced by Blethwin King of Wales, their Nephew, with a good number of Troops (4). The King had reason to fear this Revolt would become general, unless he timely oppos'd its beginnings. Accordingly he drew his Forces together with the utmost expedition, before the Evil spread any farther. In his march towards the Rebels, he fortified the Castle of Warwick, and made Henry de Beaumont Governour, who was also the first Earl of Warwick (5). At the same time he built likewise Nottingham-Castle (6), to secure a Retreat in case of necessity, by means of these two Places. Having taken these Precautions, he continued his march towards the North, to engage the Rebels, or besiege York, which had sided with them.

Vital.
Sax Ann.
S. Dunelm.Brady.
The King marches against them.He builds Castles.Edwin and Morcar dissent, and are pardoned.

Mean time, the two Earls hoping the rest of the Kingdom would follow the Example of the North, were very much deceiv'd in their expectations. The King's great Diligence, and the Superiority of his Forces breaking all their measures, they found themselves unable to resist him. In this extremity, they had but two ways to take, either to fly the Kingdom, or submit to the King's mercy. They chose the last, and found their account in it. How much soever the King might be incens'd, he very readily pardon'd them, with a view to reclaim the English by this act of clemency. He pursu'd however his march towards York, the Inhabitants whereof, little able to sustain the Burden of the War alone, came out to meet him, and deliver'd up the Keys of their City. By this Submission they were pardon'd as to corporal Punishments; but were forced to pay a large Fine, and had the mortification to see a Castle built in their City (7), and garrisoned with Norman Soldiers. Archil, a Northumbrian Lord, who had been concern'd in the Revolt, was also receiv'd into Favour upon delivering his Son in Hostage (8). Egelwin, Bishop of Durham, made his Peace likewise upon the same account (9).

York surrenders;
where the King builds a Castle.

The King's Clemency to the Heads of the Rebels might have had a good effect, if at the same time that he pardon'd some, he had not punish'd others who were much less guilty. He order'd great Numbers to be shut up in Prison, who had no hand at all in the late Insurrection (10), and thereby gave occasion to think the Mercy shewn to the Leaders was only a strain of his Policy. This Conduct spread a Terror throughout the Kingdom, which was still encreas'd, when Castles were seen building at Lincoln, Huntington, Cambridge, which were evidently design'd to keep the English in awe. Morcar and the other Northumbrian Lords (11), dreading their Punishment was only deferr'd till a more convenient season, retir'd into Scotland. Earl Goffric was under the same Apprehensions, and instilled them into Prince Edgar, who by his advice, fled to the Court of Scotland, with his Mother and Sisters (12). Malcolm Canmore (13), who was then on the Throne, receiv'd them with the Respect due to their Rank, and considering their

The King's Clemency seems doubtful.He builds Castles in several places.Several Lords with Prince Edgar retire into Scotland.
S. Dunelm.
M. Paris.

(1) Though they offer'd to pay him Tribute. Tyrol, p. 16.

(2) They had then Guards secur'd from the Violence of the Soldiers, by placing Guards at the Gates to keep them out. Ibid.

(3) Sharnburn in North, which the Conqueror had given to Warren the Norman. But Edwin, the Lord of it, proving he had not sided with Harold, it was restor'd to him. Tyrol calls this Fact in question, because this Estate is not mention'd in Domesday-Book, as in Possession of the said Warren, introduced to Vol. II. p. 51, 52.

(4) Blethwin, son of Baldwin's Father married Ethelga, Edwin's Sister, after whose Death he was married to Harold. Ord. Vit. 311.

(5) He was Brother of Rogeville de Montre, Son to Harold de Vaulx, Son of Turk of Pont Ademar, by Wicca. He was call'd Henry of Newburgh, from the Place of his Birth, a Castle in Normandy, and was made Earl of Warwick, after the Survey. Gomet l. 7. c. 4.

(6) And gave the Custody of it to William Ponder.

(7) He built two Castles there, in which he put five hundred Soldiers. S. Dunelm p. 197. Hoved p. 450.

(8) Archil married Sigrid, Daughter of Ælfred, Bishop of Durham. This Archil seiz'd part of Northumberland that was waste, and inhabited it. By Sigrid he had a Son, nam'd Goffpatrick, and he another of that Name, afterwards Earl of Northumberland. S. Dunelm p. 300. 34.

(9) And by his Mediation, Conditions of Peace were offer'd to Malcolm King of Scots, which he accepting, a Peace was concluded between the two Kings. Ord. Vital.

(10) And the Lands of those who were concern'd in it, he plentifully distributed among his Followers, that had assist'd him at the Battle of Hastings. As for the little which was left to the ancient Inhabitants, he put it under the Yoke of perpetual Servitude, that is, encumber'd it with Knight's Service, M. Paris, p. 4. M. Wals. p. 225. Brompt. p. 965. Tyrol, p. 16, 17. Vol. II.

(11) Malcolmein, Morcar, Wickars, and other Lords, as well as Bishops, Clergy, and others, afraid of being imprison'd on account of the late Insurrection, retir'd, some to the King of Scots, others into Woods and Deserts, from whence they frequently sallied out, and annoy'd the Normans, who were possess'd of their Estates. M. Paris, p. 4. S. Dunelm p. 197. Brompt. p. 965.

(12) He embark'd, with his Mother Margaret and Christina, in order to return into Hungary, his native Place; but was driven by a Storm into Scotland, where he said. M. Paris, p. 4. Brompt. p. 965. Knigh-ton, p. 2344.

(13) Rapin, by Mistake, says Macmure. See Baobanan, &c. David Scott, &c.

1068.

Sax. Ann. Malcolm marries Edgar's Sister.

Birth rather than their Fortune, married soon after Margaret Edgar's eldest Sister. From this marriage sprung Matilda, Grandmother to Henry II. King of England, in whose Person the Saxon and Norman Royal Families were united.

1069.

The King takes from the English their Arms, and clothes the Curfew.

Pcl. Vng.

The King was not sorry to see himself thus rid of his secret Enemies, who gave him much less uneasiness being in Scotland, than if they had staid in England. However, the Flight of these Lords discovering how the English stood affected towards him, he resolved to take all possible measures to screen himself from their Resentment. For that purpose, he took two Precautions which were equally insupportable to them. The first was to take away their Arms (1). The second to forbid them any Lights in their Houses after eight a-Clock. At which hour a Bell was rung to warn them to put out their Fire and Candle, under the penalty of a great Fine for every offence. The sound of this Bell, called the Curfew, was for a long while very grating in the ears of the English. When they reflected on the Sweetness of Liberty, enjoyed under their antient Kings, they could not without extreme Grief behold themselves reduced to such Slavery. If this Order was not most punctually observed, they were sure to be immediately punished as if guilty of some heinous Crime. This Bell therefore was as a Signal, which being repeated every day, constantly put them in mind of their Slavery. This Oppression joined to a thousand others which they daily suffered from the hands of the King, as well as from the Foreigners, imbittered their Lives and made them deplore their sad and helpless condition. In this manner several Historians represent the State of the English at that Time.

Harold's Sons make a Descent.

S. Dunelm.

Flor. Werc.

Malmsh.

p. 104.

Whilst the King was thus guarding against the secret Practices of his Subjects, Goodwin, Edmund and Magnus, Sons of Harold, made a descent in Somersetshire. The only Opposition, they met with, was from Ednoth, formerly Master of the Horse to the King their Father, who was willing to give King William a proof of his Fidelity by encountering these Princes. His Zeal for the new King proved fatal to him, for he was slain in the Battle; after which, they retired laden with Booty.

English and Normans complain one of another.

If the Historians on the side of the English may be credited, England was then in a pitiable state. The Normans supported by the King's Favour and Protection, daily committed Outrages upon the English, for which these last could expect no Redress. Others, more Friends to the Normans than the English, assure us, the English vexed that the King's measures should put it out of their power to shake off a Yoke which they bore with extreme Impatience, found fault with the Normans in general. They add, scarce a day passed but the dead Bodies of assassinated Normans were found in the Woods or Highways, without any possibility of discovering the Authors of these Murders, so firmly did the English stand by one another. In all appearance the King was persuaded, the English were wholly to blame, since he published a severe Edict, ordering that when a Norman should be slain or robbed, the Hundred where the Act was done should be responsible for the Crime, and pay a large Fine. This Law was not new to the English. From the time of Alfred the Great, it had been in force in the Kingdom (2). But what extremely provoked them, was, that this Edict was made in favour of the Normans only.

Several Normans quit England.

Ord. Vital.

How gracious soever the King might be to the Foreigners, many of them desired leave to return home (3). The King readily granted their Request, paying the Arrears due to them, and rewarding them beyond their expectation. All this was done at the expence of the English, on whom were levied the Sums necessary to defray this charge.

Occasions of complaint continually encreased on both

(1) This doth not appear from the ancient Historians. And as for what follows about the Curfew (qu. Curfew-bell, or Curfew-fire) Polydore Vergil is the first who mentions it. There is a passage quoted out of William Malmshury, p. 156. to countenance that Notion, but which, if I have the Reader to judge:—Lucernarum usum noctibus in Curia restituit qui fuerat tempore fratris intermissus,—i. e. He [Henry I.] restored in his Court the Use of Lights at Night, which had been left off in his Brother [William Rufus's] Time. But is this anything like a Curfew?

(2) In the Time of the Danes, when the Body of an unknown Person was found murdered, it was taken for granted it was a Dane, and the Hundred paid the Mulct. Thus William only revived an old Custom, by changing the Name of Dane into that of Norman. Bacon's Hist. c. 40. p. 62. Rapin.

(3) About this Time (says Ordericus Vitalis, p. 512.) some of the Norman Ladies wanting their Husbands, sent for them to return, and withheld them know if they returned not, they must have other Men to relieve their Necessities. Hugo de Grentemesnil, who presided at Winchester; Hemfrid de Totnes, Governor of Hastings, with many others, returned into Normandy. His Soldiers likewise, wearied with the Desolations of the Country, importuned him for their Release that they might retire to a fixed Place of bode; which he granted, and dismissed them with plentiful Rewards. Ibid.

(4) M. Wail says, they came either to conquer England, or to take William or drive him out of the Kingdom. p. 226.

(5) Of two hundred and forty, says Flor. Werc. S. Dunelm. p. 198, &c. Of three hundred, according to Sax. Ann. Malmsh. p. 106. Huntingd. M. Paris, p. 5. M. Wail.

(6) From Egelewin, the Bishop, who went out to meet him, and advised him to beware of Treachery. The Northumbrians unanimously, resolved beforehand never to submit to a Stranger, and therefore agreed either to kill him, or to die themselves. The Earl coming to Durham, suffered his Men to treat the People like Enemies, killing some of the Bishop's Tenants. S. Dunelm. p. 198.

(7) They flocked to Durham in the Night, and forcing the Gates in the Morning, rushed in, and slew as many of the Earl's Attendants as they could meet with. Cumin fled for refuge into the Bishop's Palace, but it being set on Fire by the Conspirators, all that were in it perished in the Flames. Of the seven hundred Normans, but one escaped. This was done January 23. S. Dunelm. p. 38. 198.

(8) There came Sweyn's two Sons, Harold and Canute; Earl Turkill, and Christian their Bishop. S. Dunelm. p. 198. Brompt. p. 965.

(9) In the Mouth of the Humber. Huntingd. p. 368. S. Dunelm. p. 198.

(10) With Walthoff, these brought him several thousands of armed Men. S. Dunelm, ibid. M. Paris, p. 5.

(11) More than three thousand Normans were killed. William Mulet the Vice-comes, and his Wife and Children, with Gilbert de Gaunt, and some few others were spared. S. Dunelm. p. 199.

(12) They wintered between the Ouse and the Trent. Huntingd. p. 369. M. Paris, p. 5. Sax. Ann.

1069. He recalled several whom he had banished, set others at Liberty, and affected by some instances of severity to repress the Insolence of the Normans (1). His Fears being somewhat abated by the good effects of these Proceedings, he sent the Queen and the Princes into Normandy, and then marched against the Danes. He was so provoked with the Northumbrians, that he was heard to swear by God's Splendour, he would not leave a Soul alive. As soon as he entered Yorkshire, he began to execute his Threats by terrible ravages. Mean time the Danes kept their Post, where he durst not attack them, well knowing, by hazarding a Battle, he staked his all against little or nothing. To extricate himself out of this difficulty, he believed the best course he could take would be to bribe the General by Presents. For that purpose he sent private Emisaries to offer him a large Sum of Money, with leave to plunder the Country along the Sea-Coast, provided he would depart when Winter was over. This Negotiation succeeding to his wish, Osbern retired in the beginning of the Spring, for which he was severely punished by the King his Brother (2). The Danes being gone, The King marched to York to besiege the City, defended by an English and Scotch Garrison, under the command of a brave Governor (3). This was Earl Waltheof, who by his Courage and Conduct, rendered the Siege so long and difficult, that the King began to despair of Success, when the want of Provisions obliged the besieged to capitulate. How incensed soever the King might be, he readily granted honourable Terms to this brave Governor, whose Valour he had so often admired during the Siege. He was not satisfied with shewing him this mark of his Esteem, but gave him in marriage his own Niece, Daughter to the Countess of Albemarle (4). Some time after, he made him also Earl of Northampton and Huntingdon, and lastly of Northumberland. He received likewise into favour Earl Gospatric; but punished severely the rest of the Officers and Soldiers of the Garrison, laying a heavy Fine upon the Citizens of York. As soon as the Siege was over, and the King found it in his power to be revenged of the Northumbrians, he ravaged their Country in so merciless a manner, that for sixty Miles together, between York and Durham, he did not leave a single House standing (5). He spared not even the Churches and other publick Edifices. This is what William of Malmesbury, though a Norman, durst not deny. His Pretence for thus laying the Country waste, was, to prevent a second Danish Invasion. But the method he took, was a clear evidence, it was to glut his revenge, and strike a Terror into the rest of the Kingdom. It is impossible, according to Historians, to describe the Miseries of the northern Counties. The Lands lying untilld (6), and the Houses being destroyed, People died in heaps, after having endeavoured to prolong a wretched Life, by eating of the most unclean Animals, and sometimes even human Flesh (7).

The Step lately taken by the English in calling the Danes into the Kingdom, thoroughly convinced the King, he should never be in peaceable Possession of the Crown till he had intirely put it out of their power to execute the Projects formed against him. This made him resolve to humble in such a manner all that had any Interest with the People, that they should not be able to make any considerable Effort. It is true, many innocent Persons were to suffer in the execution of this Design. But at that time, it is certain the King thought only of his own safety, without troubling himself, whether the means he made use of were consistent with Justice. To accomplish his ends, he suddenly removed the English from such Posts as gave them any Power over their Countrymen. After which he dispossessed them of all the Baronies and the Fiefs of the Crown in general, and distributed them to the Normans and other Foreigners who had followed him into England. But as these last were not so many in number as those that were deprived of their Estates, he was obliged to load them, as I may say, with Benefits, in order to draw all the Crown-Lands out of the hands of the English. We may be satisfied by the following instances, how profuse the King was in this Distribution. Robert, his uterine Brother, had the Earldom of Cornwall, in which were two hundred and eighty eight Manors (8), besides five hundred and fifty eight (9), which he possessed in other Counties. Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, his other Brother, was made Earl Palatine of Kent, and Justiciary of England. This Prelate had one hundred and eighty Fiefs in Kent alone (10), and two hundred and fifty five in several other Places. William Fitz-Osbern was rewarded with the whole Earldom of Hereford (11). Hugh Lupus of Almonches the King's Sister's Son, was presented by his Uncle with the County Palatine of Chester, with all the Royal Prerogatives, to hold it in full Sovereignty as the King himself held his Crown. Alan Fergeant Duke of Bretagne, the King's Son-in-law, had all Earl Edwin's Estate with the same Privileges as were granted to the Earl of Chester (12). Roger de Montgomery had first Arundel, Chichester, and afterwards Shropshire. Walter Giffard had Buckinghamshire, and William Warner, the County of Surrey. Eudes, Earl of Blois, was put in possession of the Lordship of Holderness. Ralph de Guader (13) a Breton, was made Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, and Lord of Norwich. Henry de Ferrariis received Tutbury-Castle (14). William Bishop of Constance, was possessed of two hundred and eighty Fiefs, which he left at his Death to Robert Mowbray his Nephew. It would be endless to mention all the Donations granted by the King to the Foreigners, at the Expence of the English. Those above-mentioned are sufficient to shew, the Intent of this Profusion was solely to deprive the English of their Estates. This therefore is a memorable Epocha, when, to speak in the Language of the Historians, England was delivered into the hands of Foreigners. It may easily be conceived, the Lords, to whom the King distributed so many Estates, suffered none to hold of them but those of their own Nation. Accordingly from that time, we hear no more of Ealdormen, or Thanes, but of Counts, or Earls, Viscounts, Barons, Vassalors, Esquires, and other Titles taken from the Norman or French Tongue, which began to be introduced into England instead of the Saxon Names. So that England may be truly said to become Norman. Perhaps even its own Name would have been changed for that of Normandy, if some things, spoken of in the following Reigns, had not made the Normans, settled in England, desirous of being considered as Englishmen, and even taking the Name. Be this as it will, from the Foreigners, who were then put in possession of these Lands, are derived a great part of the most eminent Families this day in the Kingdom.

It was not only the English Nobility that were sufferers by the Conqueror's new Plan: The Clergy met with no better quarter. The Saxon Kings had granted to several Bishops and Abbots Lands exempted from all military Service, denouncing in their Charters Imprecations against such of their Successors as should dare to violate these Privileges. But King William, not being one of those scrupulous Princes who looked upon what their Predecessors have settled as unalterable, cancelled all these Immunities (15). Church-Lands as well as the rest, were obliged to find, in time of War, a certain number of Horsemen, notwithstanding the Clauses in their ancient Charters to the con-

(1) To this Time Mr Joyce refers that considerable Transaction related by Roger de Hoveden, That William caused certain wise and noble Englishmen throughout all England to be summoned, that he might hear from them the Laws and ancient Customs thereof, and confirm them. Joyce, p. 21. See R. Hoved, p. 601. &c.

(2) He was banished. Malm. p. 106.

(3) But he took Oxford in his Way, which had revolted against him, and soon reduced it. From Oxford he marched on by Nottingham towards York, when he encountered Waltheof, he slew the greatest part of the People, and laid the Country waste; and engaging the Enemy at York, he put the strongest to flight, and took all the rest with the Sword. Ord. Vital. Mat. Paris, p. 4, 5.

(4) His daughter by the same Mother. The Duke's Name was Judith. Gemet. l. 8. c. 17.

(5) At the time Wulf, Bishop of Durham was deprived, and his Brother Eghewin put in his room. M. Paris, p. 5.

(6) This occasioned a terrible Famine, of which there is a melancholy Account in S. Dunelm. p. 199, &c. The Lands lay untilld for nine Years. S. Dunelm. lib. 1. p. 166.

(7) King William, as soon as he came to Durham, ordered a Castle to be built there. S. Dunelm. p. 49. Christmas approaching, he caused his Crown, &c. to be brought to York, where he kept that Festival. As soon as the Holidays were over, he marched against a Party, who had fortified themselves in an island in the middle of the Country, and having pursued them as far as the Tees, he marched over Mountains, and through Woods, almost crosd the Kingdom into Gascony, to be revenged on the Welsh, who had lately besieged Shrewsbury; but upon his Arrival with his Army at Chester, he thereby quieted the whole Province of Merch: And a Duke the French having now made his Peace, the King built a Castle there, and another, in his Return out of those Parts, at Stafford, putting strong Garrisons into both. From thence he came to Salisbury, where he kept his Easter, and largely rewarding his Soldiers, he dismissed them. Ord. Vital.

(8) During William's Absence in the North, the Sons of the late King Harold, having procured from Donnet King of Ireland a Fleet of sixty Sail, landed again at first in Exeter, plundering and burning wherever they came: But Brien Son to Eudo Earl of Britagne, fought them twice in one Day, killing seven hundred of their Men, with others of the Irish Nobility, the rest flying to their Ships, returned into Ireland. W. Gemet. l. 7. c. 40. Ord. Vital. See Tyrol. p. 23, 24, 25.

(9) Brady says two hundred and fifty eight.

(10) According to the same Author, it was but five hundred and forty five: And in all seven hundred and ninety three.

(11) Brady says one hundred and eighty four; in all four hundred and thirty nine. Brady, p. 195, 196.

(12) And also the Isle of Wight. He was Serjeant of Normandy, and placed with Walter Lacy, the King's Standard Bearer, to oppose the Welsh. Rot. pen. Ep. Ellen.

(13) Rapin, by Mistake, says Mercia's Estate. The Words of the Grant are. Ego Gulielmus cognomine Bastardus de, &c. Alano, &c. omnes villas & terras quod antea fuerunt Cennici Edwini in Eboracra cum fidei militum, &c. These Lands, when given, were gildable, but by the King's Favour were changed into a Liberty or Honour, now called Richmansbury, now a Castle of that Name, built by Earl Alan.

(14) Now Grener, a Castle in Bretagne.

(15) Though he was no Earl at the Time of the Survey, he had then an hundred and seventy six Lordships, besides Tutbury Castle.

(16) Mr. Juchowicz or Opman, That this Burden was not laid upon the Bishopsricks and greater Abbies, without their own Consents, given in a Synod or Great Council of the Kingdom, which the King held this Year at Winchester. Titles of Honour, p. 578. See Tyrol. p. 25.

1070. trary. Such of the Clergy as refused to comply, only gave the King what he wanted, a Pretence to dispossess them and place Foreigners in their room. Moreover, he quartered upon the Monasteries almost all his Troops, and obliged the Monks to find them in Necessaries. By this means, he kept his Army without any charge, and had Spies in all the Religious Houses, who watched the Actions of the Monks.

All this not sufficing to make the King easy, he thought himself of another Expedient, which drew upon him the Imprecations of the People, and especially of the Monks. Some of his Emissaries (1) informing him that many Persons had lodged their Money and Plate in the Monasteries, he took occasion to order all the Religious Houses to be searched, and every thing of value to be seiz'd, on pretence it belonged to the Rebels. Some Historians affirm, he did not spare even the Shrines of the Saints and the consecrated Vessel. Very probably, the Clergy's Zeal, after the Battle of Hastings, to place this Prince on the Throne, was entirely owing to the fear of losing their Effects. But on this last occasion, they had but too much reason to perceive how greatly they were mistaken in their Politicks.

How severely soever the King had used the Clergy, he was not yet satisfied. The great Credit of the Bishops and Abbots still making him uneasy, he resolved to be rid of the most suspected. To proceed in the least blameable manner, he sent for two Legates from Rome (2), who convened a Council at Winchester (3), where every thing passed to his wish. Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, was degraded for intruding into the See, Robert his Predecessor not having been canonically deposed. This was probably a Sacrifice offered by the King to the Pope, for it does not appear he had any reason to complain of the Archbishop. The same Council also deposed Egelmer, Bishop of East-Anglia, whose See was at Helmham. Agelric, Bishop of Selsey (4), and some others, whom the King did not like, were likewise sacrificed to his Jealousy. As for others, against whom the Council had nothing to alledge, the King, by his sole Authority, banished some the Kingdom, and threw the rest into Prison, without any legal Proceedings, or giving other reason than his Good-Pleasure. After he was thus clear of all that gave him any Uneasiness, he placed in their room Normans or other Foreigners (5), for all were acceptable but English. He promoted Lanfranc, an Italian, Abbot of a Monastery at Caen, to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury (6), and Thomas, a Canon of Bayeux, to that of York. Three of his Chaplains were made Bishops of Winchester, Helmham, and Selsey (7), and Norman Abbots were placed in the Monasteries, from whence the English were removed. This however must be said for the King, that he made choice of Persons of eminent worth to fill up the Vacancies.

Let it not be imagined that I have used any exaggeration, in what has been said concerning the usage of King William to the English, or affected to follow those who made it their business to blacken his Reputation. Whoever will be at the pains to consult the original Historians, will easily be convinc'd of the contrary. They will see, there is not a single Circumstance but what occurs in the Histories, written during his Life, or shortly after his Death, by Authors most desirous to justify his Conduct. 'Tis therefore a groundless Assertion of some of our modern Writers, to say, this Prince never acted as Conqueror, but constantly followed the ancient Laws and Constitutions of the Realm.

The King's whole Conduct demonstrating to the English that his Design was to reduce them so low that they should never more be able to hold up their Heads, some of the principal among them thought now was the time or never, to make a vigorous Effort to prevent their utter ruin.

Eustace, Abbot of St. Albans, was one of the most zealous to inspire his Countrymen with this Resolution, and by means of his Interest and Riches it was that a fierce Combination was formed to drive the King and the Normans out of the Kingdom. Matters were carried on with that Secrecy, that the Conspirators suddenly drew an Army together, before the King had any notice of it. This Army growing very numerous in a few days, the Abbot of St. Albans sent for Edgar Atheling out of Scotland, and put him at the head of the Malecontents, by whom he was acknowledged for King, and proclaimed in all the Places they were masters of. This bold Enterprize made the King extremely uneasy, who was ever apprehensive of some sudden Revolution robbing him of the Fruit of all his Labours. He communicated his Thoughts to Lanfranc the new Archbishop of Canterbury, who advised him to deal more gently with the English, intimating the absolute necessity of a speedy Negotiation with the Rebels, lest the Flame, already kindled, should over-spread the whole Kingdom. The King took his advice, and after many fair Promises, found means to engage the Head of the Malecontents in a Conference at Bathampton. He calmly heard all their Complaints, and promised to redress their Grievances. Nay, he swore on the Holy Evangelists, to establish the antient Laws of the Realm, which went under the name of Edward his Benefactor. This Condescension satisfying the Malecontents, they returned to the Army to dismiss their Troops, believing they had no further occasion for them. But the King had not the least thought of keeping an Oath, which he looked upon as extorted. Presently after, he ordered a great Number of those that had taken up Arms against him, to be apprehended, some of whom were put to death, and others banished or imprisoned. Upon this Edgar fled into Scotland (8), and the rest took refuge in Ireland, Denmark, and Norway. The Abbot of St. Albans retired to the Isle of Ely, where he died with Grief. As soon as the King heard of his death, he seized the Goods of the Monastery, and took from thence all the valuable Effects: He was resolved to destroy it utterly, if Lanfranc had not prevailed upon him to desist from his Design (9).

The King's Behaviour to the Malecontents variously wrought on the minds of the English. Some, terrified by his Severity, resolved to endure all things for fear of increasing their Afflictions by fruitless Attempts. Others, not so passive, determined to try all ways to free themselves from a Yoke they could no longer bear. These retired to the Isle of Ely, where was a rich Monastery, the Abbot of which was their Friend. But this was not the only reason of their chusing that Retreat. This Place, called an Isle from its being surrounded with a Morass, was very strong, and seemed proper to shelter them from the King's Rigours, when filled with a sufficient number of Men to defend it. Edwin and Morcar chose to join them (10), being sensible they should be the first Victims of the King's Suspicions, and not daring any longer to trust to his Promises. Some time after, Edwin resolving to go into Scotland, where he thought he might be more serviceable to his Party, was murdered on the road by his own treacherous Followers. Morcar his Brother found in the Isle of Ely, many Persons of Quality, with Egelwin (11) and Walter, Bishops of Durham and Hereford, all resolutely bent to oppose to their utmost the despotick Power assumed by the King. Their Number being considerably increased by Multitudes of Malecontents flocking to them (12), they chose for their Leader Hereward (13), Nephew to the Abbot (14) of Peterborough, who was looked upon as the bravest and best Soldier in the Kingdom. He was banished in the Reign of King Edward, for some Outrages committed in his Neighbourhood, and retired into Flanders, where his Valour gained him great

(1) Particulars of William First's Conquest, Earl of Hersford, Sec. S. Dunelm. p. 200.

(2) Hermard Bishop of London and John and Peter, Cardinals. S. Dunelm. p. 201, 80.

(3) Rapin by M. de la Haye. See S. Dunelm. p. 201. Brompt. p. 907. M. de la Haye R. de Duets p. 482.

(4) He was afterwards made Bishop of Marlborough. S. Dunelm. p. 292. Rapin calls him by mistake, Bishop of Durham; whereas the Bishop of Durham then was Wulfstan, who died into Scotland at this time. See S. Dunelm. p. 200. Brompt. p. 966.

(5) He used his utmost Endeavours to have as many of the English turned out as he could, that he might put some of his Countrymen in their room. S. Dunelm. p. 202.

(6) Mr. Tyrol thinks, that Lanfranc was elected, or at least confirm'd by the great Council of the Kingdom, according to the Sax. Ann. in Marg.— In this Council he likewise happened. That the Bishops and greater Abbots gave their Consents that, for the future, their Lands should be held by Knight-Service: From which time, the Bishop and Abbot, who sat before in this Council, and Synod, as more spiritual Persons, appeared henceforward in the great Council of the Kingdom among the lay Nobility, as the Bishops do to this day. Tyrol. p. 28, 29.

(7) Wulfstan was made Bishop of Winchester, Athelric of Helmham, and Stigand of Selsey. S. Dunelm. p. 202. Brompt. p. 968.

(8) To this Time may most probably be referred what Bayard relates. That William sent a Herald to demand Edgar, demanding War against him, unless he were surrendered up. Edgar looked upon it as a cruel and faithless thing, to deliver up his Guilt and Honour to his capital Enemy, to be put to death, and therefore refused to listen any thing, rather than so to do: And thereupon he heartened and detained Edgar. Bayard. p. 210. Engl. Edit. Folio.

(9) The Account of this Revolt is only related by Matthew Paris in the Life of Richard, and for that reason is by some called in question. But as he could not well invent this Story, it is most probable he found it in the Annals of his Monastery of St. Albans. Bayard also relates, that Edgar could not be concerned in it, being he had fled into Scotland near two Year before, and did not return into England till three Year after, though this Author makes him to come back the Year before.

(10) Udal and na that William intended to put them in Prison, they privately withdrew from Court. S. Dunelm. p. 203. M. de la Haye p. 70.

(11) Who was come thither from Scotland. S. Dunelm. p. 203. M. Paris p. 8.

(12) The Sax. Ann. say, that they were joined by Sigard King of Danmark, Osbert a Danish Bishop, Earl of Osney, and several other Danes; but Swan having concluded a Peace with William, the Danes went off with a large Booty they had taken out of Peterborough Monastery, which they plundered and burnt. See Engl. Edit. p. 71.

(13) He was younger Son to Leofric Earl of Merca, and Brother to Algar Earl of Merca after Leofric.

(14) Hereward was Bishop, but there was no such Bishoprick then. He was Nephew to Brand Abbot of Peterborough. See Ingulph. p. 70, 71.

Reputation, and oblig'd him to eminent Posts. The Death of his Father oblig'd him to return into England, he had been banish'd to a Norrm. He demanded Restitution, but not obtaining it by a legal Process, drove out the former Possessor, and took Possession. It was precisely at this juncture that coming to Ely to avoid the King's Resentment, he was chosen General by the Malcontents. As he had a great Reputation, and as the counragers and rebels were as much dreaded by the King, as that they dur'd not to oppose him were despised, he made the King extremely uneasy. The Honour he had just receiv'd animating him with fresh Ardour, and with a Desire to shew he was not unworthy of it, he prepared for a vigorous Defence, reflecting he should not be long in that place with out being attacked. While he was laying in warlike Stores, he caus'd all the accessible Parts of the Isle to be carefully fortified, and took all other Precautions, that might render a Siege the more difficult. King Wil- liam knowing whom he had to deal with, march'd with all possible speed to attack him, in expectation to surprize him unprepared. But Harrold had already taken care to oppose his Entrance into the Isle, by ordering a Castle of Wood to be built upon the Mons, which could not be assaulted, and which defend'd the only Passage to the Besieged. In spite of these seemingly insurmountable Difficulties, the King was bent upon a Siege, or rather a Blockade. He was in hopes to reduce them by Famine, and have them all at his Mercy, the same thing that prevented his Approaches, being an invincible Obstacle to their Flight. With this view he built a Bridge over the Mons, two Miles in length, by means of which he de-priv'd the Besieged of all hopes of Relief (1). However, though he had now spent a great deal of time in the Siege, he was never the nearer, since the Rebels had provided great store of Provisions. This Delay made him very uneasy, as well upon account of the Affair in hand, as because it prevented him from marching against the King of Scotland, who had taken this opportunity to make an Inroad into the northern Counties. At length, when he began to despair of the Success of his Enterprize, a happy thought made him master of the Place.

The Monastery of Ely holding without the Limits of the Isle many Manors, from whence the greatest part of their Revenues arose, the King was adviſed to ſeize them, in order to reduce the Monks to obedience out of fear of loſing them. He had no ſooner put this advice in practice, and diſtributed the Lands to his Courtiers, but Thurſtan the Abbot, not being able to withſtand the Clamours of the Monks, ſought means to recover their Eſtates. He could think of no properer method than procuring the King's Favour by ſome conſiderable Service. To this end, he privately ſent and offered to put the King in poſſeſſion of the Iſle of Ely, with all that were in it, and pay him a thouſand Marks (2), on condition the ſeized Lands were reſtored to the Monastery. This offer was gladly accepted, and the Abbot performed his Promiſe: but Huetan has neglected to inform us of the means he uſed to accompliſh it. However that be, the Miſdecontents were conſtrained by the Abbot's Treachery to ſubmit to the King's mercy. Hereward alone eſcaped, having opened a way with his Sword through the Guards that defended a certain Paſs. Of thoſe that were taken in the Iſle, ſome had their Eyes put out, or their Hands cut off, others were ſhut up in divers Priſons. Among theſe laſt were Earl Morcar, with Egelwin Biſhop of Durham, who having been ſo hardy as to excommunicate the King (3), was ſent to Abington, and there ſtarved to Death (4). The Monks of Ely were likewiſe chaſtiſed, though they had taken all imaginable care to perform their Capitulation. When they came to pay the ſtipulated Sum, for the want of a Groat only, they were forced to pay another thouſand Marks (5). Moreover the King quartered upon them forty Knights, for whom they were obliged to find all Neceſſaries.

Whilst the King was employed in the Siege of Ely, Mahomet continued his Ravages in the North (6), with a Barbarity unworthy a Christian Prince, if it was such as is described by the English Historians. They tell us, the Scots ripped up the Bellies of Women with Child, cut the Throats of the old Men, and roasted young Children into the Air to receive them on the Points of their Swords. But very likely, this Account is exceedingly aggravated, as well as the Number of English Slaves, carried into Scotland, where it is pretended every House was furnished with one. Guthrie, who was the Governor of Northumberland (7), not being strong enough to resist the King of Scotland, made an Expedition into Cumberland, where he revenged on the Scots the Calamities inflicted by their Countrymen, on the English. This Expedition served only to inflame the King of Scotland's Rage (8), who took occasion from thence to encircle his Palace in Northumberland. The King could not bear these Injustices; but the Affair of Elphering of greater importance, he was willing to see the End. As soon as it was over, he marched into Galloway, where however he only fatigued his Army to little purpose. Mean time Malcolm, who was retired into Scotland, endeavoured to prolong the War, in hopes some new Troubles, of which he might take advantage, would arise in England. The same reason obliged the King to put an End to it as soon as possible. The readiest way to succeed, as he thought, was to follow the Scots into the heart of their Country, that the Dread of a Battle, which to them might prove fatal, might compel them to a Peace. This Resolution procured him the expected Advantage. Malcolm, unwilling to hazard a Battle in his own Kingdom, offering to accommodate Matters by a Treaty, he was of Opinion, he ought immediately to end a War, which the Circumstances of his Affairs made him look upon as extremely dangerous. Besides, he seemed, ever since the Battle of Hastings, resolved never to run any hazard. This was what had formerly prevented him from fighting the Danes, and probably the same reason caused him to behave in like manner with the Scots. Be this as it will, the bounds of the two Kingdoms were settled (9), by the Treaty, and Malcolm did him Homage (10). Some English Writers (11) pretend this Homage concerned all Scotland; but the Scots affirm it was only for Cumberland. And indeed that is most likely, since there is no appearance that Malcolm, who had not received the least check, should humble himself to do Homage for his whole Kingdom. I am very sensible, King William is said to have a right to demand it: But this is not a Place to examine this Point, the Discussion whereof will more properly come in elsewhere.

The good reception Malcolm gave all the English Fugitives, drew great Numbers into his Dominions, where some procured Settlements which obliged them to continue there. From these are derived several considerable Families at this day in Scotland (12). Some will have it, that the English brought thither their Language, with the Titles of Duke, Earl and Baron; but Buchanan affirms, they were in use there before that time. He freely owns indeed, that the English introduced into Scotland Luxury, Pride, Wantonnefs, Drunkennefs and other Vices, to which he pretends, his Countrymen were Strangers before. Among the chief of these Refugees was Earl Goffaric, who had been deprived of his Government, under colour of his being concerned in the Death of Cumin, tho' he had since that done the King very signal Services. He was succeeded by Earl Walthoff (13), the only English Lord, for whom the King yet shewed any Regard. But he did not keep long in his Favour, for which he was principally indebted to his Wife, who was the King's Niece.

The French had afforded King William sufficient time 1073. to settle himself in the Throne of England, without giving him the least molestation. He hoped therefore, as they had not taken advantage of the late Troubles in England, they would be still less inclined to disturb him, after the entire Reduction of his English Subjects. But on a sudden Philip's Jealousy reviving, he could not bear to

1. Δ is a subalgebra of \mathcal{A} and $P \in \mathcal{C}(\Delta)$. \square

[illegible]

5. The following is a list of the names of the persons who have been appointed to the various committees of the Board of Directors of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, for the year ending December 31, 1914.

In 1990, the Journal of the American Medical Association published a study by Smith and his colleagues. In this study, 100 patients with a history of myocardial infarction were randomly assigned to receive either a placebo or a daily dose of 100 mg of aspirin. The study found that patients who received aspirin had a significantly lower risk of dying from a heart attack compared to those who received a placebo. The study concluded that aspirin therapy should be considered for patients with a history of myocardial infarction.

Environ. Biol. Fish. (2015) 98:1011–1021

$\frac{1}{2} \text{H}_2\text{O} + \frac{1}{2} \text{O}_2 \rightarrow \text{H}_2\text{O}$ - Half-mole of H_2O is formed $\frac{1}{2} \text{H}_2 + \frac{1}{2} \text{O}_2 \rightarrow \text{H}_2\text{O}$ - Half-mole of H_2 is consumed the same time, the Journal of the American Medical Association, the British Medical Journal, and the Lancet have all published articles on the subject of the health of the nation.

[illegible]

S. P. DODGE

[illegible][illegible]

where $\tau_{\text{max}} = 1000$ s, $\tau_{\text{min}} = 100$ s, $\tau_{\text{max}} = 1000$ s, $\tau_{\text{min}} = 100$ s. A $\tau_{\text{max}} = 1000$ s, $\tau_{\text{min}} = 100$ s.

where \mathbf{W} is the weight matrix, \mathbf{L} is the Laplacian matrix, \mathbf{F} is the feature matrix, \mathbf{P} is the probability matrix, \mathbf{C} is the class matrix, \mathbf{H} is the hidden matrix, \mathbf{S} is the similarity matrix, \mathbf{L} is the Laplacian matrix, \mathbf{F} is the feature matrix, \mathbf{P} is the probability matrix, \mathbf{C} is the class matrix, \mathbf{H} is the hidden matrix, \mathbf{S} is the similarity matrix.

(4) He flung himself to death. B. npt p. 969.

In 1890, the Indians were forced to make up one third of the tribe which, they were forced to sell their Plate, to strip their

E. ... here? ... Church's, killed by force of N. blemen, &c. S. D. Minn. p. 200.

Rayne Light (L.) Co., agent, at the Reg. of P. & M., Wash., D.C. H. 1001

H. ... there would State Courts created in the ... Mountain of ... in Yokibure.

the same time, it was found that the P. h. c., having the marks of both P. h. eng. and P. h. l. in the lateral space of it, which was

[illegible]

For a discussion of the Shih-shan and Ch'ang-shan schools, see Ann. Maimsh.

On the other hand, the \mathcal{H}_∞ norm of the transfer function of the Family of Linear Systems Family Norm (FNS) is defined as

At the time time came for the People out of H. . . at the house of Queen Margaret, of whom

...the ... of ... of whom ... out of France

Sheridan's C. P. (C. P.) D. P., P. P., C. C., B. B., T. T., L. L., D. D.

... due to him both by Mr. Parker and Mother's Side, for he was the Son of Earl Seward, by Iphigene the Daughter of Earl

... the daughter of Lark

1073.

see the King of England in so prosperous a condition. He blamed himself for being so impolitic as not to assist the English Malecontents, and resolved to retrieve his Error by attacking Normandy. He expected no doubt the English would take advantage of this Diversion to revolt, and keep the King employed in England. Whatever his thoughts were, he suddenly invaded Normandy, without any Declaration of War. Upon which, the King went over with an Army wholly consisting of English (1), not daring to carry his Norman Troops out of the Kingdom. Besides, he chose rather to expose the English than Normans, who were absolutely necessary for the Preservation of his Conquest. With these Forces, he retook Mans and all the Province of Maine, which had lately revolted, the English glorying in faithfully serving him in Normandy, whilst in England he treated them with great rigour. Philip not succeeding according to his expectation, soon grew weary of the War, and put an end to it by a Peace with the King of England.

Edgar Atheling submits to the King. Sax. Ann. Malmsb. M. Paris.

Shortly after this Treaty, Prince Edgar, tired with living like a Fugitive in a Foreign Country, came to the King, and, begging his Pardon, submitted to his Will. He met with a favourable reception, and was allowed a Pound of Silver a day. From that time he ever remained in obedience without giving the King the least cause of uneasiness. If he had occasion to complain, it was not so much of the King as of the English, who, after the death of Edward, had preferred a private Person before him. It was not Edgar that King William had deprived of the Crown, but Harold, who probably, had he been able to keep it, would have left it to his Son, regardless of the Rights of the Saxon Prince. On the other hand, it must be confessed, Edgar had reason to be satisfied with the King's Clemency, who was very willing to receive him into Favour, notwithstanding the Mistrust he might justly entertain of him.

The Pope's demand of the King. Hoved. Eadm. Brady. Gregory. Ep. Lib. VII. Ep. 27.

Whilst the King was in Normandy, Gregory VII, the boldest and most enterprising Pope that ever sat in the Papal Chair, sent his Nuntio to summon him to do him Homage, pretending, England was a Fief of the Holy See. He demanded likewise the Arrears of Peter-Pence, which had not been paid for several years. Some pretend the Pope's Demand as to the first Article, was not groundless, but was the Condition, on which the King had obtained the Pope's approbation for the Conquest of England. Others derive the Pope's Sovereignty over England from the voluntary Grant of Rome, or Peter-Pence made to the Church of Rome, by Ina and Offa, Kings of Wessex and Mercia. They pretend it was a real Tribute by which they became Feudatories to the Holy See. In fine, there are some who giving up this pretension, content themselves with dating this Sovereignty from the time of Ethelwulf's Journey to Rome. But tho' perhaps at the time King William was meditating his Enterprize, he did not dispute the Pope's Claims, yet when he found himself well fixed in the Throne, he was otherwise disposed. He plainly told the Nuntio, he held his Crown only of God and his Sword, and would not make it dependent on any Person living. Nay, he went further: For, upon the Nuntio's daring to threaten him, he published an Edict, forbidding all his Subjects to acknowledge any Pope but whom he allowed of, and receive any Orders from Rome without his Leave. This was to make Gregory sensible, who had then a Competitor, how great a risk he run of being fowled in his turn, if he persisted in his Claims. As for the Arrears of Peter-Pence, he promised to pay what was due, and to be more punctual for the future. This Firmness convincing the Pope, the King was not swayed by superstitious Scruples, much less to be awed with Threats, he desisted from his Pretensions.

The King's refusal to submit. Eadm. p. 6 and N. t. Scidm. p. 14.

The King's long Stay in Normandy occasioned in England a fresh Conspiracy, so much the more dangerous as the most considerable of the Norman Lords were the Contrivers. Ralph de Guader, a Breton, Earl of Suffolk, and Roger de Breteuil Earl of Hereford (2), resolving to unite their two Families by the Marriage of Ralph with the Daughter of Roger (3), the King for reasons unknown put a stop to their Proceedings. The Earls, who durst not complete the Marriage whilst the King was in England, took the opportunity of his Absence to accomplish their design. They made a splendid Entertainment upon this occasion, to which were invited several Persons of Quality, and, among the rest, Earl Walthoff. As they knew the King's Temper, they formed at the same time the Project of a Conspiracy to depose him, perceiving no other way to avoid the effects of his Anger. The present occasion seeming favourable to draw their Guests into their Plot, as soon as they saw them heated with Wine, they began to talk of the King, and dwelt upon such Subjects as were most likely to exasperate them against him. They pretended to pity the English, who from being always a free People, were now reduced to a shameful Servitude. As for the Normans, they stirred them up with a Consideration of the King's severe Government, who by the excessive Impositions laid on Estates, took from them with one hand what he had given them with the other. In fine, perceiving they were heard with pleasure, they openly declared, it was unworthy of Persons of Honour to be governed by a Badan, who had usurped the two Crowns he possessed. Their Discourse had so sudden an Effect upon Men who in their Cups thought nothing difficult, that with one consent they resolved to take Arms and oppose the King's return. Earl Walthoff, warmed with Wine like the rest, came into the Plot without reflecting on the Consequences. But on the morrow, the Fumes of the Liquor being dispersed, he considered more maturely, that he had embarked in an Enterprize, which instead of freeing the English from Oppression, could not but encrease their Misery. He foresaw the Difficulties which would naturally occur in the Execution. But supposing it chanced to succeed, he plainly perceived, England would not be the better for it, since she would become a Prey to several petty Tyrants who would complete her ruin. Moreover, he considered, in case the Conspirators were crushed, which was very probable, the Vengeance would all fall on his Head, as being an Englishman, whereas the Foreigners might find some Favour with the King. He could not likewise forbear acknowledging he was much indebted to the King, who not only pardoned him once before, but also distinguished him by many Favours from all his Countrymen. These Reflections working in his mind a hearty Repentance for what he had done, he went to Lanfranc and imparted to him all that had passed. He alleged his drinking too much permitted him not to reflect on what was proposed to him, and intreated him to intercede for his Pardon. The Archbishop commended his Repentance, and advised him to repair forthwith to the King, and inform him of all the Circumstances. He put him in hopes of easily obtaining a Pardon for a Crime done with so little premeditation, at such a time, and for which he was so soon sorry, and even wrote to the King in his behalf. Walthoff taking this Advice, set out immediately and went and threw himself at the King's feet, who received him very kindly, and pardoned his Imprudence, after he was informed of all the Particulars of the Conspiracy.

Reports of it, and is pardoned.

The King was very much alarmed at this News, and resolved to return into England, without delay, to appease the Troubles occasioned by his Absence. But his Presence was not necessary. The Conspiracy was stifled almost in its very birth by the Vigilance of the Bishop of Bayeux the Regent (4). The two Earls had concerted their Measures so ill, that they could not even join the Forces, each had assembled, so that Ralph de Guader found himself constrained to retire to Norwich Castle, where he was immediately besieged. As he despaired of pardon, in case he fell into the King's hands, he did not think fit to wait the Issue of the Siege, but finding means to escape, fled into Denmark (5). After his departure, his Countess defended the Castle some time, but at length surrendered upon Terms. She had liberty to follow the Earl her Spouse, who had now procured a powerful Aid from the King of Denmark to support the Revolt. And indeed, soon after a Danish Fleet appeared on the Coast of England, but not finding the English inclined to rise, sailed back immediately (6).

The Plot is crushed.

Sax. Ann. Huntingd.

(1) This did not appear from the antient Historians, but rather the contrary. They tell us, That this Year King William carried a great Army of English and French by land Sea. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 369. Eadm. p. 972. Some of them indeed say, That William received Advice with advantage, Forces that he carried over from F. I. Malmsb. p. 105. S. Dunelm. p. 205. But this is not saying that his Army wholly consisted of English.

(2) Breteuil's Signify in Normandy. He was Son to William Fitz-Osbert Earl of Hereford in England, and from him it was that the same Laws and Customs, observed in Breteuil, were observed and practised in Hereford after the Conquest. Denham. Geogr. Terr. Hist.

(3) She was Daughter to William Fitz-Osbert, and Roger's Sister, not his Daughter. The Marriage was celebrated at Exeter near Newmarket. W. Malmsb. p. 104. Eadm. p. 974. M. Paris. p. 7.

(4) And by the help of William Bishop of Exeter, Agelwin Abbot of Evesham, Urso Sheriff of Wiltshire, and Walter de Lacy, who drew together some Forces, and prevented the Earl of Hereford from passing the Severn, and joining Earl Ralph; while Osbert, and Gregory Bishop of Exeter, marched with an Army of English and French against Earl Ralph. S. Dunelm. p. 208.

(5) He went first to Breteuil, and thence to Denmark, where he prevailed upon the King of Denmark to lend him Succours; which accordingly came some time after, in two hundred Ships, under the Command of Canute, King Swegen's Son, and Earl Hakon; but not finding the English disposed to take Arms, they sailed to Flanders, after having staid two Days in the Thames Mouth. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 208. M. Paris. p. 5, 6. — The Sax. Ann. and M. Paris say, that they had sent before this to the King of Denmark for assistance. M. Paris. p. 7.

(6) In the Year 1074, a weak house Christian, died Edgitha, Relict of Edward the Confessor, and was buried by the King her Husband in Westminster Abbey, where a fine Monument was afterwards erected to her Memory. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 209. Malmsb. p. 111.

When time King William being returned to England, was informed, there were still some remains of the Conspiracy in the Western Counties (1). To prevent the Fire from relighting, he marched with all speed to those parts, and severely punished all whom he suspected to be concerned in the Plot. Some he ordered to be hanged, others, to have their Feet and Hands cut off, or their Eyes put out. Those that were most favourably treated were banished the Kingdom. The Pardon granted Earl Waltheof going for nothing, he was apprehended, carried to Winchester, publicly beheaded and buried under the Scaffold. His Riches were said to be the principal Occasion of his Death, the King having a longing Desire to his great Estate (2). Others add, that Judith his Wife did not a little contribute to his Ruin, exasperating the King by false Reports, that she might be at liberty to marry elsewhere. Be this as it will, the unhappy fate of this brave Earl was universally lamented. Every one thought he was too severely dealt with for so slight a Crime, even supposing he had not obtained his Pardon. Some time after (3) his Body was removed to Croyland Abbey (4), where it was pretended to work divers Miracles, and accordingly this Earl passed with the People for a true Martyr. The Abbot of Croyland, encouraging this Belief, was turned out of his Monastery, by the King's order, and Ingulphus, a Monk of Fontevraud, was put in his room. This is the same Ingulphus who, notwithstanding his Obligations to King William, has not failed to attest, in his History of Croyland, the Miracles wrought at Waltheof's Tomb.

Tho' the English were not concerned in the late Conspiracy, but rather refused to join the Male-contents, yet were they no less punished. The King took it for granted, they had privately fomented the Rebellion, and consequently, deprived some of their Estates, and others of their Liberty. From this time William of Malmesbury dates the Servitude of the English. As much Norman as he was, he plainly enough intimates that from thenceforward the King had no manner of Regard for them. Hence it may be conjectured, this Prince's Severity to the English was very great and universal, since this Historian reckons as a Trifle, what the King had already done with respect to the Spiritual and Temporal Lords.

The Precautions taken by the King, to remove from the English all thoughts of a revolt, rendering him easy, he went beyond Sea, to be revenged of Ralph de Guader, who was retired to his City of Dol in Bretagne (5). He was not satisfied with seizing all his Estates in England, but resolved to deprive him also of his Hereditary Possessions. For that purpose, he laid Siege to Dol, which however he could not take, the Resistance of the Besieged giving the King of France time to come to their Relief. King William missing his Aim, returned to England, where during the rest of that and the following Year, nothing remarkable happened, except a Council held at London, where was settled the Precedency of the Bishops.

The King enjoyed then a Tranquillity which seemed to promise a long Continuance, when it was disturbed by an unexpected War. Robert his eldest Son encouraged by the King of France (6), pretended his Father ought to resign Normandy to him, in pursuance of a positive Promise, made him, as he said, to that purpose (7). Upon this Pretension (8) he attempted to render himself master of the Dukedom, and even treated very ill such as refused to own him for Sovereign. The King surprized at this Audaciousness, immediately drew an Army together consisting entirely of English, for the reason before-mentioned, and passed into Normandy to put a stop to his Son's Proceedings. Robert was not deterred from his Design by his Arrival; but violently opposed his Father, who saw himself forced to carry on the War in form, finding in his own Son no contemptible Enemy. He happened one day to fall into an Ambush, where he was obliged to expose his Person as much as the meanest Officer. He distinguished himself to be his Valour, that Robert, who knew him not, deeming him the most formidable of his Enemies, assaulted him, and wounding him in the Arm, dismounted him with his Lance. The King was in great Danger of losing his Life, it, by good fortune, Robert had not known him by some Mark on his Arm. Then the young Prince, hastily alighting, raised him up, and set him on his own Horse, to rescue him from the present danger. Mean time, the English Troops being roughly handled by the Normans, the King was obliged to retreat in Disorder (9). Robert's being like to kill his Father, made such an impression upon his mind that, to shew the Sincerity of his Sorrow, he submitted entirely to his mercy. But this Generosity was not sufficient to recover the King's Favour, who never after had any Affection for him. Nay, his last, in the first Emotions of Passion, he denounced his Curse against him, who, at the Submissions of the young Prince could not prevail with him to retract. However he gave him a kind reception; but carried him into England, on pretence to send him at the head of an Army against Scotland. Accordingly, next Year (10) Robert was commissioned to bring the Scots to reason, who had renewed the War (11).

He did nothing remarkable in this Expedition (12), except founding the Town of Newcastle upon Tyne, in the same Place where the Abbey of Monkcester stood, famous for the Austerity of the Monks. This War ended in a Treaty between the two Nations.

Before the Army was disbanded, the King being desirous to make himself some amends for the Charges in raising it, turned his Arms against the Welsh, in order to chastise them for some Incurfions into his Dominions (13). The Welsh Princes finding themselves unable to withstand him, voluntarily submitted, and obliged themselves to pay an annual Tribute to the Crown of England.

About this time King William built the famous Tower of London, to keep the Citizens in awe, whose Fidelity he had ever suspected (14). Some pretend, this Citadel was founded by Julius Caesar; but it would be difficult to prove Caesar was ever at London, and more so, that he undertook this work, of which he makes no mention in his Commentaries.

(1) Amongst the Welsh who had joined in it. Sax. Ann. M. Paris, p. 7.

(2) And several of the Normans also gazing after his Estate and Preferments, particularly Yvo de Talvas. He was beheaded May 31. 1075. Ingulph. p. 72.

(3) A fortnight after. Ingulph. p. 72.

(4) To which he had been a great Benefactor. Ingulph. p. 73.

(5) P. Daniel gives a different Account of this Matter: He says, That Fulk Earl of Anjou, and Hel, Duke of Bretagne, having assisted the Inhabitants of Mans, William was preparing to invade their Dominion: But a Pope's Legate, that happened to be then in France, persuaded them to a Peace, which William readily came into, upon the News of the Conspiracy in England. As soon as that was quelled, he came back to Normandy, and sent Hel orders to come and do him Homage, as his Predecessors had done to the first Dukes of Normandy. The Duke of Bretagne refuses; upon which William goes about to compel him to it, and besieges Dol. He comes with numerous Forces to the Relief of the Besieged, whose brave Resistance had very much lessened King William's Army, and forces him to raise the Siege. As he was retreating, the confederate Troops fell upon him, and killed abundance of his Men, and withal became Masters of his Baggage, the Loss of which was computed at 150000. Ord. Vital. l. 4. Malm. l. 3. Huntingd. l. 7.

(6) He was encouraged and assisted by him underhand. See P. Daniel, Vol. III. p. 112, 113. It was thought that Robert was the Author of the Intimidation at Mans; and that he likewise stirred up the Duke of Bretagne, Earl of Anjou, and King of France, in order to compel his Father to deliver up to him Normandy and Maine. Ord. Vital. l. 4. P. Daniel, ibid.

(7) When the Inhabitants of Mans submitted to Duke William, one of the Conditions was, That the County of Maine should be given to Robert; and King William made William likewise promise, immediately before his Expedition into England, that he would have the Dukedom of Normandy to Robert: Accordingly the great Men and Barons of Normandy did the young Prince Homage. But William meant that he would leave it to him after his death, and in case he were slain in his Attempt upon England. Robert, thinking it long, could not forbear once to put his Father in mind of his Promise; but King William gave him no other Answer, than, that he never used to sleep till he went to bed. S. Dunelm. p. 209. Ord. Vital. Huntingd. p. 404. Walsingham. l. 1. c. 430. P. Daniel, p. 113.

(8) Robert was an Abbot of his Brother William and Henry; upon which he repaired to Reims, and attempted to seize the Castle: But Robert being the Governor refused his Design. In the mean time, William having been informed of the whole Matter, hastened to Reims, from whence Robert fled, and then to Normandy, and to gather Forces together, which daily increased, by means of the Supplies the King of France sent him under hand; and for the Maintenance whereof his Mother Matilda, that loved him better than the rest of her Children, furnished him with Money secretly. Finding himself pursued by his Father, he desired King Philip to give him time to fly into his own Country, and he granted him. Robert, in the mean time, was attacked by his Father, and in a Sally that was made, Robert wounded him, &c. P. Daniel, p. 113, 114. Malm. p. 106. Huntingd. p. 404. Ord. Vital. Brompt. M. Paris, &c.

(9) One of the Sons of the King, was killed under him, his Son William wounded, and he lost abundance of Men. Sax. Ann. p. 1076. P. Daniel, p. 210. Malm. p. 206. Upon King William's Retreat, (which, as Mr. Trenchard p. 47. observes, was the only confidence one he ever received in his late) there followed several Intermittions in Bretagne, Anjou, Maine, and even in Normandy. But through the Mediation of several Norman and English Lords, and the Intercession of the King of France, William was reconciled to his Son. Ord. Vital. P. Daniel, p. 114.

(10) It was in the Year 1080, in Autumn. S. Dunelm. p. 211. And it was the Year before, 1079, in August, that Matilda breaking the Peace made, invaded Northumbria and as far as the River Tyne, killed a great many Men, and carried away Multitudes of Prisoners, returning home with her Spoils. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 211.

(11) In May 1080, Walscher Bishop of Durham, (to whom King William had, in 1075, committed the Care of Northumbria), was slain in Gateshead, by the Town, with a hundred Men, all French or Flemings. Which when King William heard of, he sent a great Party of his Men, with a great deal of Force to revenge it, who wasting a great part of Northumberland, killed all those whom he could find to have been any way concerned in it. Sax. Ann. p. 110. Malm. p. 110. Sax. Ann.—Walscher was succeeded by William, who was either the Founder of the University of Durham, or its first Bishop. Sax. Ann. p. 113.

(12) He went to the Fens, but not having sufficient Forces, he could do nothing. S. Dunelm. p. 211. Chron. p. 110. Brompt. p. 977.

(13) And he sent his Son as St. David's, compelling the Welsh to let at Liberty several Prisoners they had taken. Sax. Ann. p. 110. Canad. p. 110.

(14) Or at least Bideport, who was the chief Surveyor of the Building. See Tyndal, p. 47.

1078.
The King's Conduct during the Peace.

Malmsh.

M. West.
Sax. Ann.

Leges Guliel.

Malmsh.
Sax. Ann.

S. Dunelm.
Hoved.
Ingulph.

Dooms-day
Book.

The Peace with Scotland, and the Submission of the Welsh, introduced a State of Tranquillity which lasted some years. The King took the opportunity of this calm to settle the Affairs of the Kingdom. Since his accession to the Crown, England had been in extreme confusion, by reason of divers Alterations as well in the Government, as in the Laws and methods of administering Justice. But this confusion was still encreased with regard to the Debts of private Persons. The Creditors imagined, they who were put in possession of the Lands were to pay the Debts of those that were turned out, and accordingly to them were they sent by the Debtors. But the Possessors refused to meddle with matters that were liable to so many Frauds; and maintained, the King granted them the Lands free from all demands. Besides, the Jurisprudence of the Normans being different from that of the English, there was no knowing how to proceed, the King not having yet determined any thing on that subject. If he had made any Regulations, it was in cases where his own Advantage and Interest were concerned. As for private Persons, it does not appear that he had hitherto given himself much trouble about them. 'Tis true indeed, they who make it their Business to extol him on all occasions, remark the strict Justice that was exercised in his Reign, with respect to Crimes (1), as an argument of his Affection for his Subjects. But this proof is not so strong as they imagine, for this Strictness turned no less to the King's, than to the People's advantage; as the suffering Crimes to go unpunished must tend to the prejudice of the supreme Authority. Besides, Offences for the most part being then punishable by pecuniary Fines, all the profit accrued to the King, who had deprived the Earls, Barons, and Bishops of the share they enjoyed under the Saxon Kings (2).

However this be, it can't be denied that the King's predominant Passion was a greedy desire to heap up Riches. He was never weary with inventing new Expedients to gratify his covetous Temper (3). We have already seen how he impoverish'd the English. But in this he acted as much or more for the advantage of the Normans and other Foreigners, than for his own. He therefore judged it reasonable, that the Foreigners who were Proprietors of the Estates in England, should be liable to the same Impositions as the English. But that he might proceed in due Proportion, he wanted to know the Value of every Person's Estate. To this end he ordered an exact Survey to be taken of the Lands, Goods and Chattels of all his Subjects. This Survey contained the number of Acres in each man's Estate, what he was wont to pay in the Saxon Reigns, and how much he had been taxed of late years since the Revolution. Moreover, what Stock each had of Horses, Cattle, Sheep, &c. how much ready Money in his House, what he ow'd, and what was owing to him. All this was set down in great Order in a Book called Dooms-day Book, that is, The Book of the Day of Judgment, apparently to denote that the Means of the English were fitted in that Book, as the Actions of Mankind will be at that great Day. This general Register, which some term the Great Terrar, or Land-Book of England, was laid up in the Exchequer or King's Treasury, to be consulted upon occasion; that is, as an Historian expresses it, when it was required to know, of how much more Wool the English Flocks might be fleec'd. The King's strict orders to take this Survey with all possible exactness, were punctually executed (4), the Commissioners as well as private Persons, having cause to dread an exemplary punishment, in case they used any Fraud, or were guilty of the least Connivance on this occasion (5).

We may easily guess, this Survey was not taken purely to satisfy the King's Curiosity. The Taxes laid afterwards upon almost all the Effects of private Persons, were a clear Evidence that his Intent was to leave the English no more than what was absolutely necessary for their Subsistence. This Monarch, considering England as a conquered Country, imagined himself the Proprietor of all the Lands in the Kingdom, and that the vanquished were to receive what he was pleased to leave them, as a signal Favour. According to this Rule, 'tis easy to see, his Revenues were to be proportionable to the Estates of the English, and his own Avariciousness. Not to enter into a particular Account of the several Branches of his Revenues (6), it will suffice to observe, that it amounted annually to four hundred thousand Pounds Sterling, which Sum, according to a moderate computation, was equal to five Millions now of the same Money. Besides these settled Revenues, he had a great many Perquisites, as Mulcts and Fines, which were very frequent in those days. But what is further remarkable in this matter, is, that none of this Money was employed in paying the Army that was kept on foot. In the distribution of the Lands taken from the English, the King had taken care to charge them with the maintenance of his Troops. The new Proprietors were very willing to accept of the Estates upon that condition, since having no right, they were wholly indebted to his Liberality for them. By this means, he maintained, without any manner of charge to him, three-score thousand Men, ready to march upon the first notice. 'Tis not at all strange, he passed for the richest Prince in his time, since his Incomes vastly exceeded the Expence of his Household, in which he spent but a small part of the yearly Profits of the whole Kingdom.

After the King had thus settled his Revenues, he sought means to gratify another Passion, which was almost as strong as the former. I mean his fondness for Hunting, which caused him to commit a world of unjust Acts. By these Acts I don't understand those severe Laws he made on that account (7), though they were exceeding rigorous. This does not properly distinguish him from many other Princes, who look upon the Breaches of the Game-Laws, as a most capital Offence, and more readily pardon the killing of a Man than a Stag. What I speak of, was the prodigious Defolation King William ordered to be made in Hampshire, by dispeopling the Country for above thirty Miles in Compass, demolishing the Churches and Houses to make a Forest for the Habitation of wild 1078.

Pol. Virg.

The King's
R.
Brady.

Ord. Vitalis.
Sax. Ann.

1079.
The King extremely fond of Hunting.
M. Paris.
Sax. Ann.

Makes the New-Forest.
Knighton.

(1) During his Reign, People could go about any where safe and unmolested, even though they were loaded with Gold; whereas before, every Wood was a Nest of Robbers. Sax. Ann. M. West. p. 229. Brumpt.

(2) See the foregoing Dissertation, p. 151, 152. It does not appear that William abolished the County, Hundred, and other Courts, (which did not grow into disuse till King John's Reign. See St. Amand. p. 161.) or that he absolutely deprived the Ealdormen or Earls of the Profits that accrued to them from Fines, &c. But he seems rather by his Laws to have confirmed them in the Possession thereof. As for the Bishops, it is certain, that, whereas they used, under the Saxon Kings, to sit in the County, Hundred, and Sheriff's Courts, with the Earl or Sheriff, and there jointly determine both Ecclesiastical and Secular Causes; King William did in the year 1083, ordain, That no Bishop or Archdeacon should, for the future, hold Pleas in any of those Courts, concerning Episcopal Laws or Canons; but that every one who had transgressed the Episcopal Laws, should be judged in such place as the Bishop should appoint; which gave Rise to the Ecclesiastical Courts. The Order whereby the Bishops were deprived of this valuable Privilege, and had their Jurisdiction confined to spiritual Matters, is in Selden's Notes on Eadmer, p. 167. and Brady, Vol. II. p. 214.

(3) W. Malmshury owns that he was justly blameable upon that account, and that he had no regard for what he said or did, though never so unbecoming his Royal Character, so as he could but be a Gainer by it. Malmsh. p. 112. Sax. Ann.

(4) Yet this is not to exact a Survey, as some Historians would represent it, if we may judge of the rest by what Ingulphus, p. 79, relates about his own Monastery of Croyland. That the Commissioners were so kind and civil, as not to give in the true Value of it: And we may reasonably suppose that other Monasteries found the like favour. See Tyrell, p. 55.

(5) This Survey was begun in the year 1080, and finished in 1086. It was made by Verdict or Presentment of Juries, or certain Persons sworn in every Hundred, Wapentake, or County, before Commissioners, consisting of the greatest Earls or Bishops, who enquired into, and described as well the Possessions and Customs of the King, as of his great Men. They noted, what, and how much arable Land, Pasture, Meadow, and Wood every Man had, and what was the extent and value of them in the time of Edward the Confessor, (expressed by the Letters T. R. E. i. e. Tempore Regis Edwardi) and at the time of making the Survey. This Survey was made by Counties, Hundreds, Towns or Manors, Hides, Half-hides, Virgates, and Acres of Land, Meadow, Pasture, and Wood. Also they noted what Mills and Fisheries, and in some Counties what and how many Freeman, Socmen, Villains, Bordars, Servants, young Cattle, Sheep, Hogs, working Horses, &c. in every Town and Manor, and who they belonged to. Always setting down the King's Name first, then the Bishops, Abbots, and all the great Men that held of the King in chief. Brady, p. 205, 206. [See the Lists themselves in Brady, Vol. I. Appendix, No. 1. and Vol. II. No. 10. and Selden's Preface to Eadmer, p. 3—5.] This Survey was chiefly intended to give the King a true Account of his own Lands, or Demesnes, as also what were held by his Tenants in Capite. It is therefore no wonder, if many of those Towns or Villages, which were then held by their Feudatories or Under-Tenants, are quite left out and omitted in it. Some Cities and Towns of note are not mentioned therein, as any one may find, that will but take the Pains to compare it with an exact Catalogue of the ancient Towns and Villages in England, the greatest part of which he will not be able to find there. All England (except Wiltshire, Cumberland, and Northumberland,) was described, with part of Wales; and the Description or Survey written in two Books, called the Great and Little Domesday Book, now in the Exchequer. The little Book contains only Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex. This being the highest Record in the Kingdom, it was then (and is to this Day) a decisive Evidence in any Controversy in which there may be occasion to make use of it.

(6) They are set down by Brady as follows. 1. A Land-Tax, called Hidge, which he found here before his Arrival in the time of Edward the Confessor, or rather which he set up again. 2. Reliefs, or Fines for giving the Possession of Hereditary Fees, Assignment of Dower out of the Husband's Estate, Composition for Licence to marry, and to have the Wardships of Heirs, or Entrance upon Farms due to him from all Tenants in capite. Alio ponal Fines, Forfeitures of Goods, and pecuniary Mulcts for Crimes, &c. Tolls and Customs for Passage and Pontage, for Liberty of buying and selling; Exchequer, besides the ancient Customs upon Merchandise. 3. Crown Lands, being fourteen hundred and twenty-two Manors or Lordships in several Counties, besides abundance of Farms and Lands in Middlesex, Shropshire, Rutlandshire, in the last of which he had also a hundred and fifty Pounds of Rent in white Money. To which finally add Echeats and Forfeitures.—In short, his Revenue was so great, that Ordéricus Vitalis (p. 523.) says, it was reported to be one thousand and sixty Pounds of Sterling-Money, thirty Shillings and a Penny half-penny of the just Rents and Profits of England every day of the year, besides his Gifts and Presents, and pecuniary Punishments, which, if we reckon ten times as much now, according to the Rate of things in his time, his yearly Revenue amounted to 3,874,497 l. 16 s. 3 d. But allow it to be fifteen times so much now, as may very well be done, and not over-rate it, then his yearly Income was 5,811,746 l. 14 s. 4 d. half-penny, besides Free-gifts, Fines, and Amerciaments for Offences. Brady, Vol. II. p. 204—211.

(7) Namely, That whoever killed a Deer should have his Eyes put out. Sax. Ann. M. Paris, p. 9. Brumpt. p. 981.

1079. Beasts (1). If we may believe certain Historians, he did not make the owners of the Lands or Houses the least amends. This Tract of Land, called before Yene, was afterwards term'd the New-Forest. Some affirm, besides the diversion of Hunting, the King had another Inducement to depopulate these Parts. They pretend his aim was to give a free Access to the Troops, which, in case of Necessity, he might send for from Normandy. But this Motive, which seems to be very trifling, was doubtless invented by those, who, having entertained a great Idea of this Prince, were persuaded, he was guided in all his Actions by Prudence and Policy; as if Princes were not as subject to Passions as other men. Others observing, that two of his Sons (2) and one of his Grandsons (3) lost their Lives in this very Forest by extraordinary Accidents, conclude from thence, that Heaven took Vengeance for the Injuries done to the Proprietors of the Lands.

His Affection for Normandy. Brady. Tyrrel. The King's great Affection for Normandy was another of his governing Passions. Every thing practised there was, in his opinion, the Pattern of Perfection. Accordingly he endeavoured to abolish the Saxon Laws, and establish the Norman in their room (4). Perhaps he would have pushed this matter further, had it not been represented to him, that the Laws of England, bearing the name of his Benefactor, all the world would look with horror upon his Ingratitude. However, he made several Innovations in the English Laws, and the Methods of administering Justice. For instance, he would not suffer the Bishops to preside at the Shire-gemots, or County-Courts, but assigned them a Court of their own. His pretence for so doing was, that the Ecclesiastical matters might not be intermixed with the Civil. But the true Motive was, because he had a mind to deprive the Bishops of their share of the Fines and Mulcts. He erected also several Courts before unknown to the English (5), and which were very inconvenient to them. They were not only ignorant of the Rules and Practices of these Courts; but, as they always attended the Prince, the Suitors were obliged to follow him wherever he went, to prosecute their Suits. Amongst these several Courts there was one however which became very advantageous to the People; since it was designed to moderate the Rigour of the Laws by Equity, I mean, the Court of Exchequer, which is still in being (6).

King William was not satisfied with obliging the English to try their Causes in these Courts, but forced them also to make use of the Norman Language, and did all he could to abolish the English Tongue. With this view it was he erected in all the Cities and Boroughs Schools (7) where Norman was taught, and obliged Parents under heavy Penalties to send their Children thither. I have elsewhere observed the Nature of the Norman Language, which was very difficult, and hard to be understood by the French themselves, by reason of the great mixture of Danish with the French. However, the King was so bent to introduce his native Tongue, that he made it his chief business. They who had any concerns at Court, and did not speak Norman, were looked upon with an evil eye, as Persons that had no complaisance for the King. The most effectual means he made use of to oblige the English to learn Norman, was the publishing his Laws in that Tongue (8), the Ignorance of which was no sufficient Excuse for the Violators. Some have accused him of acting in this par-

(1) There were thirty six Parish Churches demolished. In this Forest are now nine Walks, and to every one a Keeper, two Rangers, a Bow-bearer, and a Lord-Warden. On the North side of Malswood Castle is the Oak that buds on Christmas Day, and withers again before Night. Camden Add. to Hampt.

(2) Richard his second Son, and William Rufus. Camden Ord. Vital. Sandford Malmsh. p. 111.

(3) Richard's son Duke Robert. Malmsh. Add. S. Dunelm. p. 225.

(4) This is more than is advanced by the ancient Historians: William had indeed the Laws translated into French, but still these were the Laws of the Land, and the Statutes of the English Kings. For this, we have the Authority of Inglulphus. Ipsam etiam Idiomata tantum abhorrebat [Normanni] quod leges terras, statutaque Anglorum Regum lingua Gallica tractarentur, p. 71. Sir Edward Coke says, King William I. liked the English Law so well, that he caused it to be written in the Norman Tongue, and established great part of it in Normandy. But there is no Authority for This, it not being mentioned by any coeval Historian or other Writer, either of England or Normandy. It will not be amiss to insert here the Observation or Conjecture of a learned Gentleman collected by Madox, p. 123. Hist. of the Exchequer. It seemed to him, by the Course of English History, and otherwise, that after the Norman Conquest, there ensued a great Alteration in the old English Laws, Manners and Usages. Nevertheless, that Alteration with reference to the Laws, was not completely brought about and settled till the Reign of Henry II. The Reign of William I. was mostly employed in quelling the Disorders and Insurrections of his English Subjects, and in getting and securing to himself and his Heirs, a full and safe Possession of the Regal and other Revenues of England. The next King (viz. William II.) reigned under a Title extollable by the just Pretensions of his elder Brother Robert; yet being a stately, replete and subtle Prince, partly by Power, and partly by Policy, he kept the English under the Yoke, and continued to strengthen himself in the new Acquisitions, and to form the Laws and Manners of this Country after the Norman Fashion. The next King (viz. Henry I.) was a mild Book-learned Prince, and reigned likewise for several Years under a disputed Title: He continued, as far as his Affairs would permit, to establish the Norman Laws and Customs, as William I. and William II. had done. In his Time many of the Anglo-Norman Lords, who had great Estates in Normandy as well as in England, might probably be, and were inclinable to favour the Title and Interests of Robert Earl of Normandy, which might give Umbrage to King Henry. King Henry to win the Affections of the English Natives, who made the Bulk of the People, and thereby to check or balance the Anglo-Norman Lords, commanded a Body of Laws to be compiled, which were agreeable to the Laws of the old English, or Anglo-Saxon Kings, and called the Laws of Henry I. However, these Laws of Henry I. relate chiefly to Criminal Matters, and were never, for ought that appears, duly published, much less put in practice amongst the English. The Reign of the next King (viz. Stephen) was nothing in effect but a State of War. Henry II., the next Successor, came to the Crown by an undoubted Title, and surpassed all his Ancestors in Power and Extent of Dominion; he was King of England, Earl or Duke of Normandy, Lord of Ireland, Aquitain, and the Aquitanick Tract of Land; inasmuch that he was at that Time the greatest King in Christendom. This Prince did put the last or finishing Hand to the Norman Establishment, or in special to the Alteration thereby made in the English Laws; as will in some measure appear from these Considerations following; namely, The Statutes or Constitutions of Clarendon, made in, or about the Eleventh Year of Henry II., are, both for Phrase and Substance, more entirely Normannick than any Laws or Publick Acts from the Conquest to that Time. And Thomas Becket Archbishop of Canterbury, who was the first native Englishman that had been Archbishop of that See, since the Conquest, opposed certain Articles of those Constitutions, as they were, in his Opinion, prejudicial or derogatory to the supposed Rights of the Clergy, and to the old Law and Usages of the English Nation. The Norman Laws, and Customs were settled by constant use during the Reign of Henry II.; and at the latter end of his Reign Ranulf de Glanville, a great Man in the Law, and a Justice, drew up a Compendium of the Laws of England, fitted for publick use; which he probably did by the King's Command, that it might serve as a Guide or System for the Direction of such as dealt in Law-proceedings; and this System of Glanville's, is in effect nothing else but a Transcript of the Norman Law; as will readily appear to any Man who pleases to compare it with the Grand Customier of Normandy. In fine, this Normannick Model of Laws continued, and was indeed firmly settled in England during the Reigns of Henry II., and his two Sons, Richard and John, and of the succeeding Kings, being the Alterations that were made therein, at the end of the Reign of King John, in the Reign of Henry III., and in subsequent Ages.

(5) These several Courts were only the King's Court, and the Exchequer.

(6) At, and some time after the Conquest, it does not appear that there was more than one supreme ordinary Court of Judicature, namely, Curia Regis, or the King's Court, which was always at the Place of his Residence. At his Court, more especially at some Solemnities of the Year, the King held his Great Councils, and transacted Affairs of great Importance, attended by his great Lords and Barons. There Coronations, &c. were celebrated: There was placed the Throne, a sovereign ordinary Court of Judicature, wherein Justice was administered to the Subjects: and there the Affairs of the Royal Revenue were managed. To the King's Court belonged the following great Officers. I. The Chief Justice. He was next the King in Power and Authority, and in his Absence governed the Realm as Viceroy. If the King was not present in Person, in Curia Regis, he was chief Judge both in criminal and civil Causes. II. The Constable, or Comptabularius Regis, or Anglicus. He was a high Officer both in War and Peace. This Office was antiently Hereditary. III. The Marshal. This Office was also still Hereditary. As an Officer in the King's Court he was to provide for the Security of the King's Person in his Palace, to distribute Lodgings there, to preserve Peace and Order in the King's Household, and assist in determining Controversies there, &c. IV. Seneſchall or Steward. This Office was likewise Hereditary. He is called in Latin, Dapifer. V. The Chamberlain, or Camerarius Regis. It may be observed, the great Officers are distinguished from the subordinate Offices of the same Name, by the Epithet of Magistratus, Magisterium. As the Office of King's Chamberlain is called Magister Camerarius, in like manner, Magistra Marescallaria, &c. VI. The Chancellor, who was usually styled Cancellarius Regis, to distinguish him from the inferior Chancellors of Dioceſes, &c. Little is said of his Office. However, we find he was wont to supervise the Charters to be sealed by the King's Seal, and likewise to supervise and seal the Acts and Precepts that issued in Proceedings depending in Curia Regis. He was one of the King's prime Counsellors. VII. The Treasurer. He was for the most part a Prelate or Ecclesiastical Person. For some time after the Conquest, the Justice used to do many Acts, afterwards pertaining to the Treasurer's Office. The Curia Regis, where all the Liege-men of the Kingdom repaired for Justice, was undoubtedly established in England by the Normans, there being no notice of any such Court in the Anglo-Saxon Times. All Pleas or Causes then were determined below in a plain manner, in the Courts within the several Counties, Towns or Districts. And indeed at first there were but few Causes referred to the King's Courts after the Conquest, till the Norman Lords who were possessed of the large Seignories, carried it with so high a Hand towards their Vassals and Neighbours, that the latter could not have Right done them in the ordinary way, and so were constrained to seek for Justice in the King's Court. And thus was likewise done when Contentions arose between the great Lords themselves. However, few or no Causes were brought thither without permission, and the Party's making Fine to the Crown to have his Plea in Curia Regis. These were sometimes called oblata, or voluntary Fines. When the Pleas in the King's Court became very numerous, there were certain Justices appointed to go Itors through the Realm, to determine Pleas and Causes within several Counties. These were vested with great Authority. It is not known when these were first instituted: But they were new-modelled, and their new Circuits appointed by Henry II. A Branch of the King's Court was the Exchequer. It was a sort of subaltern Court, resembling in its Model the Curia Regis. For in it presided and sat the great Officers above-mentioned, and sometime the King himself. It was called Scaccarium, because a chequered Cloth, figured like a Chess-board, was antiently wont to be laid on the Table in the Court; which Custom continues to this Day. This Court is thought to be first instituted about the Time of the Conquest, though it is not known for certain. The great Persons that assisted at this Court were called Barones Scaccarii. To these was left the Care and Management of the Crown Revenue, &c. The Chief Justice let to farm the King's Manors, held Pleas at the Exchequer, and made due Allowances to the Accomptants. The other great Officers had likewise their part in Affairs transacted at the Exchequer. As to Causers, the Exchequer at first was also a Court having Jurisdiction in Common-Pleas. Matters remained in this Posture till the Division of the King's Court, and Separation of the Common-Pleas from it, of which notice shall be taken hereafter. Madox's Hist. of the Excheq.

(7) This is more than can be found in the ancient Historians. He ordered indeed French to be taught in all Schools, as Inglulph testifies, Ipsam Idiomata tantum abhorrebat, quod pueri etiam in Scholis principia Literarum Grammaticæ Gallicæ ac non Anglice traderentur, p. 71. But this does not prove that he erected those Schools.

(8) The single Instance of his Laws being in French in Inglulph, is of no considerable Force; for the Laws of King Edward confirmed by King William, were written in Latin, and not in French; as were also the Body of Laws of this King granted by way of a Charter. The like may be said concerning those of his Successors. For all our antient Laws and Statutes, from the Reign of King Henry I. to the Statute of Wylmester, which was made in the Third Year of Edward I., are drawn up in Latin, and none of them in French; as are also all their Charters, except some few of the three first Norman Kings, which are either written in English Saxon alone, or in Latin with the English Version under them. Tyrrel's Introduction to Vol. II. p. 61.

1080. ticular from a worse Motive. They pretend his Aim was to inflame the English by causing them to commit Offences which were generally punished by Mults and Confiscations to his use. But supposing this were not so, as it must be confessed it cannot be proved, his covetous Temper, and all his other ways to heap up riches, are but too just grounds for such an Accusation.

To return to the Norman Language. There are those who affirm, that in spite of all his Pains the King could not introduce it into England. On the contrary, they maintain, the Normans by degrees learnt to speak English, their small number being carried away by the bulk of the Nation. Others, who are of a contrary Opinion, endeavour to demonstrate the Norman Tongue was established upon the Ruins of the English. But it is difficult for either to prove their Assertions. Thus much is certain, the Language spoken in England after the Conquest, was not exactly the same with what was used in the time of the Saxon Kings. However, the Normans can't be said to learn English, or the English to admit of Norman, but rather out of the two Languages was formed a third, which was neither one nor other, but partook of both. Nevertheless, all publick Acts were in Norman till Edward the Third's Time (1).

Remark on
the English Tongue.

1081.
The King's Partiality
for the Normans.
Ingulph.
p. 86.

The King's Partiality to the Normans was so great, that he could not forbear showing it upon all occasions. Ingulphus, Abbot of Croyland, gives us an Instance which deserves notice. He says, he appeared one day before the Council, where the King was present, to demand certain Lands belonging to his Monastery (2), then in possession of Talboys a Norman, who had settled there some Monks of his own Nation. The King, continues the Historian, examining the original Charter or Grant of the Abby-Lands, judged at first that the Demand was right and just. But Talboys alledging in his defence, that the Monks settled on these Lands were Normans, and hearty Friends to the King, whereas those of Croyland were English, this single Argument was sufficiently strong to induce the King to give sentence in favour of the Normans. Herein, he was biased by his natural Inclination and Interest. The former made him favour his own Nation, and the latter inclined him to put it as much as possible out of the power of the English to revolt.

Odo aspires to the Papacy.

1082.
Ord. Vital.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.

What has been hitherto said of the Oppressions of the English, suffices to show, they did not complain without cause. Perhaps their impatient Behaviour occasioned these Oppressions. But, be this as it will, 'tis certain they were extremely impoverished, whilst they beheld the Normans enriched by their Spoils. A single Instance will demonstrate how much they were pillaged by those who were most in favour with the King. Odo Bishop of Bayeux, his half-Brother, after an abode of fifteen or sixteen Years in England, thought himself rich enough to purchase the Papacy. To that end, he bought a stately Palace at Rome, where he designed to reside and convey all his Treasures, that he might be ready upon the Pope's Death to put his Design in execution. Mean time, as he was willing to conceal his Intentions, he took the opportunity to begin his Journey during the King his Brother's absence in Normandy, and went to the Isle of Wight, where his Ships lay ready for him. Contrary Winds preventing him from embarking so soon as he expected, he was forced to remain some time in the Isle. His Stay there broke all his measures. The King having intelligence of his Design, came over with all speed, and surprised him just as he was going to sail. He ordered him to be seized immediately. But finding Fear and Respect hindered his Officers from doing their Duty, he laid hands on him himself. In vain did the Prelate plead the Privileges of his Order. The King told him, he seized him not as Bishop, but as Earl of Kent,

The King
seizes him, and confis-cates his Estate.

and commanded him to Prison, this Seizure was quickly followed with a Confiscation of all his Effects to the King's use, the Prelate being convicted of numberless Extortions and Rapines (3).

Nothing remarkable happening in the rest of this, and the next year, I shall proceed to the Occurrences of the Year 1084, in which we meet with the Death of Queen Matilda (4), and the King's Preparations against an Invasion he was threatened with. The English who had taken refuge in Denmark, persuaded King Canute that their Countrymen waited only for an Opportunity to throw off the Norman Yoke. The present Juncture seeming very favourable, he formed a Project to conquer England, to which he had some Pretensions, that being supported with Force, appeared very plausible. To this end he fitted out a Fleet (5), and levied Troops, whose Numbers plainly showed he had some great Design in hand. Those Preparations gave King William some uneasiness; the advices from Denmark putting it out of doubt that this Armament was designed against him. As he durst not confide in the English, he brought into the Kingdom a numerous Army of Foreigners (6), and laid upon his Subjects a Tax of Six Shillings upon every Hide of Land, which was three times as much as Dane-gelt used to be. Whether Canute was diverted from his purpose by the Preparations in England, or by some other unexpected Affairs (7), he gave it over without making any Attempt. The King, on his part, disbanded his Army (8); but the Money, levied for their pay, was not restored. On the contrary, he imposed a new Tax, on account of the Order of Knighthood, he intended to confer on Henry his youngest Son (9). The Norman Custom of making the Prince Presents, when he knighted any of his Sons, tended too much to the King's Benefit for him to neglect to introduce it into England, where it was never practised before (10).

1082.

1084.
Death of the Queen.
Malmsh.
Hoved.
Ingulph.
King of Denmark
about to invade England.
S. Dunelm.
Malmsh.

Fl. Wig.
Hoved.
Huntingd.

The State of England.
Malmsh.

It was not difficult for the King to lay what Burthens he pleased on his Subjects, since he was sure to be obeyed in whatever he enjoined. The Normans took care not to oppose his Will, for fear of losing their Estates the same way they acquired them, I mean, by a bare Act of his good Pleasure; and the English were unable to throw off his oppressive Yoke. There was scarce a Lord of that Nation, but what was imprisoned or banished. If any still preserved their Liberty, they were watched so narrowly, that the least Opposition, or the least Suspicion given the King, was sufficient to ruin them. Edgar Atheling, who seemed the most formidable, subsisted entirely upon his Pension from the King. Besides, since his voluntary Submission to the Conqueror, he had forfeited the Hearts and Affection of the English, who looked upon him now with the utmost contempt. An Historian even assures us, he was in some measure stupid. And for proof alledges, that for a Horse presented him by the King, he remitted the Pension given him for his Livelihood. The ill State of his Affairs, and perhaps the Fear of falling a Sacrifice to the King's Suspicions, made him resolve to go into the East and bear Arms against the Infidels (11). The King readily giving him Leave, he set out attended with two hundred Knights, who having lost their Estates in England, were willing to seek their fortune elsewhere. Having spent two Years in the Eastern parts, where, 'tis pretended, he signalized himself by many brave Actions, he returned to England, regardless of the Estates and Honours offered him by the Emperor of Constantinople.

1085.

Edgar goes into the East.
Malmsh.
S. Dunelm.

Edgar's Departure freeing the King from all uneasiness on his account, every one imagined, that Monarch would for the future turn his thoughts to Peace, to which he was a Stranger almost from his very Birth. Besides, he 1086.

William
wars against France.
Malmsh.

(1) Till the Thirty third of that King. As for Pleadings in French, they were in use only in the King's own Court (now called the King's Bench) or else in the Exchequer; but in interior Courts in the County, where far the greater part of the Law-Business of the Kingdom was dispatched, it was otherwise. The antientest Law-Books we have, viz. Glancvil, Bracton, and Fleta, are in Latin; the first we can find in French being Bracton, and Herr's Mirror of Justice, both which were written in the time of Edward I, when it became very much the Fashion to write, not only our Laws in French, but our very Parliament-Rolls of Edward III, and great part of Richard III's Reign in that Language. The Reason of which Mr. Tyler goes on to assign. p. cii. Introduction.

(2) The Cell of Spalding. Ingulph, p. 71, 86.
(3) Odo had engaged Hugh Earl of Chesler, with a great many Knights and other Persons of Quality, to attend him in his Journey to Rome. Ord. Vital. He was sent Prisoner to Normandy, and being set at Liberty after the Death of William I. went along with Duke Robert to Jerusalem, where he died at the Siege of Antioch. S. Dunelm. p. 212. Malmsh. p. 112.

(4) She died on the first of November, after a lingering Illness; and was buried in the Nunnery of the Holy Trinity near Caen, which she had founded. Ord. Vital. Brompt. p. 977. Malmsh. p. 111. See her Epitaph in Sandsford, p. 3, 4. out of Orderic Vital. p. 647.

(5) Consisting of above sixteen hundred Ships. Malmsh. p. 107.

(6) Of French and Normans, which he quartered all about England; and ordered the Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, Viscounts, &c. to find them in Provisions. He ordered at the same the maritime Places to be laid waste, that the Enemy, at their first landing, might find no Sustainance. S. Dunelm. p. 213. Malmsh. p. 107. Brompt. p. 978. Ingulph. p. 79, &c.

(7) He was detained by contrary Winds for near two years together. Malmsh. p. 107.

(8) He sent back part of the Army, and kept the rest with him all the Winter. S. Dunelm. p. 213.

(9) He was knighted in Westminster Week, at Westminster, where the King held his Court. Soon after King William ordered the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, Viscounts, cum suis militibus, to attend him at Salisbury, on the first of August, where he made them all swear Fealty to him. And from thence went to the Isle of Wight, in order to pass into Normandy; and whilst he lay there, he extorted a great Sum of Money from his Subjects, not minding whether he did it right or wrong; and so he went into Normandy. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 213. Brompt. p. 979, 980. M. Paris, &c.

(10) Among the antient Aids payable to the King from the immediate Tenants of the Crown (and likewise to inferior Lords from their immediate Tenants), were these three, namely, To make his eldest Son a Knight, to marry his eldest Daughter, and to ransom his Person when taken in War. It does not appear what Author Rapin follows in saying this Aid was levied by the Conqueror, to make his youngest Son a Knight, which was never practised. Neither is it mentioned in Madox, or other authentick Authors. See Madox, Ch. xv. Hist. of the Exch.

(11) Along with Robert Earl Godwin's Son. Malmsh. p. 103. His Sister Cristina was, before this, veiled a Nun in the Monastery of Rumsey in Hampshire. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. Brompt. &c.

1086. was grown so corpulent and unwieldy, that a quiet Life seemed absolutely necessary for him. But he was far from any such thought. All on a sudden he is seen to make extraordinary Preparations, which plainly shewed he was meditating some great Undertaking. Philip, King of France, easily guessed this Armament was designed against him. And indeed, quickly after, King William sets out for Normandy, in order to make fierce War with France (1). But Philip prevented the impending Storm, by offering Proposals, which were followed by a Truce. The King, whose Corpulency was extremely troublesome to him, taking this opportunity to go through a Course of Physick, a Jest of King Philip occasioned the breaking of the Truce. This Prince asking one that was come from Roan, Whether the King of England was delivered yet of his great Belly? King William, being informed of it, sent him word (2), as soon as he was up again, he would come and offer in the Church of Notre-Dame at Paris, ten thousand Lances by way of Wax-lights (3). His Words were soon followed by Deeds; for marching in the very hottest time of the Summer (4), he ravaged le Vexin in a terrible manner, and then laid Siege to Mantes. He was so provoked, that after taking the City, he reduced it to ashes, without sparing the very Churches, in one of which two Hermits were burnt (5). The warmth of the Season, and the great Fire, which he stood very near to see his Orders executed, threw him into a Fever, which interrupted his Progress. This was attended with another accident, no less fatal to him. Whilst he was on the road in his return to Roan, leaping a Ditch on Horse-back, he so bruised the Rim of his Belly against the Pommel of the Saddle, that the Violence of the Blow very much increased his Fever. After this Accident, not being able to mount his Horse, he was carried in a Litter to Roan, where he grew worse and worse. As soon as he found he was near his End, he began seriously to reflect on all the past Actions of his Life, and view them in a different Light from what he had hitherto done. He ordered large Sums to be given to the Poor and the Churches, particularly for rebuilding those he had burnt at Mantes. He set at Liberty all the Prisoners, among whom were Morcar and Ulnoth (6). This last, Brother to King Harold, had been detained in Prison in Normandy from his Childhood when he was given in Hostage by Earl Goodwin to Edward the Confessor. It was much more difficult to obtain the like Favour of the King for the Bishop of Bayeux his Brother, because he had sworn never to release him. However, he was prevailed upon by the Importunities of the Bishop's Friends (7). His Distemper, which daily increased, leaving him no hopes of Recovery, he ordered his principal Officers to stand round his Bed, and notwithstanding his Weakness, made them a long Discourse, wherein he greatly extolled the Reputation he had gained by his warlike Actions. Nevertheless, he could not forbear owning, he had unjustly usurped the Crown of England, and was guilty of all the Blood spilt upon that occasion. Adding, as he would not presume to bequeath a Crown, which of Right did not belong to him, he left it to God's disposal: but if he might have his Wish, William, his second Son, should wear it after him. In his Will, which he made just before he died (8), he left Normandy to his eldest Son Robert, not so much out of Affection (9), as because he foresaw great Obstacles in the execution of his Will, should he have ordered it otherwise. Henry his third Son, had for his share an Annuity of five thousand Marks (10); with all his Mother's Effects (11); this was all his Portion. It is said, the young Prince complaining that he was so ill provided for, the King told him, by a prophetick Spirit, he should one day be King of England, and excell his Brothers in Glory and Riches. But one can hardly believe, God so intimately revealed himself to such a Prince as this (12).

Though the dying King left his Crown to God's disposal, he did all that lay in his power to procure it for his second Son. He wrote upon that subject to Lanfranc a very pressing Letter (13), which he ordered his Son William, even before his Death, to carry himself. No doubt, he thought that Prince would meet with too strong an Opposition in England, in case necessary Measures were not taken before-hand, to gain the Consent of the Normans and English. Having thus settled his Temporal Affairs, he caused himself to be removed to Hermetrude, a Village near Roan, that he might be more at Liberty to think of his Spiritual Concerns. Here this Prince ended his Days on the ninth of September, in the Sixty fourth Year of his Age, after a Reign of Fifty two Years in Normandy, and Twenty one in England (14). If some of his Historians are to be credited, he expressed on his Death-bed a hearty Sorrow for all the Injuries he had done the English. His Body was removed to Caen without any Ceremony, and deposited in the Abbey-Church, built by himself, where he had chosen to lie. Robert, his eldest Son, being then in Germany, and William in England, his youngest Son Henry took care of his Funeral. The Corps was but meanly attended for so great a Prince, his principal Officers having abandoned him before he expired, some to make their Court to Robert, others to William (15). An extraordinary Adventure rendered the Funeral of this Monarch very remarkable. Just as they were going to lay him in his Grave, [Anselm Fitz-Arthur] a Norman Gentleman, stands up and forbids the Burial in that Place, claiming the Ground as his Inheritance, and alledging, the deceased had built the Church upon it, without paying him for it. Whereupon, they were forced to stop, according to the Laws of the Country, in order to examine this Pretension; which proving well grounded, Henry was obliged to make the Gentleman Satisfaction (16), and then the Corps was interred (17).

Thus lived and died William I. surnamed the Bastard and Conqueror, if this last Title may be justly ascribed to him, which all Historians are not agreed in. They that maintain this Title perfectly suits with him, ground their Opinion upon his having no Right to the Crown, and the Severity of his Government, which was all along Arbitrary. Others affirm, his Election entirely cancelled his Right of Conquest. This uncertainty gives occasion to compare him to the Emperor Augustus, of whom it is said, that he came to the Empire neither by Conquest nor Usurpation, nor Inheritance, nor Election, but by a strange mixture of these Rights. However this be, or in what manner soever King William may be accused or justified upon this head, he kept Possession of the Throne, by such Politick Methods as are practised by the most able Princes, but which are seldom consonant to the Maxims of Justice and Equity.

This Prince's Character is variously drawn by the Historians, according to the different Faces, under which they were pleased to view him. Some considering him only as a Conqueror of a great Kingdom, extoll him to the skies for his Valour and Prudence, and slightly pass over the rest of his Actions. Others considering the same Conquest as a real Usurpation, and reflecting chiefly on the Means he made use of to preserve it, scruple not to represent him as a real Tyrant. It is certain, they may be all in the right, since there was in this Monarch a great mixture of good and bad Qualities. He was reckoned one of the wisest Princes of his time. Ever vigilant and active, he shewed as great Resolution in executing, as Boldness in forming his Designs. He saw Danger at a distance, and generally endeavoured to prevent it. But when that could not be done, no Man faced it with greater Intrepidity. On the other hand, his extreme covetous Temper, and Partiality to his Countrymen, led him to the commission of many things, which can hardly be justified.

(1) He would have been, long before, revenged of the King of France, for assisting his Son Robert, and exciting him to frequent Revolts; if he had not been afraid of a Civil War in Normandy, which might have been attended with another in England; both which would have found him more Work than he could well have dispatched. But at last, in the Year 1087, they came to Blows. Robert was the occasion of it; for he revolted again, and retired to the King of France, who furnished him with Troops, wherewith he ravaged Normandy. W. Gemeticen. l. 7. c. 43. P. Daniel, Vol. III. p. 115.

(2) Swearing by the Resurrection and Splendor of God, his usual Oath. Malmsh. p. 112.

(3) Alluding to the Custom of lying-in Women in those Days, who were wont to offer lighted Candles at their Churching.

(4) In August. Malmsh. p. 112. Sax. Ann.

(5) The English Historians say two Nuns. Huntingd. p. 370. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. &c.

(6) And Roger and Steward, surnamed Barn. S. Dunelm. p. 213.

(7) Particularly of his Brother Robert Earl of Mortaigne. Ord Vitalis.

(8) And which is extant in Ord. Vitalis, as also among Camdeni Anglica, Normannica, &c.

(9) Malmsh. says, that he did it much against his Will, — involuntus & coactus — Malmsh. p. 112. M. Wilm. See Ord Vitalis.

(10) Vitalis says, he left him only 5000 Marks in Money.

(11) He had his Mother's Possessions, viz. the County of Maine, and Money and Jewels which amounted to a very great Sum. Brompt. p. 980. Inq. p. 13.

(12) Malmsh. p. 112. M. Wilm.

(13) He left part of his Treasure to some poor English, and to several Churches and Monasteries in England. Brompt. p. 980.

(14) Epistolam de constituendo Rege Lect. Ord Vitalis.

(15) He reigned twenty Years ten Months, and twenty six Days, reckoning from the Battle of Hastings. R. de Diesto, p. 488. M. Wilm.

(16) And the inferior Officers fell a plundering whatever stood in their way, so that the King's Corpse was left almost naked. Ord Vitalis.

(17) He paid him sixty Shillings for the Place where the Grave was, and promised to see him farther satisfied for the rest of the Ground. Ord Vitalis. Malmsh.

(18) M. Paris, p. 11. says, he paid him a hundred Pounds of Silver.

(19) William Rufus caused a most stately Monument to be erected for his Father, before the High-Altar of St. Stephen's Monastery, which was adorned with Gold, Silver, and precious Stones. This stately Monument stood till the Year 1562, and then Chastillon taking the City of Caen, certain Soldiers opening it, and not finding the Treasure they expected, broke it to pieces, and threw about William's Bones; some whereof were afterwards brought into England. But the Monks in the Year 1642, in the Place thereof caused a plain Altar-Tomb to be built. See the Figure of it in Sandford, p. 7.

1087.

Malmsh.

Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.

In his younger years, he was handsome and well proportioned. He had rather a stern and majestick, than a mild and taking countenance; however, he could sometimes put on such sweetness and gentleness in his looks, as were hardly to be refuted. We may guess his great strength and vigour from Historians assuring us, none but himself could bend his Bow. The same Historians are very much divided concerning his chastity. Some say, he was very much addicted to Women in his youth: Others tell us, his little inclination that way, gave occasion to call his manhood in question. Some affirm, after he was married, he never gave his Queen cause to be jealous. Others assure us, he kept for his mistress a Clergyman's daughter, whom Matilda ordered to be ham-stringed. Be this as it will, after he was on the throne of England, Hunting was observed to be his sole diversion. His household was perfectly well regulated; but his expenses were not answerable to his greatness and riches. Nevertheless, upon solemn occasions, he loved magnificence, and took a pleasure in appearing in all his grandeur. Seldom did he fail of being crowned every year (1), at the three great feasts of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, which he generally spent at Gloucester, Winchester, and Westminster. During these festivals he kept a splendid court, was much more easy of access and liberal of his favours. The great Men of the kingdom (2) were usually about him whilst these solemnities lasted; but one can hardly believe it was in order to hold a Wittena-Gemot or Parliament, as some do pretend (3). And indeed, there is no likelihood, that after depriving the English of their estates, he should leave them in possession of the greatest of their privileges. It is still less probable he would transfer this right to foreigners, since he was at liberty to grant them the English estates on what terms he pleased. Now it is certain, his temper was such, that he would never voluntarily render himself dependant on his own Subjects. However this be, if the Saxon Wittena-Gemot subsisted in his reign, it may at least be affirmed, its authority was very limited, and its nature very different from what it had been.

There are Historians who greatly commend this Prince's clemency, on account of his being very often satisfied with punishing the English rebels, by the confiscation of their estates. It cannot be denied, what they say is true, with regard to persons of the first rank. Indeed, except Earl Walthoff, who was publicly beheaded, and Egelwin Bishop of Durham, who was starved in prison, we don't find any of the principal English Lords put to death in this reign. But his clemency with respect to persons of a lower rank cannot be justly extolled. It is certain he punished great numbers with death, put out the eyes or cut off the hands of many others, and condemned multitudes to perpetual imprisonment for very slight crimes. All the Historians unanimously upbraid him with the death of Earl Walthoff, as an action the most heinous; since he beheaded him for what he had already pardoned. But this severity was in some measure balanced by his moderation to Prince Edgar, who had furnished him with sufficient pretences to sacrifice him to his jealousy. Perhaps, the little merit of this Prince was the sole motive of this moderation; since the King never considered him as a very formidable rival. However, I think he ought to be praised for his clemency in this respect, since the motive is unknown. How little formidable soever Edgar might be, with regard to his personal qualities, he can't be denied to be so on account of his birth. He was the only surviving Prince of the royal family of the Saxons, and as he served for a cloak to several insurrections, the King could not be entirely assured of him.

King William had by Matilda, daughter to the Earl of Flanders, four Sons and five Daughters. Robert was Duke of Normandy. Richard was killed by a Stag in the new Forest, or, as others say, by a distemper caught in hunting, of which he died in his Father's life-time (4). William mounted the throne of England, and was succeeded by Henry his Brother. Cicely his eldest daughter was Abbess of the Holy-Trinity at Caen. Constance was married to Alan Fergeant Duke of Bretagne. Adela was wife to Stephen Earl of Blais, and by him had a Son of the same name, whom we shall see King of England. Adeliza, promised to Harold, died young (5). Alphonso King of Gallicia married the fifth, whose name was Agatha (6). She is said to remain a Virgin after marriage, and, being entirely devoted to the service of God, spent her days in the constant exercise of Prayer (7).

2. WILLIAM

(1) He wore his Crown; that is, kept his Court, or Great Councils then.

(2) The great Men of the whole Kingdom, namely, the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Thanes, and Knights. Sax. Ann. Malmsh. p. 112. Knighton, p. 2354.

(3) And yet this is what Brady, who was no great Friend to those Assemblies, thinks fit to own. The Conqueror, says he, commonly kept the Easter at Winchester, &c. as above, p. 178. Note (6), at which time were present in Court, all the temporal Nobility, Bishops, Abbots, &c. through all England; so that at those Festivals he could call a Great Council, or Synod, at a Day's warning, and at those times were commonly held the Great Councils for all publick Affairs. Brady, Vol. II. p. 214. Note (6). The same is also confirmed by the late learned Mr. Madox. At his Court, and more especially at some solemn times in the year, the King held his Great Councils, and ordinarily transacted such Affairs as were of great Importance, or required Pomp and Solemnity, according to the Custom of the Times. See p. 178. Note (6). The Baronage attending on his royal Person made a considerable part of his Court. They were his Homagers; they held their Baronies of him; he was their Sovereign or chief Lord, and they were his Men, as to Life, Limb, and earthly Honour. With them the King consulted in weighty Affairs, and did many solemn Acts in their presence, and with their concurrence. Madox, Hist. of the Exchequer. p. 2.---6. The Places at which King William is recording to have held his Court, are as follow: In the year 1069, at York. (Ord. Vitalis.) In 1072, at Winchester, at Easter; and the Whitsuntide following at Windsor. In 1074, at Westminster. (S. Dunelm. p. 209.) In 1084, at Christmas, he held it (de more) at Gloucester. In 1085, at Winchester at Easter; at Whitsuntide at London. (Huntingd. p. 370.) And at Christmas (de more) at Gloucester, for five days, where he was attended by his great Men; and the Clergy afterwards held a Synod for three days. (Sax. Ann. Brompt. p. 979.) In 1086, at Winchester at Easter; and at Whitsuntide at Westminster. (Sax. Ann.) See Madox's Hist. of Excheq. p. 5, 6.

(4) W. Malmsh. p. 111, says, he was a very promising Youth. He was buried on the South-side of the Choir of the Cathedral Church of Winchester. His Epitaph is, Hic jacet Ricardus Willi. Senioris Regis Fili. & Beorn. Dux. i. e. Duke of Bernay in Normandy. See the Figure of his Tomb in Sandford, p. 8.

(5) Rapin, mislled by Baker, or other modern Authors, calls her Margaret, reckoning her the ninth, whereas she was the third daughter. See W. Gemiteen. p. 685, and Sandford, p. 10.

(6) Agatha, falsely called by Rapin, Eleanor, was the sixth daughter. She was affianced to Alphonso, but died in her Journey to Spain. Her Body being brought back into her native Country, was buried at Bayeux. Sandford, p. 12. The fifth was Gundred Countess of Surrey, married to William Warren, made Earl of Surrey by King William Rufus. She died in Childhood at Castle-Acre in Norfolk. 1085.

(7) I. The Justiciarii Regis, during the Reign of William I were; 1. Odo Bishop of Bayeux. 2. William Fitz-Osbern. 3. Gosfrid Bishop of Cohtance. Madox's Hist. Excheq. p. 743.

II. The most remarkable Occurrences not mentioned by Mr. Rapin, are these: 1. King William brought the Jews from Roan to inhabit in England. Stow's Chron. p. 103. 2. In his Reign, or much about that time, Sirnames came first to be used. 3. Trial by Battail was introduced into this Kingdom. 4. The Normans brought in a new way of creating Knights; and also the Use of Seals and Wineffes in all Deeds and Instruments. Before that time, or at least before the Reign of Edward the Confessor, the Persons concerned, only set down their Names, with a Cross before them. Ingulph. p. 70, 71. Lastly, the Normans brought in the shocking Vice of common Swearing.---In the Year 1066, there was an Earthquake in England; and a Frost from the beginning of November, till the middle of April. In 1077, Aug. 14, there was a very great Fire in London. Sax. Ann. And again in 1087, the greatest part of that City was burnt down (with St. Paul's Cathedral;) as were also most of the chief Towns in England. Sax. Ann. Brompt. p. 982. S. Dunelm. p. 213.

W. 2.

III. As the Translator intends to give a short account of the Coin in every Reign, he begins with observing, That, probably, the Britons never coined any Money, but in Cæsar's time used only Iron Rings and shapeless pieces of Brass, and that even their Tribute-Money afterwards was the ordinary current Coin brought in or minted here by the Romans, as long as this Island continued a Province. For among the many thousand Roman Coins, there was never one undoubted British Coin yet produced; those of Cunobelin be liable to unanswerable Objections. After the Saxons were settled in England, their Silver Coins were generally all of a size and ill-minted, which they called Pennies, worth about Three-pence of our Money. They had also Half-Pennies and Farthings, (as appears from the Saxon Gospels) and Half-farthings, called Sticas. Of which kind Bishop Niculfon takes those Brass Pieces to be that were found some Years since at Rippon in Yorkshire, and communicated by Sir Edward Blacket the Owner to several curious Antiquaries. After the Norman Conquest, a Pound of Gold being divided into twenty-four Carats, (or half Ounces) and every Carat into four Grains, the old Sterling, (as it was afterwards called) or Right Standard of Gold, consisted of twenty-three Carats, and three Grains and a half of fine Gold, and half a Grain of Alloy of Copper or Silver. Again; a Pound of Silver being divided into twelve Ounces, and every Ounce into twenty Penny-weights, and every Penny-weight into twenty-four Grains, a Pound weight of Old Sterling consisted then (as it does now) of eleven Ounces two Penny weights of fine Silver, and eighteen Penny-weights of Alloy. The first eight Kings after the Conquest continued to coin Money much like their Saxon Predecessors, only a little lighter; for of the Saxon Pennies there are some at this day that weigh more than a Penny-weight, whereas few of those of the Norman Kings reach twenty-two Grains till Edward I, when the English Pennies were to weigh a Penny-weight. The Normans also continued the like Method with the Saxons as to Inscriptions, having round the King's Head his Name and Title; which was very short, only REX or REX ANGL. and on the Reverse, the Name of the Monarch.

2. WILLIAM II. Surnamed RUFUS.

WILLIAM II.
1087.

Brompt.

Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.
Ingulph.Eadmer.
Dunelm.
M. West.

Brompt.

S. Dunelm.
Hoved.William
crowned.
Eadmer.
Ord. Vital.

WHILST the Conqueror was taken up in Normandy with the thoughts of dying, William his Son was concerting in England all necessary measures to secure the crown, pursuant to his Father's intention. Dispatch was so much the more necessary on this occasion, as he had reason to fear, in case his Brother Robert could come in time, he would gain the people to his side. His business therefore was to secure, beforehand, the Normans to his interest, who being possessed of all the Fiefs and Places in the kingdom, were properly to dispose of the future election. However, the English were by no means to be neglected, lest joining to Robert's friends, they might turn the Scale to his side. Mean while, young William was beloved by neither. The English thought him too like the King his father, and the Normans, who knew him still better, dreaded his rough temper. On the other hand, Robert had birthright to plead in his favour; whereas William could support his pretensions only by his Father's bare desire of having him for successor. But this bare indication of his Will, without an express nomination, was very insufficient. Nay, in all likelihood it would never have produced the effect, the dying King promised himself, if, before the news of his death reached England, care had not been taken to dispose Men to a compliance. It was with this view, he sent over his Son with all speed (1), to endeavour, with Lanfranc, and some other Lords, to accomplish this project. Eudo High-Treasurer (2), and Lanfranc Archbishop of Canterbury were very serviceable to young William on this occasion. The first had secured Dover, Winchester, Pevensey, Hastings, and other places on the South-coast. Moreover, he delivered to him the late King's treasures, which amounted to sixty thousand pounds in money, besides plate and jewels of a much greater value. Lanfranc, who was esteemed and beloved as well by the English as Normans, used all his credit in his favour. His pains were crowned with so good success, that in a little time he drew to his party the leading Lords of both Nations. To these were added other means, which helped to incline people to William's side. It was rumoured among the English, that this Prince had made a firm resolution to govern in a very different manner from the King his father; that he would hearken to their just complaints, and abolish the too rigorous laws enacted since the revolution, particularly the laws relating to the Game. In short, it was promised in his name, that they should be restored to a part of their estates, and to their ancient privileges. On the other hand, the Normans were told, the best way to preserve their possessions, was to confirm the Conqueror's choice; that the young Prince, being placed on the throne, would be led by his own interest to support them, since his and their rights would stand on the same foundation, namely, the Will of the late King. Robert, being absent, had but few friends to speak for him. As it was uncertain how he would behave after his return, those that would have been inclined to favour him, did not dare to declare for him openly. They foresaw the ill consequences of such a proceeding, in case he should not think fit to support them. Besides, this party had no head. William had taken care to keep Uthoth and Morcar in prison (3), notwithstanding his Father's orders to the contrary, for fear they should head the English, whom he did not take for his friends. All these Circumstances well managed by Lanfranc and other adherents to Prince William, concurring to pave his way to the throne, he was crown'd the 27th of September, eighteen days after his father's death (4). 1087.

This Prince, surnamed Rufus from being red-haired (5), ^{H. Charles} was thirty years of age when he ascended the throne. ^{1087.} Probably, he was indebted for his good fortune to Robert's disobliging the King his father, who never forgave his revolt. And indeed, the younger had nothing to give him the preference to the elder. The only good quality remarkable in him, was his great courage, which however was hardly to be distinguished from a brutish fierceness. He was of a very ill disposition, which being never corrected by education, frequently led him to actions unworthy of a Prince. Bred up to arms from his youth, and at a court, where he continually beheld instances of severity and absolute power, he became a perfect Brute in his behaviour and manners. To these ill qualities he joined a great indifferency for religion, and his whole conduct shewed him to be regardless of honour or honesty. He was as greedy of money as his father, but with this difference, the Father heaped up money purely for the sake of hoarding, and very unwillingly parted with it; whereas the Son loved it only to squander it away in vain expenses, wherein he was guided more by caprice than reason. However, in the beginning of his reign, as it was his interest to hide his inclinations for fear of alarming his subjects, he put on a mask for some time. It was even observed with pleasure, that he affected to be guided by the counsels of Lanfranc, who was universally esteemed and beloved. It was chiefly the respect he at first paid this ^{S. Dunelm.} wife Counsellor, that filled the English with hopes of a ^{Hoved.} happy change in their fortune, and prevented them from giving ear to the solicitations of those that would have engaged them in Robert's cause.

But whilst the confidence he placed in this Prelate ^{1088.} was serviceable to him, with regard to the English, it occasioned such troubles from another quarter, as shook him in his throne. Odo his Uncle, Bishop of Bayeux, who was lately released out of prison, could not bear to see Lanfranc in so great favour (6). He had harboured a secret animosity against the Archbishop, ever since his advising the King to seize him, as he was imbarcking for Rome. This private enmity, joined to a desire of ruling again as he had done formerly, threw him upon the project of dethroning the King, and setting the crown on the head of Robert, who was lately returned to Normandy. He did not want a pretence to countenance his enterprize. Robert's birthright furnished him with a very plausible one. As soon as he had taken this resolution, he drew into his Plot some of the principal Norman Lords. It was necessary to begin with them, since, without their aid, the English were able to do nothing. These Normans being gained with many others, by their means, it was not very difficult to persuade the English to join with them. As the greatest part were dispossessed of their estates, they expected some relief from the troubles that were going to be raised in the kingdom, by the dissention between the two Brothers. In order to confirm both English and Normans in their late resolution, Odo represented to them, there was no living happily under the government of a capricious and brutish Prince, without religion or honesty: That they had reason to dread the worst, if they gave him time to establish himself in the throne, and therefore, should they delay to take proper measures to screen themselves from the impending Evils, it would perhaps be too late, when they had a mind to undertake it.

Master and Place of Coinage. The Coins of the two first Williams were very rare, 'till a Nest of them was accidentally found at Tesk 1703-4. On their Coins they both appear in a Pearl Diadem with Lobels at each Ear, and an Arch cross the Head, consequently they are impossible to be distinguished. Mr. Thoresby indeed ascribes those with a full Face to the Conqueror, and those with the half Face and Scepter to Rufus. The Inscription on the Conqueror's Money is, WILLELM. WILLELM V. (mistaken by Dr. Nicolsen for WILLELM II.) or WILLELMVS. PILEM. PILEMVS. PILEMVS. (P. being the Saxon W) REX. A. ANGL. ANGLOR. or ANGLOR. Reverse, a Cross Fleuree with four Scepters quarterly, or a Cross with four Pellets in each Quarter, the Name of the Mint-Master and Place of Minting; as HEREFORD. LVNDEN. LOND. LVNDRE. LVNDR. for London; C. for Canterbury; EO or EOER for Tesk; LINCOLN. EXETER. LEYNC. for Lancaster; PINC. for Winchester; DEOTFORD. for Thetford. See the Coin in the foregoing Page, which hath on one Side PILEM REX ANGLOR. and on the Reverse GODICON LVNDNEN.

(1) He was attended by Robert Black his Father's Chaplain. Ord. Vitalis.
(2) He was the King's Steward. William de Pont-Aube gave him the Keys of the Treasury at Winchester: After which going to Dover, Hastings, Pevensey, and other Castles on that Coast, he made the Keepers promise not to deliver them without his Knowledge, still concealing the King's Death; which done he returned to Winchester, and discovered that the King was dead. Hist. of Colchester-Abbey in Manuscript. Angl. P. 2. p. 389.

(3) He brought them over with him, and put them in Prison at Winchester. S. Dunelm. p. 214.
(4) After his Coronation he went to Winchester, and distributed his Father's Treasure, according to his last Will, viz. to some of the chief Cathedral Churches and Monasteries ten Marks of Gold a-piece, to some six, and to other less, beside rich Crosses, Candlesticks, &c. and to smaller Churches in the Country five Shillings a-piece; he also sent a hundred Pound to each County to be distributed amongst the Poor. S. Dunelm. p. 214. Brompt. p. 983. Malmsb. p. 113. Sax. Ann. &c.

(5) Or from his red Complexion. Tyrrel, p. 73.

(6) He was come over to England, and had been confirmed in the possession of his Earldom of Kent. Malmsb. p. 120. M. Paris, p. 11.

1089. He added, Justice itself required the crown to be given to the first-born, to which he had a lawful right, and of which he had not deserved to be deprived. These considerations were strengthened with assurances of the uprightness and generosity of Robert. He set forth his mild and gracious disposition, which put them in hopes of enjoying, under his government, the tranquillity they so earnestly longed for.

Whether birth-right had any weight with these Lords, or William's ill temper made them wish for a new master, they readily came into the Prelate's measures. Each promised to do his utmost to promote the design, provided Robert would exert himself likewise, and bring over supplies from Normandy. The Norman Lords, who were in the conspiracy, bestirred themselves so effectually, that they quickly gained almost all the leading-men of their nation. As soon as the Bishop was secure of the assistance of his countrymen, whom he judged much more capable of serving Robert than the English, he sent that Prince word, that nothing was wanting but his presence, with a body of Norman troops, to recover the crown unjustly usurped by his Brother. As this news could not but be very agreeable to the Duke, he came immediately to a resolution upon so advantageous a proposal. But as he had not Money sufficient to defray the expences of so great an undertaking, he borrowed [three thousand pounds] of his Brother Henry, for which he mortgaged to him the country of Cotentin (1). Then he sent his Uncle word, he would not fail of coming to England, as soon as possible, desiring him to prepare every thing for the execution of their designs.

As soon as the Norman Lords were certified of Robert's resolution they began to stir (2). The Bishop of Constance, with his Nephew Mowbray (3), made themselves masters of Bath and Barklay Castle, and stored Bristol with ammunition, intending that place for their chief magazine. Roger Bigod in Norfolk, Hugh Grantmeil in Leicestershire, seized several places. Roger de Montgomery (4), William Bishop of Durham (5), Bernard of Newark (6), Roger Lacy, Ralph Mortimer secured Worcestershire. In a word, there was not a Lord among the conspirators but what fortified himself in some city. Had Robert arrived at that time, probably he would have dethroned his Brother. But his natural slothfulness, and unnecessary expences made him lose so fair an opportunity. On the contrary, the King, who was of a quite different temper, omitted nothing to stifle the conspiracy, whilst his Brother's indolence afforded him time. The most effectual means he made use of, was the gaining the English to his side, in which Lanfranc's interest was very serviceable to him. This prelate, who in the late reign had shewn great regard for the English, made use of their confidence in him, to induce them to assist the King in so urgent a necessity. By his solicitations and pains, he reclaimed the conspirators, and persuaded the rest to continue firm to the King (7). So that in a very short space William was enabled to send out a fleet, whilst with an army of Englishmen (8), he marched against Odo his Uncle, whom he justly considered as the Ring-leader of the rebels. The Prelate had fortified himself in Kent, where he had made himself master of Rochester and Pevensey. As soon as he heard of the King's approach, he shut himself up in Pevensey (9), where he was in hopes to hold out a siege, till the Duke of Normandy should come to his relief. But as he was more hot than courageous, and for want of fore-sight, had even neglected to provide things necessary for his defence, the town was taken in a few days (10) by the furious assaults of the King. Odo could obtain his pardon upon no other terms but the procuring the surrender of Rochester, where the chief of the Norman Lords were shut up, under the command of Eustace Earl of Boulogne. To this purpose he was conducted to the gates of Rochester, where he feigned to persuade the governor to deliver up the city. But Eustace observing by his looks, that he did not speak from his heart, detained him prisoner, and so furnished him with a plausible excuse for the breach of his promise.

William despairing of becoming master of Rochester the way, was obliged to besiege it. He was six weeks before the town without making any progress (11), the Bishop defending themselves with such bravery, that he began to lose all hopes of success. But at length a contagious distemper, which daily weakened them, compelled them to desire a capitulation. It was no easy matter to agree upon the terms. At length, after many debates, the King granted them the liberty to march off with their horses, without hopes of being ever restored to their estates and employments. The Bishop of Bayeux, being reduced to a very low condition, retired to the Duke of Normandy, who committed to him the administration of his affairs. The siege of Rochester had furnished the Duke with a fair opportunity to make a diversion in some other part of the kingdom. But by an inexcusable negligence, he lost the advantage of so favourable a juncture. Instead of going himself into England with forces proportionable to the greatness of his enterprise, he contented himself with sending a single Ship with some soldiers, who were all taken and drowned (12).

William being master of Rochester, marched his army towards Durham, to chastise the Bishop, who was one of the rebels. As the Garrison was very weak, the city was quickly obliged to surrender, and the Bishop with all that had taken arms against the King, were banished. Thus, this conspiracy, which seemed so dangerous, was crushed by the vigour and good conduct of the King, who equally made use of prudence and force to bring the Rebels to reason. He not only gained by his address Montgomery (13), but also several other Norman Lords, whose defection was very prejudicial to Robert's party. By his secret emissaries, he made them sensible, they were extremely in the wrong to act against him: That, seeing they held their Estates by virtue of the same right that procured him the crown, it was manifestly their interest to support him. On the other hand, he gave an instance of the greatest prudence in beginning with his Uncle's destruction, who was the author of the conspiracy. But his success on this occasion was chiefly owing to his diligence.

As the English had shewed themselves ready to assist him in his necessity, they expected a suitable reward. But it was not long before they perceived they flattered themselves with vain hopes. Whilst he wanted their assistance, he gave them fair words; but as soon as he saw himself well settled in the throne, he forgot his promises. He even began to oppress them with several impositions; in which he shewed still less moderation than the late King. He was gently admonished of these proceedings by Lanfranc, who could not forbear putting him in mind of what he had promised. How careful soever this Prelate might be to make use of the most respectful terms, William was extremely offended, and asked him in an angry tone and with an oath, Whether he thought it possible for a King to keep all his Promises? From that time the Archbishop was quite out of favour, neither did the King ever afford him one kind look. But his disgrace was of no long continuance. He died quickly after, lamented by both Nations, as one of the most worthy Prelates, promoted to the See of Canterbury ever since the conversion of the Saxons.

Whilst Lanfranc was alive and at court, the presence of so venerable a Man was some check to the King's vicious inclinations. But as soon as he was clear of this Prelate, who had an awe over him, he threw off all restraint. More especially he gave a loose to his natural desire of heaping up money in order to squander it away in a vain and extravagant manner. Avaricious without frugality, covetous and prodigal at the same time, continually scraping up money without ever filling his coffers, he was always in want, and under a necessity of inventing perpetually new ways and means of raising money. One of his methods, never before practised in England, was to seize the vacant benefices. He was not satisfied with having the First-Fruits, but appropriated the whole profits to himself for several years to-

(1) The County of Constantine (now Cotentin) was then the third part of Normandy.

(2) The Conspiracy was formed in Lent, and about Easter they began to stir. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 214.

(3) Geoffrey Bishop of Constance, (of Exeter, says Brompt. p. 984.) and Robert de Mowbray Earl of Northampton. Malmsh. p. 120. R. de Diceto, p. 489. M. Paris, p. 11.

(4) Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury. Brady, p. 218. Note (b).

(5) Whom William II. had made Justicier. M. Paris, p. 11.

(6) Or rather of Newmarket. Brompt. p. 984. R. de Diceto, p. 489.

(7) He promised them that the King would make good Laws, abolish the Taxes, and give them free liberty of Hunting. Brompt. p. 120. Sax. Ann. &c.

(8) And Normans. R. de Diceto, p. 489.

(9) Which belonged to his Brother Robert Earl of Mortaigne. R. de Diceto, p. 489.

(10) It held out above six Weeks. Huntingd. p. 372. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 215. Seven Weeks, says Brompt. p. 120.

(11) This does not appear from any of the ancient Historians. It is probable Rapin hath confounded the account of the Siege of Pevensey with this.

(12) The Historians say, that he sent over part of his army, but King William's Fleet destroyed an innumerable multitude of his Men: Which shews Robert must have sent a considerable number of Troops. Brompt. p. 985. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 372. See Malmsh. p. 121.

(13) Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury. Malmsh. p. 120.

1088. gether without filling them. And after conveying away every thing that was convertible into Money, he sold them so pilled to such as bid highest, without regarding their merit or capacity. As soon as the Archbishoprick of Canterbury was vacant by Lanfranc's death, he seized the temporalities, and kept them in his hands four years. He did the same with the Bishoprick of Lincoln, and all others that became void in his reign. This Prince's Historians, most part Monks or Ecclesiasticks, bitterly inveigh against him upon this account. They so frequently insist on this point, that there is no room to doubt, it was one of the principal motives which induced them to blacken his reputation to the utmost of their power. However this be, these proceedings occasioned loud clamours among the Clergy; but they were disregarded by the King. It was in vain they carried their complaints to the Pope. The Court of Rome, as matters then stood, durst not intermeddle in this affair. The Church was rent by a Schism, wherein England was yet unengaged. Besides, Urban II, to whom the English Clergy made application, was then projecting the recovery of the Holy-Land, in which enterprise he intended to engage all the Princes of Christendom. It was not possible therefore for the Pope, nor consistent with his interest, to fall upon William at such a juncture.

A Schism in the Church hinders the Pope from intermeddling.

1090. William has a Design upon Normandy.

Malmib. Hoved. S. Dunelm. Brompton. Ord. Vital.

He takes Valeri and Albemarle.

Robert implores aid from the King of France, who understood how to use cunning as well as force, found means to make Philip his friend (2), who retired without doing any thing, leaving Robert exposed, as before, to the insults of his Brother. By the King of France's retreat, the Duke's affairs were in a worse condition than ever, for relying on that aid, he had taken no other measures. William took from him several other places, and bribed certain Burghers of Roan, who promised to deliver the Metropolis of Normandy into his hands (3).

Plot to deliver up Roan. Ord. Vital.

Prince Henry joins his Brother Robert.

He saves Roan. Ord. Vital. p. 690.

1091. Peace between the King and Duke. Flor. Wig. Ord. Vital. Malmib. Sax. Ann.

This Monarch had reason to be satisfied with the possession of a Crown, which he had no right to expect. This single consideration, doubtless, ought to have bred in him so much regard for his Brother Robert, as might have helped to make him easy under the injury he had done him. But neither duty nor brotherly affection could balance in his mind the desire of becoming master of all his Father's dominions. He no sooner saw himself settled in the throne of England, but he formed a design to conquer Normandy. Perhaps, to his avidity was added the desire of being revenged for the Duke his Brother's attempt to dethrone him. Be this as it will, after making extraordinary preparations, the intent of which Robert never suspected, he made a descent in Normandy. He immediately became Master of St. Valeri, Albemarle, and some other Places, whilst Robert was unprovided of forces to oppose this invasion (1).

The pressing necessity the Duke was in of applying to a foreign power, obliged him to implore the protection of the King of France, who came in person to his assistance. But he reaped no great advantage from thence. William, who understood how to use cunning as well as force, found means to make Philip his friend (2), who retired without doing any thing, leaving Robert exposed, as before, to the insults of his Brother. By the King of France's retreat, the Duke's affairs were in a worse condition than ever, for relying on that aid, he had taken no other measures. William took from him several other places, and bribed certain Burghers of Roan, who promised to deliver the Metropolis of Normandy into his hands (3).

Mean time, Robert was in great Straits (4). He had no other refuge than the assistance of Henry his youngest Brother; but he had little reason to expect any favour from him. Henry was exasperated at the Duke's taking possession of Cotentin without paying what he owed him, and was preparing to do himself justice by force. Nevertheless, Robert's promise to make him satisfaction, as soon as the war was ended, disarmed him, and even engaged him in his quarrel. This aid came very seasonably, to free the Duke from his present danger. Henry hearing of the plot that was contrived at Roan, suddenly entered the city, and seizing Canon Chief of the conspirators, threw him headlong from a Tower. By this bold action, he quashed the conspiracy, which, had it taken effect, would have robbed the Duke of his Capital, and probably, of all his other dominions.

The union of the two Brothers, and the ill success of the Roan conspiracy, put a stop to William's progress, who, quickly after, was obliged to conclude a peace with the Duke. The articles of the treaty were, that Robert should deliver up to the King the country of Eu and towns of Fescamp and Cherburgh, with all the places he had taken on the coast of Normandy. William on his part, obliged himself to assist him in reducing the Province of Maine which had revolted, to restore to the Normans all their confiscated Estates in England, and to grant certain Fiefs to his Brother in the same kingdom. Lastly, it was agreed, if either of the two Brothers died without heirs, the survivor should succeed to all his dominions. This treaty was solemnly sworn to by twelve Barons on each side, and the Brothers seemed perfectly reconciled.

But if these two Princes were pleased, their younger Brother was not so. He was not only omitted in this treaty, but found Robert by no means disposed to keep his word with him. Incensed at this treatment, he thought he might lawfully right himself some other way, and, on a sudden, surprized Mount St. Michael. This unexpected blow startled Robert, who not caring to leave a place of that importance in the hands of his Brother, desired William's assistance to retake it. Though William had no concern in this affair, he readily accompanied Robert (5) to the siege, or rather Blockade of this place, situated on a rock, which the Sea, by flowing round it twice a day, renders inaccessible.

Whilst the two Brothers lay before Mount St. Michael, William, as he was riding alone at some distance from the camp, chanced to see two Horsemen (6) coming from the town. As he was of an impetuous temper, he rid up to them to try to take one of them prisoner, that he might be informed of the state of the place. The Soldiers, finding themselves attacked by a single person only, stood upon their defence, and in the first encounter his Horse was killed under him, and himself thrown on the ground with his foot intangled in the stirrup. This accident would have cost him his life, if, the moment one of the Soldiers was going to kill him, he had not cried out, Hold, Rafael, I am the King of England. Upon which, they were struck with fear and respect, and helping him up, gave him one of their Horses. He nimbly leaped into the Saddle, and then addressing himself to the person that dismounted him, Come, said he to him, thou shalt be my Soldier for the future, and enjoy the reward of thy valour.

Though the siege went on but slowly, Henry was driven to great straits for want of water. However, as he knew Robert's good nature, he did not despair of some relief, by representing to him, it would be more glorious to subdue him by arms than by thirst. Robert, who was naturally generous, sent him immediately a tun of wine (7), with leave to supply him with as much water as was necessary. William upbraided him as guilty of folly in this complaisance. What, replied he, is the quarrel between us and our Brother of that importance, that we should desire he should die with thirst? We may have occasion for a Brother hereafter, but where shall we find another when we have destroyed this? But William not at all pleased with this, as he thought, unseasonable generosity, quitted the siege and returned to England. However, Robert persisted, notwithstanding all difficulties, to carry on the siege, till the place was surrendered upon terms. Henry having liberty to go where he pleased, wandered up and down for some time without any fixed abode, attended only by a chaplain and three or four domesticks.

About the same time Robert banished Edgar Atheling out of Normandy, and William forbid him ever returning into England. The cause of his disgrace is unknown; it is only said, he retired into Scotland, his only refuge in his misfortunes.

Whilst William was employed in Normandy, Malcolm King of Scotland took advantage of his absence, to make an incursion into Northumberland (8), from whence he had carried away a great booty. The northern people loudly complained of the King's amusing himself beyond Sea, whilst his frontiers were plundering by foreigners. These complaints apparently hastening his return, he was no sooner arrived (9), but he made great preparations to be revenged of the King of Scotland. But fearing his Brother Robert, who was become master of Mount St. Michael, would take advantage of his absence and seize his Castles in Normandy, he desired him to come and join him. He pretended, his valour and experience were absolutely necessary to put an honourable end to the war. But to engage him by a more powerful Motive, he promised as soon as the affair was over, he would punctually perform his part of their late treaty. Robert being prevailed upon by this promise, and the good opinion the King his Brother seemed to have of him, speedily repaired into England and attended him to Scotland.

The success of the war did not answer William's preparations. The greatest part of the fleet, fitted out to annoy the Coasts of Scotland, was destroyed by a

(1) Stephen of Albemarle, Son of Odo Earl of Champagne, at King William's charge, fortified and mann'd his Castle for him. Ord. Vital. p. 608.

(2) He bribed him with Money. Flor. Wig. p. 604. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 216.

(3) William came over to England, and kept his Court at Christmas at Westminster, grievously oppressing his Subjects with Taxes; and then at Candlemas went back to Normandy. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 216. Brompt. p. 980.

(4) King William was come over with a great Fleet, on purpose to deprive him entirely of Normandy. Ord. Vitalis.

(5) Malmib. says, that he was come over from England, (where he had probably been since the conclusion of the treaty) that he might, according to his engagement, help to reduce the inhabitants of Maine. Malmib. p. 121.

(6) Malmib. says, that he alone rushed upon many, p. 121.

(7) It doth not appear that he sent him either Wine or Water; but only that he ordered his Men to keep such a negligent Watch on one side, as that Henry's Men might have an opportunity to provide themselves with Water.

(8) He wasted a great part of it in May, but was beaten back by the Inhabitants. S. Dunelm. p. 216. Sax. Ann. Brompt. p. 987.

(9) He came over in August. S. Dunelm. Brompt. ibid.

1091. Storm (1), his army suffered no less in marching over the morasses and mountains. The want of provisions in those almost desolate places he was engaged in, and the roads, grown impassable by reason of the bad weather, visibly destroyed so many of his Men, that he often repented of this expedition. He would have been very hard put to it, by these accidents, had not Malcolm been apprehensive of the ill consequences of a war, that had drawn the enemy into his country. And therefore, chusing rather to oblige William to leave Scotland by fair means, than venture to drive them thence by force, he sent him proposals (2), which being gladly accepted, were soon followed by a treaty of peace. The conditions were, that Malcolm should pay William the same homage his Father had done: That twelve manors, held by him in England before the rupture, should be restored to him, and that William should pay him yearly twelve Marks (3) in lieu of all other claims. Prince Edgar, who was employed in this negotiation, behaving to the satisfaction of both parties, William and Robert received him into favour, and he had leave to return into England. The Duke of Normandy was in hopes the war being over, the King his Brother would seriously think of satisfying him. But perceiving at length he fought only to amuse him, he returned home (4) in great anger, taking Prince Edgar along with him.

A Peace is made.
Hoved.

Edgar restored to favour.
Brompt.
Hoved.

Glamorgan-shire conquered by the English.
Welsh
Chron.

Whilst William was in Scotland, Robert Fitz-Hamon, Gentleman of the Bed-chamber, conquered Glamorgan-shire in South-Wales. He had served Jestyn, Lord of Glamorgan, against Rees King of Wales, on certain terms, which the Welsh Lord refused to execute, after the war was ended. This breach of Faith causing Fitz-Hamon to resolve to right himself by arms, he drew his friends together, attacked Rees, slew him in the fight, and seized his country. Twelve Knights, who accompanied him in his expedition, were rewarded each with a Manor which they and their posterity enjoyed (5).

1092.
Malmsh.
Ord. Vital.

William rebuilds Carlisle.
Sax. Ann.
Fl. Wig.
S. Dunelm.

The next year, Prince Henry took by surprize Dorchester, a small town in Maine, where he retired in expectation of a better fortune.

The frequent irruptions of the Scots into the northern parts of England, convincing the King of the necessity of stopping their progress by a strong Barrier, he ordered the City of Carlisle upon the Tine to be rebuilt. This City which had been destroyed by the Danes, and lain two hundred years in ruins, was peopled again, and endowed with great privileges which it enjoys to this day (6). The episcopal See of Dorchester was removed to Lincoln, and that of Wells to Bath about this time, with the King's consent, which was purchased with a large sum of money.

1093.
He falls ill.
S. Dunelm.
Eadmer.
Sax. Ann.

This monarch was become so absolute, that he met with no opposition to his will. Taxes and impositions were renewed every day on diverse pretences. Nothing happened but what the King made an occasion to levy money upon the Cities, Burroughs, private persons, without favouring the Normans any more than the English. None daring to oppose these oppressions, the people expected no other remedy for their evils, but the death of the King, which they heartily prayed for in private. A distemper, which seized him at Gloucester (7), gave them hopes their prayers were going to be heard. He himself thought he had not long to live. The approach of death, which to him seemed certain, and the exhortations of the Bishops about him, threw him into reflections, which were followed by some signs of repentance. He appeared firmly resolved to correct the mismanagements in the government, if it pleased God to restore him to his health. The Bishops improving these good motions, admonished him to fill the vacant benefices. They represented to him what an obstacle it was to his Salvation, to apply the Church's revenues to uses contrary to the intent of the Donors. The condition he was in, made him readily comply with whatever was desired. He nominated Robert Bloet, one of his counsellors, to the Bishoprick of Lincoln, and for Archbishop of Canterbury, made choice of Anselm, Abbot of Bec in Normandy, who was then at the English court. It was with great difficulty that An-

Scots signs of Repentance.
Eadmer.

Makes Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury.
Huntingd.
Knighton.
Brompt.
Brady.

selm was prevailed upon to accept of this dignity. He was a zealous assertor of the rights of the Church, and as he knew William was not very scrupulous in these matters, he dreaded the taking upon him a burden, which to him seemed too weighty in such a reign. However, the persuasions of the Bishops, and seeming repentance of the King, brought him at length to a compliance. Before he was consecrated, he requested the King, to restore to the Church of Canterbury all that belonged to it in Lanfranc's time; which was positively promised. Mean time, William, finding he was out of danger, and perceiving he daily gathered strength, used delays, to avoid restoring the Church-Lands. At length, as the Archbishop pressed him continually upon that subject, he frankly declared his intent was, that the persons to whom he had granted the Lands should enjoy them, they and their posterity. He even told the Archbishop, he expected his consent. But Anselm would never be brought to this compliance, which he looked upon as a downright prevarication. Hence the great contest between the King and him, which occasioned a world of trouble to both.

In the mean time, William, whose repentance proceeded entirely from the fear of death, finding himself perfectly recovered, forgot all his promises, and fell to his former courses. The prisoners, commanded to be freed, were, by his order, more closely confined, and those that were set at liberty, were again thrown into prison. Extortion, injustice, and rapine, were as prevalent as ever. The administration of justice was in the hands of such as took more care to enrich themselves, than discharge the duties of their respective offices: All were poor, but those who had the fingering of the publick money. To be in favour with the King, it was necessary to be without honour or conscience. None but informers met with encouragement. These disorders forced many honest Men to resolve to quit the kingdom, and seek elsewhere that tranquillity they could not find in their native country. But even this liberty, which they imagined they could not be abridged of, was denied them by an edict, forbidding all persons to go out of the kingdom without the King's leave.

Whilst England was in this wretched condition, Malcolm King of Scotland came to Gloucester, according to an agreement made with William, to settle some affairs that were left undetermined in the late treaty. As soon as the King had notice of his arrival, he sent him word, that he expected before all things, to receive his homage. Malcolm replied, he was ready to do it on the frontiers of the two kingdoms, according to custom. William, not satisfied with this answer, let him know further, he would have it done in Gloucester, the vassal not being to appoint where he was to do his homage. Malcolm, looking upon this as a pretence to affront him, returned home without seeing the King, provoked at the haughtiness shewn him. He was no sooner in Scotland, but he began his revenge with invading Northumberland. This was the fifth time he had ravaged that country, revenging on the innocent subjects the wrongs pretended to be received from the Sovereign. Robert de Mowbray was then governor of the northern Parts. He was a person of courage and conduct, and finding the King's forces were too remote, took upon him speedily to remedy the evil his government was afflicted with. He drew together a body of troops with such diligence, that he fell on the Scots when they thought themselves most secure. This unexpected attack throwing the Scots into disorder and confusion, they ran away without making scarce any resistance. Malcolm and Edward his eldest Son, vexed to see their flying troops, and endeavouring to rally them, were both slain on the spot. The Scotch Historians pretend the English owed their victory to a notorious treachery (8). Perhaps it was because the Scots suffered themselves to be surprized. However this be, this fatal battle was the occasion of numberless evils to Scotland shortly after. Malcolm had with him a General called Walter, to whom, in reward of his services, he had given the office of Steward 1093.

7. A. D. 1093.
Ord. Vital.
Sax. Ann.

King of Scotland comes to Gloucester.
Sax. Ann.
S. Dunelm.
p. 218.
Brompt.
R. de Hag.
Fl. Wig.

Robert comes and invades Northumberland.
S. Dunelm.
Brompt.

Is slain about 1093.
Hoved.
Brompt.
W. Giffart.
cen.
Malmsh.
Origin of the Norman Conquest.
Buch.

(1) A few days before Michaelmas. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm.

(2) This Peace was brought about by means of Duke Robert and Edgar Atheling. See S. Dunelm. p. 216. Brompt. Sax. Ann.

(3) Of Gold. S. Dunelm. ibid. Brompt.

(4) Two days before Christmas. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 217.

(5) There is a Book written on this Subject by Sir Edward Stradling, or Sir Edward Mansel, (for it is ascribed to both) wherein you have the Names of the twelve Knights. Their Names, and the Lordships each of them had, are as follows: 1. William de Londres, had for his Share the Manor of Osney. 2. Sir Richard Granville, that of Neth. 3. Sir Pann Turl had Coyty. 4. Sir Robert St. Martin, Liban-blethyan. 5. Sir Richard Nyward, Talavan. 6. Sir Gilbert Hampreite, Penmark. 7. Sir Reginald de Sully, Sully. 8. Sir Roger Berkele, East-Onclard. 9. Sir Peter le Seor, Paton. 10. Sir John Fleming, St. George. 11. Sir John St. Jeon, Fomon. 12. Sir William Stradling, St. Demas. See Hist. of Wales, and Camden's Glamorgan-shire.

(6) Carlisle (the Luguballum, or Luguballa, or Luguballum of the Britons and Romans, and the Luel of the Saxons) stands near the Confluence of the Rivers Eden, Petteril, and Caulde, and not on the Tine. The Colony sent thither by William Rufus, or Huiandmen, are by all Records said to be the first that tilled the Lands thereabouts.

(7) It seized him at the Manor of Aboston in Gloucestershire, from whence he was carried to Gloucester, where he lay sick all the Lent. S. Dunelm. p. 217, 218.

(8) Boetius and Buchanan say, that Malcolm having reduced the Castle of Alnewick to Extremity, the Besieged were forced to surrender, and only desired that the King in Person would receive the Keys of the Gates, which were brought by a Soldier upon the Top of a Lance, who standing within the Wall, thrust the Point of the Lance into the King's Eyes as he was going to take them. Upon which Edward his Son falling too rashly upon the enemy, received a Wound of which he soon after died. See Malmsh. p. 103.

1093, or great Master of his Household (1). From this Officer sprang the family of the Stuarts, who long sway'd the scepter of Scotland, and for a century that of England (2). Margaret, King Malcolm's Queen, and Sister of Edgar Atheling, survived the melancholy news of the death of her Husband and Son but three days. Though Malcolm left three other Sons of fit age to govern, the Scots placed the crown on the head of Donald his Brother. This Prince was no sooner on the throne, but he expelled all the English out of the kingdom. Among whom was Edgar Atheling, who taking with him the Sons of Malcolm his Nephews, retired into England.

The Scots delayed to take vengeance of their defeat only whilst they were employed in the coronation of their new King. Towards the end of the Summer, Donald, at the head of his army, made an irruption into England, where he cruelly revenged Malcolm's death. As soon as William had notice of it, he sent an army into the North under the command of Duncan, natural Son of the late King of Scotland. At the approach of these forces, Donald hastily retired into his kingdom; but was so closely pursued, that he could not avoid coming to a battle. As his army was much inferior to that of the English, he was defeated and forced to betake himself to one of the Hebrides (3). This misfortune throwing the Scots into great consternation, Duncan improved the juncture, and got himself crowned in the room of Donald.

About the same time, new troubles arising in Wales, the English army marched thither. This war proved fatal to the Welsh, who lost part of their country, with Rees their King slain in a battle (4).

The affairs of Scotland and Wales being ended to William's satisfaction, it was not long before he sought fresh occasions to exert his activity. Robert his Brother being displeased that their late treaty was not executed, was making preparations, which made William apprehensive, he designed to retake the places yielded to him by the same treaty. Therefore, without troubling himself to satisfy him, he resolved to lead an army into Normandy to secure his fortresses, and make new conquests. As he went to embark, he passed through Hastings, where he visited Battle-Abby, and caused the Church to be consecrated, which was dedicated to St. Martin, as the King his Father had ordered. Upon his arrival in Normandy (5), he wanted to hold a conference with his Brother, wherein he endeavoured to amuse him with fresh promises. This interview proving ineffectual, they agreed upon a second, in the presence of the twenty-four Barons, who had sworn to the treaty. William's sole aim was to intimidate these Barons, that they might lay the fault on his Brother. But finding that, instead of blaming Robert, they openly declared in his favour, he broke off the conference and began Hostilities. He immediately became master of some places, the Governors whereof he had brib'd. But afterwards, Robert receiving assistance from France, retook Argentan, and made the garrison, consisting of eight hundred Men, prisoners. After that, he besieged the Castle of Holms, which surrendered at discretion. These Successes made William sensible, he should find it difficult to be clear of this war without loss, if the French troops continued in his Brother's service. Having learnt by experience that Philip was not proof against presents, he resolved to try the same way that had formerly succeeded so well. But after the excessive taxes laid on the kingdom, it seemed impracticable to raise the sum he then wanted. However, as he had a fertile invention on these occasions, he bethought himself of a new expedient which succeeded to his wish. Under pretence that there was an urgent occasion for Supplies, he sent orders into England to levy with all possible speed twenty thousand Men. In raising this army, such were purposely taken for Soldiers as were well to pass, or to whom it was very inconvenient to leave their Families. When these levies were going to embark, the King's Treasurer told them, by his order, that they might every Man repair to his own Home upon the payment of Ten Shillings each (6).

Robert assisted by the French.

S. Dunelm.

Who are bribed by William.

This news was so acceptable to these Soldiers lifted against their wills, that there was not one but what was glad to be dismissed at so easy a rate. By this means William raised the Sum of ten thousand Pounds Sterling, with which he brib'd the French to retire, who were an obstacle in his way.

The departure of the auxiliaries put Robert's affairs in a very bad state. Probably, it would have occasioned the loss of all his dominions, if the King had not been obliged to return into England to quell the Welsh who were ravaging Shropshire and Chester. Never could a diversion come more unseasonably, since it made him lose the conquest of Normandy, which he now thought infallible. He left Normandy therefore with extreme indignation, after a reconciliation with his Brother Henry, who cross'd the Seas with him.

At his arrival in England, he march'd into Wales, where he rebuilt the Castle of Montgomery that had been demolished. At his approach, the Welsh, according to custom, retired to the Mountains, where it was impossible to reach them. As that difficult country was unknown to him, he lost so many of his Men in obstinately pursuing the enemy in their lurking holes, that he was at last compelled to retire without doing them much damage.

In spite of the difficulties he had struggled with in this expedition, he resolved upon a second, the same year, after strengthening his army with new levies. But he was scarce entered Wales, when he was called off from his enterprise, by affairs of greater importance, which more nearly concerned him.

Robert de Mowbray had done the King signal service by his victory over the Scots. Blown up with his happy success, he imagined William could not sufficiently reward so important a service, that had freed him from a very troublesome neighbour. But the King, who had no generosity in him, expressed so little gratitude, that the Earl's haughty spirit led him to devise means to make him repent of this contempt. Nothing less would satisfy his revenge than the dethroning of William and setting the crown on the head of Stephen, Earl of Albemarle, Nephew to William the Conqueror. He drew into this conspiracy a great number of Lords, who, as well as he, were dissatisfied with the harsh and scornful behaviour of the King. William received the first news of this conspiracy as he was marching into Wales. But this war seeming to him of little importance in comparison of the gathering storm, he altered his course (7), and marched with all speed to the North. His design was to crush the head of the Malecontents, before the rest could join him. The conspirators foreseeing he would march that way, laid an ambush for him, which he would have certainly fallen into, if Gilbert de Tunbridge (8), one of the rebels, had not given him notice of it. This stratagem failing, William continued his march, and besieged the Castle of Bamborough where Mowbray was (9). This place, which was strong and well stored with necessities, holding out longer than was expected, he resolved to change the siege into a Blockade, that he might go in quest of the other conspirators, who were now up in arms. To this purpose he built near Bamborough a Fortress which he called Mal-Voisin, [or Bad-Neighbour,] because it took away all possibility of throwing any succours into the Castle. Some time after, Mowbray going out upon a false information (10), had the misfortune to fall into the hands of the Besiegers. As soon as the King heard of it, he ordered the Prisoner to be carried to the foot of Bamborough-Walls, and, in case the Besieged refused to surrender, to have his eyes put out before their faces. This order produced the expected effect, the Castle was surrendered upon Terms, and Mowbray confined in Windfor-Castle, where he remained a prisoner thirty years. His companions in the revolt met with no better treatment. Roger Lacy was dispossessed of all his Lands (11). Hugh Earl of Chester redeemed his life with the sum of three thousand pounds

Mowbray's Revolt. Malmib. Hoved. S. Dunelm. Brompt. Sax. Ann.

The King had like to fall into an Ambush. Ord. Vital.

He besieges Bamborough and builds Mal-Voisin. Hunt. Hoved.

Mowbray taken and imprisoned. Brady.

His Accomplishes are all punished. Malmib. Sax. Ann.

(1) This Magistrate (says Buchanan) was to gather in all the King's Revenues; also he had a Jurisdiction, such as the Sheriffs of Counties have, and he is the same with that which our Ancestors called a Thane. p. 217.

(2) C Camden says, Malcolm made Walter Steward of the whole Kingdom of Scotland, and that he was Son to Flean by Nesla Daughter to Griffith ap Lievelin Prince of North-Wales. Flean was the Son of Banquo, slain by Macbeth.

(3) A Cluster of Isles called by the Inhabitants Inch-Gall, who retain the Manners, Customs, and Habit of the ancient Scots, and speak the Irish Language. They are commonly thought to be forty-four in Number, though they that have travelled them, reckon them to be about three hundred. They are called by the English, The Western Isles.

(4) From this time there were no more Princes in South-Wales, but the Kings of England were accounted their chief Governors.

(5) He came there about the middle of Lent. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 219.

(6) Simon of Durham, and the rest of the Historians say, That Ranulf Flambard, the Treasurer, took from them the Money that had been paid them for their Maintenance. S. Dunelm. p. 220. M. Paris, p. 14. Sax. Ann. See Henry Spelman supposes they were raised not by the way we call Præsumpt, but through the King's earnest Solicitations; and that the Money the King took from them, was what the County had allowed them for their Submission. Spelman Codex. p. 296.

(7) And in the mean time sent his Brother Henry into Normandy, with a large Sum of Money, to harass that Country, Hasted. p. 375. Sax. Ann.

(8) Rapin by mistake calls him William. See Ord. Vital. p. 704.

(9) He besieged Newcastle first. Sax. Ann. Brompt. p. 991, &c.

(10) Sam. Durham says, some Soldiers belonging to Newcastle upon Tyne promised to give him entrance into the Town, if he would come thither privately with a few Followers. Upon which he went out one Night with thirty Soldiers, but being betrayed by his own Men, was pursued and taken by the Garrison of Mal-Voisin. p. 221.

(11) Which were given to his Brother Hugh, who adhered to the King. Ord. Vital. p. 704.

1095.

Sterling. The Count of Eu chusing to vindicate his innocence in single combat against his accuser, and being overcome, was condemned to lose his eyes, and be castrated. William of Ardes accused of the same crime, was sentenced to be hanged, though he protested his innocence with his last breath. All the rest were condemned to divers punishments, not one escaping.

Quarrel between the King and Anselm. Dunelm. Hunt. Hoved. Edmer. Malmib.

The King was no sooner out of this trouble, but he fell into another, occasioned by the renewal of his differences with the Archbishop of Canterbury. He had no great regard to the Church's immunities, which Anselm too haughtily supported. This Prelate had even presumed to acknowledge Urban II. for lawful Pope, though he very well knew the King was rather inclined to Clement his antagonist. In vain was it represented to him, that by a Law made in the late reign, no person was to acknowledge a Pope without the King's consent. This argument was of no force with him, who pretended the King had no right to meddle with Ecclesiastical Affairs. But upon what ground did he himself pretend to determine for the whole Church of England? The King, for his part, was not willing to give way to his Subject, and as he began to treat him a little roughly, Anselm desired leave to go to Rome. William at first denied him, but at length consented, being glad to be clear of him. However, not to let him depart without further marks of his displeasure, he sent an Officer after him, who overtaking him just as he was going to sail, ransacked his baggage, and took away all the money he could find, pretending it was against the Law to carry the Coin out of the kingdom. After Anselm's departure, the King seized the temporalities of the Archbishoprick, and enjoyed them as long as he lived. This Prelate continued some time at Rome, where he did all that lay in his power to stir up the Pope against the King. But at length, finding Urban did not care to engage in his quarrel, he retired to a Monastery at Lyons, where he remained till William's death.

M. Paris.

Urban II. was then going to discover the grand design which he had been long revolving in his mind. I mean the famous Crusade, undertaken for the recovery of the Holy Land out of the hands of the Saracens (1). This great affair is so well known, that there is no occasion to descend to particulars. It will be sufficient to remind the Reader, that Peter the Hermite first set this project on foot; that Pope Urban II. preached it himself at the council of Clermont; and that numberless persons of all nations and ranks in Europe, zealously embarked in it. The badge of those that engaged in this undertaking, was a Red Cross wrought in their habit, and worn on the right shoulder, from whence they were called the Croisfés [or the Crossed,] and the expedition, the Crusade. Their Motto was, It is God's Will. The heads of the Croisfés were, Hugh of France (2), Godfrey of Bouillon, Raimund of Tholouse Count of St. Giles, Robert Earl of Flanders, Baldwin Earl of Haynault, Bohemond Prince of Tarentum, Tancred his Nephew, and Robert Duke of Normandy (3). This last burned with a desire of distinguishing himself in this war, which made so much noise in the world: But money was wanting to defray the necessary charge. The only means he had to supply this want, was to borrow a sum of the King his Brother (4), and give him Normandy for his security (5). William gladly received the proposal. But as his kingdom was exhausted by the great levies of money already raised, he was forced to recur to new methods. The readiest way, as he thought, was to desire the richest of his Subjects, particularly the Nobility and Clergy, to furnish him with the sum required. His request being equivalent to a command, such as were unwilling to comply were forced to it, without respect of persons. This compulsion gave the Lords a pretence to treat their Vassals in the same manner, and oblige them to contribute to the King's wants. Several Ecclesiasticks not having by them what was demanded, were, or pretended to be, under a necessity of melting down the Church-Plate, and even the Shrines of the Saints (6).

Robert mortgages Normandy to the King his Brother. S. Dunelm. Hoved. Brompt. W. Gemit.

Malmib. S. Dunelm. Edm.

The different Tempers of the two Brothers.

Let us here reflect a moment, on the different temper of these two Sons of William the Conqueror. The first makes a conscience of oppressing his Subjects to supply the charges of an expedition approved by all the world, chusing rather to mortgage his dukedom than raise the money upon them. The other makes no scruple to extort money from his people, to acquire a Good, of no advantage to them, but purely to gratify his ambition. Hence we may judge how great an injury the Conqueror did the English in preferring the younger to the elder Brother.

William's conquest of France. Ord. Vital.

As soon as Robert was gone, William taking possession of Normandy (7), demanded of the King of France the French Vexin (8), which he pretended belonged to the dukedom. This pretension occasioned a war, which, having nothing remarkable in it, ended the next year in a treaty of peace.

The great ease wherewith William had lately acquired Normandy, served only to inflame his desire and set him upon the conquest of Wales. To that end, he made, on some other pretence, extraordinary preparations, imagining he could not fail of success, as he hoped to surprize the Welsh. He resolved to extirpate all the Males of that nation, whose neighbourhood had all along been very troublesome to the English. But the honour of this conquest was not reserved for him. Though by the assistance of some deserters, he penetrated a good way into that difficult country (9), he lost more of his own Men than he destroyed of the enemies. So that he was forced once more to desist from this undertaking, without doing any thing considerable.

1097.

His Wars with the Welsh. Brompt. Hoved. Hunt. Sax. Ann.

Shortly after, a new revolution in Scotland made him resolve to send an army thither under the command of Edgar Atheling. Donald, who was driven out of Scotland, finding means to re-enter, compelled Duncan to leave the kingdom, and established himself in the throne. The greatest part of the English Historians pretend, that William, as Sovereign Lord of Scotland, made himself judge of this difference. They add, that doing Edgar, eldest Son to Malcolm Canmore, the justice due to him, he ordered his troops to march into Scotland, and put that Prince in possession of the crown. However this be, without staying to examine the matter, I shall only say, Edgar Atheling by help of the English army, placed young Edgar his nephew on the throne of his ancestors. William could not undertake this expedition in person, the revolt of the province of Maine obliging him to go thither (10) and lay siege to the Capital.

1098.

The Affairs of Scotland. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. Buchanan.

During the King's absence, Wales was again exposed to the insults of the English, or rather Normans, who began to be confounded with the English. Owen, a Welsh Lord, Father-in-law of Griffith and Cadogan (11), Kings of Wales, having been disoblged by his Sons-in-law, privately invited the Earls of Chester and Shrewsbury into his country, promising them a great booty. The two Earls levying some troops, were received by Owen into Wales, where they committed unspeakable cruelties. The two Kings surprized by this unexpected attack, were forced to fly into Ireland, and leave the country to the mercy of the English. Their flight giving their enemies an opportunity to continue their march, they penetrated as far as the Isle of Anglesey, where they destroyed all with fire and sword. Whilst they were exercising their cruelties, Magnus King of Norway, who had lately made himself master of the Isle of Man, advanced as far as Anglesey. As he offered to land, the English endeavoured to hinder him, and the Earl of Shrewsbury (12) was slain in the skirmish. His death was looked upon as a just judgment for the horrid barbarities committed by him in the Isle. This accident causing some disorder among the English troops, they were constrained to abandon the shore. Magnus landing in the Island, and finding the English had left nothing to plunder, re-imbarked, and the English retired laden with spoil.

The English invade

Wales. Chron. Gal. Sax. Ann. Hoved. Malmib.

The King of

Norway attacks Anglesey. Pol. Virg. Hoved. Brompt. Du Chesn.

These little advantages were not capable of balancing the evils the English suffered this same year. Besides a great scarcity, occasioned by bad weather, which lasted several months, the King laid heavy taxes upon them, so much the more grievous, as the money was to be expended in works that were unnecessary, or at least might have been deferred to some other time. He not only rebuilt London-Bridge, which had been carried away by an unusual Flood, but chose this time of scarcity for other pairs London-Bridge, builds Westminster-Hall, and a Mill round the Tower. Sax. Ann.

William re-

(1) For a full account of it, see M. Paris, p. 19---44. Malmib. p. 130, &c.

(2) Hugh Magnus, Count of Vermandois, Valois, Chauvent, Amiens, Brother to Philip I. King of France.

(3) The chief Head of the Crusade was Adhemar Bishop of Puy in France. Fleury's Eccl. Hist.

(4) Ten thousand Marks of Silver. S. Dunelm. p. 222.

(5) For three years. Edmer. p. 35.

(6) He took at that time four Shillings upon every Hide of Land; from which the Ecclesiasticks themselves were not exempted. See Lives of the Confessors, c. 11.

(7) He took possession of it before Robert set out, in September. S. Dunelm. p. 222. Brompt. 993. R. de Diceto. p. 493. Robert wintered in Apulia, Sax. Ann.

(8) The Norman Vexin is seated between the River Andelle and the River Epte. The French Vexin lies between the Epte and the Oise.

(9) He continued there till Midsummer, and ordered Castles to be built upon the Frontiers. Sax. Ann.

(10) About the middle of November. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 377.

(11) He was Father-in-law to Griffith, and Uncle to Cadogan, having married his Aunt Emeryth, the Daughter of Conan. See Hist. of Wales, p. 117.

(12) Hugh de Montgomery, youngest Son to Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury. Dugdale's Barons, vol. 1. p. 28. The Welsh call him Hugh Goch, i. e. the Red-headed.

1089.

Huntingd.

Works, which required vast sums of money. He raised a new wall round the Tower, and built a great Hall at Westminster two hundred and seventy foot long, and seventy broad (1). How spacious soever this Hall was, William, at his return from Normandy, thought it too little, and said it hardly deserved to be called a Bed-chamber, in comparison of the extent he designed it. It is affirmed, he undertook this building purely to raise money, and for the same reason resolved to pull it down and build it larger, but was prevented by other affairs.

1099.

William returns Mans.
Malmsh.
S. Dunelm.
M. Paris.
W. Gemit.
Huntingd.
Sax. Ann.
S. Dunelm.
&c.

About Midsummer the next year, William, as he was hunting in New Forest, was told by a messenger that Helias Count de la Fleſche, had surprized and taken the city of Mans, and was then besieging the castle, which would soon be forced to surrender, if not timely relieved. This news obliging him to break off his sport, he sent the messenger back that instant, ordering him to tell the Besieged he would be with them in eight days. At the same time, he turned his Horse's head towards the Sea-side, crying out, He that loves me, follow me, and arrived at Dartmouth that very day, where he would have embarked immediately: But the wind was so contrary, that the master of the Ship represented to him, he could not put to Sea without manifest danger. Tush, replied the King, set forward, thou never yet heardest of a King that was drowned: And compelling him to sail, he safely arrived at Barſleur. On the morrow he sent for the troops he had in Normandy, to attend him on the road to Mans, and in a few days marched to the relief of the Besieged. By this extreme diligence, he surprized the Besiegers in such a manner, that he not only relieved the castle, but took the Count of Fleſche prisoner. Exulting at his success, he could not forbear jesting on the misfortune of his enemy. But the Count, far from being cast down at what had happened, fiercely replied, He had no reason to glory in an advantage which he had gained by surprize, adding, were he at liberty again, he would let him see, it would not be so easy a matter to vanquish him another time. The victorious King, piqued with these bold words, set his prisoner free upon the spot, telling him, He desired no return, but exhorted him to do his worst. After this, returning to England (2) with the same expedition, he went and pursued his diversion, which this affair had interrupted.

Jerusalem taken.
M. Paris.
Malmsh.
M. West.

The same year the Croisſes took Jerusalem by storm, and put forty thousand Saracens to the sword. When they came to elect a King to govern the country conquered upon the Infidels, the majority of the Leaders of the Christian army gave their votes for Robert Duke of Normandy. But this Prince, for reasons unknown, refused this dignity (3). Whereupon, the famous Godfrey of Bouillon was chosen, who by his valour and conduct, had greatly contributed to the success of that expedition.

1100.
Earl of Poitiers mortgaged his Dominions to the King.
Malmsh.
Ord. Vital.

Fortune seemed to take a pleasure in heaping favours on William. After having acquired the possession of Normandy by a happy chance, which he had no room to expect, an opportunity was put into his hands of becoming also master of the Dutchy of Guienne and Earldom of Poitou. William Earl of Poitiers, animated by the example of so many Princes engaged in the holy war, resolved to join them, and lead a powerful reinforcement to the Croisſes. As this design could not be executed without great expence, he applied to the King of England for the sum he wanted, offering to mortgage his dominions (4) for his security. William readily closing with so advantageous a proposal, speedily raised the Money. He designed to carry it himself to the Earl, that he might at the same time take possession of his dominions, consisting of Guienne and Poitou, two of the richest provinces of France. Whilst he was preparing for his voyage, he had a mind to take the diversion of hunting in New-Forest, where an unforeseen death put an end to all his projects.

It is said, as the King was going to mount his horse, he was told a certain Monk had dreamt a dream which portended some great misfortune to him. As he gave but little heed to such presages, he answered jestingly, he plainly saw the Monk wanted money, so ordered him a hundred shillings; but however sent him word, to dream better dreams for the future (5). Whether this is to be considered as an omen, or the pure effect of chance, it was that very day fulfilled. Towards the evening William having wounded a Stag, was pursuing him full speed, when Walter Tyrrel, a French Knight (6), shooting at the same Stag, pierced the King through the heart, upon which he fell down dead without speaking a word (7). The murderer, though he knew his own innocence, fled for it however, without any body endeavouring to seize him. Every one was busy about the King, whose body was laid in a Cart, which accidentally came by, and carried to Winchester, where it was buried the next day. Henry his Brother, fearing the measures he had taken to secure the crown might be retarded, dispatched the funeral as soon as possible, which was celebrated without much ceremony, no one lamenting the loss of a Prince so little beloved.

1100.
William
killed by accident, a Terrence Lanning.
Hoved
Malmsh.
Knighton.
Brompton.

Thus fell William Rufus on the second of August of the year 1100, in the forty-fourth year of his age, after a reign of twelve years, ten months, and twenty days. His tragical death, in the very place where his Brother and Nephew (8) perished by no less extraordinary accidents, gave occasion for many reflections. It was publicly said, that God was pleased to take vengeance upon the Conqueror's family, for his destroying and laying waste the country in so prodigious a manner to make the New-Forest. But there is no need to have recourse to the Father's faults; enough might be found in the Son, not to wonder at his perishing by an uncommon death. Accordingly Historians, without hesitation, rank William Rufus among those Princes who are no great ornament to the throne of England.

Character of William
Rufus.
S. Dunelm.
Brompton.

This Prince had all the vices of his Father without his virtues. William I. balanced his faults, by a religious outside, a great chastity, and a commendable temperance. But by the description given of his Son by Historians, it appears, he was neither religious, nor chaste, nor temperate. He was profuse to his favourites and soldiers, and magnificent in his buildings and cloaths. It is said, his Valet bringing him one day a new pair of breeches which cost but three shillings, he fell into a passion (9), and ordered him never to bring him any but what cost at least a Mark. It is added, he was contented with a pair not worth so much, being valued to him at a Mark. If we may believe those who have writ his Life, he had neither honour nor conscience, nor faith, nor religion, and that he took a pride in appearing as such. It is related that one day [fifty English] Gentlemen accused for hunting and killing the King's deer (10), having passed through the trial of the Fire Ordeal untouched, he swore, He could not believe God was a just Judge, since he protected such sort of people. Eadmer, who lived in his time, says, the King took money of the Jews at Roan, to compel such as were baptized to return to Judaism (11). Malmſbury adds, William ordered some Bishops and Rabbies to meet together and dispute in his presence upon religion, promising the Rabbies he would be circumcised, if their arguments seemed to him stronger than those of the Christians. Indeed, the Historian says, it is to be supposed this promise was only in merriment. He is charged with denying a providence, and openly maintaining that prayers addressed to Saints were vain and impertinent.

Malmsh.

Eadmer.

p. 123.

But to judge impartially of the testimony of these Historians, who were all either Monks or Ecclesiastics, it must be considered they may very possibly have drawn

Remarks on the Historians who have given us the Character of Rufus.

- (1) Seventy-four, says Sandford, p. 21.
(2) At least this paid current in England, as we shall see in the Year 1106. It is said he did it out of expectation of the Crown of England, and our Historians observe, that he never after prospered in any thing he undertook.
(3) Aquitain, containing the Countries of Perche, Saintonge, Angoumois, Perigot, &c. with his Territories. Brady, p. 224.
(4) The Monk dreamt that he saw the King gnaw a Crucifix with his Teeth, and that as he was about to bite off its Legs, the Image spurn'd him to the Ground, and as he lay groveling on the Earth, there came out of his Mouth a Flame of Fire, with abundance of Smoke. Malmsh.
(5) Ord. Vitalis calls him a rich native of Pontaise, a valiant Knight, dextrous in Arms; and therefore very intimate with the King, by whom he had been invited over. See Malmsh. p. 126. P. Blesensis, p. 110. After the Fact, he eloped into Normandy. Knighton, p. 2373. Tyrrel, p. 108, 109.
(6) The Circumstances of this Matter are thus related by Sir John Hayward. As the King was hunting at Cherishingham in the New-Forest, he struck a Deer lightly with an Arrow; and stay'd his Horse to look after the Deer, holding his Hands before his Eyes to keep off the Sun-beams which dazzled his sight; another Deer crouching the way, Sir Walter Tyrrel shooting at it too carelessly, or too steadily at the King, hit him full in the Breast. Mr. Tyrrel observes, though Florence of Worcester, Malmſbury, and Simon of Durham, (who wrote within forty Years after this Accident) do all agree in the Place and Person who had the Misfortune thus to kill this Prince, yet there are Authors of that very Age, who not only doubt, but positively deny that this Walter had any hand in it. I addess says, Whether the Arrow was shot at him, or, as most affirm, flew him by his falling down upon it. His Tomb of Grey-marble (somewhat raised from the Ground) remains at this Day in the midst of the Choir of Winchester Cathedral. This Monument being broken open by the Parliamentarians in the Reign of Charles I. was found to contain the Dust of that King, some Relicks of Cloth of Gold, a large Gold-Ring, and a small Chalice of Silver. The Reader may see a Draught of this Tomb in Sandford's Gen. Hist. p. 23.
(7) See Page 178. Note (2) and (3).
(8) Knighton says, That he made killing of a Deer a capital Crime; whoever killed a Hare was fined twenty Shillings, and a Rabbit ten Shillings, p. 2373.
(9) This Story is thus related: A young Jew being converted, as is said, by a Vision of a Saint, his Father presented the King with sixty Marks, intreating him to make his Son return to his old Religion. The King lends to the young Man, and commanded him without more to turn Jew again; which he refusing to do, and wondering the King, who was a Christian, should propose such a thing to him, he was bid to be gone. The Father perceiving the King could do no good upon his Son, desired to have his Money again. Now, said the King, I have taken Pains enough to turn thee, however, that thou may'st see how kindly I will use thee, thou shalt have one half, and the other half thou canst not have, once deny me for my Pains. Eadmer, p. 47.

1100. him in blacker colours than he deserved. For he was the first King of England that seized the Church's revenues, without regarding the clamours of the clergy. This was unpardonable with them. Their strong prejudices against him on that account, might perhaps make them think, that a Prince, guilty of so heinous a crime, must have been without faith or religion. This conjecture may be supported by observing that the writers, who charge him with prophaneness, produce no other evidence than some publick rumours. As for incontinency, which he is also accused of, they alledge no instances, nor so much as name any of his mistresses; though the amours of Kings are not easily concealed. It is true, they father a Bastard Son upon him, called Bertrand (1). But this alone would not have been sufficient to put them so much out of humour, had not his other actions, which more nearly concerned them, stirred their choler. However, that is only a conjecture, which the reader may value as he pleases. Nevertheless, as I find in the Life of this Prince but few laudable actions to balance these accusations, I do not see how he could possibly be justified, since all the Historians unanimously agree in saying so much ill of him.

Thorn.
Baker.

Sax. Ann.
Huntingd.
p. 378.
M. Paris.
p. 46.

Huntingd.
M. Paris.

Higden.

His ordinary revenues were probably the same with his Father's. But as he ran into many more needless expenses, he often increased them by extraordinary impositions, which were very frequent in his reign. To these were added the profits of the vacant benefices, which brought him very large sums. At the time of his death, he had in his hands the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, the Bishopricks of Winchester and Salisbury, and twelve rich Abbies, besides many other benefices of less value. When, after enjoying the incomes some years, he thought fit to dispose of the benefices, he never regarded the merit of the persons, but only the sum they bid for them. However, it is related, that one day two Monks striving to out-bid one another for a rich Abbey, he perceived a third standing by, of whom he demanded how much he would give? The Monk replied, he had no money, and, if he had, his conscience would not suffer him to lay it out in that manner; whereupon the King told him, swearing by St.

Luke's Face, his usual oath, that he best deserv'd it, and should have it for nothing.

Ranulph Flamhart, a Man of mean birth, was his treasurer, and the contriver of most of the extraordinary ways practised by the King to extort money from his Subjects. He was rewarded for his services with the Bishoprick of Durham, conferred on him by the King a little before his death.

Among his charitable works are reckoned, the Hospital Speed. he founded at York, and a Church in Southwark for the use of the Monks called de Charitate (2).

This Prince was of a middle stature, but being very fat, look'd shorter than he was. His hair a deep yellow, inclined to red; his eyes of two different colours, speckled with small black spots. He was generally of a very ruddy complexion. Though he was far from being eloquent, he talked a good deal, especially when angry. His countenance was severe, and his voice strong, which he would exalt sometimes on purpose to frighten those he was speaking to. He is said however to converse affably enough with his courtiers, who easily found the way to soften his fierce temper.

Historians relate several extraordinary accidents in this reign, as earthquakes (3), comets; and a spring, which ran blood three days together (4). But what caused the most damage was, first a great fire in 1092, which burnt down great part of London. In the next place, the Sea rising to an extraordinary height (5), overflowed the coast of Kent, and swept away abundance of people and cattle. This inundation covered the Lands that belonged formerly to Earl Goodwin in the reign of Edward the Confessor. This Place, called at this day Goodwin's Sands, is famous for Shipwrecks innumerable.

Malsbury observes of the reign of William Rufus, that notwithstanding Mens minds were turned to war, yet excess and sensuality prevailed in a very scandalous manner among the Nobility, and even among the Clergy. Vanity, lust and intemperance reigned every where, says that Historian. The Men appeared so effeminate in their dress and conversation, that they showed themselves Men in nothing but their daily attempts upon the chastity of the women (6).

Extraordinary Occurrences in his Reign.
Malm'sb.
p. 23.
Remarks of an Historian on the Corruption of Manners in this Age.

Eadmer.

(1) Baker is the only one (as far as can be found) that mentions this Child. But the Monks give King William a bad Character as to his Incontinency. Brompt. p. 996. M. Paris, p. 46.

(2) Also of an old Monastery in the City of York, he founded an Hospital for the Support of poor Persons, and dedicated it to St. Peter. This Hospital was afterwards augmented by King Stephen, and by him dedicated to St. Leonard. Sir John Hayward in the Life of Will. p. 220.

(3) One in the Year 1089, which was followed by a Dearth.

(4) At Finchamstead in Berkshire. Malm'sb. and other Historians say, it ran for a Fortnight together. Malm'sb. p. 125. Huntingd. p. 378. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 225, affirms, it ran for three Weeks together. In 1091, there was so terrible a Storm at South-Weft, that it blew down above six hundred Houses, and several Churches in London. It took off the whole Roof of St. Mary-le-bow Church, and carried it a good way. There were four Beams in it twenty-six Foot long, that fell with such force in one of the Streets (which were not then paved, but a moorish Ground) that they sunk above twenty Foot in the Street. As they could not be pulled up again, People were forced to saw them even with the Ground. S. Dunelm. p. 217. Hoved. p. 462. See Stow's Survey, Vol. I. p. 21.

(5) On Novemb. 11. say the Sax. Ann. But Flor. Wor. places it on the 3d.

(6) The Places at which William Rufus is recorded to have held his Courts, are as follows. In the Year 1087 at Christmas, at London. (Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 371. Brompt. p. 983.) In 1090, at Westminster, at Christmas. (Sax. Ann.) In 1092, pro more at Christmas. (Eadmer, p. 15--20.) In 1093, at Christmas, at Gloucester. (Sax. Ann.) In 1095, at Winchester, at Easter; at Whitfuntide, at Windsor; and at the same place again at Christmas. (Sax. Ann.) In 1096, in the beginning of January, at Salisbury. (Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 222. Eadmer, &c.) In 1097, at Easter, at Windsor. (Sax. Ann.) In 1099, at Whitfuntide, in his new Hall at Westminster, for the first time; (Sax. Ann.) and at Christmas, at Gloucester. In 1100, at Winchester, at Easter; and at Whitfuntide, at London, pro more. (Sax. Ann. Brompt. p. 996.)

W 2

As there is but little to say of this King's Coin, it may not be amiss to show how the King's Revenue was paid in those ancient times. At first, The Tenants of Knight's Fees answered to their Lords by military Services; and the Tenants of Soccage Lands and Demenes in great measure by Work and Provisions: Afterwards, the Revenue of the Crown was answered in Gold and Silver, and sometime in Palfreys, Distriers, Chafcons, Leveners, Harvets, &c. (that is, in Horses, Dogs and Birds of Game) and the like. Sometime in both together. When a Man paid Money into the Exchequer, it was said, In thesauro liberavit so much; and the same Phrase continueth to this Day. These Payments were made ad Scalum and ad Penjum; and in Blank Silver and Numero by Tale. Ad Scalum was by paying Sixpence over and above each Pound or twenty Shillings, which at first was thought sufficient to make good the Weight. Ad Penjum was the Person's making good the Deficiencies of Weight, though it was more than Six-pence per twenty Shillings. But as the Money might be deficient in Fineness as well as Weight, a third way of Payment was by Combustion, or melting down part of the Money paid in, and reducing it to Plate of due Fineness. When the Ferm was melted down, it was said to be dealbated or blanch'd. As suppose a Ferm of a hundred Pounds was paid into the Exchequer, after the Combustion it was said to be a hundred Pound Blank. Frequently the twentieth Part of one Shilling was accepted in lieu of Combustion, to save Trouble and Charges. The Payment by Numero or Tale needs no Explanation. Payments, or at least Computations, were made by Marks, and Half-Marks; Ounces, and half Ounces of Gold: And in Pounds, Marks, Half-Marks, Shillings, Pence, &c. of Silver. The Mark of Gold was equal to a hundred and twenty Shillings of Silver. The Ounce of Gold was equivalent to fifteen Shillings of Silver. The Pound of Silver by Tale was twenty Shillings; the Mark thirteen Shillings and Four-pence; and the Shilling consisted of Twelve pence; and a Penny was the twentieth part of an Ounce, equal to our Three-pence.

The Coins of William Rufus are exceeding rare, if, as is justly believed, all those with the Full Face are to be ascribed to the Conqueror: However, several Authors place one of the Full Face to this King, inscribed P I L L E M. R E X. A N. a Cross, or a Star, on each side the King's Head: Reverse, a Cross composed of double Lines, as in the Figure here annexed.

3. HENRY I. Surnamed BEAU-CLERK.

HENRY I.
1100.

THE English considered the death of William Rufus as a great deliverance, though the present advantage reaped by it, was not to continue long. The Norman yoke was not broken by the death of this Prince, since there still remained two Sons of William the Conqueror, of whom one was soon going to be their Sovereign. Indeed this might have been a favourable juncture, if they had designed to throw off this yoke, or the two former Kings had left it in their power to attempt it. But depressed as they were, and stript of their estates and all offices, such a thought could scarce come into their minds. Their only course was to be guided by the proceedings of the Normans, who were masters of the Kingdom. In all likelihood, these last were in great perplexity on account of the two Brothers, who might both claim the Crown. Robert Duke of Normandy, by his Birth, seem'd to have an incontestable right, which was further strengthen'd by his late Treaty with William Rufus, wherein it was agreed that the Survivor should be heir to all their father's inheritance. Besides, his mild and generous temper, which had gained him a strong party in England, seem'd to give him a great advantage over his Brother Henry, whose disposition was unknown. But on the other hand, his slothfulness and negligence, of which he had given too many instances, form'd a disadvantageous prejudice against him. His very friends were backward to declare in his favour, fearing he was not ready to prosecute his right. His departure from the Holy Land was known, but where he was at present none could tell. Nay, his friends were in pain about him. Moreover, after his great expence in his voyage, it was reasonable to presume that, at his return, he would find himself destitute of all necessary means to dispute the crown with his Brother. On the contrary, Henry had the advantage of being born in England (1), whilst his Father was on the throne, which went a great way with some people. Then, his pretensions were strengthened with his presence, and positive promise both to the Normans and English (2) to abrogate all rigorous Laws made since the Conquest, to restore the government as in the time of the Saxon Kings, to abolish all unjust and arbitrary taxes, to reinstate the Clergy in their privileges, to fill the vacant benefices, and recall the banish'd Ecclesiasticks. But all these promises would not perhaps have produced the effect he expected, if his diligence and vigour at this juncture had not added weight to his reasons. Immediately after the death of William he posted to Winchester, where the Crown and Sceptre were kept with the royal treasure, and would have taken possession, but was stoutly opposed by Roger de Breteuil (3), one of Robert's adherents. This Lord alledged, they were bound by oath to acknowledge the Duke of Normandy for King, in case William died without heirs. That besides, the Law of Nature gave Robert a right, which could not be justly disputed. During this contest, several other Lords being come to Winchester, there was quickly a great concourse of people, flowing in from all parts to know what was transacting. If the choice of a King had solely depended upon the Lords, then at Winchester, the Duke of Normandy's right would doubtless have been preserved. But Henry gave them not time to take necessary measures to execute such a design. As he observed the people were in his interest, he improved that advantage, and drawing his sword, swore no Man should take possession of the Crown. The dispute still growing warmer, the Lords that were present thought fit to retire into a private room, to consult more calmly together what was to be done on this emergency. Whilst they were debating, the people made the name of Henry resound in their ears by their loud acclamations, 1100. and gave them reason to dread it would be extremely dangerous to declare for Robert. So preferring their own safety to justice and equity, they resolved, (in order to prevent a civil war which seem'd unavoidable, if they persisted in asserting the rights of the Duke of Normandy,) to place Henry on the throne. This was enough to satisfy the Prince that his right was sufficiently established. Without staying for the confirmation of the estates, he set out immediately for London. On the morrow after his arrival, Maurice, Bishop of that city (4), in consequence of this hasty and irregular election, put the crown on his head, administering to him the usual oath.

The short space between the death of William and Henry's coronation (5) is used as an argument by those that maintain the right of electing the Kings was then confined to a few of the principal Lords. At least, they infer from hence that the Commons were not concerned in the elections. Henry had it not in his power to seize the crown by mere force. Neither can it be said to have fallen to him as next Heir, for his elder Brother was alive. He obtained it therefore only by election. This being granted, to say he was chosen by the nation represented, as at this day, by a Parliament, it should be proved, such a Parliament was then sitting. But that is impossible. Much less can it be said, that in three days space, the estates could be summoned and assembled. This is a plausible argument: But the truth is, nothing can be concluded from it, because there was yet no regulation made since the Conquest about the succession of the crown (6).

As Henry's pretended election interrupted the natural order of the Succession, it was to be feared, it would make dangerous impressions on the minds of the people. It was therefore highly necessary he should enter upon his reign in such manner as might give his subjects room to hope well of his government. The performance of his promises being the test that was to demonstrate the sincerity of his intentions, he began his reign with that, in order to gain the people's affection. He set about, in the first place, reforming his court, where the King his Brother had suffered many abuses to creep in. The courtiers, for the most part, sure of impunity, were wont to tyrannize over people in a shameful manner. Not content with oppressing them by unjust and violent methods, and secretly attempting the chastity of the women, they publicly gloried in it, instead of dreading a punishment. To cure these disorders, Henry published a very severe edict against all offenders in general, but particularly against adulterers. As for those that abused their power in oppressing the people, he ordered them to be put to death without mercy. Some who were already notorious upon that account, were driven from court, and Ranulph Bishop of Durham, the detested Minister of the late King, was thrown into prison (7).

If this first proceeding of the new King gave the English a good opinion of his reign, what he added soon after was no less acceptable to them. To convince them of his real intent to perform what he had promised, he abolished the Couvre-feu, which they could not but consider as a constant badge of their servitude (8). This favour was followed by another of much greater importance: I mean, a Charter, confirming divers privileges enjoyed under the Saxon Kings, and renouncing all those unjust prerogatives usurped by the two late Kings. By this Charter, Henry restored the Church to her antient liberties, and freed her from all those oppressions she had for some time been subject to, particularly during the vacant Sees and Abbies. He consented that the Heirs of Earls and Barons upon

(1) He was born at Selby in Yorkshire in 1070, Sandford, p. 24. M. Paris says it was in 1068, p. 5.

(2) To the Clergy and Laity (populo universis) which he assembled at London, M. Paris, p. 5. Eadmer, p. 55. S. Dunelm. p. 255, &c. Sax. Ann.

(3) William de Breteuil, and not Roger. He was Son of William Fitz-osbern Earl of Hereford, and had his Estate in Normandy, of which Brutium was the chief Seat, from whence he was surnamed William de Breteuil, now Breteuil.

(4) And Thomas Archbishop of York. R. de Diceto, p. 498. M. Paris, p. 46. P. Blefensis, p. 111.

(5) William died the second, or, according to some, the first of August, and Henry was crowned the fifth. S. Dunelm. p. 225. M. Paris, p. 46. Brompt. p. 997. The Person that assisted Henry mostly in getting the Crown was Henry de Bello Monte, or Beaumont Earl of Warwick. Mainf. p. 156. Brady, p. 235.

(6) This Dispute whether the Commons had any share in the electing of the Kings, seems to proceed from not considering that the Barons had all the Lands in their hands in those days, and that there was no such thing then as what we call Commons now, nor till some time after. See Note, p. 155.

(7) This was done by the advice of the Great Council of the Kingdom. M. Paris, p. 47. Sax. Ann.

(8) See page 171, Note (1).

1100. a death, should not be obliged to reclaim their estates, but pay only a lawful Relief (1). And at the same time required the Lords to deal in like manner with their Vassals. He agreed that the Nobles might marry their Daughters without asking the King's consent, provided it was not to the enemies of the State. He appointed the Mothers, or nearest relations, guardians to Minors. He made a standard for weights and measures throughout the kingdom, and ordained that Coiners should be punished with loss of limbs. In fine, having granted a general pardon for all crimes committed before his coronation, and remitted all arrears and debts due to the crown, he added a very material article, which was no less satisfactory to the Normans than English; which was, the confirmation of the Laws of King Edward, that is, of the Laws in force during the empire of the Saxon Kings, and entirely laid aside or expressly abolished since the Conquest. The native English, could not but be extremely well pleased to see their antient Laws restored. And the Normans were no less gainers by it. Hitherto they held their estates at the will of the Conqueror, consequently were liable to be dispossessed at his pleasure. But by this charter, which confined the royal authority within its antient bounds, they were settled in their possessions, and screened from the violence of arbitrary power. This charter being approved and signed by the Lords spiritual and temporal, several copies were transcribed and deposited in the principal Monasteries to be consulted upon occasion (2).

Anselm recalled.

This beginning of government gave the people room to hope a happy continuance, since they already saw so advantageous alterations. But still one thing was wanting to compleat their satisfaction, namely, the recalling of Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, who had gained their esteem and affection, by his vigorous opposition to the late King's oppressions. Henry, unwilling to refuse them this pleasure, writ a Letter to the Archbishop, who was still at Lyons, to invite him to return to his Diocese; intimating withal, he designed to be guided by his directions, and entrust him with the administration of affairs. Anselm, to whom this news gave wings, returned forthwith into England (3), to the great joy of the people.

The King marries Matilda of Scotland.

The arrival of this Prelate was no less agreeable to the King. He had need of him in an affair which could not be managed without his assistance. As his design was to attach the English to his interest, he believed nothing was more capable to gain their affection, than his marrying Matilda, Daughter to Malcolm King of Scotland by Margaret, Sister to Edgar Atheling (4). Indeed this alliance could not but be very grateful to the Nation, since it would be the means of restoring the Saxon royal family to the crown.

Obstacles to the Marriage. Eadmer.

Henry had now demanded the Princess of King Edgar her Brother; but there occurred a great obstacle to the execution of this project. Matilda had been educated in England in the Monastery at Wilton, where she had put on the veil. Indeed, to remove this difficulty, it was alledged she had not taken the vow, and had been veiled only to preserve her chastity, supposed to be in danger in the beginning of the Conquest. But this reason did not appear to the two Kings sufficient to authorise any farther proceedings, though they were both equally desirous of the match. Every one knew, Matilda had put on the veil, and, it was generally believed, had vowed chastity. Some even affirm, she excepted against her marriage as unlawful, and add, that, when pressed at last with reasons of State, she yielded to the instances of her Brother and Lover, she cursed the Line that was to spring from her, as abominable in the sight of God. The decision of this affair, which appeared so difficult, being left to the Archbishop of Canterbury, he would not undertake it alone, but called in the assistance of a council which met at his palace at Lambeth. This assembly being entirely inclined to the King's side, the arguments for Matilda's liberty to marry, were so well managed, that the council declared the intended marriage to be good and lawful. Pursuant to this declaration, it was shortly after solemnized to the general satisfaction of both kingdoms (5).

1101. Whilst these things were transacting, Duke Robert was returned to Normandy (6), and had taken possession of his dominions without opposition. Though Normandy was mortgaged to the late King (7), Henry did not think fit to dispute it with his Brother, at a time when he was apprehensive of being attacked himself upon the account of England. Duke Robert in his way home from the Holy-Land, made some stay in Apulia, where he married a wife (8), which delay helped his Brother to rob him of the crown. He was no sooner arrived, but he openly showed his resentment at being supplanted, and a firm resolution to attempt the recovery of what he had been deprived of in his absence. The Bishop of Durham, who, finding means to escape out of prison (9), was retired to Normandy, did not a little contribute to confirm him in that design. Moreover several Norman Lords, who had consented to Henry's election by a sort of compulsion, began to contrive how to place Robert on the throne (10). They had already been tampering with some of the principal English Lords, to draw them into their plot. As they knew him to be a mild and good-natured Prince, they promised themselves much greater happiness under his Government than under Henry's, who appeared to have more vigour and resolution. Mean time, the rumour of Robert's preparing to assert his rights, wrought variously on the minds of the people. Some were for continuing firm to the King, and keeping the Oath they had taken to him. Others, on the contrary, though satisfied with the King's proceedings, resumed their former inclination for the Duke his Brother, so that Henry was under great perplexity. If he was loth to trust to the fidelity of the English, they were no less so to rely on his sincerity. What they had experienced from the two late Kings, gave them but too much reason to dread, that whatever the present King had hitherto done, was only to amuse them and prevent their siding with his Brother. In this state of uncertainty, Anselm's assistance was of great use to Henry in fixing the English (11), who seemed to be wavering. The Archbishop, who was indebted to the King, was very glad to show his gratitude on this occasion. He assembled the principal English and Norman Lords, and so positively assured them, the King would punctually perform all his promises, that they seemed very well satisfied. And yet, no sooner was it known that the Duke of Normandy was going to embark for England, but the greatest part of the Nobles declared for him, and part of the fleet (12) followed their example. This defection gave the Duke opportunity to land at Portsmouth (13), where he was received without opposition. He was not ignorant how the English stood affected. Such as came to him every day, assured him of the good wishes of their countrymen. They made him hope, the King would quickly be deterred by the whole Nation, who looked upon their oath of allegiance as involuntary. Mean time, Henry took all the measures he thought requisite to frustrate the designs of his Brother, by making use of Anselm's credit, in whom the people seemed very much to confide. As

Eadmer.

Sax. Ann.

M. Paris. Pol. Virg.

(1) When the King's Tenant in Capite died, his Lands were in the King's Hands till the Heir had done Homage and was of Age. When the Heir sued to have his Estate out of the King's Hands, his obtaining it was called Livery, and the Profits received in the mean time by the King, were called Primer Seisin. Now, according to Sir Henry Spelman, redeeming Lands was a Composition with the King for Primer Seisin, Livery and Relief; for the two first of which by Henry's Charter, the Heir was not to pay any thing for the future. Spelman's Feuds, &c. p. 30. c. 16. The Relief of an Earl, as set down in the Laws of the Conqueror, was, eight Horses saddled and bridled; four Helmets; four Coats of Mail; four Shields; four Spears; four Swords, four Chafers, and one Palfrey bridled and laddled. That of a Baron half as much, with a Palfrey. That of a Vassal to his Lord, his best Horse, his Helmet, Coat of Mail, Shield, Spear, Sword, or in lieu of these a hundred Shillings. That of the Countryman, his best Beast; and of him that farmed his Lands, a Year's Rent. These were afterwards turned into Money; and no doubt both Money and Arms were extorted in an arbitrary manner, as appears by the words of the Law, LL. Gul. c. 12, c. 23, c. 24, c. 29. Robert de Belesme Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury, upon the death of his Brother Hugh de Montgomery, paid for the said Earldom, as a Relief, three thousand Pound Sterling, in the tenth of William Rufus. Ord. Vital. p. 708.

(2) There were as many Copies as Counties, which were sent to certain Abbies in each County: And yet there was scarce one to be found in the Reign of King John, whose Magna Charta was founded upon it. There is a Copy at this Day in the Red Book of the Exchequer. And Matthew Paris (p. 55.) has given us a Transcript of that which was sent into Herefordshire, which you may find translated by Tyrrel, p. 114. B. III. Vol. II.

(3) Before Michaelmas, and landed at Dover, Octob. 24. Eadmer, p. 55. Sax. Ann.

(4) Brompton says, he did it by the Advice of his great Council, p. 998. See S. Dunelm. p. 226. They were married, Nov. 11. Sax. Ann. Malmsh. p. 156.

(5) M. Paris his account of Matilda's being against marrying and declaring herself a Nun, and cursing her Issue seems to be groundless. For Eadmer says, she privately applied to Anselm, confessing she had been veiled indeed, but against her Will, and had never worn her Veil unless in the Presence of the Abbess Christina her Aunt; and also that the King her Father seeing it once on her Head, pull'd it off, and tore it, protesting to Alan Earl of Breteigne, he intended to marry her, and not to make her a Nun. Eadmer, p. 56.

(6) In August. Huntingd. p. 378. Brompt. p. 998.

(7) It was only for three Years. See above, p. 187. Note (5).

(8) Sibilla Daughter to Geoffrey, and Sister to William Earl of Conversana, a Prince of Italy, with whom he had a fine Fortune. Malmsh. p. 153.

(9) By bribing his Keepers, M. Paris, p. 47. They brought him a Rope in a Pitcher of Water, by which he let himself down. Malmsh. p. 156.

(10) The chief of those that remained faithful to Henry, were Robert Fitz-baron, Richard de Redvers, Roger Bigot, Robert Earl of Meiland, with his Brother Henry. Malmsh. p. 156.

(11) The King and they seem to have entered into a Covenant. See Eadmer, p. 59.

(12) Which Henry had fitted out upon News of Robert's Preparations. S. Dunelm. p. 226. Sax. Ann. Brompt. p. 998.

(13) In August: He was conveyed thither by that part of Henry's Fleet which had revolted. From Portsmouth, Robert immediately marched towards Winchester, and encamped near that City. S. Dunelm. p. 226. Brompt. p. 998.

1101. soon as the army was ready to march, the Archbishop came and called the principal officers together, to whom he so sensibly represented the heinousness of breaking their oath, that he confirmed them in their duty; so that they unanimously promised to hazard their lives and fortunes in defence of the King (1). Robert, who expected the contrary, plainly saw this change would prove very prejudicial to his affairs. He relied not on his own forces, but on the assistance of the English. In expectation that the majority would abandon the King and join him, he had proceeded so far as to threaten such as persisted to support the Usurper, as he styled his Brother. But when he found the bulk of the Nation declared for the King, and the army had just renewed their oath of allegiance, he perceived the execution of his design was impracticable. Thus, falling on a sudden from all his hopes (2), he closed immediately with the proposals of peace sent him by the King. An accommodation appeared to him so much the more necessary, as he saw the most zealous for him at first, began to waver. Matters standing thus, and the two Brothers equally wishing to come to a treaty, the Lords of both parties met together to consider of the means. It was easy to see, Robert did not expect to obtain by treaty a crown, which he could not acquire by arms. So, in consideration that Henry was already crowned, and born in the kingdom after his Father was on the throne, the result of the conference was, that he should keep possession of the crown. He promised for his part (3) to resign to Robert the Castles in Normandy garrisoned with English, and to pay him the yearly Sum of three thousand Marks. It was stipulated also, that if one of the Brothers died without children, the other should succeed him. This agreement being signed and sworn to by twelve Lords of each side, the armies were disbanded (4). Robert staid two full months (5) at the court of England, living in perfect union with his Brother.

This accommodation was very advantageous to the King in many respects. It not only secured him the crown which he was in some hazard of losing, but rendered him also more feared and esteemed, when it was seen that by his prudence and steadiness, he got clear of so dangerous an affair. However, he could not forget the peril he had been in. As he was apprehensive his enemies might hereafter make fresh attempts to dethrone him, whenever an opportunity offered, he resolved to prevent them, by ruining them one after another. It was no hard matter for him to make them feel, by turns, the effects of his resentment. Opportunities of being revenged are seldom wanting to those who have the power in their hands. Soon after the treaty, he attacked, on divers pretences, Hugh de Grantmesnil, Robert de Pontfract, and some others, who easily perceived, their greatest crime consisted in their good-will to the Duke of Normandy. He was particularly exasperated with Robert de Belesme (6), because he had shown him the least respect, and still continued to discover his desire of exciting new troubles. This young Lord, Son to the late Earl of Montgomery, publicly declared, Henry was an Usurper, and that it was dishonourable for the Normans as well as the English, to suffer him to take the crown from his elder Brother. He was not satisfied with talking thus indiscreetly, but rendered himself formidable, by storing and fortifying his Castles in Shropshire (7). The King, who had determined his ruin, was glad, he gave him so fair an opportunity by these imprudent proceedings. To complete his destruction, spies were set upon him, who, feigning to come into his measures, observed all his actions, and took care to talk to him, before surned witnesses, of things that served to render him criminal. When the King thought he had sufficient evidence against him, he ordered him to be accused of five and forty articles, the least of which was enough to condemn him. Belesme being obliged to appear in court, desired time to prepare his answer; which being granted, he took the opportunity to make his escape and retire to Shrewsbury, where he hoped to defend himself by the assistance of the Welsh, who espoused his cause. When he took this resolution, he relied on the assistance of several other Lords, who seemed to be entirely of his sentiments. But whether he was deceived, or not deemed a fit person to be head of such an enterprize, he found himself abandoned by all, and thereby saw, though too late, the vanity of his projects. The King proclaiming him a traitor, marched against him with so superior a force, that in few days he became master of Shrewsbury, where the rebel did not dare to expect him (8). After which, he took all his other castles, and compelled him to relinquish whatever was held by the Earl his Father in England, and retire to Normandy, where he carried his ill temper. Henry confiscated all his Lands, and involved his Brothers in the same punishment, notwithstanding their innocence, so desirous was he of expelling this family out of his dominions (9).

The insolence of this Lord did not give the King so much trouble, as the haughtiness of Archbishop Anselm, much with whom he had a contest that threw him into great perplexities. The Archbishop had conceived two projects, which could not, in all likelihood, be accomplished without great difficulties. The first was to oblige the Clergy to live unmarried, and the second, to wrest from the King the investiture of Bishops and Abbots. To attain his ends, he convened a Synod, where, in the first place, he caused all the married Priests to be excommunicated, though they were then very numerous in England. Henry, who was not much concerned in this affair, being unwilling to give the Archbishop any distaste, the decree passed in the Synod, notwithstanding the strong opposition of the inferior Clergy, who in vain tried to ward off this blow. An Historian remarks, that, although Anselm's good intentions were generally applauded, it was thought to be a thing of dangerous consequence, to compel the Priests to a continency, of which many of them were not capable; and adds, it was justly feared, this rigour would occasion their committing uncleanness of a more criminal nature than the prohibited marriage.

Anselm seeing his first project succeed, undertook the execution of the second, and would have proceeded to excommunicate the Bishops invested by the King. But here the case was quite altered. The King was too much concerned, not to oppose to the utmost of his power the abolishing a prerogative his predecessors had quietly enjoyed. But how vigorously soever he exerted himself, he could not prevent some Bishops who had received their investitures from him, from resigning their Bishopricks out of fear of excommunication. On the other hand, Anselm refused to consecrate such as were nominated to their Sees by the King, unless he would give up the right of investiture. This new claim, which the Archbishop, finding himself supported by the Court of Rome, very boldly asserted, occasioned a many years quarrel between him and the King. As Henry would not depart from his prerogative, Anselm pretended he could not submit without betraying the cause of God. All hopes of accommodation being taken away by the obstinacy of both parties (10), the Archbishop resolved to carry his complaints to Paschal II, who was then Pope. In all appearance, it was by his orders that he embarked in this enterprize. He was attended in his Journey by the Prelates that had resigned their Bishopricks, and upon his arrival at Rome, instantly demanded of the Pope that he would be pleased to restore them by his authority: Then, says an Historian, the Holy See, whose clemency is open to all the world, provided care be taken to prepare it beforehand by a certain dazzling Metal, restored the Bishops, and sent them back to their respective Churches. The King being informed that Anselm was gone to Rome, sent also three agents to plead his cause, namely, Gerard Archbishop elect of York, Herbert Bishop of Thetford, and Robert Bishop of Chester, with William de Wareham, an Ecclesiastick of great learning, to assist them with his advice (11). Though these agents maintained the King's cause with a great zeal and resolution, Paschal would abate nothing of his pretensions. The affair was carried so far, that the King was going to be excommunicated. On the other hand, the Archbishop was deprived of his temporalities, during his absence from the kingdom. At length, after many contests for near three years together, the King and Pope happening to be in such circumstances, as made them equally wish to see an

(1) Henry encamped with a very large Army, near Hastings, about Midsummer. S. Dunelm. p. 226. Sax. Ann.

(2) Eadmer says, he was afraid of being excommunicated by Anselm, p. 49.

(3) See the Conditions at length in the Sax. Ann.

(4) Robert sent part of his Army back into Normandy, and kept the rest with him, which committed great Ravages whilst they staid in England. S. Dunelm. p. 227. Sax. Ann.

(5) Till Michaelmas. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 378.

(6) De Belesme, or de Bellisimo Castello, a fair Castle in Pereb: He was Son of Robert de Montgomery, and upon the Death of his Brother Hugh de Montgomery, the Earl of Shropshire and Arundel came to him in the tenth of W. Rufus.

(7) Those of Shrewsbury and Bridgnorth, as also those of Tickill in Yorkshire, and Arundel in Sussex. Ord. Vital.

(8) The King went first and besieged Arundel Castle in Sussex, which (being blocked up by several Forts about it) surrendered with the Earl's Leave. From hence the King marched to Bridgnorth, and spent three Weeks before it, and at last took the Castle by bribing the Welsh. After this the King demanded Shrewsbury of Robert de Novil and Ulger de Teables, (placed there as Governors by the Earl) and threaten'd, if it were not delivered up in three Days, he would hang all he should take therein. Upon which they treated with the King, and the Keys of the Castle were sent to him, by Ralph Abbot of Seys, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. Ord. Vital. p. 806, &c.

(9) This Earl had a vast Estate in Normandy. His Brothers were Arnulphe and Roger of Poitou.

(10) This Matter seems to have been debated in a Great Council of the Nation. See Eadmer, p. 62, 65, 66, 69.

(11) Rapin, who calls these Agents, Ambassadors, has named them wrong, following some modern Historians; and therefore the Names are here inserted as they stand in Eadmer, p. 63.

1103. end of the quarrel; the Pope permitted the Bishops to do homage to the King, and Henry gave up the right of Investiture. Thus ended this affair, which I have but just mentioned here, intending to treat more fully of it in another place.

1104. Though the King's contest with the court of Rome gave him a great deal of trouble whilst it lasted, it did not hinder him from minding his other affairs. Robert his Brother, who was then in England (1), found by experience how attentive this Monarch was to whatever might turn to his advantage. The reason of the Duke of Normandy's visit, was to press the payment of his pension. But Henry knowing his Brother's mild and generous temper, cared him in such manner, and gave him so good words, that he insensibly drew him in to desist from his demands (2). This unseasonable generosity cost the imprudent Duke very dear, since it proved in the end the occasion of his ruin. His easy and liberal temper had always spoiled his designs. We have already seen, in the beginning of the reign of William Rufus, how ill he consumed the money lent him by Henry, instead of employing it in keeping up his party in England; by which indiscreet management he lost the crown for that time. Afterwards, he borrowed ten thousand Marks of King William for his voyage to the Holy Land. This sum not sufficing to defray the great expence he was at, he contracted so many debts during the voyage, and since his return, that he was forced to mortgage almost all his Gives up his Pension.

W. Gemit.

Repents of it, and complains of the King.

Belesme raises troubles in Normandy. Ord. Vital.

Defeats the Duke, and aspires to the Dukedom.

He is joined by the Duke of Mortagne. Malmsh.

Robert makes Peace with him. Ord. Vital. p. 812.

1105. The Normans apply to the King of England. Ord. Vital. Malmsh.

without any hopes of protection from the Duke, resolved to apply to the King of England for relief. Their suit was very welcome to Henry, who only wanted a pretence to interpose in the affairs of Normandy, in order to have an opportunity of seizing the Duchy. But as this design was in itself very odious, he endeavoured to give it a colour of justice, by pretending to act from quite another motive. To this purpose, he writ a letter to his Brother (6), representing to him, that his conduct gave the Normans just cause of complaint, since he protected persons who ought to be deemed enemies to the publick: That the peace he had made with them, leaving the country exposed to their ravages, his Subjects could no longer consider as their Sovereign, a Prince from whom they could expect no protection: That he entreated him therefore to redress the grievances complained of by the Normans, or not think it strange, that upon his neglect, he should himself espouse the cause of those that applied to him. To these remonstrances, he added complaints of certain injuries, which he pretended to have suffered himself, and demanded speedy satisfaction. He would doubtless have taken it very ill, if the Duke had thus meddled with his affairs. But such is the unreasonableness of most Men, that they practise without scruple what they condemn in others, and fancy the world is so blind as not to see the injustice of their actions, because they are artfully covered with the cloak of charity.

Whilst Henry feigned to have no other design but to relieve the distressed Normans, he himself oppressed his own Subjects by an exorbitant tax. He pretended to be forced to go and wage war with the two tyrants of Normandy; a war wherein the English however were wholly unconcerned. Notwithstanding all his promises to the people, this tax was levied with all imaginable rigor, even to the imprisoning and plaguing various ways such as refused, or had not wherewithal, to pay it. As soon as his preparations were finished, he passed into Normandy with a numerous army (7), carrying with him large sums of money, with which he bribed the Nobles and Governors of the Castles. He could the better do this, as Robert was not in condition to cross his designs, or secure the allegiance of his Subjects by the same method. The present posture of affairs favouring the King more than at any other time, he seized upon Caen and some other cities (8). The Duke of Bretagne and the Earl of Anjou, even permitted him to garrison some of their Frontier-Towns, for fear of drawing upon themselves the burden of the war, designed against Robert. On the other hand, they that had invited him to their assistance, plainly foreseeing, if the quarrel was made up, it must be to their prejudice, never ceased exhorting him to push his conquests, and make himself master of all Normandy. They represented to him, it was the only way to ease them of the oppressions they lay under, since they could expect no assistance from their Sovereign. The Bishop of Sees, sworn enemy of the two Earls, who had turned him out of his Diocese, blew up the flame to the utmost of his power, and lost no opportunity to excite Henry to pursue his undertaking. One day, as he was with him in the Church of Carenton, he caused him to observe how full the Church was of goods, brought thither by the people, to secure them from the plundering Tyrants. This afforded him a pretence to make a long Speech, representing to the King that the rise of all their miseries was owing to the carelessness or connivance of the Duke; adding, that the country would never be restored to its former tranquillity, till they had another master. In fine, he conjured the King to take upon him the government, and free the Normans, the ancient Subjects of his family, from the wretched state they were reduced to. Henry, who only wanted a cloak for his injustice, listened very attentively to this speech; and pretending to be touched with compassion for the Normans, promised to exert his utmost to procure the relief they expected at his hands. However, he expressed an extreme concern that he was forced to deprive his Brother of his dominions, who by his incapacity was running headlong into destruction. Pursuant to this resolution, which he pretended to take purely out of necessity, and in compliance to the intreaties of the Normans, he continued the war. Robert made but a weak defence; for, not suspecting the King's designs, he had no time to pre-and passes over into Normandy, where he makes great Progress.

Henry sends an Army into England. Ord. Vital. Malmsh.

Ord. Vitalis. p. 815.

Malmsh.

(1) He came over in the Year 1103. Sax. Ann.

(2) It was the Queen that prevailed upon him to desist from it. See W. Gemitien, p. 675. Malmsh. p. 156. Knighten, p. 2276.

(3) He burnt many Towns and Churches, with the People that had fled to them for Safety; and the Abbey of Almanika. Ord. Vitalis.

(4) At Hiesmes. After which Robert de Belesme took the Fortrefs of Hiesmes and Gontel Castle, and many other Garrisons round about; and the neighbouring Territories submitted to him. Ord. Vital.

(5) He granted R. de Belesme his Father's Honours and Estates, the Bishoprick of Sees, the Forest of Gelfer, &c. Ord. Vital.

(6) He passed himself into Normandy, with a great Fleet, and visited Damfront, and other Towns subject to him; after which he had an Interview with his Brother, and reproved him for making a Peace with Robert de Belesme. Ord. Vital.

(7) In Lent. Sax. Ann. (8) He first took Bayeux, and burnt it almost to the ground; at which the Inhabitants of other Places, particularly those of Caen, were so frightened, that when Henry marched against them, they yielded to him, and expelled their Governor: for which good Service he bestowed on four of the chief Citizens of Caen the Manor of Dallington in Suffex, worth eighty Pounds per Annum Rent. Ord. Vital.

1105. pare. Wherefore Henry, having put his affairs upon so good a foot, in this first campaign, returned to England (1), with intent to raise, during the Winter, the money and forces he wanted, to finish the work so happily begun.

Sax. Ann.
Eadmer.

1106.
Robert goes for Peace.
M. Paris.
Ord. Vital.
Sax. Ann.
Fl. Warr.

The Duke of Normandy was then in a very deplorable condition. He perceived at length, his ruin was determined, but knew not how to prevent it. In this perplexity, he resolved to repair to the King his Brother, and try to move him by his submissions. As he was himself of a kind and generous disposition, he could not believe but the King was so too. Possessed with this notion, he came to England (2), and sued for Peace, in a manner suitable to his condition, but unbecoming the Son of William the Conqueror. Henry, who was not of so easy a nature, was deaf to all his intreaties. He bethought himself of improving the present juncture, to become master of Normandy. Accordingly, nothing could bring him to an accommodation, which would have very much lessened his pretensions. For this reason, he obstinately refused to enter into any Negotiation, and thought he dealt very kindly by his Brother, in permitting him to return. Robert despairing to prevail, departed, full of rage and vexation, and uttering great threats, which Henry little regarded. An Historian assures us however, the King felt some remorse for the injury he was doing his Brother, who had never given him any just cause of complaint, and from whom he had already taken a crown. But if he had any such reflections, they were very short-lived (3). The only effect they produced, was to inspire him with a dread, that his Brother's wrongs would move the compassion of the English, and revive the affection they had formerly shown for that Prince. This thought giving him some uneasiness, he judged it necessary to prepossess his Subjects in his favour, by renewing his promises. To this end, he convened the Great Council or Parliament (4), and endeavoured, in a studied speech, to demonstrate the justice of his undertaking. He represented to them, "That Robert's refusal of the kingdom of Jerusalem, had drawn "down on his head the vengeance of God; by whom, "ever since that time, he had been visibly forsaken, as a "Prince unworthy of his care, after despising to great a "favour (5). He aggravated the oppressions the Normans groaned under, and strove to make the English believe, it was incumbent on them to take in hand the defence of a miserable people. He desired the Lords to consider his own peaceable temper, and how patiently "he had taken his Brother's menaces, to which he had "made no other return, but brotherly and gentle admonitions. He enlarged upon the Duke's ill qualities. "He displayed his excessive profuseness, which made him "a continual burden to all the world. Moreover, he accused him of extreme arrogance, and of showing on "all occasions an utter contempt for the English nation. "He assured them, for his part, he still persisted in his resolution to govern by just Laws, of which the Charter he had granted, was an undeniable argument. In fine, he added, provided he was sure of the hearts and affection of the English, he valued not any thing his enemies could do against him." This Speech had the effect he expected. All the Lords thinking themselves honoured by the confidence he placed in them, and flattering themselves, that he would perform his promises, unanimously declared they would live and die in his service.

but can't obtain it.

Malmsh.
M. Paris.

M. Paris.

The English promised to serve the King against his Brother.

Remark on
the King's Speech.

What colour soever the King might give his ambition, it was easy to discover the weakness of the reasons alledg'd in vindication of his undertaking. The truth is, these reasons were not so much as plausible. The pretended refusal of the crown of Jerusalem, had no better foundation than an uncertain rumour spread in England, which, in all likelihood, was false, for the best Historians make no mention of this fact (6). But supposing the thing had been as true as it was doubtful, Robert possibly might have refused the crown out of modesty, as well as from a principle of pride or irreligion. But be this as it will, Henry could have no right from thence to deprive him of his dominions. It is evident therefore, the sole motive that engaged the English Lords to assure him of their assistance, was his solemn promise to see his Charter observed, which had been hitherto very much neglected.

Henry made use of the declaration of the English in his favour, to obtain a grant of fresh supplies, by means of which he made a considerable addition to his troops. As soon as the season permitted (7), he crossed the Sea with a numerous fleet (8), in order to complete the conquest of Normandy. He opened the campaign with the siege of Tinchebray, where the Earl of Mortagne, who had sided with the Duke, had thrown in a strong reinforcement. As this place was of great strength, and well provided with necessaries, it held out long enough for Robert to come to its relief. Ever since the Duke parted from the King his Brother, without being able to prevail with him, he had joined with the Earl of Mortagne and Robert de Belesme, who had led all their forces to his assistance. The King of France had also sent him some troops, and several Norman Lords (9) came to him with considerable bodies, as soon as they perceived Henry was not acting for them, but for himself. All these succours enabling the Duke to give his Brother battle, he marched towards him with that resolution. The two armies were almost equal in number. Robert had more foot, but not so many horse as the King. So, each side might flatter themselves with hopes of success. However, the battle, which was fought under the Walls of Tinchebray, did not last long. The Norman horse being put in disorder at the first onset, and the foot not being able to maintain the fight without their aid, the whole army was entirely routed, and the English had nothing to do but to kill or take prisoners. The Duke of Normandy perceiving there was no possibility of rallying his troops, and resolving not to turn his back, chose rather to be taken, than show the least signs of cowardice. Edgar Atheling, the Earl of Mortagne (10), four hundred Knights, and ten thousand Soldiers, had the same fate. As the battle of Hastings made the Normans masters of Malmsh. England, so this, which was fought forty years after, put the English in possession of Normandy. Prince Edgar, who had often been the sport of Fortune, was immediately released, and went and passed the residue of his days in England, where he died of extreme old age. The Duke of Normandy, and Earl of Mortagne, were not so favourably treated. The Earl was shut up in the Tower of London, and the Duke in Cardiff Castle in Wales, where he remained a prisoner to his death, which happened not till twenty-six years after. Some say, this unfortunate Prince attempting to make an escape, Henry order'd his sight to be taken away, by applying a burning-hot Brass Baton to his eyes (11). But the silence of the best Historians renders this fact something improbable. I do not pretend to excuse the hard-heartedness of the King, who ought to have called to mind Robert's generosity to him, during the siege of Mount St. Michael, though he had forgot he was his Brother. In vain does an Historian endeavour to justify him, by observing Robert never loved him during their younger years, and had done him many injuries. Such a reason will scarce serve the purpose, for which it is alledged by that author.

The victory of Tinchebray having acquired the King the possession of all Normandy, he returned in triumph to England (12). Upon his arrival, his first care was to make some regulations for his court, where several abuses had long since crept in which called for reformation. In the former reign, when the King took a progress, those who followed the Court, committed all manner of outrages in the places where they lodged. They shamefully extorted what they pleased from their Hosts, and attempted the chastity of the Women, without any restraint (13): Coins of false Money were grown very numerous and bare-faced, being secure of the protection of the Great, who set them at work in their Houses, where no body dared to search for them. These disorders not ceasing upon the King's Edict in the beginning of his 1106.

Henry returns to Normandy.
Sax. Ann.
V. 1106.
Fl. Warr.
W. Genet.

Battle of Tinchebray, where Robert was taken prisoner.

and shut up in Cardiff
Castle.
Mezerai.
M. Paris.

Henry becomes Master of all Normandy.
M. Paris.
Eadmer.
Malmsh.

(1) In Autumn. Sax. Ann.

(2) Before Lent, to Henry, who was then at Northampton. Sax. Ann.

(3) The Pope helped to disperse them, satisfying him that it would not be a Civil War, but a very great advantage to the Country. See Malmsh. p. 100.

(4) At London. M. Paris, p. 32.

(5) Hence it is plain, it was believed in England that Robert had refused the Crown of Jerusalem; otherwise Henry could not have urged it against his Brother. Rapin.

(6) It is mentioned by no Author older than Henry of Huntingdon, consequently 'tis only to be looked upon as a common Tradition.

(7) Before August. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 229.

(8) And the principal Nobility of the Kingdom. Fl. Warr. Ord. Vital.

(9) Particularly Robert de St. Valere, and William de Ferrars. King Henry had on his side William Earl of Saxony, Robert Earl of Meulan, William Earl of Waren, Earl of Maun, &c. Ord. Vital.

(10) And of Norman Barons, William Crispin, William de Ferrars, Robert de St. Valere, Senior. Eadmer, p. 92.

(11) Hence the Italian Word, Alacmaro, to blind. Menage, Orig. de la Langue Ital. Rapin.

(12) In Lent 1107. Sax. Ann.

(13) In the King's Progress his Attendants plundered every thing that came in their way, so that the Country was laid waste where the King travelled. For which cause People, when they knew of the King's coming, left their Houses, carrying away what Provision they could, and sheltering themselves in the Woods and By-places. The King ordered, that whoever spoiled any Goods of those that entertained them, should have their Persons, should they be taken, have their Eyes put out, or their Hands and Feet cut off.

1107. reign, he published a second with still greater Penalties. Severity was necessary to check the licence that was introduced into the kingdom, by the connivance that offences of this nature had hitherto met with (1).

1108. Before the war in Normandy, Henry had positively assured his subjects, he would govern according to equity, and maintain them in their privileges. But prosperity made him forget his promises. Immediately after his return, he was observed to be grown more haughty, and less popular than before. He treated the Nobles with an intolerable arrogance, even to the using, when speaking to them, very abusive language. Besides he little regarded his own Charter, nor corrected any abuses that turned to his profit. Anselm was the only person he showed any value for. The trouble that Prelate had given him, made him look upon all occasions of quarrelling with him as so many dangerous quick-sands, which he was resolved to avoid. But his precautions served only to render Anselm more haughty and imperious than before the contest. The Archbishop perceiving the King, for fear of being engaged in fresh disputes, refrained from meddling with ecclesiastical affairs, took the opportunity to prosecute, with the utmost rigour, the Priests who obstinately persisted in keeping their wives. His disgrace and long absence made them hope, they should at length be freed from his persecutions. But he quickly let them see, that, when once he begun a thing, he never left it unfinished. Some time after his return, he called a Synod (2), where at his instance, severe penalties were decreed against all clergymen who lived in the state of matrimony. There were even some that were deprived of their livings. But so far was this rigour from having any good effect, that it only proved the occasion of the Clergy's committing real crimes, in order to avoid the pretended excess they were engaged in before.

The King did not much concern himself in this regulation of the Synod. It was indifferent to him, whether the clergy married or lived single. And therefore he left the Archbishop to act as he pleased, without interposing in an affair that concerned him not. He was going to have another upon his hands more worthy his regard. Lewis the Great, King of France, who had just succeeded his Father Philip, looking upon Henry, since his acquisition of Normandy, as a very formidable neighbour, was seeking means to humble his overgrown power (3). To execute this project, he designed to make use of William, surnamed Crito, Son of Robert, a young Prince of great hopes, but under age. How careful soever he was to conceal his designs, Henry had notice of them, and passed suddenly into Normandy; where he ordered his Nephew to be taken into custody (4), to prevent any insurrection upon his account. Lewis, by this proceeding, perceiving his design had taken air, deferred the execution of it to a better opportunity. Mean time, the young Prince having made his escape, by means of his Tutor, was carried to Paris, and other courts, where he in vain solicited for assistance to recover the Duke his Father's dominions. The neighbouring Princes stood too much in awe of Henry to engage in such an undertaking. As for the Normans, though many of them were well inclined to the Son of their Sovereign, and several even contributed privately towards his maintenance, they durst however not openly declare in his favour.

1109. Henry having spent the Winter and part of the Summer in Normandy, returned to England (5), where soon after ambassadors came to him from the Emperor Henry IV, to demand his Daughter Matilda in marriage. He very joyfully received the proposal, and as soon as the articles were agreed upon, the wedding was celebrated by proxy. But as the Princess was very young, she continued in England till the year following, when she was sent to the Emperor her Spouse with a magnificent retinue, and a very considerable Sum for her portion.

The necessity of paying his Daughter's marriage-portion, furnished the King with a pretence to lay a tax of three shillings on every hide of Land. This tax brought him in an immense sum, if it be true, as some pretend to calculate it, that it was equal to 824,850*l.* of our present money. The custom of raising money for the marriage of the King's eldest daughter was introduced by this Prince, and very duly practised by his successors, who found it too beneficial to suffer it to be lost (6). Hence may be seen how prejudicial to a free people such innovations are, that become as a law by one single precedent.

Before the marriage was solemnized, death took out of the world Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury (7), a learned Prelate of that age, but haughty and bigotted to the last degree. 'Tis very reasonable to suppose that his zeal for the Court of Rome, his firmness in the affair of Investitures, and his constant endeavour to establish the celibacy of the Clergy in England, entitled him to a place in the Calendar. As soon as Anselm was laid in his grave, the King seized the revenues of the Archbishoprick, and kept them in his hands for five years. The Clergy were in hopes, the persecution they had suffered, during his life, would end with his death; but the Court of Rome was no less zealous to support what the Archbishop had done solely by her orders. Besides, the King, who was very unwilling to break with the Pope, strictly enjoined the execution of what was established. So that the Clergy were obliged to observe a seeming continency, by being debarred from marrying. But they privately made themselves amends for this restraint, in the commission of the most enormous crimes. At least, this is what the authors of that age make no scruple to lay to their charge.

The year 1110 was memorable for the revival of learning at Cambridge (8), from whence it had been long banished. According to the general opinion, Edward the Elder had formerly founded an university there. But the town had suffered so much by the Danish wars, that learning fell to decay, and never flourished again till the time we are speaking of (9).

The following year Henry crossed the Sea (10), to stop the progress of Fulk Earl of Anjou, who had caused the city of Constance in Normandy to revolt. Elias Earl of Maine, having espoused the interest of Fulk, and being taken prisoner in a battle, was put to death (11). Henry thought this instance of severity necessary to strike a dread into the Normans, whose revolt he was apprehensive of; well knowing, France would be ready to protect them.

Before the King went to Normandy, he admitted into England great numbers of Flemings, who by the inundation of the Sea in their own country, were compelled to seek for new habitations. He planted them at first in the waste parts of Yorkshire (12). But upon the complaints made to him after his return, he removed them to the country conquered from the Welsh, about Ros and Pembroke. Their posterity continue there to this day, retaining so much of their old customs and language, as distinguishes them plainly from the Welsh, and shows they are of foreign extraction.

Henry had not time to make a long stay in England (13). The year after, he was obliged to pass into Normandy, where the King of France had kindled a fresh war, by persuading the Earl of Anjou to take up arms again. This war gave him some trouble, but he happily surmounted all difficulties. Lewis had even the mortification to see the Earl of Anjou desert him, who, by that defection, reaped the advantage of marrying his daughter to Prince William, Son of King Henry. During the King's stay in Normandy, he had the satisfaction of having his most inveterate Enemy Robert de Belesme fall into his hands, who was sent into England, and kept prisoner all his life (14). These troubles being over, Henry returned to England (15), where he lived in peace the five following years, without any disturbance, except from the Welsh, who now and then made some incursions.

During this calm, the Pope and Clergy (16) at last prevailed upon him to permit the vacancies in the Church to

(1) Counterfeiters of Money were punished with Loss of Eyes and Genitals, Eadmer-----in the Year 1107, died Edgar, King of Scotland, and was succeeded by Alexander. Sax. Ann.
(2) Or rather a great Council, at London. See Eadmer, p. 94, 95.
(3) The Fortieth of Griffin was the Occasion of the War between the two Kings. See P. Daniel, Vol. III. p. 107-----108.
(4) He ordered Robert Fitz-Boschamp, Viscount d'Artois to arrest it. Ord. Vital.
(5) This was one of the ancient aids due to the King from his Tenants; and was practised in Normandy, and also in England, where the Normans settled. It was no otherwise introduced by Henry I, but as he happened to be the first Norman King that married his eldest Daughter.
(6) He died March 22. Sax. Ann.
(7) Or rather first Institution. See Petr. Blesensis, p. 114, 115. And above, p. 112, Note (6).
(8) This same year King Henry married Robert his natural Son to Anand, Daughter and Heir of Robert Fitz-Hugues, late Earl of Gloucester, and then invited him with that Earl's Son. He also held his Court at New Windsor, which he had built, and there distinguished himself by his Bravery, Politeness, Generosity, and William Bezanard, because they had sided with Helias Earl of Marne. Huntingd. p. 379. Sax. Ann. Brady, p. 1009.
(9) In August. Sax. Ann.
(10) He being put to death in 1110, Fulk Earl of Anjou, who had married Elias's only daughter, seized upon the English, and intended to do Henry Revenge for it. Huntingd. p. 379. Brady, p. 1004.
(11) Many of them perished over in the Reign of King William his Father, and also lately in his own; as they came in very great Swarms, they became a Burthen to the Nation: Whereupon Henry at first planted them in the waste parts of Normandy, and as they increased, and then into Wales in the Year 1111. What drew them over here, was that Queen Maud, Henry's Mother, was daughter to Bartholomew V, great Lord of the Flemings, a Work of theirs, is to be seen in Pembroke, extending through a long Tract of Land. Huntingd. p. 182. Ord. Vital. Camden.
(12) It does not appear he was in England and now August 1111, to July 1113. See Sax. Ann.
(13) In the Castle of Walsingham. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 380.
(14) Eadmer says, he did it by the Persuasion of his Bishops and Great Men, p. 110.

1109.

Anselm
Archbishop of Canterbury
(7), a learned Prelate of that age, but haughty and bigotted
to the last degree.

The Clergy
were in hopes, the persecution they had suffered, during his life, would end with his death;

S. Dunelm.
Eadmer.

Learning
at Cambridge
(8), from whence it had been long banished.

Henry crossed the Sea
(10), to stop
the progress of Fulk
Earl of Anjou,
who had caused
the city of Constance
in Normandy
to revolt.

England
great numbers of Flemings, who
by the inundation of the Sea
in their own country, were compelled to seek for new habitations.

Henry had not time to make a long stay in England
(13).

Henry settled them at first in the waste parts
of Yorkshire
(12).

Henry crossed the Sea
(10), to stop
the progress of Fulk
Earl of Anjou,
who had caused
the city of Constance
in Normandy
to revolt.

1114.

be filled, particularly the See of Canterbury, the revenues of which he had now enjoyed five years. As soon as he had given his consent, a Synod was convened, where Ralph Bishop of Rochester was unanimously chosen Archbishop, to the great satisfaction of the people, by whom he was very much esteemed. Thurstan one of the King's chaplains, was nominated to the See of York. At the same time all the other vacancies were filled, but with such partiality to the Normans, as gave the English just cause to complain.

Henry invades the Welsh.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.

The Welsh growing more and more troublesome on the borders, Henry determined not to chastise them only, but root them out entirely. To execute this barbarous resolution, he entered Wales with a numerous army, divided into three bodies, in order to surround them on all sides. But upon his approach, they having retired to their mountains, it was not possible for him to attack them. However he kept them long invested, but at last finding there was no drawing them from their retreat, consented to make peace. At his return to London, he received news of the consummation of his daughter Matilda's marriage, and her coronation at Mentz.

Brompt.
S. Dunelm.

1115.

The Normans take the Oath to Prince
William.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.
and likewise
the English.

Shortly after, Henry passed once more into Normandy (1), where he caused the States to swear fealty to Prince William his Son, who was then twelve years of age. The next year (2), he took the same precaution with regard to England in order to secure the crown in his family. To this end he summoned a General Assembly at Salisbury, where all that were present promised to acknowledge Prince William for their sovereign, after the death of the King his father, and accordingly took their oath to him. From this Assembly, some pretend to date the original of the right of the Commons sitting in Parliament. They maintain, that in imitation of what was practised in Normandy, Henry summoned the Commons as well as the Nobility and Clergy; and that this was the first time, the representatives of the people were admitted to sit in Parliament (3). Others affirm, the general assemblies of the nation had been diffused before this. In fine, there are who assure us, this assembly was the first that was styled a parliament. Of these three opinions the first can never be proved, the second is evidently false, and the third very uncertain (4).

1116.

Eadmer.

Ever since Lewis the Gros came to the crown of France, he had never ceased to disturb Henry, either by countenancing the Male-contents in Normandy, or stirring up the neighbouring Princes against him. Though he generally took care to act underhand, yet Henry was not ignorant that this Prince was the sole support of all these little troublesome enemies, and therefore to be even with him, undertook to combat him in his own way. Theobald Earl of Blois, his nephew, Son to his Sister Adela, being displeased with the King of France, Henry excites him to revenge; and persuading him to take up arms, lends him a powerful aid. Lewis, on his part, invested William Crito, Son of Robert, with the Duchy of Normandy, promising to assist him with all his forces to take possession. Supported by France and Baldwin Earl of Flanders, the young Prince attempted to wrest Normandy from the King his Uncle (5). Lewis did not now proceed underhand, but openly. He claimed, as sovereign Lord of Normandy, a right to dispose of that Duchy, and especially in favour of the only Son of Duke Robert, unjustly detained in prison.

1118.

His army being reinforced by a considerable body of troops, brought him by the Earl of Flanders, he entered Normandy with design to put William in possession.

As soon as Henry was informed of his enemies project, he made great preparations for the war, of which the English were obliged to bear the whole charge. When all was ready, he cross'd the Sea (6), and joining forces with the Duke of Bretagne (7) and Earl of Blois, he advanced towards the enemies to give them battle. But Lewis not thinking proper to expect him, chose to retire (8), covered with confusion at his own ill measures, and the ruin of his projects by Henry's diligence (9). Instead of maintaining what he had undertaken, he sent proposals of peace to Henry, which were accepted on condition he restored Gisors, then in his hands. After signing the treaty, Henry speedily returned into England (10), to prevent the entrance of a legate, sent by the Pope without his permission. Queen Matilda died some months after (11), lamented by all the English, as well for her merit as descent from their ancient Kings.

1118.
Henry goes to Normandy.
Makes Peace
with Lewis.
Huntingd.
Brompt.

Matilda dies.
Sax. Ann.
Malmsh.

Mean time, the King of France had still his former project in view. Henry neglecting to demolish the castle of Gisors according to the late treaty, Lewis took occasion from thence suddenly to invade Normandy, and commit great ravages. However, Henry remained quiet in England (12), seeming to take no notice of this insult. All the world was amazed at his carelessness. Nay, many ascribed it to want of courage. At length, one of his courtiers taking the freedom to represent to him, how much he wronged his reputation, he mildly answered, he had learnt of the King his father, that the best way to vanquish the French, was, to let them vent their first fury. But to show his slowness was not the effect of fear, he soon after passed into Normandy (13) with a powerful army, and offered his enemy battle. Lewis accepting the challenge, the two armies engaged. During the fight, a French cavalier, named Crispin, personally attacked the King of England, and struck him twice on the head with such force, that notwithstanding his helmet, the King was all over blood. However, he continued this single combat. The fight of his blood rousing his courage, he discharged so furious a blow at his adversary, that he tumbled him from his horse, and took him prisoner. This action raised such emulation among his troops, that at last, after a sharp engagement, the enemy was obliged to quit the field (14). The standard of France was taken and sent in triumph to Roan (15). Some time after, the two Kings came to a second battle (16), the success whereof was doubtful, both sides pretending to the victory. In a word, this war proved very sharp, and not a little troublesome to the two Monarchs.

Lewis renews the War.
Malmsh.

and is defeated by Henry.
Huntingd.
R. Diceto.
Brompton.

Ord. Vital.
p. 858.

Whilst hostilities were continued on both sides with equal warmth, Lewis endeavoured to take advantage of the residence of Pope Calixtus II, then in France, to embroil his enemy in new troubles. He was in hopes, the Pope, being of the house of Burgundy, would be easily induced to favour his designs. And therefore, without discovering his intentions, he prevailed with him to convene a council at Rheims, to which the English Bishops were summoned. Henry not mistrusting any thing from that quarter, readily permitted them to be present at the council. He only ordered them, when they took their leave, to salute the Pope in his name, to hearken to his apostolical precepts, but to take care to bring none of his new inventions into the kingdom. The council consisted mostly of French Bishops, some of whom being intrusted with their King's secret, made heavy complaints against Henry. They even proposed to excommunicate him, for unjustly detaining the person and dominions of the Duke of Normandy his Brother.

1119.
Council of Rheims.
Ord. Vital.
p. 885.

It is moved to excommunicate
Henry.

(1) He failed from Portsmouth, October 11. 1114. Sax. Ann.

(2) He returned into England in July 1115. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 237.

(3) Malmshury says, "All the Freemen of England and Normandy, of whatsoever Order or Dignity, or to what Lord soever they were Vassals or Tenants, were made to do Homage, and swear Fealty to William, Son of King Henry and Queen Matilda." But this is nothing like a Parliament. Polydore Virgil, and from him Stow and Speed's Chronicle, commence the beginning of our Parliaments from this Assembly, but without citing the least Authority for it.

(4) In the Year 1116, after Easter King Henry went over into Normandy, where he staid till November 1120. Sax. Ann.---in Normanniâ toto hoc tempore moratus. Malmsh. p. 165.

(5) And even Fulk Earl of Anjou, thinking it hard that he should be obliged to do King Henry Homage for the Earldom of Maine, entered into the League: As did also Almeric de Montfort, who was discontented because Henry refused to invest him with the Earldom of Evreux. As soon as the Confederacy was formed, Lewis lent to require Henry to set Robert at liberty; which he refusing to do, the Earls of Anjou and Flanders advanced towards the Frontiers of France, where they no sooner appeared, but William's Party rose up in arms, and proclaimed him Duke of Normandy. But what troubled Henry most, was, That a Conspiracy was formed against him, wherein one of his Favourites, and some of the Officers of his Bed-Chamber were concerned. See P. Daniel, Vol. III. p. 205.---212.

(6) He was there already, and had been ever since the Year 1116, after Easter. Sax. Ann.

(8) He staid but one Night in Normandy. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 380. Brompt. p. 1006.

(9) The French Historians make no mention of this Retreat, or of the Peace that followed it, and have confounded this War in 1118, with that which was renewed the same Year after the delivering up Gisors. Rapin.

(10) It does not appear that King Henry returned to England upon this occasion. Eadmer expressly says, that the Legate waited upon the King at Roan. p. 118. The Legate was Anselm, Nephew to the late Archbishop of that Name.

(11) She died the first of May, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. She was a pious and charitable Princess. Among other Works she built an Hospital for Lepers in London; and the Priory of Christ Church within Algate. Sax. Ann. Brompt. p. 1007. M. Paris, p. 51, 56. Malmsh. p. 165. Once as she was crossing the River Lea at Oldford near London; she was well washed, and in danger of being drowned: Whereupon she caused two Stone-Bridges to be built, in a place one Mile distant from the Oldford; one over the Lea at the Head of the Town of Stratford, and the other over another Stream thereof, commonly called Channel's-Bridge, and made the King's Highway of Gravel between the two Bridges. She gave also certain Manors, and a Mill called Wiggon-Mill, to the Abbots of Barking, for repairing of the same Bridges and Way. These were the first Stone-Bridges in England. And because they were arched like a Bow, the Town of Stratford was afterwards called Bow. Stow's Annals, p. 139. Hayward's Life of Henry I. p. 305.---This Year also died Robert Earl of Mellent the King's Counsellor. Huntingd. p. 380.

(12) This is a Mistake. He lay still at Roan---Apud Rothomagum se continebat. Malmsh. p. 160.

(13) This likewise is a mistake. He was there already.

(15) The King gave twenty Marks to the Man who brought it. His Horse was also taken, and sent back to him next day by Henry. Lewis was left alone, and lost himself in a Wood, from whence a Countryman conveyed him, without knowing him, to Andely, where the remains of his Army were retired. Ord. Vitalis, p. 885.

(16) It does not appear that it was any thing like a Battle. Lewis sent indeed and challenged Henry to a second Fight, but he did not think fit to accept of the Challenge. See P. Daniel, p. 211.

1119. ther, who as one of the Crusade, was under the Church's protection. This motion would, doubtless, have been approved by the majority, had not the Pope, who was unwilling to break with Henry, evaded it, by undertaking to exhort him himself to do justice to his Brother. Some time after, Calixtus came to Gisors, where he had a long conference with the King, intimating, it was the council's desire that Robert should be restored to his dominions. Henry replied, He had not taken Normandy from his Brother, but from dissolute Men and Robbers, that were consuming the inheritance of his Ancestors, given up to them by Robert. Adding, he had not proceeded of his own head, but by the solicitations of the Nobility, Clergy, and People of Normandy, who earnestly befought him to prevent the utter desolation of the Church. He took care to strengthen these reasons with magnificent presents, which wrought so upon the Pope and the Cardinals his attendants, that at their return, they gave out, they had never seen a more eloquent Prince. Thus Calixtus, relinquishing the interest of the imprisoned Duke, used his endeavours to procure a peace between the two (1) Kings, in which he succeeded the next year (2).

1120. As soon as the peace was concluded, Henry, impatient to return to England, from whence he had been long absent (3), embarked at Barfleur (4) with a numerous retinue of Nobles. William his Son, who was then sixteen years of age (5), took with him in his Vessel, all the young Nobility, to render his passage more agreeable. As he sailed last, he had a mind to overtake the King his Father, and promised the Seamen a reward if his Ship arrived first. This idle emulation was probably the cause of the misfortune that befell him. As the Pilot, in order to get before the King, kept too near the shore on the coast of England (6), the Ship touched upon a rock (7), and split. In the fright caused by this accident, the Seamen's first care was to hoist out the Boat, in order to save the Prince, and indeed, by their diligence he was now out of danger. But as he was making off, the cries of Matilda, his natural Sister, prevailed with him to row back to take her in. His approach, giving others opportunity to leap in, the Boat sunk with its load, without any possibility of saving the Prince. Of all that stayed in the Ship, there were but very few (8) that escaped by swimming. From these circumstances of this tragical accident came to be known. Among those that perished in the waves, were, besides the Prince, one of his natural Brothers called Richard, Matilda his Sister Countess of Perche, Lucia the King's Niece, the Earl of Chester, and several Lords, whose debauched lives, as is pretended, but too justly brought down this Judgment on their heads (9).

1121. This unexpected accident made such impression on the King, that he was never after seen to laugh. However, his extreme desire to repair his loss, made him resolve to marry Adeliza daughter of Geoffrey Earl of Louvain. But he had not the satisfaction he expected from this marriage, she never proving with child.

The same year the Welsh made an incursion into Cheshire, under the conduct of Griffin Prince of North-Wales (10). They burnt several Castles, and committed such ravages that they drew the English arms into their own country. Henry, at the head of his troops, made some progress at first, but one day, wanting to seize a certain pass, he fell into an ambush, where he lost many of his Men, and was shot himself by an arrow on his Breast-plate. This accident, and the fear of not ending the war so successfully as he expected, preventing him from proceeding any further, he made a peace with Griffin. However, he obliged him to give hostages, and a thousand head of cattle, to defray the charges of the war.

1122. Shortly after, death took out of the world Ralph Archbishop of Canterbury (11). This Prelate was of an unblameable life, but so great a Stickler for the prerogatives of his See, that he could not bear the least infringement, even in things of the smallest consequence. For instance, on the solemn festivals, when the King was wont to wear his crown, he would not suffer him to put it on himself, pretending that office belonged, on all occasions, to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The metropolitical See continued vacant till the next year, when Corbet (12), Abbot of St. Bennet's, was elected by a Synod held at Winchester for that purpose (13).

Henry imagined by the peace with the King of France, he had removed all occasions of war beyond Sea, and that none would dare for the future to dispute with him the possession of Normandy. Nevertheless, Robert de Mellent, Lord of Pont-Audemer created him fresh troubles, which obliged him to pass once more into that duchy (14). This Lord, who was in great credit with the Normans, and secretly countenanced by the King of France, undertook to restore William Crito to his dominions. This project was in such forwardness, that the country was going to revolt, if the King had not speedily repaired thither (15). On his arrival, he laid siege to Pont-Audemer, and took it. After which, he added some works to the castles of Caen, Roan, and Arques, and reinforced the garriçons. These precautions put a stop to the Normans, who did not think themselves able to execute their designs. However, Robert de Mellent, and the Earl of Montfort his associate, kept the Field with some troops. But being drawn into an ambush, they were both taken prisoners, and the rest remained quiet.

1125. Whilst the King was in Normandy, Cardinal John de Crema, the Pope's Legate, came into England. The design of his coming was to compleat the reformation of the pretended great abuse of the Clergy's marrying, which they still did, notwithstanding all the precautions to the contrary. The Legate was received with great pomp, though the people were little pleased with it, not being used to see Legates exercising their authority in the kingdom. A Synod being convened by the Legate at London, he caused several rigorous Canons to be passed against such Ecclesiasticks, as persisted in keeping their wives (16). These Canons however were not capable to stop this pre-

(1) The Articles of which were, 1. That all Castles and strong Holds taken in the late War should be mutually restored, and the Prisoners on both sides set at liberty without ransom. 2. That Henry should do Homage for Normandy. But Henry thinking it a diminution of his Royal Dignity to do this Homage in Person, he made his Son William do it; who then received the Investiture of that Duchy from the hands of the King of France; and all the great Men of Normandy swore Fealty to him. Ord. Vital. p. 163. P. Daniel, p. 212. S. Dunelm. p. 242. Brompt. p. 1012. Malmsh. p. 165. Prince William went, in the Year 1119, in May, to his Father in Normandy, and there married, in June the same Year, Matilda, daughter of Fulk Earl of Anjou; the Marriage was solemnized at Lisieux in Burgundy. Sax. Ann. Malmsh. p. 165. Sandford, p. 29. Ord. Vital. See Tyrrel, p. 157.

(2) Father Daniel says, the Pope threatened Henry to excommunicate him, and did so. But the English Historians speak in a different manner of this Interview. Rapin.

(3) Almost five years; namely, ever since after Easter, in 1116.

(4) On the 26th of November. Ord. Vital. The 25th says Malmsh.

(5) He must have been near Eighteen, since he was born in 1102. Sandford, p. 28. S. Dunelm. p. 242. Hoveden, p. 476.

(6) It was in or near the Harbour of Barfleur. Chr. T. Wikes, p. 26. Ord. Vitalis.

(7) Called Chateraje. Hoveden, p. 476.

(8) All the Historians agree there was but one escaped, and that a Butcher. Malmsh. p. 165. S. Dunelm. p. 142. Eadmer, p. 135. Brompt. p. 1012.

(9) There perished in this Shipwreck a hundred and forty Officers and Soldiers, fifty Sailors, with the Officers belonging to the Ship; many of the Nobility of both Sexes, &c. about three hundred in all. Most of them were drunk. See S. Dunelm. p. 242. Ord. Vitalis. This was looked upon as a just Judgment by our Historians, for their being polluted with the Sin of Sedomy. The loss of this young Prince was not very unhappy for the English Nation, in that he became which Brompton relates from Malmsh. (though we can't find it in his History) that he had such an Aversion to the English, that he threatened, if ever he came to be King, he would make them draw the Plough like Oxen. By this fatal accident, the Perfess, Heritors, and Estates of the Heirs of most of the great Men were in Henry's Power; by which means he strengthened his Interest in England by marrying their Widows, Daughters, and Sisters, to his Courtiers and Officers. Ord. Vit. Brompt. p. 1012. Huntingd. M. Paris.

(10) Being encouraged thereto by the Death of Richard Earl of Chester, drowned with Prince William.

(11) He died the twentieth of October. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 246.

(12) All the Historians call him William de Curbeil, or Curbusil. See Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 382. S. Dunelm. p. 247. And then he was Prior of Chibch, or St. Ofsib in Essex, not of St. Bennet's. Hoveden, p. 477. R. de Diceto, p. 504. Brompt. p. 1014.

(13) At Gloucester. See Sax. Ann. The same year King Henry cut a Dike from Tonky to Lincoln, between the Witham and the Trent, seven Miles in length. It is called Fisj-Dike. S. Dunelm. p. 243. Camden. And the same year Ralph Bishop of Darham laid the Foundations of Newham Castle, upon the Tweed. S. Dunelm. ibid.

(14) The first that declared for William Crito was Almeric Earl of Montfort and Evreux; who was joined by Waleran and Robert, the Sons of Robert Earl of Mellent, William de Romara, Hugh de Montfort, Hugh de Newcastle, William Lupell, Baldric de Braye, Pagan de Gisors, &c. Ord. Vital. Sax. Ann. P. Daniel, p. 214, &c. King Henry, finding that these Barons were supported by the King of France, declared War against him; and not long after both Armies came to an Engagement near the Village of Tenude, about two or three Leagues from Roan, on March 26; wherein the French were routed. Earl Waleran, Hugh de Montfort, and Hugh de Newcastle, with eighty other Knights, were taken Prisoners. Against whom King Henry proceeded with great Severity, notwithstanding the Intercession of the Earl of Flanders, who was then at his Court. The Earl of Mellent was forced to surrender his whole Inheritance to Henry to save his Life; though he was restored to it in 1129. Hugh de Newcastle was kept a Prisoner five Years; and Hugh de Montfort eighteen at Gloucester. Geoffrey de Tourville, Odard de Pine, and Luke de Barre, had their Eyes put out. Those that signalized themselves in this Battle, were, Eudo de Borling, William de Tancarville, King Henry's Chamberlain, William de Grandcourt, &c. Ord. Vitalis. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 250. P. Daniel, &c.

(15) He spent his Easter at Winchester, and from thence went to Portsmouth, where he remained all Whitsun-Week, and then passed into Normandy. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 250. Brompt. p. 1014.

(16) The Legate having severely inveighed against the Priests marrying, alledged, it was a horrid Sin for a Priest to rise from the Side of a Harlot, and then to make the Body of Christ; yet the next Night, (having said Mass that very Day) he himself was taken in Bed with a Whore. Huntingd. who was himself a Priest and the Son of a Priest, and living at this very time, (after an Apology for making bold with the Fathers of the Church) is the first that gives us this Story at large, and concludes, that the Thing was too notorious to be denied, neither ought it to be concealed, p. 382. See Brompt. p. 1015.

1125.
The King wound at Bromp.

tended Licentiousness, though the King strictly enjoined their observance. But Henry's aim was not so much to prevent the Clergy from marrying, as to obtain of the Pope, by this seeming zeal, a power to execute the decrees of the Councils on this article, as it happened in the year 1129. When once he was invested with this authority, he gave the Priests leave, without scruple, to keep their wives, upon payment of so much money for a dispensation (1).

1127.
Henry gets Matilda
known his
Sax. Ann.
Malmib.

The King had now, for six years, been expecting in vain that God would bless him with children by his second wife. When he found, after so long a time, there was no likelihood of obtaining what he desired, he was quite out of hopes. However, to secure the succession in his family, he resolved to have his daughter Matilda, who since the Emperor's death was returned to England (2), acknowledged the presumptive heir to the crown. The advantage this Princess had, of being descended by the Mother's side from the antient Saxon Kings, endeared her to the English, who were not yet inured to the Norman yoke. On the other hand, for want of a Prince of their own nation, it was the interest of the Normans to place on the throne a granddaughter of William the Conqueror, to whom they were indebted for all their possessions in England. The case standing thus, the King was in hopes to succeed in his design, and assembled all the immediate Vassals of the crown (3). Among the Lords, present at this great council, were, Stephen Earl of Boulogne, the King's Nephew, and David King of Scotland (4), on account of the Fiefs he held in England (5). All the members of the assembly consenting to the King's proposal, David and Stephen were the first that took the oath to Matilda, in case the King her father died without issue male.

Matilda married to Geoffrey Plantagenet.
Hunt.
Hoved.
M. Paris.

This affair being transacted to the King's satisfaction, he married the Empress to Geoffrey Plantagenet, Son of Fulk Earl of Anjou (6), who had resigned his dominions to his Son, in order to go and take possession of the crown of Jerusalem, upon the death of Baldwin II. his Father-in-law. The King, in making choice of Earl Geoffrey for his daughter, consulted his own interest more than Matilda's inclination. This Princess, widow to an Emperor, thinking it a disparagement to marry the Earl of Anjou, very unwillingly gave her consent, and not without some compulsion from her Father. As he was in continual apprehensions that William Crito, his Nephew, would take Normandy from him, he thought he could not do better than secure Geoffrey in his interest, that he might be always ready to assist that Duchy in case of attack.

The Barons
are displeased with
the Match.

If Matilda showed some reluctance to comply with her Father's will, the English and Norman Barons seemed no less dissatisfied with this alliance. They imagined, they ought to have been consulted in an affair which was to give them a King. Moreover, some had secretly flattered themselves with one day mounting the throne, by marrying the Empress. It was easy therefore to foresee, that the oath by which the King meant to bind them, would be of little force after his death. But besides that he imagined none would venture to break it, his dread of the King of France and William Crito, caused him to consider only the present advantage procured him by the marriage of his daughter.

1128.
Critt male Earl of Flanders.
Sax. Ann.
S. Dunelm.

He was very justly apprehensive of a League between Lewis and William Crito. The King of France no longer concealing his design of putting the young Prince in possession of his Father's dominions, had now invested him with the Earldom of Flanders, the better to enable him to wage war with the King his Uncle. To prevent his Enemy's designs, Henry used two methods with equal success. The first was, to carry the war into France. The second, to engage the Flemings to rise against their new Earl, and join with Theodoric of Alsatia, who pretended to Flanders. Pursuant to his Scheme, he entered France with a powerful army, whilst, on the other hand, the towns of Flanders openly declared against his Nephew. Alost was the first William undertook to reduce to obedience, by a Siege which lasted long enough to give his Rival time to come to its relief. William having intelligence of Theodoric's approach, went to meet him, and gaining a compleat victory, returned to carry on the Siege. The defeat of the Landgrave of Alsatia would have disabled the Besieged to hold out any longer, if in one of their sallies William had not received a wound (7), of which he died in a few days. This young Prince was endued with courage, and several other good qualities. But, to avoid the misfortunes the Duke his Father had drawn upon himself by his profuseness, he ran into the contrary extreme (8). This failing, joined to some acts of violence committed by him in Flanders, and his immoderate love of women, gained him the hatred of the Flemings, and disposed them to listen to the solicitations of the King his Uncle. The unlucky accident of this Prince's sudden death, and the presence of the English army in France, obliged Lewis to desist from his projects, and conclude a peace with Henry. From that time to the day of his death, the King had no more quarrels with France. Neither do we find in the residue of his reign, which lasted six years longer, but very few occurrences worth notice, the principal of which I am going to relate.

In the 30th year of his reign, being likewise the 30th of the Century, Henry went over to Normandy, where he spent the best part of a year. His main business was an interview with Pope Innocent II. whom at length he owned for the true Pope, though Anacletus his rival was master of Rome. The chief difficulty of this affair, consisted in the Acknowledgment of Innocent by France, and, in Henry's inclining, for that reason, to Anacletus. But Innocent managed him so artfully, that he was owned by him for Pope, which did not a little turn to his advantage.

Henry, when he returned to England (9), brought with him his daughter Matilda, who upon some disgust was parted from the Earl her Husband. Upon his arrival, he called a General Assembly (10), where the oath of fealty to the Empress was renewed, after which she went back to her Husband, who desired her company.

The year 1132 was remarkable for the founding of an Episcopal see at Carlisle, and the burning great part of London. As the houses were mostly built of wood, this City was frequently subject to the like accidents.

The next year, a new occasion of Joy blotted out the remembrance of this misfortune. Matilda was brought to bed of a Prince, named Henry after his Grandfather. Immediately after the birth of this Prince, the King assembled all the great Men, and caused them to renew the oath of the succession, in which the new-born Prince was included. This was the third time he made them take this oath, which however was never the better observed. Matilda had two Sons more, namely, Geoffrey and William, of whom I shall have occasion to speak hereafter.

Towards the latter end of the Summer, the King went over for the last time to Normandy. The day he embarked, there was an eclipse of the Sun, and two days after a great Earthquake, Flames of fire issuing out of the cliffs of the Earth with great violence. Some will have these accidents to be presages of the King's death, which however did not happen till two years after. Robert his eldest Brother died before him at the Castle of Cardiff, where he had been prisoner twenty-six years (11). He was a Prince of great courage, and for some time, of great reputation. His easy, careless and profuse temper, made him lose twice the opportunity of acquiring the crown of England, which he had a better claim to, and perhaps was more deserving of than his Brothers. He was surnamed Courte-hose, either for wearing his Breeches very short, or because his Legs were not long enough in proportion to the rest of his body (12). Some give him the Surname of Courteous, mistaking the meaning of the Word Courte-hose, and because that name was suitable to his generous temper.

(1) In 1126, September 11, King Henry returned to England from Normandy, having been there ever since William's death, 1123. See Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 254. Brompt. p. 1015. Huntingdon, p. 383.

(2) After her Husband's death in 1125, she came to the King her Father in Normandy; and in 1126, came over to England along with him. Brompt. p. 1015. Sax. Ann. Malmib. p. 175. S. Dunelm. p. 251.

(3) The Archbishop, Bishops, Abbots, Earls and Thanes. Sax. Ann.

(4) He came to England in 1126, after Michaelmas, and spent a whole Year here. Sax. Ann.

(5) Namely, Huntingdonshire, Northumberland, and Cumberland.

(6) He sent her, after William's death, to Normandy, where she was attended by Robert Earl of Gloucester, and Brian, Son of Alan Fergeant Earl of Richmond, with Orders that the Marriage Ceremony should be performed by the Archbishop of Reims. Henry himself went over into Normandy, August 20, to see the Marriage concluded. Sax. Ann. Malmib. p. 175. Huntingdon, p. 383. S. Dunelm. p. 255. Geoffrey, Earl of Anjou, was but fifteen years old. P. Daniel, p. 223.

(7) Taking hold of a Man's Lance, he was wounded in the Ball of the Thumb; which turning to a Gangrene, he died five days after in St. Bertin's Monastery, on July 27. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 255. P. Daniel, p. 225. See his Tomb and Epitaph in Sandford, p. 17.

(8) Upon which account he is, in the Belgeick Histories, surnamed Miser. Tyrrel, p. 172.

(9) About the beginning of July, in 1131. S. Dunelm. p. 256. Sax. Ann. Malmib. p. 177.

(10) At Northampton. Huntingdon, p. 384. Malmib. p. 177.

(11) It was about twenty-seven, namely, from 1107 to 1134, February 10. Ord. Vitalis. W. Goussier.

(12) Malmibury says he was so named, because he was small of Stature, p. 153.

1133. He was buried at Gloucester in the Choir of the Cathedral, where his tomb is still to be seen (1).

1135. The death of Robert was quickly followed by that of the King his Brother. About the latter end of August, 1135, he was seized with a violent illness, which carried him off in seven days. It is said, he was the occasion of it himself, by eating to excess of some Lampreys, of which he was very fond. He was then at the Castle of Lyon near Roan, a place he much delighted in. When he found he was near his end, he sent for the Earl of Gloucester his natural Son, and earnestly recommended to him the concerns of the Empress his daughter, without mentioning the Earl of Anjou his Son-in-law, with whom he was displeased. After this, he made his Will, leaving to his domesticks above sixty thousand Pounds Sterling. He ordered his debts to be punctually paid, and all arrears due to him to be remitted. He died on the second of December (2), in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirty-sixth of his reign. His Body was cut in pieces in order to be embalmed (3), after the rude manner of those days, because he was to be buried in England, in the Abbey of Reading (4).

We find in this Prince a great mixture of good and bad qualities. He was very courageous, and of a great capacity, both in military and civil affairs. His prudence in the administration of his government appeared chiefly in that during his frequent voyages to Normandy, there was never any insurrection in England, though the kingdom did not want Malecontents. He was exceeding regular in his diet. Never was he known to be guilty of any excess in eating or drinking, except that which cost him his Life. He was inexorable to all Malefactors, being persuaded, severity was absolutely necessary to curb the Licentiousness introduced in the late reign. His education was the reverse of that of William Rufus: Whereas this last had no learning at all, Henry was brought up to Letters, and made great progress in his Studies. Hence he acquired the surname of Beau-Clerc, that is, the Scholar, for in those days none but Ecclesiasticks troubled themselves about Books, and Princes least of all others. He retained all his life long a relish for the Sciences, imbibed in his youth. He had even built a Palace at Oxford, where he often retired to divert himself with the conversation of the Learned. His handsome Face, his sweet and serene Looks, his free and open Countenance, his affable Carriage and agreeable Conversation, prepossessed at first sight all the World in his favour. These fine qualities, would have rendered him an accomplished Prince, had they not been sullied with many faults, among which, Cruelty, Avarice, and an inordinate love of Women, were most predominant. The first appeared in the barbarous usage of his elder Brother. The second, in his exorbitant and Levant taxes on the People. The third, in the great number of Bastards by several Mistresses. I shall not stay to remark here his usurpation of the crown; because it may be objected, Robert's claim was not incontestable, by reason of the diversity of opinions on that subject. But for his injustice to his Brother, in depriving him of his dominions, and detaining him prisoner twenty-six years, I think nothing can be alledged to excuse it. In order to repair in some measure his misdemeanours, he founded the Episcopal Sees of Ely and Carlisle, and the Abbies of Reading, Hyde, Chester, with the Priory of Dunstable (5). This was the method of atoning for offences, much in vogue in those days, which being very easy for the Rich and Powerful, was long in use and is still practised to this day. The Charter this Prince granted the Nation upon his accession to the Crown, is one of the most remarkable particulars of his reign, during which England enjoyed a prodigious plenty of all things. For a Shilling might be bought as much corn as would serve one hundred men a day; and for a Groat, which was also the price of a Sheep, as much hay and oats as twenty Horses could eat in the same time. It is true indeed, Money was then much scarcer than at present.

Henry left only one legitimate daughter, namely, the Empress Matilda, and twelve natural Children. Among whom Robert Earl of Gloucester made the greatest figure (6), as well on account of his personal merit, as for his steady adherence to the Empress his Sister, as will be seen in the following reign (7).

The 1135.

Ord. Vitul.

His Character.

(1) He lies in the middle of the Choir, where, not long after, was erected for him a Tomb of Wainscot in the form of a Chest, with his Image thereon Crois-legged, carved to the Life in heart of Oak. Upon the Panels of the Chest are pencilled the Arms of several of the Worthies, and at the foot, the Arms of France and England Quarterly, which show these Escutcheons to be painted since the Reign of Henry IV. The Parliament Soldiers in Charles I's time tore it to pieces, but the Panels (ready to be burnt) were bought of the Soldiers by Sir Humphrey Truoy of Stamford, and after the Restoration, put together again, and beautified at his own Charge, and defended with a Wire-crown. Sandford. Huntingden says he died of Grief for being forced to wear a cast-off Coat of the King his Brother.

(2) Rapin by mistake says September. He died about Midnight the first of December, being Sunday.

(3) Gervase of Canterbury gives us the barbarous manner of embalming the King's Body. They cut great Gashes in his Flesh with Knives, and then powdering it well with Salt, wrapped it up in tanned Ox-hides to avoid the Stench, which was so infectious, that a Man who was forced to open his Head died presently after.

(4) Though there is no mention of this King's Monument, the Monks of Reading are thought to erect a Tomb answerable to the Dignity of their Founder. Upon the Supplication of the Abbeys, his Bones were said to be thrown out to make room for a Stable of Horses. The Monastery is now a Dwelling-house. Sandford.

(5) Among his other Buildings was a magnificent Palace at Windsor, to which he adjoined a large Park, inclosed with a Stone Wall, which is affirmed to be the first Park in England. Though there were afterwards so great a Number, that there were computed more in this Kingdom, than in all the Christian World besides.

(6) The rest of his natural Children were; II. Richard the Widow of Anstil a Nobleman in Oxfordshire. He was crowned with Prince William. III. Reynald eldest Earl of Connaught in the 5th of Stephen, by Sibyl Daughter of Sir Robert Count of Meer in Warwickshire. IV. Robert by Edith, Daughter of a Norman Gentleman. V. Gilbert, mentioned without any particulars by St. Gervase. VI. William de Tracy, named from a Town in Normandy. VII. Henry, by Nella Daughter of Rees ap Idris, Prince of South-Wales. (Who afterwards, of Gerald of Wexford, Count of Pembrokeshire, Castle, and Ancestor of the Earls of Kildare in Ireland.) He was born and bred, and lived and married in Wales, having two Sons, Malcol and Robert. He left his Line in the Contract betwixt Margaret Son of the King of Norway, and Isabel Montgomery Earl of Straceghery, 1160. VIII. Maud, Wife of Retro Earl of Porto. She was crowned with Prince William. IX. Another Maud married to Conan the Great, Earl of Breton. X. Jocan married to Eustace de Paais, natural Son of William de Breteuil, eldest Son and Heir of William, and eldest Brother of Roger Earl of Hertford in England. XI. Constance Wife of Reynald, Viscount Baron at a Town of Maase in France, and by him Mother of Edward Viscount Baron, Father of Edward King of England and Queen of William King of Scotland, and of Constance de York, to whom King John confirmed the Gift of her Grandmother Coyfard. XII. Elizabeth, the Sister of Elizabeth Sister of Walter Earl of Mellent, married to Alexander King of Scots. These, with two other natural Daughters, are mentioned by Gervase, f. 1. s. c. 29.

